PREFACE.

THE Author of "BLACK BESS; OR, THE KNIGHT OF THE ROAD," has one request to make.

It is, that those who have, unread, condemned the present work, will take the trouble to peruse it. An entire change of opinion will be the result; because in no place will vice be found commended and virtue sneered at; nor will any pandering to sensuality, suggestions of impure thoughts, or direct encouragement to crime be discovered; neither are there details of seduction, bigamy, adultery, and domestic poisonings, such as are indispensable ingredients of our popular three-volume novels. On the contrary, the work will be found full of exciting personal adventures, such as can never be re-enacted until Railways are swept away, and Stage Coaches replaced on our High-roads—until, in fine, the present state of things is changed to what it was a century and a half ago. If anyone is weak-minded enough to be carried away by the idea that a highwayman's career as depicted in these pages can be played in reality at the present day, he must be imbecile indeed. Let not the "Life of Robin Hood" fall into the hands of such a one, or, sure as fate, Sherwood Forest would be his destination, with a bow and arrows for his stock-in-trade.

Seriously, however, such a state of mind, so produced, would of course work its cure in a little while, before much harm was done; and the victim, thoroughly cured, would laugh heartily at his past folly.

To the Public which has received the work with such unexampled favour the Author begs to express his best acknowledgments, coupled with the hope that his next effort will not be found unworthy of their support.

London.

BLACK BESS;

OR, THE

KNIGHT OF THE ROAD.

A ROMANCE.

[DICK TURPIN STOPS THE LORD MAYOR'S CARRIAGE.]

CHAPTER I.

DICK TURPIN WAYLAYS AND ROBS THE EX-LORD MAYOR OF LONDON ON WIMBLEDON COMMON.

THE rim of the rising moon was just peeping above the horizon, and a few faint, sickly beams of light shot up from it into the night sky, giving to all objects a dim, spectral-like appearance.

Standing in the middle of the high road which skirts Wimbledon Common on the north side was a horse and rider.

The moonlight shimmered upon both with a strange effect.

At first sight it seemed as though a lambent flickering flame was playing over them, from the horse's hoofs to the long feather in the rider's hat.

This was caused by the peculiar tint the vapours on the horizon gave to the moon's rays.

The horseman was leaning forward in his saddle in an attitude of intense listening.

There was something remarkably picturesque and romantic about him as he sat so still upon his steed in the centre of the deserted highway.

He was tall and muscular, and sat in the saddle with an ease and grace as rare as it was admirable.

His attire was well calculated to set off his figure to the greatest advantage; it was that so much affected by military officers in the reign of the second George.

A three-cornered black felt hat, trimmed with broad gold lace, and with a long black feather trailing from it.

A cravat of spotlessly white muslin tied in a large bow, with the ends depending almost to the waist.

A crimson-coloured coat, very long in the waist and very stiff in the skirts trimmed and faced also with gold lace.

A waistcoat of the same materials and colour, coming low down on the hips.

Close-fitting pantaloons of white leather, and large black boots coming up high above the knee.

Such was the costume which he wore.

We have said nothing of the jewellery upon his person, and which glistened faintly in the moonlight. A refined taste would have considered there was a little too much of it.

Of the steed which he bestrode, and which was no other than the mare so celebrated in song and story—Black Bess—we feel it is perfectly unnecessary to say a word in the shape of description.

Her rider—whom we may as well at once call by name, Dick Turpin—had, at the moment we introduce him to our readers, one hand upon her neck.

We have said he was listening intently.

So Bess appeared to be, for her ears were projected forwards.

Upon the soft miry road—for it had been raining heavily a few hours before—was an indistinct grating sound.

None, however, but the most practised listener could have detected it, or, if they had, could have told what it really was.

To Dick the sound was perfectly intelligible.

A carriage was approaching, though as yet it was at a considerable distance.

Very rapidly, however, the sound grew louder and the trampling of horses' hoofs began to mingle with the grating, crushing noise.

Then the light of the carriage lamps flashed through the gloom and cast a dim halo around.

It was one of those capacious, comfortable vehicles, in which our great-grandfathers delighted to ride.

Two powerful horses drew it along at a rapid rate.

There were no armorial bearings upon the carriage, but the gaudy ornamentation about it was sufficient to show that it belonged to no member of the aristocracy.

The stout coachman though, who sat on the box and drove the horses in a dignified sort of way, had something of that appearance.

So also had the footman, who sat with his arms folded before him in the dickey.

The occupants of the carriage were two persons, upon whom the sun of glory had risen, shone, and set.

And all within the space of twelve months.

That period of time had comprehended their butterfly existence.

In a word, they were the ex-lord mayor and ex-lady mayoress of London.

It was the ninth of November, and he had yielded his title and office to another.

He had not, however, been wholly overlooked, as most are, when their term of office has expired; the civic authorities had somehow taken it into their sapient heads that he had fulfilled his onerous duties with more than common ability, so they had, the previous three months, been busily engaged in getting up a testimonial in the shape of a large gold cup, very elaborately chased and ornamented.

A fulsome inscription engraved upon it set forth at length the suppositious talents of Lord Mayor Funge.

Such was his euphonious appellation.

Ezekiel Funge.

Of course the presentation of this cup increased his pomposity and arrogance in no small degree.

He lolled back in the carriage with a most complacent smile upon his lips.

It had been there ever since he had received the golden cup. He could not trust it out of his sight, and when he set out for his residence at Mortlake he had put it into the carriage with him.

When we say he could not trust it out of his sight, we speak literally, for the cup was placed on the cushions on the opposite seat, so that as he stretched out his legs and leaned back, he could contemplate its beauties through his half-closed eyelids.

The quantity of fat upon his face prevented his opening them to any great width.

"Matilda!" he said to his wife, for the fiftieth time during their ride; "are you looking at the cup?"

"Of course not, you idiot," was the polite reply of his better half, who was in appearance the very opposite of himself, for she was thin and waspish, with a vinegar-looking countenance, and a particularly shrill, sour, disagreeable voice. "Of course not, idiot; do you think I'm like you, got eyes for nothing else?"

Ex-Mayor Funge gave a gasp, and agitated his fat hands like the fins of a turtle when he is suddenly thrown on his back.

"My dear, my dear," he said, "how often I have expressed my desire that you would not speak in that dreadful way; it is really—I may say—really"—

"Hold your tongue, do, stupid!" interrupted his wife, "and don't make such an ass of yourself, or if you have got anything to say, say it at once, and not circumbend about as if you were addressing a lot of tipsy aldermen!"

"You don't comprehend, Matilda—you don't comprehend; and you don't sufficiently, duly, and properly appreciate the honour and respect which have been paid me as a reward for the trustworthy fulfilment of the important duties which devolved upon me."

"Oh! stuff!"

"Matilda!"

"Rubbish!"

Ex-Mayor Funge gave a groan.

"It's a great trouble to me," he said; "I little thought when I went courting you at the fishmonger's, in Fore-street, how you would turn out. Ah! me, I wish some of the old folks could have lived to see this beautiful cup!"

He took it into his hands as he spoke, and held it up so that the light of the carriage lamp should fall upon it.

As he held it there, in the uncertain light, it looked very rich and handsome. The design was good, and the execution tasteful.

But its appearance, pretty and captivating as it would have been to ninety-nine women out of a hundred, made no impression on the ex-mayor's wife. She was one of those women who are always grumbling and discontented with everything and everybody.

Still ex-Mayor Funge carried his admiration for the cup to rather a ridiculous extent.

"Beautiful! beautiful!" he kept repeating, as he turned it over in his hands, and viewed it on every side. "Beautiful! it's—a—really—a—what's that?"

The ex-lord mayor gave a great start, and let go the cup, which fell with a dab on the floor of the carriage.

It was the sudden report of a pistol which gave him such a shock of alarm.

The explosion was followed by a voice which said, in clear, decisive tones—

"Pull up, coachman, or you are a dead man!"

Like a prudent man who values his skin above all things, the aristocratic-looking coachman at once brought the carriage to a stand-still.

"Oh! Matilda, Matilda!" said the ex-mayor. "It's a highwayman—a highwayman! I shall lose my beautiful cup."

At this moment Dick rode up to the window, and let it down with a crash. Ex-Mayor Funge's agony and alarm at the presumptive loss of his cup were very visibly impressed upon his countenance, which was really an amusing thing to look upon.

Dick laughed outright.

He just projected the barrel of a pistol a little way into the carriage as he said, blandly—

"A nice evening after the rain, your lordship."

"A nice fiddlestick, you vagabond!" said the ex-mayoress, imitating Dick's manner. "I suppose you will rob us first, and cut our throats afterwards."

"Oh! not by any means, your ladyship, not by any means. I should never forgive myself were I to deprive society of two such ornaments to it as yourself and your worthy spouse."

Dick lifted his hat and made a most elaborate bow as he concluded his reply.

As for the ex-mayor himself, he could only give vent to some inarticulate groans.

"I am sorry to trouble you," said Dick, "but this is really a case of necessity. I must trouble you for your money, rings, watch, and the gold cup you have got with you in the carriage."

As these last words reached the ex-mayor's ears, he uttered such a dismal groan that Dick fairly drew back his head out of the carriage.

"Come, come," said Dick, recovering himself, "I am very much pressed for time, so I beg that you will comply with my request with all possible expedition."

"Oh! you wretch! you villain!" said the ex-mayoress. "You ill-bred, low brought-up son of a parish. If I was a man wouldn't I settle you pretty quick!"

Her husband sat still on the seat, quite incapable of speech or motion.

With a skill and dexterity that could only have been acquired by long practice, Dick rapidly transferred the contents of the mayor's pockets to his own.

Then he looked about for the cup, but could see it nowhere.

The ladies then, as in the present day, distended their dresses with hoops, so that large as the carriage was, the skirts of the ex-mayoress nearly filled it.

"I very much regret to say," said Dick, opening the carriage door, "that I shall have to trouble you both to alight."

Ezekiel was nearest the door, and with some little difficulty Dick dragged him out.

No sooner did his feet touch the ground than he sat down on the roadside, in a very doleful and undignified manner indeed.

"Now, my lady, I must trouble you, if you please."

"Don't 'my lady' me, you villainous-looking rascal! Don't 'my lady' me, I say. You know as well as I do that it ain't my title any longer, you do, you ugly wretch!"

Dick smiled in the politest manner, and putting his arm into the carriage, seized her hand, and drew her gently yet forcibly out of it.

The thing was done with extreme featness, and the ex-mayoress found herself standing beside her husband before she was thoroughly aware of what had taken place.

She did not, however, imitate his example and sit down in the road.

Dick glanced again into the carriage, and there, on the floor, near the opposite door, he saw some glittering object which he made sure was the golden cup.

It was quite out of his reach, so he sprang off his horse, and rather imprudently got into the carriage.

But the ex-mayoress had an eye to all that was going on, and springing forward, she banged the carriage-door, and fastened it in a moment.

"Joseph! Joseph!" she shrieked; "get down in a minute, and run to the other door. I've caught the plundering villain. Stand by the door, and don't let him get out. I'll scratch his face for him if he tries to get out on this side, and you, Thomas, run and get some assistance."

The ex-mayoress felt the courage of an army in her breast.

Now Joseph the footman, and Thomas the coachman, experienced no such sudden accession of valour.

Of the two, Joseph was the greater coward, though he was certainly the youngest and most active.

He was one of those slim, delicate-looking young men who are so often chosen as footmen.

When Dick fired the pistol and called to the coachman to halt, his heart gave such a leap that he almost fell backwards out of the rumble.

However, he did keep his seat, and, finding he was in no way injured, sat there shaking in every limb and quite unable to move.

He had a most wholesome dread of firearms, and, if the assertion be true that the more despicable and contemptible a man is, the more chary he is of risking his life, then Joseph must assuredly have been the most contemptible of human beings.

When his mistress addressed him in such a valiant strain, and with such fierceness of tone, he at once began to descend from the seat, but not with any particular degree of alacrity.

"Make haste, you cowards!" she shouted, dealing her husband a tremendous blow on the side of the head, which did not in any way tend to clear his faculties, for he sat looking more bewildered and stupid than before. "Make haste, you cowards! and mind he doesn't get out on the other side, I'll take care he don't this."

In the meantime, Thomas the coachman had descended from his box, and, in obedience to her hasty command, had started off in the somewhat hopeless task of looking for some kind of assistance.

Trembling all over like a jelly, Joseph took up his station at the carriage door in order to prevent the highwayman from making his escape.

All, however, was most suspiciously quiet inside the carriage.

Black Bess had strayed some little distance down the lane, and was cropping some of the short grass which grew on the roadside.

The ex-mayoress stood boldly and defiantly on guard.

Then Joseph, who, seeing all so still, had begun to gather some small amount of courage, felt it disappear in a moment when the window close to him was let down with a clattering sound.

A moment more and he would have taken to his heels; but, before he could do so, the coachman, breathless and exhausted, arrived upon the scene.

"Keep—him—a—min—minute longer," he gasped out, "it's—all—right; nabbed he is, my lady. Here's fifty hofficers a—coming."

A perfect shriek of pleasure burst from the lips of his mistress.

"Oh! the low-minded vagabond; he'll be caught and hung now, sure enough, and serve him right, the blackguard!"

The tramp of many horses' feet came now very plainly to their ears.

"Here—they—are—my lady; here—they—are!" said the coachman, who had not yet recovered his wind; "here—they—come; can't you hear them?"

"Yes, yes! here they are, sure enough. He's caught, and we'll all go and see him hung."

As she spoke, a troop of about ten or twelve mounted police officers swept round the corner of the road at a dashing rate.

CHAPTER II.

DICK OBTAINS POSSESSION OF THE LORD MAYOR'S CUP, AND IS HOTLY PURSUED BY THE OFFICERS.

When Dick sprang into the carriage, he made sure he saw the golden cup lying close down by the door.

He found, however, that his eyes had deceived him; so, without more ado, although he had, in a manner of speaking, been imprisoned in the carriage, he set about looking for the cup in a systematic manner.

He could not find it anywhere, and he began to fear that the vixenish mayoress had managed to take it out with her.

Still, as he felt no apprehension from the amount of resistance they would be able to offer, he did not hurry himself, but very leisurely recommenced his search.

He was exceedingly anxious to obtain possession of the cup, and was resolved to do so for a very particular reason.

About a week before, when in company with a few kindred spirits, he had made rather a heavy bet that he would rob the lord mayor of his cup, and present it to them as a trophy on that or the following evening.

At last, after turning over all the cushions, he, to his inexpressible satisfaction, found it jammed in a corner, underneath the seat.

He possessed himself of it, and then listened to what was going forward.

It was then he let down the window, and so frightened Joseph with the sound.

He heard the intelligence that so many mounted officers were at hand, and for the moment was unable to account for it.

"I have it," he said, and a flush of anger swept across his face; "I have it! Some one who was present when I made the bet has set the grabs on my track."

We may as well say here that he was perfectly right in his conjecture, and at the moment the coachman saw the officers, they were in search of the highwayman.

However, he had the common before him.

He might, though, have some difficulty in regaining his seat on the back of Black Bess. Still, he was well aware that a peculiar whistle would bring her to his side in a moment.

Another circumstance was in his disfavour. The moon which a short time before had only in a dim fashion lighted up the landscape, was now shining brightly, and was only obscured for a minute or two as some small vapoury clouds swept over her disc.

He paused for a brief moment to arrange some plan of action in his mind, and it was then the troop of officers came in sight.

His resolve was quickly taken.

With an exercise of that surprising agility for which he was so famous, he sprang like an harlequin through the window of the carriage.

He chose the side upon which the mayoress stood for the execution of this feat, because Bess was on that side of the way, and he alighted on the unfortunate Ezekiel with so much suddenness and force, that he fell flat down upon the road at once.

The soft, fat body of the ex-mayor broke the violence of his fall, and without even sustaining so much injury as a bruise, Dick sprang in a moment to his feet, and gave the signal to his mare.

She reached his side with a bound at precisely the same moment of time as the officers reached the carriage.

Dick placed but one hand upon her neck, and then vaulted lightly into the saddle.

He was seated in the twinkling of an eye.

"Surrender! surrender!" said the chief of the officers. "There's five hundred pounds for your apprehension, dead or alive. Surrender, or I fire!"

The only reply Dick made to this invitation was to give Bess the reins, and dash off along the road in the direction of the common.

As soon as the chief of the officers saw the movement, he cried in a loud voice—

"Fire!"

The simultaneous discharge of about a dozen pistol-shots followed his command.

Dick, however, was at rather too great a distance for them to be very effective, and they whistled harmlessly about and around him.

Then Bess put forward that speed which could not fail to leave any other horses far in the rear.

After firing the volley, the police took no notice of ex-Mayor Funge and his wife, but plunged forward as rapidly as their steeds would carry them.

It was exceedingly unfortunate for Dick that the moon was shining with so much clearness, as it enabled his pursuers to keep him steadily in view.

They were one and all exceedingly well mounted, and plied whip and spur most vigorously.

After the lapse of a few moments, Dick turned his head and looked behind him.

He was gaining rapidly on his pursuers, and must eventually, unless some unforseen accident occurred, distance them completely.

He was quite sure of baffling them if he could but reach a small plantation, or rather wood, which was only a mile or two ahead.

He looked back again, and saw the officers were still farther in the rear, although they were goading their horses to the utmost in their endeavour to overtake him.

When he looked back again the next time, it was just as he was entering the wood.

They were then completely out of sight.

He trotted gently along a narrow glade.

A deep silence was everywhere around him,

He looked about him on all sides, in quest of some place of concealment in case the officers should, on finding he had disappeared, take it into their heads to hunt through the wood.

No such place met his gaze. However, he still pushed steadily onward.

At that time the wood was of a tolerable size, though a few poplars are all that remain now to show where it once stood.

Suddenly Dick paused, for a faint, peculiar sound reached his ears.

It came and ceased so suddenly that, acquainted as he was with slight noises of all kinds, he was unable to determine what it was.

It sounded more like the shutting of a door than anything else.

He hastened forward in the direction from whence the sound had proceeded, walking Bess gently, so that her hoofs should make as little noise as possible.

Her tread was almost noiseless upon the soft springy turf.

The trees now began to get thinner, and, after proceeding some distance farther, he emerged into a small clearing of about a quarter of an acre in extent.

At the side of this enclosure opposite to where he stood, an unusually dense group of tall poplar trees reared their summits to the sky.

In the black shadows which they cast was a rudely-built cottage, or rather hut.

It was only one storey high, but it covered a large piece of ground, and its interior was doubtless divided into several apartments.

Dick listened for a minute or two, and then, not hearing any sound, either in advance or behind, rode boldly forward to the door of the solitary habitation.

"Hilloa there! Hilloa! House! house!" he shouted, striking the door some heavy blows with the handle of his riding-whip.

He paused, and, as the summons was disregarded, repeated it.

He did so because he felt almost sure the place was tenanted, for a few rays of light shone through the chinks in the door.

He was on the point of applying his whip for the third time, when the door was abruptly flung open, and a man appeared upon the threshold.

A huge fire was burning within, and emitting a brilliant light, which brought the figure of this man into bold relief.

To all appearance, take him altogether, he was not exactly the individual to inspire a nervous person with confidence if he met him in a lonely place.

"Well," he said gruffly, as he saw Dick observing him, "what's your business?"

"Yes," said Dick.

This was rather an ambiguous reply, and the man favoured him with a long stare.

However, without paying any further attention to him, Dick dismounted from his mare, and holding her by the bridle, walked towards the door of the hut.

"Here—here—hold hard!" said the man, putting his hand against Dick's breast, and striving to keep him back, "I should like to know where you're a comin' to!"

"Inside, my friend, inside. I'm tired, so is my mare, and I want to rest awhile."

He pushed by him into the interior of the hut as he spoke.

The man appeared so astounded at his coolness that he could hardly make any opposition to him; and, seeing him once fairly in, he, with a growl of dissatisfaction, closed the door.

A clumsy three-legged stool was the only thing there was in the place which would serve for a seat.

This Dick monopolized unceremoniously.

"My worthy friend," he said, as the man came towards the fire, "I am very sorry if I have forced myself inconveniently upon you, but pray understand I will pay you liberally for my shelter and your trouble."

The man gave a grunt by way of response.

Observing this sign of concession, Dick took a guinea out of his pocket, and handed it to the man.

His eyes glistened with cupidity as he received it, and his whole bearing underwent a remarkable alteration.

"Your lordship's servant," he said. "What can I do for you."

"Give my mare a feed of corn and a little water—only a little, mind."

"Yes, your honour's worship."

"And if you have got anything good to drink in the place, bring me some."

The man replied by going to a chest at the other end of the room, and producing a bottle and glass.

"Brandy," he said, as he placed it on the table.

Dick poured out a glass.

"This is a queer place, rather," he said, after drinking it off, "a very queer place!"

The man looked at him suspiciously.

"Why, yes, it is," he replied, "but it does for a poor fellow like me who picks up his living in the wood."

"A woodman?"

"That's it. You see there's always a great quantity of dry sticks lying about."

"I suppose so," said Dick, with a smile, for his companion did not look much like a man given to such peaceful pursuits.

But then appearances are often deceptive.

The man noticed the smile.

"To be sure I sometimes pick up a stray hare or bird, but not very often, though."

"Drink," said Dick.

The man did not need a second invitation.

All remained profoundly still about the old hut.

"Making so bold," said the man, "I should like to know who you be?"

Dick laughed as he said—

"Well, I don't know that I need fear telling you who I am, for, unless I am mistaken, you are a member of the same honourable profession as myself, only in rather a different line."

"Indeed."

"Yes. I wonder when you saw me that you did not at once suspect who I was."

"How should I?"

"When you saw my mare."

"She is certainly a fine creature!" said the man, looking at her more attentively.

"You're right. She has not a white hair about her."

"Then she is——"

"Black Bess!" said Dick. "Fill up your glass, and drink good luck to her rider."

"Dick Turpin?"

"Himself!"

"And are you really him?" said the man, looking upon Dick with some degree of awe, and a great deal of respect.

"Most certainly."

"Then I'll drink your health with all the pleasure in life!"

"Fill up, then."

"And—if now——"

"Speak on. Don't be afraid!"

"If you wouldn't mind, now granting me a favour, I should take it very kind."

"What is it?"

"Let me——"

"Go on!"

"Shake hands with you."

"To be sure I will," said Dick, giving him a hearty grip.

The woodman uttered a sigh of satisfaction, and then said—

"Well, what lay has brought you down these parts? I have never heard of your being here before."

"Well, you see it was rather a special job."

"Oh!"

"About a week ago you must know I was at the 'Three Tuns,' in Seven Dials."

"Ay, ay."

"Well, while we were talking over business, one of the pals, said—

"'I s'pose you've all heard of the cup that's to be given to old Funge, the mayor?'

"Some had and some hadn't."

"Of course."

"So it turned out, when the story was told, that a subscription was afloat to purchase the lord mayor a large golden cup to be presented to him on his retirement from office."

"Yes."

"'We all know old Funge,' said one. 'He'll burst with pride if he gets this present!'

"'Oh! won't he rather!' added another.

"'Now,' said I, 'I'll bet anybody fifty pounds that I'll take his cup and bring it here within three nights after he receives it.'

"'Done!' said one.

"The bet was booked, and the case then looked rather difficult; for, of course, we did not know that old Funge would be fool enough to take the cup in the carriage with him."

"Then did he?"

"You shall hear. I kept a sharp look-out, and at last found his delight was so great that he could not suffer the cup to go out of his hands, but made just as much fuss with it as a child does with its rattle. However, to make a long story short, I found he had got it in the carriage, and was on his way home without any escort."

"You got it, then?"

"Oh! yes, with hardly any trouble. But just as I had secured it, a party of officers galloped up; but I managed to baffle them, and here I am, safe and sound."

"Then, you've got the cup?" said the man, manifesting a much greater degree of interest in the recital than he had previously displayed. "Have you got the cup with you?"

"Of course I have. Look! here it is."

"Dick, as he spoke, produced the valuable from one of the pockets of his capacious coat.

An eager covetous glance darted from the woodman's eyes as he saw it, and he made a step forward towards Dick.

"It is pretty, is it not?" said the latter, turning it about in his hands. "By this firelight it looks rich indeed."

"Very, very."

Then Dick, for the first time, noticed the avaricious look on the woodman's countenance.

He was on his guard immediately. His suspicions were aroused and he lost not a moment in restoring the precious cup to his pocket.

The woodman watched it disappear from his sight with about the same degree of satisfaction as a famished wolf would exhibit on seeing a lamb, upon which he had set his heart, safely escorted from his fangs.

Dick poured out another glass of brandy.

"Drink!" he said.

The man suddenly assumed a listening attitude.

"What is it?" asked the highwayman. "I hear nothing, and I am accustomed to catch the slightest sound."

"I may be mistaken," said the man, "but I fancy I heard the tramp of horses' feet. I have lived a many years in the silence of this wood, and my hearing has got sharpened."

"It would."

"Still, I will go to the door and listen. Maybe it was nothing."

The woodman rose from his seat, and, opening the door, stood for a moment listening, and then went out.

"I don't half like his ways," thought Dick. "I will keep a sharp look-out upon him."

He also left the fireside, and walked to the door of the hut.

As he reached it he saw the man returning slowly across the clearing.

"My ears must have deceived me," he said, as soon as he had perceived Dick. "I can hear no one."

"I thought you were mistaken."

There was a slight alteration in the tone of his voice which the man appeared to notice, for he added in an apologetic sort of way—

"At all events, it was a mistake on the right side. I should not like you to get into trouble under my roof."

"No, no!"

"And, for my part, I am very glad to think I did make a mistake."

"Then you think there is no one about?"

"The wood is as quiet as the grave."

"Well, if that is the case, as I have been knocking about a great deal the last night or two, I should be glad of half an hour's slumber."

This was simply a ruse on Dick's part, for he wished to assure himself of the good faith of the woodman, and determined, should it prove he was attempting to play him false, to deal out retribution, with no sparing hand; for, generous and free himself by nature, he detested avariciousness in others.

On the other hand, should the man be really inclined to serve him, it would be a very convenient thing to have such a place as this lonely wood hut to seek a shelter in in case the hue and cry after him should be unusually strong.

It was to this end, then, he proposed to feign sleep so as to test him.

The experiment, certainly, was rather a dangerous one, but Dick was a fearless man, and the thought of personal peril never had the least weight against any enterprise he had determined upon.

He interrupted the apologies the woodman began to make by saying—

"As you must know I am accustomed to get sleep how and where I can, and sometimes it is in very strange places, so if I put this stool up in yonder corner, and lean back against the wall, I shall sleep as comfortably as I could wish."

Without, then, waiting for any reply, he placed the stool as he had said, and, folding his arms, leaned back as if to compose himself to slumber.

"Do not let me remain more than an hour," he said, "as I wish to get back to London before dawn."

The man promised to rouse him, and, having done so, stretched himself out at full length in front of the fire.

CHAPTER III.

DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS SOME OF THE MYSTERIES CONNECTED WITH THE OLD HUT IN THE WOOD.

A DEEP silence now ensued. Dick with his head leaning on his breast, and his eyes to all appearance close shut, sat perfectly still, allowing nothing that was going on to escape him.

By Dick's orders Bess had been littered down at the further end of the huge apartment.

The wood logs on the hearth sputtered and crackled, and that was the only sound that could be heard.

At last, after the lapse of about a quarter of an hour, and just as the deep repose was drawing the highwayman into a doze, the man by the fire made a slight movement.

Dick was aroused immediately; but was careful not to start in the least degree, so as to make the man suspect he was not actually asleep.

The woodman had placed his hand upon the floor, and risen to a half-sitting posture.

He regarded Dick narrowly, and the latter, as he glanced at his face through his partially closed eyelids, was struck in a moment by the sinister expression which appeared upon it.

He remained for some time without changing his position.

Then he spoke in a strange hoarse whisper.

"He sleeps now," he said; "surely he sleeps, and then what I have to do will be done easily. Ha!"

He sank, suddenly, flat down upon the floor.

Dick had moved a little on his seat.

Then seeing that all remained perfectly still as before, the woodman slowly and carefully raised himself from the ground.

"Yes, yes," he said, in the same whispering tones, and as if he was endeavouring to inspire his craven heart with courage. "Yes, yes! he sleeps soundly—soundly; I must do it all alone, for there is no one down below, but—but——"

"Down below," thought Dick, struck with the strangeness of the remark. "What in the world can he mean?"

"Yes," continued the woodman, "I am here alone with him. He is asleep, and is it not best I should be alone? Surely I can vanquish a slumbering man? Then I will get rid of his body, and the cup will be mine, for if I do the deed by myself, I shall not have to share the worth of it with anyone. No one need know he has been here. I can turn the mare loose in the woods, where she will soon be picked up by someone, or why should I not keep and sell her? That will be an additional profit. I will do it."

"You precious rascal," said Dick to himself. "I would pounce upon you at once, only I should prefer catching you in the very act, and then you could frame no excuse. You little imagine what there is in store for you!"

Slowly, now, and carefully, so as not to make the least noise, the man got up off the floor of the hut.

From his belt he took a long and most formidable looking knife, and clutching it tightly in his hand, he stepped forward cautiously towards his, as he believed, unconscious guest.

Dick remained perfectly still. Not by the slightest sign did he give the man cause to think he was not sleeping.

But he was on the alert for whatever might happen next.

And now the woodman stood as close as he dared to Dick, and lifted his knife in the air.

Instead, however, of its plunging into the highwayman's heart, as he fully intended it should, he felt his wrist seized, as his arm descended, with a powerful grasp, while another as powerful clutched him by the throat.

"You cowardly, avaricious wretch," said Dick, sternly. "What reason can you give that I should not now at once put an end to your miserable life?"

It would be quite folly to attempt to describe the look of unutterable consternation which overspread the woodman's face at this unexpected termination to the adventure.

"Spare me! spare me!" he cried.

"Spare you, you miserable hound! How dare you make such a request to me? Drop your knife!"

But the woodman, who by this time had recovered from the first shock of his surprise, on finding that Dick was awake, feeling that his condition was so desperate that it could not be made much worse, commenced a violent struggle.

At heart, although he was a big, burly ruffian, he was a thorough-going coward, and like the wolf—which animal he in more than one respect resembled—would not show fight until forced at bay.

With Dick, however, whose muscles seemed of iron, he stood but a poor chance; and, after a fierce but brief struggle, the highwayman threw him with so much violence upon the hard earth, which formed the floor of the hut, that he lay stunned and incapable of motion.

Dick wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Whew!" he said; "that was hot work, but it strikes me I have settled him for a little while."

However, to put him out of reach of doing further damage, Dick, after a brief search in the hut, found a stout rope with which he securely bound him.

Then he lifted him up, and fairly threw him into one corner of the apartment.

It was not the gentlest of treatment, but then as Dick very justly said, he did not see how he could expect him to be particularly careful how he used him.

He gave no signs of life or consciousness.

Dick went to the door of the hut, and, opening it, took a long look around and about him.

Nothing, however, but the tall trees met his gaze.

The moon was now high in the heavens, and all objects were distinctly visible.

He listened, but all was still.

Then he turned back, and was about to lead Bess out of the hut and mount her and ride off, when he suddenly recollected the remark the woodman had made about no one being down below, and he immediately became curious to know the meaning of what he said.

"Yes," he said to himself, after deliberating the subject in his mind for a few moments; "yes, there is certainly something more in this hut than meets the first glance; and as I have yet some hours to spare, I will try if I cannot find out what it is."

Having come to this determination, he set about in a very business-like manner, making an examination of the building.

For this purpose he took one of the burning brands from the fire, and which would serve very well as a torch, to assist him in his investigations.

He commenced with the apartment in which he had been sitting. From the size and rambling manner in which the hut was built, he felt sure there must be several others.

The thatched roof formed the ceiling of the one in which he stood, and was about eight feet from the ground in the lowest part.

The two beams ran lengthwise across it, from which many articles were suspended.

The walls appeared to be nothing but mud and timber; the whole building seemed very roughly constructed.

There was no window whatever, so that in the daytime the only aperture through which light could enter was the door.

He made the tour of this room several times, carefully examining the walls and roof, as well as the rough flooring.

There was nothing, however, to raise the least suspicion. All seemed quite ordinary and commonplace.

Near the fire-place, however, was a door. He tried it, and found it yield to his touch.

A gush of cold air blew upon him as the door opened. All was profoundly dark beyond.

The piece of wood which had served him for a torch up to the present moment in a most satisfactory manner, now gave unequivocal symptoms of expiring.

It was, however, very little trouble to choose a fresh one from the many burning on the hearth, and, having done so, he proceeded to examine what there was on the other side of the door.

He did not anticipate making any particular discovery, because the room appeared to be on a level with the one he had just left, whereas the man had spoken of "down below," which, Dick considered, could only refer to some underground apartment.

He entered, therefore, without hesitation.

A strong current of air came from the other end of this room, and Dick had some trouble to keep his extemporized torch alight.

He got on much better, though, when he closed the door behind him, as he did away with the draught.

The room, or whatever it might be called, was very much larger than the one he had left, though precisely similar in appearance.

At the farther extremity was a door perforated with several large holes, and it was through these the wind came.

This door opened by means of a string latch. As it swung back upon its hinges, Dick saw it simply led into a rude kind of shed, which would serve as a resting-place for cattle.

The moon's rays fell into this place, and he saw the greatest portion of it with perfect plainness. It was quite empty.

Outside, the tall trees in the wood waved gently to and fro in the wind.

It was, then, apparently nothing more than a simple wood hut, and such as might have been used and built by a man who got a living in the woods.

He was somewhat disappointed; but feeling assured that there was nothing further to be seen by going forward, he retraced his steps.

He very particularly examined the flooring as he did so.

The first apartment, or the one in which was the fire, was gained without his having made any discovery whatever.

As he had done in returning through the other room, he held the torch low down on the floor, and went carefully over every square foot of it, in the hope of discovering some indications of a trap-door, but with no better success.

However, once as he came up to the edge of the hearth-stone, he fancied he saw a faint line of light running along it.

A closer observation showed him that when his eye was perpendicular to the stone, he could see this line of narrow light running completely round it.

Here, then, doubtless, was the aperture which he sought.

The fire having gone some time without replenishment, was now almost extinct, so Dick easily enough swept off the embers which remained, so as to get a good view of the hearthstone.

What was his surprise to find the fire had covered a stout iron ring, some three or four inches in diameter, which appeared to be very firmly fixed in the stone, and evidently intended as a means of raising it from its setting

Dick cooled and seized it with one hand, and found it required but a small exertion of strength to pull it upwards.

It opened after the fashion of most trap-doors; that is to say, it was hung upon two hinges.

When the stone was upright, Dick peeped over the edge of it, and discovered a rude flight of steps, which were lighted by an iron oil lamp.

It was the rays from this light which he had seen through the chink of the hearthstone, and had led to the discovery of the secret door.

"Ah!" he said, as he saw it, "it was most certainly a grand mistake to put a light there, however convenient it might be for those who had to ascend or descend the steps. If all had been in darkness I should never have discovered it, for few people, I fancy, would have thought of looking under the ashes of the fire for an entrance 'down below,' as my friend in the corner called it."

Propping up, then, the stone, as well as he was able, Dick, without hesitation, commenced the descent of the steps.

They were twenty in number.

The lamp was suspended from the arched roof of a passage, which ran along horizontally from the staircase.

It was a very difficult job, but Dick at length did succeed in detaching the lamp from its position.

This would be an invaluable aid to him in his researches. So, holding it up so as to diffuse its rays as much as possible, he proceeded cautiously along the passage.

In the other hand he held a small steel crowbar, which he had taken from a pocket in his coat, made expressly for it. Not more than an inch in diameter, nor more than fourteen or fifteen in length, it would prove a most dangerous and formidable weapon of defence for close quarters.

The passage along which he made his way was simply hollowed out of the earth, and supported at irregular distances by rough pieces of timber. The floor, roof, and walls had been hammered hard and flat by some heavy instrument. It was only a few feet in length, and at its further extremity was a massive-looking wooden door.

This Dick reached in half-a-dozen steps. He ran his eye over it, but no fastenings of any kind were visible, nor was there even a keyhole.

Of course, there were very few doors that would have presented an insurmountable barrier to Dick; still, before he proceeded to violence, he determined to see if he could not open it by fair means.

After a few futile efforts he abandoned the idea.

"It's no go!" he said, "and yet I am not half satisfied. There must be some ready means of opening this door, if I could only find them out. However, I'll get through somehow."

He placed the lamp upon the passage floor as he spoke, and in such a position as its beams fell clearly upon the door.

"Now," he said, reflectively, "I wonder if there really is no one on the other side of the door. From the way my treacherous friend spoke I fancy there must be somebody, but yet not anyone who would assist him. If he has any friends I certainly hope they will not return until I have made my explorations. Now, it strikes me the very wisest thing I can do will be to go back again and barricade the door as well as I am able, so that if they should come back they will have a little trouble in effecting an entrance.

There was so much sense in this reflection that he there and then picked up his lamp and prepared to put his resolve into execution.

A dismal, smothered kind of groan, at that very moment smote his ears.

He could not help giving a slight start as the unexpected sound echoed through the vaulted passage.

"Who's that?" he said.

All was still.

He turned round again and faced the door, for it was quite evident the groan must have come from the other side of it.

"There's some one in trouble, that's clear," said Dick after a pause of a few minutes. "Hilloa! there! Who are you? Hilloa!"

The massive door seemed to beat back his words.

They met with no response.

"Ah! well, I shall find all out soon, I hope, but I will go first and blockade the door."

He walked rapidly along the passage, and ascended the little flight of steps.

Had it not been for the lamp he carried the place would have been in pitch darkness, for the scattered embers of the fire were totally extinguished.

Bess was reposing very quietly in the corner where she had been littered down. He merely gave her a passing glance to make sure all was right, and then went to the door.

Once there, he could not resist opening it, and looking out, so as to discover whether there was any one within sight or hearing.

The silence was most intense.

As he expected, he had quite by taking a refuge in the wood, thrown the officers off the scent.

He re-entered the hut, and closed the door.

He found behind it a very thick oaken beam of wood, which was fastened to the door by a rivet in the centre, and fitted in a staple on each door-post.

"They won't open that very easily," he said, as he fixed the oak bar in its place.

Just then his eye fell upon the woodman, whom he had bound and thrown into the corner in so unceremonious a fashion. He was lying still and immovable in the position in which he had fallen, and he was to all appearances quite dead.

Then Dick bethought himself of the other door, opening into the shed, and he secured that as well as he was able.

Feeling then tolerably secure, he once more commenced the descent of the steps which the hearthstone had disclosed.

He hesitated a moment as to whether he should leave the hearthstone up as it was, or let it down into its place; but, after a minute's consideration, he resolved to leave it propped open.

In another minute now—for he had got familiar with the place—he was standing at the massive door through which the groans he had heard appeared to penetrate, though his voice had failed to do so.

He took the steel bar again into his hands and inserted the sharp point into the mortice of the door.

Then he pressed against the other end strongly and steadily, and, although the door started a little from the pressure, it did not give way. Still it gave him a better opportunity of inserting the crowbar; so much so indeed, that, at the second trial, he had the inexpressible satisfaction of seeing it swing open.

Then he picked up the lamp quickly, and held the crowbar in a defensive attitude.

Another deep groan from the cavern—or whatever it was before him—came with fearful distinctness to his ears.

A close, stifling atmosphere gushed out through the door, beyond which all was utter darkness.

Slowly and cautiously, and taking care to find a firm place to put his foot upon before he lifted the other from the ground, Dick crossed the mysterious threshold.

As he did so, the lamp emitted only the ghastliest and feeblest of rays, which in a very insufficient manner dispelled the darkness which seemed to Dick to be rolling about in huge clouds.

The air had a hot, clammy, disgreeable flavour, and was besides excessively oppressive, so much so, that the highwayman felt it pressing upon his heart and brain until he grew sick and faint.

Then he reeled out of the cavern into the passage, and was forced to lean against the wall for a considerable time before he could recover himself.

The fresh, cool air, however—for so by comparison it seemed to be—rushed down gratefully from the room above, and, mingling with the lethiferous vapour, deprived it of its noxious qualities.

Then once more came the deep, hollow, corpse-like groan, but now much louder and by far more unearthly in its tone; it seemed to fill all the atmosphere around him.

And yet, for the life of him, Dick could not tell from whence the sound appeared to come; it seemed to reach his ears from all sides.

The flame of the lamp was getting dimmer and dimmer.

Was, then, the air in that cavernous-like place so impure as not to be able to support the combustion of the wick?

Surely no; for if it were so, then no human being could possibly for many minutes live in it; and did not the groan point to the existence of someone there who was, doubtless, suffering much agony?

As this thought crossed his mind, the question arose unbidden to his lips:

"Was it from human lips so horrible a groan had come?"

CHAPTER IV.

DICK TURPIN MAKES A HORRIBLE DISCOVERY IN THE CELL BENEATH THE WOODMAN'S HUT.

AND now, as minute after minute passed, and the fresh air from the room above entered the passage, Dick felt his lungs beginning to resume their wonted healthy action.

He no longer gasped for breath, and the dull, heavy sensation which had come over him had left his brain and eyelids.

Stooping down, then, and taking the lamp again in his hands—for when he leaned half-fainting against the wall, he had placed it upon the ground—Dick tried if he could make it give a better light.

Then he found that the dimness of the flame proceeded chiefly from the fact that only a small quantity of oil, and that very thick and glutinous, remained in the reservoir of the lamp. However, by altering the wick, he did succeed in making it burn a little better.

It was, though, self-evident that if he wished to prosecute his researches in that strange, gloomy-looking place, by its aid he must do so without loss of time.

Once more, then, Dick, holding the lamp in his left and the steel crowbar in his right hand, passed through the ghostly-looking portal.

He experienced but little difficulty in breathing now; the air had a strange odour, but that was all.

"Upon my word," said Dick, as he paused after taking a few steps, "I have many a time heard of making darkness visible, but I must say I never in my life had a better exemplification of it than I have now!"

He might well think so, for the faint light the lamp gave was totally inadequate to disperse the "black darkness" with which the cavern seemed literally filled.

Naturally enough, too, he felt timid about his footing in that place, for he did not know how far the level floor extended, or how soon he might find himself upon the verge of some deep declivity too late to save himself from tumbling headlong down.

The silence which followed the utterance of the last groan was something terrible, and Dick found it growing more and more so each moment; so he was fain to speak his thoughts and speculations as to the place he was in aloud.

"I wonder, now, what this place can be? Some robber's haunt, I fancy; and yet it seems strange it should be filled with mephitic vapour, as it was. The place is full of mystery, and——confound it all, what's that?"

These last few words were spoken in a very different tone to the others. In walking forward his head had struck violently against something depending from the ceiling, but what it was he could form no idea.

With the help of the lamp, which threatened every minute to go out, he saw the object which had given him the blow upon the forehead.

It was another lamp, much larger in size than the one he held in his hand, attached by a thick iron chain to a kind of staple in the roof.

"Confound the thing!" said Dick, again; "what a crack it gave me, to be sure! Why on earth didn't they hang it out of reach of one's head? Stop, now, I wonder whether there's any oil in it?"

He felt the wick with his fingers, and found it sticky and wet, and on applying the flame of the smaller lamp it readily enough ignited.

It was a minute or two before it fairly burnt up, but when it did, it cast a tolerable light over the whole of the cavern.

There was only one or two distant corners into which its beams did not penetrate.

As nearly as he could estimate, the cave was about forty feet in length by thirty in width.

A large table and some benches were ranged round the walls.

Beyond that there was no furniture in the place.

Dick felt disappointed, when he, having given a good look round, found it such an ordinary place.

In shape it was exceedingly irregular, and full of corners. Like the hut above, it was very rudely fashioned.

"Ah!" said Dick, after he had taken in the general aspect of the cavern, "this is a snug little residence, and no mistake. I must have a closer look into it, and try if I cannot find out the individual who groaned in so uncomfortable manner. I wonder if this lamp will come down like the other did?"

[THE SPECTRE HORSEMAN.]

He tried, and found it would not, but he managed to disengage the portion holding the oil and the wick. To be sure, it was not very nice to lay hold of, but Dick never troubled about trifles.

In the corner which was in the deepest shadow, Dick found a curious-looking door.

It needed a sharp eye to distinguish it from the surrounding walls, for it was precisely the same colour, and it was more by accident than anything else that Dick's eye fell upon the chink that ran round it.

There was a circumstance connected with this door that filled Dick with astonishment.

A thin wreath of whitish-looking smoke made its way slowly through the crevice round it.

That, then, evidently was the source from whence the deadly vapour emanated.

An intense desire to know what was on the other side of this door occupied Dick's mind, to the exclusion of everything else.

He put the lamp down on the floor, at a little distance from him, and with the steel bar which had before aided him so materially, commenced an attack upon it.

It was some time before it yielded in the least degree to his efforts.

At last it gave way.

It was well Dick possessed sufficient presence of mind to throw himself instantly upon his face, for a perfect cloud of white vapour poured into the outer cavern.

The inner chamber must have been filled with it to the entire exclusion of the wholesome air, for it rushed out in incredible quantities.

By holding his face close to the earth, Dick managed to escape the greater part of it. He lay quite still, because he knew that it would soon disperse.

He cast an anxious glance towards his lamp, but, though its light was not so brilliant, he found it burning steadily.

The dense vapour rolled above and around him, and seemed as if it would never disperse. The time appeared doubly long to Dick, for he was in the highest degree impatient to know what it all meant.

After waiting a few moments longer, he ventured to rise to his feet.

The cavern was getting clearer.

He could see but a very short distance in advance of him.

As he approached the inner door he felt the air grow hotter and hotter.

His eyelids smarted and tingled as they do sometimes in a London fog.

Disregarding this, he boldly stepped into what in his mind he could not help calling the mysterious chamber.

He increased his caution.

The floor was hard and solid to the feet.

The inner cavern, or cell, was very limited in its dimensions. By stretching out his arms he could almost touch the wall on all sides, while the roof was hardly high enough for him to stand upright.

Suddenly he drew back the foot he was about to place upon the floor. He had trod upon something soft.

It sent a disagreeable thrill through his veins, for some instinctive feeling seemed to tell him what it was.

He held the lamp down on the floor, and looked at the object upon which he had put his foot.

It was a human hand.

It was in some inexplicable way puffed up to thrice its natural size, and the skin was stretched so tightly over it that the whole seemed like some huge blister.

Full of surprise and wonder, Dick looked still closer, and then he saw, lying stiff and rigid, the body of a man.

It was swollen in the same proportion as the hand.

There was not the slightest sign of vitality about it.

The body was that of a tall, powerful man. He was rudely clad in a garb which was a strange compound between that of a gamekeeper and farm labourer.

The face presented a frightful spectacle; so frightful, indeed, that after one brief glance, Dick turned away his head appalled.

There was upon the terribly bloated and disfigured features an expression in which a whole world of agony was depicted.

"This, then," said Dick, as he turned away his eyes, "this, then, is the poor, miserable wretch whose groans came upon my ears with so horrible a cadence. Who can he have been, and what can he have done to meet with such a fate as this? However, all speculation upon the subject can be of no avail. I would, though, give something to know the explanation of it, for it cannot fail to be of startling interest."

After one more glance round the cell, for it was nothing else, Dick turned round as if to leave.

As he reached the threshold, he paused reflectively.

"Ought I," he said, "to leave this place until I have assured myself that no spark of life yet clings to the pained, bloated carcass? No," he added, "I must return."

It was very unwillingly, however, that he again approached the body.

He knelt down by the side of it, and, removing some portion of the clothing, placed his hand, as nearly as he could judge, above the heart.

The skin was burning hot.

He felt a slight flutter beneath his fingers, but so slight as to be almost imperceptible.

"He lives! he lives!" he said; "perhaps even now I may hear the strange story of his sufferings from his own lips."

He nerved himself to look upon his face.

It was a loathsome colour.

The features were normally, no doubt, regular and bold. The eyebrows were jet black, and so, too, was his hair. But his countenance, swelled to the exaggerated size it was, had almost lost all traces of its configuration.

The eyes, which were staring blindly open, looked strangely small in comparison with the size of the face.

Overcoming his repugnance, Dick slowly raised the body to a sitting posture.

A strange half-sigh, half-groan, issued from the distorted lips.

"Come, Mr. What's-your-name, rouse up a bit, I daresay you are in a very bad way, but you might be worse you know. How do you feel now?"

All was still.

Dick listened in vain for a reply.

Then a slight shudder overspread the body of the man.

"Ah!" said Dick, as he felt it, "I am sadly afraid it's all over with him, poor fellow!"

He laid him on the floor of the cell as he spoke.

He replaced his hand upon his heart, but its pulsations had ceased to be perceptible.

"One thing is certain," said Dick, as he once more prepared to depart, "of all the strange adventures I have met with in my career, this is certainly the strangest of them all."

He closed the door of the cell, and once more glanced round the cave, so as to impress its appearance upon his memory. Then he walked slowly to the foot of the little flight of steps.

As he placed his foot upon the first one, a loud and impatient knocking at the outer door reached his ears.

CHAPTER V.

THE ROBBERS IN THE WOOD RETURN, AND MAKE AN ATTACK ON DICK TURPIN.

Now, when Dick heard the knocking at the door of the hut, he did what was an unusual thing for him indeed.

He stood still, undecided how to act.

The first question which crossed his mind was whether those who were clamouring so loudly for admission were police officers or some of those bold, reckless men who doubtless made the cave beneath the hut their hiding and abiding place.

He was inclined to think the latter as being the most probable.

He placed the lamp upon the floor, and stealthily ascended the steps on tiptoe.

His position was most unquestionably full of peril, for it was only natural to suppose that if these men were sufficiently inhuman to doom one of their comrades to so terrible a death, they would not scruple to put him out of the way of divulging any of their secrets.

"They're an uncommon bad lot, that's certain," said Dick; "and, as I cannot get any profit by encountering them, I think the very best thing I can do will be to get clear off, if possible, without letting them know anything about it."

Having come to this determination, he crept stealthily along the floor of the hut until he came to Black Bess.

He patted her encouragingly upon the neck, and slipped the bridle over his arm.

As he was close by the door, he stopped to listen.

The knocking had ceased, and the confused murmur of several voices alone came to his ears.

He could not distinguish a single word.

Without, therefore, pausing a moment longer, Dick led Bess across the room to the door which opened into the outer apartment.

The fresh, cool air that gushed in refreshed him exceedingly.

Just as he was about to close this door, he heard the sharp report of a pistol, and the bullet crashing through the panel.

The men outside, to the number of five or six, and who, as Dick had rightly enough conjectured, were members of the band of robbers who made that lonely hut their home, were evidently getting angry and impatient at this disregard of their summons.

"Fire away!" said Dick, "nobody cares!"

Before opening the little door which led into the shed, Dick thought it would only be prudent to listen for a while, and ascertain, if possible, whether any of the woodman's companions, finding it impossible to obtain an entrance from the front of the hut, would go round to the back of it.

He looked through the holes which were perforated in the door, but saw nothing.

Almost immediately afterwards, however, he heard a rustling among the trees.

Keeping both ears and eyes open, he waited patiently for what should happen next.

Three swarthy, ill-favoured, gipsy-like looking men emerged from the trees.

The moonlight, which was even brighter than when he had looked out a short time before, revealed their figures with great distinctness.

Looking straight before them, and without pausing for a moment, these men approached the door behind which Turpin stood.

From their confident step they evidently anticipated no difficulty in opening this door.

When they tried it they found it firm and immoveable.

Dick stood a little on one side, for he thought it not unlikely they would, in their disappointment, fire a bullet through that door as they had through the other.

The men, however, drew back to a short distance, and spoke in a low tone to each other.

"I wish I could hit on some plan of scaring these scoundrels. I'll warrant they are as arrant cowards as ever put shoes on their feet. What can I think of? Surely I ought to be able to think of something."

He rubbed his head in a perplexed, absent sort of way. It was no use, though, he could not rub an idea into it.

The act of keeping his eye upon what the men were about prevented his elaborating any plan of action.

He now saw two of the men withdraw, leaving the other as a kind of guard.

"They have gone round to their friends in front, I suppose. I wonder what they think of it?"

The robbers appeared to be alarmed about something. They seemed to dread taking any vigorous steps. No doubt they were puzzled how to account for the hut being barricaded against them.

From some reason or other they appeared to be aware that their hut had been taken possession of by some one, but, of course, whether by one person or twenty they could have no idea.

Then Dick saw the two men who had just left return, accompanied by three others.

All six then entered the shed.

"Shaw is right," said one.

"Well, it's quite certain, whether he's right or wrong, that if the bar is really up behind the other door, there will be little hope of forcing it, for it was made purposely to resist any attack that might be made upon it."

"Yes, yes."

"Some one must have entered this place, and, no doubt, discovered all. As the doors are all fastened, he must be inside."

"Comrades," said another, "it is some spy, and we are lost. Are you agreed that he shall die?"

"All—all!" they cried.

"Thank you," said Dick to himself. "But it strikes me you are counting your chickens before they are hatched."

Then the man who had so logically concluded that there must be some one inside the hut unfriendly to them, spoke again—

"This door before us, and the existence of which no one would suspect when standing in this shed, because it is made of the same materials as the walls, is by no means so strong, and if we all strive with a will we shall easily enough force it open, and then death—death to the intruder."

"Yes—death!" said the others.

"You make a mistake," said Dick, mentally, "if you think you can frighten me by any such threats——"

He was interrupted by the man who had taken so prominent a part in the council saying rapidly—

"The trunk—the trunk!"

To the intense surprise of Dick, no sooner were these words spoken, than they dashed rapidly into the wood.

This furnished him with matter for speculation.

"The trunk?" he repeated. "Whatever can they mean by saying, 'The trunk—the trunk!' and then running off like a parcel of madmen. I can't make them out at all. I think the very best thing I can do is to be off!"

He put his hand on the fastenings of the door.

"Stop, now," he said, as a second thought entered his head. "I may fall into a snare of some kind. Never mind, here goes."

He was too late.

He heard the sounds of men's footsteps approaching.

"Here they are back again. I wonder what they meant by 'trunk?'"

It was a great puzzle to Dick, and he was anxious in the extreme to know what it was.

They did not keep him long in suspense.

The six men made their appearance again in front of the shed, carrying the trunk of a small tree upon their shoulders.

"Oh, I see now," said Dick; "how ever was it I did not think of that before? It was the trunk of a tree that they meant. It looks as though it had been cut down some time, and laid on the ground in the wet. They are going to smash the door in with it."

The intention of the robbers was now only too apparent. With a ready thought, that had struck them all at once, as soon as the word "trunk" was uttered by their comrade, they one and all remembered the trunk of a tree which had lain for many a day in the clearing in the front of the hut.

Then all, actuated by one impulse, darted off to fetch it.

That was the moment Dick should have seized upon to make his escape; but while he was cudgelling his brains to think what they meant, the opportunity was lost.

The trunk which the men carried was quite denuded of its branches. No doubt they had, from time to time, been lopped off for firewood.

It was about ten feet in length by two in diameter.

The men, three on each side, made a pause, and settled it firmly upon their shoulders.

The thickest end was turned towards the door, and when the men carrying it rushed forward and used it as a battering-ram, there were very few doors that could have held upon their hinges.

Dick's position was getting critical, for at close quarters six to one is rather long odds.

"Forward! forward!" shouted the man nearest the large end of the tree.

Encircling it with their arms, the men ran forwards, and the rude battering-ram came with a terrific crash against the door.

Still, it did not give way completely. It was strongly made, and kept its place bravely; but another such a blow as that which it had just received must inevitably demolish it.

"Back! back! mates; back! One more blow, and the door is open."

The men gave a cheer as they drew back, and prepared for another charge.

They rushed forward with great impetuosity, with thrice as much as was required indeed, for the door gave way in a moment; and as they had prepared to meet with a much greater amount of resistance, they, as a natural result, went sprawling into the hut, with the tree on top of them.

They did not appear, though, to have sustained much damage, for, in an inconceivably short time they had risen to their feet.

All cast a rapid glance around them.

The bright moon lighted up the place in almost every part.

The hut was empty.

Dick had immediately after the first blow retired to the other apartment.

The door which connected the two rooms opened inwardly, so he stood a better chance of securing it than he would if it had opened outwards. His eye lighted upon the chest from which the man had produced the bottle of brandy. It was large and heavy, and Dick dragged it with difficulty along the floor and placed it against the door.

Of course it would not form any great obstacle, but still it would hinder their entrance for a moment or two.

He had just finished placing it in its position when he heard the men dash up against it.

"If now," he said, "I could only have a peep outside this door to see what is going on in front, but, as I can't I shall have to take my luck."

He unfastened the door, so that it would at any moment swing open.

Then he mounted his steed.

Crash—crash came the blows upon the inner door.

Feeling there was not a second to lose, Dick guided Bess to the front door of the hut.

By leaning forward in his saddle he could take hold of its edge.

He bent down his head to a level with Bess's ears, and held the reins firmly with his left hand.

Then he pulled the door quickly open and dashed out into the clearing.

A loud shout from several men in front mingled with that uttered by those who were within as he did so.

"The spy! the spy!" they cried. "That's him! Stop him! Stop him!"

Several men darted out from the shadow of the trees and endeavoured to seize Bess by the bridle.

They might as well have tried to arrest the flight of an eagle.

Several shots were fired by those in the rear, and a sudden shock, like a stroke with a stick, unaccompanied by pain, made Dick aware he had been hit in the shoulder.

It was his left one.

He pulled up and turned round upon his foes.

Their numbers had increased to near a score.

They stood huddled together in a dense throng.

They had all paused on seeing Dick suddenly wheel round.

He had a pistol in his right hand.

"Fall back into the hut," he cried in stentorian tones. "Fall back all, or I fire."

Instinctively the men retreated a few paces.

"Forward—forward! let not the spy escape. Are ye such cowards that ye shrink from one man? He has learned our secret and will betray us. Capture him, alive or dead!"

The man who pronounced these words appeared to hold the post of captain to the troop, for, though he gave such valorous orders, he himself very prudently kept in the background.

Dick laughed as he said—

"I hold here the life of one man. Which of you is willing to be that one?"

None stirred.

They were cowards as it was, but Dick's resolute bearing, and the conviction that one of them must receive the contents of the pistol, did not enhance their valour.

They drew back yet further towards the door of the hut.

"On! on! After him! after him!" again shouted their prudent captain. "Capture him, my gallant hearts!"

Dick could not help feeling amused at the idea of twenty men holding back from attacking him.

An open kind of glade was before him, so, firing his pistol at random in the midst of the banditti, Dick turned his mare's head and galloped away.

As soon as they saw his back the men hastened to pursue him, and Dick heard them give a loud shout, intended no doubt to buoy up their courage.

"What a ridiculous termination to so horrible an adventure. They are the rankest cowards I ever met with, and no mistake. I suppose their achievements consist for the most part in plundering a henroost. I am, however, far from being satisfied; I would give a great deal to hear the story of that poor fellow whom I found in the underground cell."

Full of these thoughts Dick reached the lane which bordered the wood.

He looked behind him, but no traces of his pursuers were visible.

CHAPTER VI.

THE MEETING WITH THE SPECTRE HORSEMAN IN THE LANE.

"WHAT a glorious night!" said Dick, as he looked up and down the quiet shady lane.

The moon was at the full, and had just passed the meridian.

Far and wide, over hill and dale, tree and meadow, hill and stream, fell the flood of silvery lustre which she poured forth.

It lighted up, too, with a rare brilliancy and beauty, the numerous objects in the fertile landscape.

Dick stood upon a piece of slightly rising ground which commanded a splendid view of the surrounding scenery.

Reposing on the northern horizon, like some giant cloud, was the mass of buildings of which the city of London is composed.

The gilding on the summit of the monument glistened faintly in the mellowed light.

But not for long did the highwayman remain gazing at the beauty of the scene. He was anxious to reach London, and turning Bess's head in that direction, he gave her the rein freely.

And now, as both horse and rider are for the present in comparative safety, we will rest for a few moments from the recital of the varied incidents which occurred on this most eventful night.

We wish, if possible, to combat in the space of a few lines the objections which have been raised to making a highwayman the hero of romance.

We feel sure some of our readers will be willing to listen to our arguments.

First, then, it has been urged, and with some apparent reason, that the narration of such romantic incidents as pertain to a highwayman's career would tend to make the thoughtless endeavour to imitate them.

Before we consider this question, it ought to be clearly borne in mind that no small amount of the interest which such a tale excites is due to the fact that the Knight of the Road is essentially a thing of the past.

It is well known how the influence of time softens the asperities of all things, and it has not omitted to throw a gloss over the highwayman's exploits.

Now we ourselves cannot for a moment think it possible that anyone, let him be ever so unreflective, could be ridiculous enough, in these days, to attempt to imitate their deeds.

In fact, the bold highwayman who cried "Stand and deliver!" upon the road, has got to be considered in the light of a species of knight-errant, whose chief business was to redress such social wrongs as came under his immediate notice in the course of the many adventures among high and low, which must necessarily fall to his lot, and this is why we follow him with pleasure. Were scenes of violence alone depicted, the only feeling that would be called into existence would be disgust at his atrocities.

"Such, then, being the case, it must be self-evident that it is not his obnoxiousness to the laws of the land nor the crimes of which he may have been guilty, that gives the attention of the reader, but his courage, address, single-mindedness, and opposition of all kinds of oppression.

When we carry the fancy back a hundred years, we picture society as something very different to what it is in the present day. Law and justice were not so impartially administered them as they are now, and it must be conceded that there is yet ample room for improvement.

But nothing causes so great a change in manners and customs as increase in the speed of locomotion.

The lumbering stage-coach, with its bluff coachman and thick-headed guard, has given place to the railway train, so his occupation having gone, the day of the highwayman has passed away never to return.

Besides, the person who was weak-minded enough to think he could achieve the feats ascribed to heroes such as ours, would be just as likely, after reading some romance of chivalry, to don a suit of armour, and set out in quest of adventures, like Don Quixote.

Now no one thinks of stigmatizing as improper the romances in which mailed warriors and crusaders take a part, and yet it appears to us, the objection raised applies to them with equal force.

The truth is, that those persons whose ordinary life is monotonous and void of incident devour with avidity all tales of wild and wonderful adventure, for the simple reason that they present so vivid and remarkable a contrast to the routine of their own existence.

To all of these we promise in our pages a rich mine of entertainment; but we wish them to remember the work is a romance—nothing more.

Meanwhile Dick has trotted swiftly down the lane in the direction of London.

The high road is gained and crossed, and down another narrow lane, which will abbreviate the distance to be travelled, he takes his way.

Soaking slowly through his coat and trickling down on to Bess's flanks, came the blood from the wound in his left shoulder.

It was scarcely more than a mere scratch. The bullet, which had been fired by the robbers in the wood, had ploughed up the flesh on his shoulder, but had not touched the bone in its passage.

It bled freely, and to this circumstance may be attributed the total absence of pain. He heeded it not in the least, and had even forgotten he had been wounded.

But slowly and constantly welled forth the current of life, and fell with a faint, almost inaudible, drip upon the ground in the country lane.

Not for long, however, can he remain insensible to the fearful loss of blood.

Still he galloped onward.

All was beautifully calm. No sound, save the beat of Bess's hoofs, and the rustling of the foliage on each side of him, broke the delicious silence.

Before him, and high up in the heavens, was the bright, full moon, travelling apparently at the same rate as himself and ever keeping the same distance in advance.

Occasionally a light fleecy cloud would sweep over her disc, obscuring her brilliancy for a moment, and then sail away across the sky, but that was all.

It was a night which could not fail to make a deep impression upon any reasoning being. The deep silence and repose around seemed to steal into the mind and create a corresponding influence upon the soul. It seemed to chasten and soften down the thoughts as the moonlight chastened material objects.

Then the aspect of the lane changed.

The low hedgerows gave place to high ones, while here and there a thick group of elms and poplars cast a deep black shadow on the roadway.

Dick still pressed on. Once or twice he felt a strange sensation of weakness, and a kind of mist floated before his eyes.

A slight smarting from the wound in his shoulder now attracted his attention, and he placed his right hand upon it.

To his surprise, he found his coat sopping wet.

He withdrew his hand with a puzzled air.

Oh! I remember now," he said; "one of those rascals scratched me with a bullet, and I suppose it has been bleeding ever since."

He moved his arm about to ascertain whether the joint had been injured in any way, but he felt nothing more than a little stiffness.

"Oh! it's all right," he said. "I must manage to bind it up in some way; I wish I had discovered it earlier."

While speaking he untied his voluminous cravat, and, though it was rather an awkward job, succeeded in bandaging the wound and staunching the blood.

"That's better! I shall get on now, I fancy."

But he had lost more blood than he imagined, and he felt his head swim, and he reeled in his saddle.

"Woa! gently! hold up!" he said, clutching Bess's mane. "Woa now!"

He recovered himself by an effort, and pricking his mare gently with a spur, continued on his way.

A dull red mist seemed to obscure his vision, but by degrees it cleared away.

Then, as he looked in advance of him, he fancied he could see in the far distance something in motion, but he could not determine what it was, for it was so confounded with the shadows at the end of the lane that it was hardly distinguishable.

Presently, however, it began to assume the form of a horse and rider.

It looked, though, strangely dim and undefined.

It approached with a peculiar gliding, undulating movement.

What puzzled him most was, that though he bent forward in the saddle and listened, and though all around was so profoundly silent, no sound of the horse's feet striking against the road came to his ears.

And still onward, nearer, nearer, with the same gliding, stealthy motion, came the mysterious steed.

Dick felt a vague feeling of alarm—it could scarcely be called terror—creeping over him.

This was in a great measure, no doubt, produced by the great quantity of blood which he had lost.

He made a strong effort to shake it off.

It was in vain.

Then he became conscious that Bess was trembling violently.

His hands wandered to the holsters.

And now the spectral-looking horseman reached a spot where no shadows fell upon the lane, and was plainly revealed by the pale moonbeams.

The misty, shadowy look had disappeared.

Both horse and rider were defined with extraordinary clearness.

Involuntarily, as his eye rested upon them, a cry of astonishment issued from his lips.

And well there might.

He fancied he must be dreaming.

The mysterious rider was a perfect reflex of himself.

The steed of his own mare, Black Bess.

He saw the whole as plainly as if he had stood before a gigantic looking-glass.

He closed his eyes, fancying for a moment that what he saw was but the creation of his own brain; and when he opened them again it was with the firm conviction that when he did so the apparition would have vanished.

But no; there it stood, and apparently ten times more palpable than before.

He ran his eye over the costume.

There was the same rakish-looking hat, with its long trailing feather, the same gold-faced scarlet coat, the same high boots—all was most exact.

In a moment, all that he had ever heard respecting the appearance of such an object being a foretoken of death flashed through his mind; and, although it could not absolutely be said that he placed credence in such stories, yet, when he saw approaching, and at no great distance from him, a form which he was convinced was no illusion, a cold chill crept over him, and the blood seemed to gush back suddenly to his heart.

His breath came short and thick.

"What can it mean?" he said, faintly.

As he spoke, the mysterious horseman suddenly leaped the hedge, and sped over the meadows until he reached a little knoll, where he stood still and immovable.

As for Bess, she seemed as if changed to stone. Her neck was outstretched towards the spectre steed, and her eyes seemed bursting from their sockets. Her mane was erect and her sides wet with perspiration.

How long Dick gazed he knew not, but suddenly a cloud passed over the moon's face, and cast a temporary darkness around.

When she peeped forth again the spectre horseman had disappeared.

Dick gave a sigh of relief.

"This is very, very strange," he said. "What can be the meaning of this assumption of my own form and features? I feel sick and faint. My brain is heavy and my arms paralyzed. Can it be possible that I have bled to death?"

His heart pulsated at twice its usual speed as this question crossed his mind, and he leaned forward heavily upon the neck of his steed.

In a few moments, however, the deathlike faintness which had come over him passed away, and as he settled himself properly in the saddle, he passed his hand two or three times over his brow, and looked in a bewildered sort of fashion about him.

All was still and silent. No other living, moving object could be anywhere distinguished.

He urged Bess forwards.

Filled with strange thoughts and sensations to which he had hitherto been a stranger, Dick proceeded on his way to London, nor did he draw rein again until he stood upon the old bridge at Blackfriars.

A cool, refreshing breeze came from the surface of the water, and Dick paused for a few moments in order to enjoy it, for it came very gratefully upon his fevered brain.

There were a few vessels even at that hour moving lazily on the river.

He watched them for some moments.

It was wonderful what a difference the cool breeze made to Dick; he felt himself revive rapidly.

Then he spoke—

"I am better now—much better. I feel, though, very, very weary, and am glad I have reached London. I will make my way at once to where I can have an hour or two's repose."

He proceeded at a gentle pace up Bridge-street, and so on across Fleet-street into Farringdon-street, and past the gloomy old Fleet Prison.

Then he plunged into the mass of narrow streets and courts which lie between Fleet-street and Holborn-hill.

To-day it is by no means an enviable locality, but a hundred years ago we may reasonably conclude it was at the very least a hundred times worse than it is now.

He threaded his way into Chancery-lane without meeting with a soul.

He made his way to the corner of Carey-street.

Here a watchman had his station, who was supposed to watch over the neighbourhood and protect the houses from the burglar!

Suppose, indeed!

The box was there, but it was empty. Doubtless, the guardian of the night was solacing himself somewhere near at hand.

At almost any other time Dick would have played him some trick, but now he was so thoroughly exhausted he could think of nothing but reaching some place of rest.

Soon, then, he emerged into Drury-lane by way of Princes-street, and, turning to the left, pulled up at the White Horse.

No traces of this ancient inn are left now. It was pulled down many years ago, and the present gin-palace erected on its site in the south corner of a passage called White Horse-yard.

It was famed all over London as being the resort of all the criminals in town. The landlord was always too well paid by his customers for any reward, however great, to be an inducement for him to betray them, and any of the "family" was sure of finding a safe refuge in his house.

Although it was at an hour when everybody would be supposed to be in bed, yet, when Dick drew up before the old inn, a light was burning in the tap-room.

He alighted, and, instead of entering by the door, led Bess by the bridle down a narrow alley until he reached a small door.

Here he paused, and pressing his thumb against the lintel, waited patiently.

The door swung silently open, and a stout, red-faced man appeared upon the threshold.

He held a lantern in his hand.

"Hullo!" he said, gruffly; then, as he recognized his visitor, he said, in a cordial voice, "Why, Dick lad, is it you? I have not seen you for an age. How mortal pale you are, to be sure! What's the matter?"

Dick smiled languidly as he replied—

"I am wounded, Matthew."

"Eh! wounded?"

"Oh, only slightly, only slightly. A mere scratch; in fact, nothing to speak of."

"Come in, come in, and let me attend to it. Bring your mare with you. I'll see to stabling her all right. Come in, come in."

Dick led Bess over the doorstep as desired, and Matthew, the landlord, carefully closed the door.

It was rather a strange place in which Dick stood, and it well deserves a line or two of description.

In appearance it more resembled the bottom of a well than anything else, only it was square instead of round.

The only roof it had was the sky.

It was about eight feet square. That side of it in which the door was placed was a plain brick wall of the same height as the house itself.

The other three sides were simply the external walls of the inn, in which were several windows.

But the strangest thing of all was that a number of pieces of iron, about twelve inches long by one in diameter, were stuck at regular intervals from the floor to the roof, so that a person might by their aid ascend to the housetops.

These bars were besides arranged so that they passed near every window which looked into this square place.

Their use was obvious.

A person could leave any of these rooms without difficulty through the windows, and either go up or down as circumstances might require.

There was a small low door opposite to the one by which Dick had entered, leading into the inn, and another on the left hand leading by a circuitous route to the stables.

It was through this last-mentioned door that the landlord passed, followed by Dick and his mare.

Tired and faint as he was, Dick would not forego his invariable custom of seeing his mare safely lodged and fed.

This done, he accompanied old Matthew through a maze of wooden corridors, and up a flight of rickety stairs into a small chamber.

"There," said the landlord, putting his lantern on the broad window-sill, and carefully closing the shutters, "you may make yourself perfectly comfortable for twelve hours at least. Here is the bed."

Dick threw himself upon the bed with an air of intense satisfaction.

"Shall I leave the light?"

"No; I shall not want it."

"All right; good night."

"Good night, landlord," replied Dick; "mind you look after my mare."

"Don't trouble about that, my boy. Won't you have something to eat and drink?"

"No, no, thank you," replied Turpin, drowsily. "Stay till I wake up. That'll do."

"Good night, Dick," said the landlord again.

He waited in vain for a reply.

Dick was fast asleep.

"Ah, well," said old Matthew, as he approached the bed, and cast the light of the lantern upon his face. "He's helpless enough now, and no mistake. However, he shall come to no harm under this roof so long as I am alive. So rest in peace, brave heart, rest in peace."

The landlord slowly left the bedside, and closed the door carefully behind him.

The dawn of the coming day struggled through the triangular-shaped holes in the window shutters, and a faint, leaden-coloured beam of light fell upon the exhausted, slumbering highwayman.

CHAPTER VII.

THE ENCOUNTER WITH THE POLICE OFFICER ON THE ROOF OF THE OLD INN IN DRURY LANE.

"ROUSE up, Dick! rouse up, lad! Wake up! wake up, come! Here's a couple of redbreasts dropped in. Wake up!"

It was old Matthew Gale, the landlord, who spoke.

It seemed to Dick as though he had only just closed his eyes when these words sounded in his ears.

He started up in bed.

"What is it, Matthew, eh? Is the house on fire?"

"No, no; only I saw a couple of officers come in. I didn't stop to see what they wanted, but thought I would wake you up, so that you might be prepared for action if necessary."

"Thanks! thanks! And Bess?"

"Right as a trivet. She's got all her traps on, and you can have her at a moment's notice."

"That is well. Why, dear me, it is getting quite daylight."

"Daylight? Ha! ha! He! he! he! Ha! ha!"

The landlord fairly held his sides.

"Hilloa! what's up? Why do you laugh?"

"Ha! ha! Why, at you, to be sure. The idea of fancying it was getting daylight. Night is closing in quick!"

"Nonsense!"

"It's a fact."

"Then do you mean to say I have been sleeping twelve hours?"

"Well, that's somewhere about the figure, I guess."

"I can scarcely credit it. I thought I had only just closed my eyes when you called me."

"That was because you slept sound. How is your wound?"

"Oh, I fancy it's all right. I feel nothing of it."

"I wouldn't move the bandage yet if I were you," said Matthew, after examining it. "Let it alone, and it will soon get right. Try a glass or two of this; it is the finest old port in my cellar. It will put new blood into you."

"You are thoughtful, my friend. I do feel just the least bit faint."

"I shouldn't wonder. Now, if I were you, I would try a good meal."

"I feel very hungry, I can tell you; but how about the officers you were mentioning?"

"Oh! dear me, what a head I've got! I have been rattling on like this, and quite forgot all about them."

"I can scarcely think they are after me. How could they tell I was anywhere in the neighbourhood?"

"Oh! I didn't say they were after you, only I thought you ought not to be asleep while the Philistines were abroad."

"They can't be after me. If they had seen me last night we should have had a visit long before this."

"No doubt, no doubt."

"Just run down, will you, then, and find out their object; and, as soon as you can, come back and let me know."

"I will. Don't be afraid, Dick, lad; you are safer here than you could be anywhere. I'll promise you if the grabs are in search of you I can baffle them without any trouble. So rest in security where you are. You have nothing whatever to fear."

"Well, then, Matthew, I should like you to run down again, and find out, if you can, what it is these officers want."

"All right; but on no account leave the room until I return."

Dick opened the door himself, and allowed the landlord to go out, and, leaning over the balusters, watched him as far down the stairs as he could, and then stood still and listened.

He heard the landlord's footsteps for some moments, and then a door closed, after which all was still.

Then a long pause ensued, when, hearing the door open again, Dick withdrew into his chamber.

In a moment or two afterwards the landlord returned.

"Well?" said Dick, inquiringly.

"It's you they're after. They've got some suspicion you are here, but of course I denied the fact, and told them to search the old place from top to bottom. It will take them some time," he added, complacently.

"No doubt of that."

"The 'White Horse' is fuller of odd nooks and corners than they fancy."

"Have they begun their search?"

"Yes; and as they no doubt think in a very cunning manner. You must not suppose that this staircase is the principal one. It is quite a secondary one, and they may not discover its existence. However, they have all gone straight up to the top of the house, intending to commence their search on the roof and end in the cellar."

"All, do you say?"

"Why, not all, of course. They have left one or two downstairs as a kind of guard; and, no doubt, several more are looking out in the lane and the court, and they would of course raise an alarm if they saw you attempting to leave the premises."

A great hubbub from somewhere above now reached their ear.

"God bless me!" said the landlord, "what's that?"

"They had made some discovery or other, I should fancy. What can it be?"

Old Matthew changed colour a little as he replied—

"I have no idea. However, it appears they have been up to the roof, and come down again. I must leave you now, to go and see what they are after."

"Very good; but how shall I manage if they take it into their heads to come here while you are away?"

"I'll show you. Bess is safe enough, and where they will never find her, so don't let that trouble you."

"Well—well!" said Dick, uneasily.

"Don't put yourself about. Beleaguered as the house is, it would be impossible for you to leave it with your mare. I know you don't like to be off her back, but it can't be helped."

"What do you propose, then?"

"Just this. When I go out, shut the door and lock it after me. If the officers don't come, well and good. If they do, look here!"

The landlord went to the window as he spoke.

"Now," he said, "there is something very peculiar indeed about this window. You see, to all appearance, it is nailed up."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, it is only in appearance. Those nail-heads, which stick out so ostentatiously all round the sash, are like a good deal of ostentation in this world—all sham. They are just intended to mislead any one, and nothing more. The window opens with a hidden spring, in this way."

He pressed on the head of one of the many nails round the sash, and the window rose silently in the groove made for it, and continued to rise so long as the head of the nail was pressed upon.

"Now, of course, you will say," continued the landlord, "that it is just possible, as the spring which opens the window is not concealed, that it may be discovered. But there is not the slightest ground for such a thought. On the contrary, it is more likely to prevent its being found out. You must bear in mind that there are at least fifty nail-heads here altogether, which diminishes the chances of discovery fifty times. Then, if the nails were tampered with, no one would think of driving them in further, as you saw me do, but, on the contrary, would try to pull them out."

There was so much logic in this reasoning that Dick was convinced at once.

"But you haven't seen all of this yet," said old Matthew, with a certain degree of pride, "though the other part is simple enough. Look outside."

Dick put his head through the window, and saw that he was looking into the square, well-like place which he had entered about twelve hours before.

"Those bars," said Matthew, "are mortared very firmly into the wall, and you need not fear their giving way. As soon, then, as you hear the officers at the door, press on the nail; it is the eleventh from the sill, and the window will open as I showed you. Then climb out, and take hold of the bar nearest to you with your right hand, and putting your foot on another one, close the window with your left; you will find it shut down with ease. It will then be immovable, and present to the officers the appearance of having been nailed up for a length of time. An active man like you will, of course, be able to reach the roof without difficulty, and when you have, I must leave you to your own devices."

"And fear not for me, then," said Dick, pressing the landlord's hand; "I shall be right enough, never fear."

"I will leave you, then, for I am full of anxiety to know what the redbreasts are doing, and my longer absence might be productive of suspicion."

"Do so—do so."

"I hope," said Dick, "you will be able to lead them off the scent, for I can feel I am dreadfully weak. I must have lost an immense quantity of blood."

"Keep yourself quiet, and don't get excited. I would advise you to lie down on the bed again. You can, if necessary, easily make it appear as though it had never been slept on."

"To be sure. I wish"——

"What?"

"You will smile, but if you will believe me, I am never contented unless Bess is close to me."

"Oh! now don't, I beg, trouble about that. I, as I said just now, may take the officers quite off their scent; and if I do, as it is only a little after nine, you can, as soon as they are gone, make your way down the court into Clare-market, and so gain the open country."

"I shall be glad to do so, and I fancy when once London is behind me, I shall be some time before I return."

"Oh! your wound makes you down-hearted. You will soon be all right."

"Well, leave me now, leave me now. Try and spare me the task of climbing over the roofs, for I feel quite unequal to it."

"Trust to me, I'll do the best I can," said the landlord, leaving the room.

With a wearied air, Dick threw himself upon the bed, and pressed his hands over his temples. There was a throbbing sensation in his head which was distracting and painful in the extreme. His system had been almost drained of blood.

Time passed, and nearly half an hour elapsed after old Matthew left the room before Turpin heard anything to indicate the coming of his foes.

Then, as he lay in a half unconscious state he heard the sound of footsteps on the stairs.

A minute more, and the hum of many voices mingled with them.

He rose to a sitting posture on the bed.

The different objects in the room seemed chasing each other round and round him.

He was in a strange, dreamy state.

Suddenly, the familiar tones of old Matthew's voice struck upon his ears.

He was speaking loudly.

"Of course, of course. Go where you like; I don't care. I only hope you'll find him, that's all."

"Your conduct is very suspicious, Mr. Gale; very suspicious indeed," said a gruff voice.

"As how, I should like to know?" rejoined the landlord. "As how, I say? Have I interfered with you in the least, or said a word to you about turning my house upside down, and ruining my trade? Just answer me that."

"Why, I think your trade would take a good deal of ruining, Mr. Gale. It's no good you putting on an air of injured innocence, for your house is celebrated all over the kingdom as being the resort of the worst of characters."

"Be careful what you're saying, be careful what you're saying. Recollect you're in my house, Mr. Officer."

"I know that," was the reply, given in an irascible voice. "But you just let me catch you out in harbouring or abetting any one, and see if I don't make you smart for it. I shall be sure to do so, sooner or later."

"Oh! indeed, Mr. Clever; oh! indeed. Perhaps you'd like to find me out to-day?"

"I shall, too, or it's very odd to me, so I wouldn't advise you to crow so loud. What room does this door open into, eh?"

They had reached the threshold of the one in which Dick stood.

While this little conversation was going on, and which, from its rather artificial character, was doubtless got up by old Matthew with the intention of putting Dick on his guard, the latter had, in a great measure, succeeded in shaking off the feeling of faintness which had so weighed upon him.

He smoothed over the bed, and unlocked the door silently, so that the suspicions of the officers should not be aroused by finding it fastened on the inside; and then, rushing to the window, he pressed the spring, and passed quickly out of it.

Taking hold, then, firmly of the bar, as the landlord had directed, he closed the window with his left hand.

As he hung thus suspended, he felt himself seized with a sudden giddiness, and it was by little short of a miracle he saved himself from falling into the yard below.

He looked up, and saw the edge of the roof about ten feet above him.

He sighed as he saw it.

"I can never do it," he said; "I never in my life felt so deadly faint. I must make the effort, though, or they may see me from the window."

He climbed up three or four steps, and paused; he felt that for the moment he was out of danger.

The cool night air blew refreshingly upon him, and every second seemed to bring with it a fresh accession of strength.

No sound reached him from the room below.

How they were getting on of course he could form no sort of idea.

"It will be best for me to ascend the rest of the distance. I shall be able to rest much better on the roof, and I shall no doubt be perfectly secure; for, having searched it once, they will not be likely to look for me again; and, unless I am mistaken, they will leave a man on every staircase as they go on with their search to prevent the possibility of any one making their escape by ascending.

He proceeded to the execution of his design. The remaining bars were ascended with but little difficulty, for he felt he had regained much of his wonted strength, and he found himself in another moment at the edge of the parapet.

To climb over this would be the most dangerous part of the business. He would have to relinquish his hold of the iron bars, and, grasping the stonework, draw himself over. But the stone had been there exposed to wind and rain for many a long year, and was much decayed; and as he, with his left hand, strove to take a hold, he as often found a fragment come away in his fingers.

They fell with a slight sound into the yard beneath. Dick shuddered at the time they took to reach it.

However, making a vigorous effort, he scaled the parapet, and rolled over into the gutter, which surrounded it on the inner side.

It was not a very pleasant place to fall into, for it was filled with black slimy mud, which had from time to time accumulated there, and Dick rose up very much the worse for the contact.

He did not, however, rise immediately to his feet, but lay still for a few moments, and then, raising his head, looked carefully around him.

An angular roof of dark red tiles was on his left hand, and up this he began to climb.

The ascent was rather steep, and he slipped once or twice before he reached the top, along which he crept a few feet, until his farther progress was stayed by a huge stack of chimneys.

"I must get round this," he said, "and on to the roof of the next house, in case any of the officers should make their appearance, then I shall be all right."

Very carefully now, for the attempt was full of peril, Dick crawled round to the other side of the chimneys.

"Now I've caught you, Mr. Dick; now I've caught you," said an exulting voice at this moment; and, before he was aware of it, Dick felt himself clutched tightly round the throat by some one.

It was a Bow-street runner, who had been left there by his superiors to watch if the highwayman made his appearance, and with instructions, in case he should do so, to give an immediate alarm.

But this man did not want for courage, and he resolved, should Dick get out on to the roof, to try his best to capture him single-handed, which would entitle him to the very large reward offered for his apprehension.

He was sitting very composedly on the roof, but yet keeping a sharp look-out around him, when his attention was arrested by hearing a slight sound.

It was the crumbling of the coping as Dick sought to obtain a firm hold of it.

He withdrew instantly, and hid himself behind the chimneys, for he was well aware how great an advantage you have over your enemy if you can pounce upon him unawares.

The officer, too, was also aware how difficult it was to keep a foothold on the tiles, especially during a struggle, so he very cunningly had got over the ridge of the roof on to the opposite side, where he held himself in readiness to catch Dick by the throat.

He knew, while he kept his hold upon the highwayman, he could not by any means fall down.

But Dick was accustomed to sudden surprises, and he very quickly recovered from this one.

He was in a moment alive to the fact that unless he speedily overcame this officer, and that before he gave any alarm, his comrades from below would come to his assistance, and then, in such a place, opposed to such odds, escape would be hopeless.

All this flashed through his mind with the rapidity of lightning.

Feeling, then, the necessity for instantaneous action, he summoned to his aid all the strength which he possessed, and taking a firm grip of his opponent's throat, he endeavoured, by main force, to drag him over the ridge of the roof on to the side on which he was.

Now this officer, full of the hope of being able to capture the redoubtable highwayman single-handed, disdained to call for help, as he might have done, and attacked him in a courageous manner.

It was a singular combat.

If there had been a spectator of it, though, he would have noticed that Dick was by slow degrees drawing the officer over in spite of the strenuous efforts which he made to prevent it.

The wound in Dick's arm, which, now that his blood was hot, he thought not of, was, nevertheless, a disadvantage; but this was more than compensated by his superior weight, for the officer, though muscular, was slightly made.

Slowly and surely he felt he was being drawn upwards and over.

Neither spoke.

Their heavy breathing was the only sound which issued from them.

With might and main did the officer strive to maintain his position on the slope; but in vain. He made frantic attempts to insert the toes of his boots in the crevices of the tiles and the brickwork of the chimneys; but in vain likewise.

TURPIN'S STRUGGLE WITH THE OFFICER ON THE ROOF-TOP.

Feeling, then, that it was imperatively necessary to change his tactics, he ceased suddenly to oppose any resistance to being dragged over, and gave himself an impetus forward.

This had the natural effect of causing Dick to lose his balance, and both, without relaxing their hold, rolled over and over down the slanting roof.

Had it not been for the old stone parapet, which was about eighteen inches high, and which had given Dick so much trouble to surmount, they must inevitably have been precipitated into the yard below.

It stopped their further progress, though with more force and suddenness than was pleasant.

A broad gutter, filled with the accumulated mud of many years, surrounded the parapet, and it was into this delightful bed they fell.

Dick was undermost.

The police-officer placed his knee on Dick's breast, and paused a moment to regain his breath; then, in a moment after, the struggle recommenced on both sides with redoubled fury.

They rose to their feet.

There was just room for them to stand in that narrow gutter, but that was all.

Dick was an experienced wrestler, and a cold chill crept over the officer as he felt himself in the grasp of one who was evidently a practised hand.

"Surrender!" said Dick, between his teeth—"Surrender, and I will spare you."

The only reply the officer made was to cling yet tighter to his foe.

"Take your fate, then!" shouted Dick, and he threw him violently down.

The unfortunate officer fell with a dull, sickening sound upon the top of the parapet.

His body was half over, but he still kept his hold. He felt in that was his only chance of preservation.

With a sudden wrench Dick freed himself from it, out at the expense of some portion of his apparel.

With a hideous rush the body of the officer fell back again, and plunged headlong down the abyss ere Dick could put out his hand to save him.

He placed his hands to his ears so that he should shut out the sickening crash of his body falling on the stones below.

He heard it though plainly enough in his imagination, and he withdrew his hands with a horrified expression upon his countenance.

He stooped down and peered over—all was dark below and profoundly still.

"Poor fellow!" said Dick, as he rose; "it's all over with him. I'm sorry, for he was a brave man, but it was his life or mine! Where shall I make my way now?"

He looked all round as he spoke. It was dusk, and the gloom was momentarily increasing.

An apparently solid mass of roofs and chimneys of every imaginable shape and description environed him.

From one or two of the queer-shaped attic-windows came a faint gleam of light.

The moon had not yet risen, or if she had was not sufficiently above the horison to shed her light upon the roof-tops.

He crawled along the gutters until he came to that part overlooking Drury-lane.

An ever-moving throng filled the pavements, and then in another moment Dick's eye fell upon the form of an officer who was standing in a doorway on the opposite side of the street and regarding the front of the inn attentively.

Dick slunk down still lower in the gutter, though when he peeped over he had not exposed enough of his body to be visible in the darkness.

Along the gutter on to the next house, and then on to the next, until he reached the corner of a street, he slowly crept.

He halted.

"I must make my way down by one of these attic windows," he said, "and through the house into the street below."

He made his attempt upon the one nearest to him. It was securely fastened.

Just at that moment his eye fell upon a trap-door in the roof which was slightly displaced from its position.

"That will do it," he said. "All is easy now."

He advanced to the trap as he spoke and lifted it off in a moment. It seemed to cover a square patch of darkness.

Before he trusted himself to descend, he took a coin from his pocket and let it fall through. For aught he knew the trap might be immediately over a steep staircase, or so great a distance from the floor as to prevent his dropping down with safety.

Besides, were anyone about the sound would inevitably attract their attention, but had he shown a light, it would have called notice to him.

The coin fell on a floor a foot or two below him, with a ringing sound.

He listened to see if any notice was taken of it, but all was silent as before.

Then he lowered himself carefully through the trap, holding firmly by his hands. He stretched out his feet and found they just grazed the floor, so he reached it without making the least noise.

CHAPTER VIII.

DICK, BY HIS TIMELY PRESENCE, INTERRUPTS THE PERPETRATION OF A DEED OF CRUELTY.—THE YOUNG GIRL'S GRATITUDE.

For a minute or two Dick stood perfectly still, in order that his eyes might become accustomed to the gloom. He dared not exhibit a light, and besides if he did it would only have the effect of making the darkness seem greater by the contrast, for, of course, he could not keep it burning.

Very gradually the light from the aperture in the ceiling above appeared to increase in brightness, and as it did, the objects surrounding him began to be dimly visible.

It was on a small wooden landing which he stood, and from which one door opened. It was well he had the precaution to stand still, for the top staircase was only a few inches from him.

He extended his hand and rested it upon the baluster. It was large and massive, and such as may be found in London in old houses, at the present time.

With slow and careful steps, and walking close to the wall so as to make the least possible noise, Dick descended the flight of stairs, and found himself upon another landing.

He could see with tolerable ease about him, for it was lighted with a long window.

Hearing no sound, and seeing nothing indicative of the presence of a living creature, Dick did not pause, but commenced the descent of the second flight.

His foot was on the sixth step from the top, and he was feeling his way round the turn in the staircase, when his ears were saluted with a succession of short shrieks of so shrill a nature that he almost lost his balance.

It was evidently from a female that they proceeded.

"Good heavens!" said Dick, "whatever can have happened. I never heard such frightful screams before. Some poor girl is in trouble, I take it!"

As he uttered these words, he sprang hastily down the remainder of the stairs, nor did he pause until he found himself in the passage close to the front door.

The horrible shrieks still sounded in his ears, but they came from some depth lower down.

Guided by the cries, he found his way to the head of the stairs leading to the kitchen, and up these they came in full force.

Without a moment's delay or hesitation, Dick ran down them, and seeing a bright light issuing from a partially closed door, he pushed it open, and with the hanger, which he wore by his side, in his grasp, burst into the apartment.

A horrifying sight met his gaze.

Cowering on the floor, and divested of almost every article of attire, was a young girl of about seventeen years of age. She was dark, and had long glossy hair hanging disorderedly about her. Her hands were clasped together tightly, and her face, under happier auspices, was doubtless beautiful, but now it was convulsed with agony. Her lips were apart and bloodless, and tears were streaming from her eyes.

Standing over her, and flourishing a broad, heavy belt or strap, was a being in the shape of a woman. She was old and gaunt, presenting indeed more the appearance of an animated skeleton than aught else. Her eyes were bright and reptile-looking, and a ghastly expression of delight and fiend-like malice lighted up her countenance as she struck the girl brutally with the strap.

Close by was a short, thin, insignificant-looking man, but there was a world of pity and commiseration in his looks. He held up his hands in a deprecating manner, as though he would fain, if he had the power, interpose and shield the young girl from the violent attack the woman made upon her.

Dick saw all this at a glance.

"Help! help! Save me! save me!" shrieked the young girl, as her eyes fell upon the new-comer. "Oh! sir, whoever you may be, save and help me!"

She sprang up on her feet, and reaching Dick's side with a bound, flung her arms round him and clung with the intensity of one who feels she has found a saviour.

Unmitigated surprise at the sudden appearance of a man in so hostile an attitude, deprived the old hag for an instant of both speech and motion, and she glared upon Dick as she held the strap in the air, as though she had been suddenly confronted with a spectre.

Dick passed his arm round the slight form of the young girl and drew her towards him, endeavouring by this means to reassure her and calm her terrible agitation.

"Oh! save me, sir! save me!" she sobbed, "take me away from here! Pray do, for Mrs. Brettle beats me nearly to death every day. Oh! do take me away! Will you, sir?"

She clung to him still more closely, as she asked this question, and looked up into his face with so much appealing earnestness, that Dick felt the tears spring uncontrollably into his eyes.

"Save you, my poor girl!" he said, in his deep, manly tones, which thrilled through every nerve of the girl's body with a feeling of exquisite delight which she had never before experienced; "of course I will, and take you where you please, but not till I have punished this hag for her cruelty towards you."

A happy smile lighted up her face like a sunbeam when she heard his promise, but it was suddenly clouded over, and a look of deep dejection usurped its place.

"Why do you look so sad all at once?" asked Dick.

"I'll let you know, Mr. What's-your-name!" burst in the shrill tones of the old woman's voice at this moment, and before the girl could frame a reply. "I'll let you know, Mr. What's-your-name, whether you can come rumpaging into a lone woman's house in this way, and interfering between her and her apprentice as belongs to her, leastways as she took out of the workhouse at St. Giles's six weeks ago come Easter Monday. I'll let you know."

"Apprentice?" said Dick.

"Yes; apprentice!" repeated the old woman. "I should like to know whether there's a law in the land, or whether there isn't; and if a lone woman is to have her house broken into because she chooses to give her parish apprentice a lesson. That's what I want to know."

As for the miserable-looking man, he said never a word, but stood looking from one to another aghast.

Disdaining to say anything further to this woman, who, now that she had recovered the use of her tongue, would doubtless be terribly abusive, Dick bent down his head, and looking into the girl's face with an air of perfect ease and confidence, said—

"Is it true, my dear, what this—woman, I suppose, I must call her—says? Are you her apprentice?"

"Alas! sir; yes."

"What is she? I mean, what trade were you apprenticed to learn?"

"Cap-making, sir."

"And—forgive me if what I ask hurts your feelings—from what has been said I gather you are alone in the world?"

"Quite—quite alone, sir!" said the girl, sobbing and weeping afresh. "I have no father, no mother, nor have I friend in the world."

"Oh! yes, you have," replied Dick, cheerfully. "Providence has sent me here just in time to be a friend in need to you, and I will take care you are no longer subjected to her brutality."

He pointed with his finger towards the woman whom the girl had called Mrs. Brettel.

"Oh! indeed; oh! indeed, Mr. What-d'ye-call. How much longer are you going on with your highty-tighty nonsense? I know what's law if you don't. That's my apprentice, and if you don't give her up at once, and leave my house, I will send for a constable, and pretty soon make you. Things have come to a pretty pass, indeed, when you can't do as you like in your own house without some bully or ——"

"Silence, hag!" shouted Dick. "Were it not for your sex I would bestow such a summary chastisement upon you as should serve for a lesson for the rest of your life. There are too many like you, who fancy when you take a poor orphan apprentice into your clutches you can commit what outrage you choose upon her. Why does she beat you?" asked Dick, in kinder tones, as he turned again to the young girl.

A vivid flush of crimson in a moment overspread her face.

"Do not ask me that, sir; do not ask me that," she replied, bending her eyes downwards. "Indeed I cannot tell you. It is something very wrong."

Dick's eyes blazed ominously as he heard this answer, and when the old woman again saw his countenance, it wore so terrible an expression that she involuntarily fell upon her knees and yelled for mercy.

The girl sobbed as though her heart would break.

"Cheer up!" said Dick, "cheer up. You have nothing to be ashamed of, and I will take care you are no longer coerced by her in any way. But who is that man?" he added, indicating the man who was present.

"That, sir, is Mr. Brettel."

"Her husband?"

"Yes."

"And does he sanction such cruelty?"

"Oh! no sir. He is kindness and gentleness itself. He would not hurt a fly, but his wife treats him almost as badly as she does me, and he is quite powerless to help me, and if he even said a word of remonstrance she would beat him almost to death with the strap!"

Dick regarded Mr. Brettel with a look in which surprise, curiosity, and pity were strangely blended.

"Is it possible?" he said.

"It is true, sir; and I have to thank him for many little kindnesses which he has done me."

"You have, have you?" screamed the wife, rising suddenly from her abject position. "So that's how you set me at defiance in my own house, you tyrant, is it?" she continued, addressing her husband. "Take that and that!"

As these last words issued from her lips she rushed upon him like some wild animal, and struck him over the head and face with the strap.

"She's a delightful female, certainly," said Dick, as he released himself from the hold of the young girl; "but I must put a stop to this."

Suiting the action to the word, he seized the furious woman by the neck, and, brandishing his hanger in her face, compelled her to desist.

Mr. Brettel rose with difficulty to his feet, and wiped the blood from his neck and face.

"Now, sir," said Dick, as his eye fell upon a clothesline that was stretched across the room, "I will render you a service. Pull that rope down, and give it to me."

Mr. Brettel tremblingly obeyed.

"On second thoughts," said Turpin, as he handed it back to him, "you shall bind her yourself."

"I—I!" said the husband, with genuine terror in his tones.

"Yes, you," said Dick, laughing. "You needn't look so frightened about it. You will have no danger. If she makes the least resistance, I will have her head off at a single blow."

He flourished his weapon in a formidable manner.

Mr. Brettel's hands shook so much that no one would have fancied for a moment that he would be able to do such an act; but after awhile his wife's apathy endowed him with courage, and he bound her strongly.

Dick sheathed his hanger.

"That's over; and now, Mr. Brettel, if you'll take a piece of friendly advice, you will keep her just as she is until she's half dead with hunger. She will be submissive enough then. Never heed her threats. So long as you do not unloose her she can do nothing. It will be your own fault if she ever ill-treats you again."

Mrs. Brettel ground her teeth with rage.

Her husband ventured to smile, and rubbed his hands over one another with feeble satisfaction.

"I will do it!" he said; "I will do it!"

"Well done!" said Dick, patting him encouragingly on the back. "Well done! I shouldn't advise you—— Hullo!"

"What's the matter?"

"Why, where's the young girl gone?"

"Who, Ellen?"

"If that is her name."

"I am here!" said a gentle voice, and the apprentice entered the room, but so altered that Dick scarcely recognised her.

She had taken the opportunity to slip out while they were so busily engaged in binding her mistress, and had put on a bonnet and a shawl.

She walked quickly towards Dick, and placed her hand in his.

"Take me with you, sir!" she said, pleadingly. "Do take me away from here! I don't care where I go, so that I leave this hateful place! You are brave and gentle, and I feel that I can trust you. I have no one else that I can ask to assist me. Will you take me?"

Dick hesitated.

He was in a rather dangerous situation, and might have some difficulty in getting his mare and leaving London were he by himself, but encumbered by this girl his hopes of escape were diminished tenfold.

Then, besides, he asked himself if he did escape with her, what was he to do with her eventually.

The girl noticed his hesitation.

She withdrew her hand, and her eyes thronged with tears.

"Don't think wrongly of me for asking you," she said. "I did not mean to offend you; only I thought you would be able to——"

Tears and sobs checked her utterance.

"My dear girl," said he, drawing her towards him, "I wish I could take you away from here, and I will, too. But I shall only involve you in fresh perils, and perhaps worse ones than those from which I have rescued you."

"No, no; that cannot be!"

"The curse of Cain is on me! my hand is against every man's, and every man's is against mine!"

"What do you mean?" asked the girl, anxiously.

"I am amenable to the laws—I am a felon! Even at this moment the officers are no doubt on my track. You are innocent, but I am guilty!"

"I will not believe it," said Ellen, dashing the tears from her eyes. "You are all that is good, all that is noble!"

There was evident admiration in her gaze.

"My dear girl," said Dick, again drawing her towards him, for he felt that this young girl's trusting confidence had kindled a warm feeling in his heart. "I would take you with me, you do not know how gladly, only I know so well I shall but involve you in fresh difficulties and dangers."

"I shall not fear them if you are by, because I have seen that you are bold and strong enough to overcome them all. Do let me share your perils. I would dare everything to be taken away from here!"

"But if you go I can fetch you back again. Thank goodness! there is law for that!" screamed Mrs. Brettel, who had all this time been tugging at her bonds in a vain effort to free herself. "I tell you, you are mine—mine, and the law will bring you back!"

The accents of her voice, although she was powerless to do her harm, filled the apprentice with renewed terror, and she again clung to Dick's arm.

"Don't be frightened, my dear," said he. "I see I shall never be able to leave you here exposed to her tender mercies. I will take you where you will be in safety, and where she will never find you, or perish in the attempt," he added, mentally.

Ellen gave quite a scream of pleasure as these words fell upon her ear.

"Come, come, you must learn not to be so excitable as you are. There, put your arm in mine, and we will be off."

How gladly the poor apprentice complied with his words!

She looked up in his face with the same trusting smile which he had twice before seen upon her countenance, and which became her so well.

As he gazed upon her, the bold highwayman forgot all about his present dangerous position, and pressing her hand to his side, left the kitchen.

A volley of abuse from Mrs. Brettel followed him.

"I say, Mr. B.," said Dick, returning, and popping his head in at the door. "Do not you forget my advice. Treat her like they do a wild animal! Tame her with hunger. It will be all your own fault if ever she ill-treats you again. Good-bye, old fellow!"

He shut the door as he spoke.

"Now, my dear," said Dick to the young girl who had been so strangely thrown upon his protection, "as the place is so confoundedly dark, perhaps you wouldn't mind showing me the way to the upper regions?"

Ellen laughed lightly as she held his hand, and led him up the staircase into the passage above. The poor orphan was happier than she had been for many a year. Her past sufferings were already forgotten.

"Here we are," she said, pausing at the front door.

There was a fanlight over the top, and through this an oil lamp shed a feeble light. It fell upon Ellen's face, and tinged it with a rare beauty. Dick sighed, and thought he had never seen anything so lovely.

CHAPTER IX.

DICK FINDS A PLACE OF REFUGE FOR THE POOR ORPHAN APPRENTICE.

"STOP!" said Dick, as the young girl put her hand on the lock of the front door preparatory to opening it.

"What for?"

"Why, although you said you did not believe it, it is nevertheless true that I have seriously transgressed the laws, and it was to elude the pursuit of the officers, who were after me, that I dropped through the door in your roof, intending to make my way out at the front door. But I heard your screams, and I forgot all about myself in remembering that a female was in trouble."

"And so," said Ellen, in a grave voice, "you have perhaps, by saving me, given your enemies an opportunity of ascertaining your whereabouts, and time to take fresh measures for your capture."

"I hope not; but I fear so."

"Oh! I understand now why you said you could not take me with you. I should be an encumbrance to you, and you would have to look after me when you ought to be looking after yourself. I did not know of this, indeed I did not, or I would never have been so selfish as to ask you to take me away with you. Farewell! I will remain, and leave you at least the prospect of making your escape."

She held out her hand, and repeated the word "Farewell!"

"How you run on to be sure. Of course I am all that you say, and a great deal more, perhaps. But I am quite resolved now to take you with me and chance the danger. It is probable enough the officers are thrown quite off the scent, and have relinquished pursuit of me. If so, we shall get off without any trouble."

Ellen shook her head.

"No—no," she said, "I cannot be so ungenerous. Fly, fly at once, and leave me to make my own escape."

"And where are you going to, my poor girl? Do not think of that, but render me a service."

"Render you a service? Oh! what can I do? Tell me, tell me."

"Well, you understand, of course, that these enemies of mine are police-officers?"

"Yes—yes."

"Do you know one when you see him?"

"To be sure; because of their large red waistcoats."

"Just so. It is very possible some of them may be waiting outside the door here to pounce upon me as soon as I get into the street."

"What can I do?"

"Why, I want you to open the front door, and go out as if upon some ordinary business, leaving me here in the passage."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, when you are out, go a little way up Drury-lane, looking carefully all about you, yet not seeming to do so, and come back and tell me whether you see any lurking about."

"Yes. I shall not be long."

"Be cautious, Ellen. If you see no one, then I can regain my mare, which is close by, and take you to a place of safety."

The young girl took his hand again, and, pressing it affectionately, opened the door and went out.

Dick stood quite still in the passage, patiently awaiting her return.

He took a couple of pistols from his coat-pocket and examined the priming, so that they might be in readiness for immediate use.

A hum of voices came up from the kitchen where he had left Mr. and Mrs. Brettel. The couple were, no doubt, in high disputation.

Several minutes passed, but Ellen did not return

Dick began to be uneasy.

He took a watch from his pocket, and, holding it close to the fanlight, looked at the time. It was close upon twelve.

His impatience rose to an unbearable extent. He did not for a moment think the girl had played him false, but dreaded she had fallen into some fresh trouble.

He was just about to open the door, and sally out for confirmation or dispersion of his fears, when some one tapped lightly at it.

He flung the door open in a moment.

It was Ellen.

"Did you not think me a long time?" she asked. "I thought you would, but I have been all round and cannot see an officer anywhere."

"That is well. Then we may get off in perfect safety. We will not delay another moment."

Dick, as he spoke, passed out of the house with his companion, and closed the door after him.

All was still in the street, or rather court, into which he emerged.

A dozen or so steps brought them into Drury-lane Most of the shops were shut, but here and there an open one cast a beam of light on the pavement.

The miserable oil lamps that were stuck here and there flickered feebly, and scarcely dispelled the darkness for a foot around them.

"I think," said Dick, "you had better go in at the front door of the 'White Horse,' while I go round into the court by the stables. Walk straight up to the bar, and ask for Matthew Gale, the landlord, and then tell him I am round the corner waiting for the mare."

With the alacrity of genuine gratitude, the young girl did his bidding.

The old inn was full of rude, noisy people, and she shrank back a little. For herself, she would never have dared to enter, but, for her preserver, she felt she could do anything, so she walked up to the bar and asked for Matthew Gale.

"That's me, miss," said the person she addressed, leaning over the window-sill, "what do you want?"

A man was standing at the bar window drinking a glass of gin, and the hasty glance which Ellen flung upon him did not prepossess her in his favour.

"I want to speak to you, sir, if you please. I have a message to deliver."

The man with the gin assumed an indifferent air, and raised his glass to his lips; but his sense of hearing the while was stretched to its fullest extent.

"Come in; come in here," said Matthew Gale, in those jovial tones which were really a pleasure to hear, and opening the half-glass door that led into the bar. "Come in here, and tell me what you have to say."

"It is a secret," she said, in a whisper. "A friend of yours who has his mare here is waiting for it in the court, and wants you to bring it out to him."

Old Matthew looked at her distrustfully for a moment, but her ingenuous countenance bore upon it no traces of treachery or deceit.

"Very well," he said, in a whisper. "Go back and tell him his mare will be ready in a moment."

"Thank you, sir."

She rose from her seat and left the bar, and as she passed the man at the window, she saw him empty his glass, and after saying a word or two to the landlord, follow her to the front door.

Her position was rather embarrassing.

The man might be, and probably was, a police officer whose suspicions were aroused and who had determined to follow her.

She knew not how to act. If she hesitated she would convert the man's suspicions into certainties.

A confectioner's shop was just on the opposite side of the way, and the idea for a moment crossed her brain that she would go in there and make some trifling purchase, when she recollected with a pang that she had no money.

What was to be done?

She availed herself of the only resource that was open to her, and she turned back and went again to the bar-window.

Old Matthew had vanished.

She looked up the passage. The man had evidently gone into the street, but whether he had turned to the left or the right of course she could form no sort of conjecture.

Time was speeding on. The mare was doubtless ready, and her preserver anxiously waiting for her to make her appearance; and every minute he stayed she knew to be full of danger to him.

Without saying a word to a soul, she made her way again to the door.

A tipsy woman on the other side of the way, and who was endeavouring to keep on her feet by clutching the window-shutters, was the only person in sight.

She darted round the corner of the court in a moment.

"Ellen! Ellen!" she heard a voice say, in suppressed tones, "Ellen! Ellen!"

"I am here," she said, hastening forward.

At the corner of Stanhope-street was a man on horseback.

She recognised her preserver instantly.

"You must mount and ride before me," said Dick, as she reached his side. "I have no other means of conveying you."

She held out her hands to him, and he swung her into the saddle before him.

Just at that moment a shrill whistle sounded through the court, and the man whom Ellen had seen drinking at the bar sprang out of the shadow of a gateway and grasped Bess by the bridle.

It was no time for compunctious hesitation, for Dick knew that the signal he had given would quickly bring others to the spot; so, seizing one of the holster-pistols by the barrel, he struck the man a terrible blow on the head.

Down he went like a shot.

"Off and away!" said Dick, giving his mare the rein, "on Bess, on!"

With a loud shout, a desultory throng of persons came rushing down the court from the direction of Drury-lane.

"Stop him! stop him!" they cried, "A thousand pounds reward! Stop him! stop him! Dick Turpin the highwayman! A thousand pounds reward!"

A cry of terror came from Ellen's lips as she heard the sounds, and she clung yet tighter to him.

"All right, my girl," said Dick, "they are on foot. We shall soon be safe. Don't be frightened."

Bess went round the corner of Duke-street, and into Lincoln's Inn-fields with a rush, and then the loud report of several pistols rose upon the air.

"Are you hurt, Ellen?" said Dick.

"No, no; I am quite safe and unhurt. And you?"

"Without a scratch."

The young girl gave a sigh of relief.

"The danger is over now," said Dick, as he trotted quietly across Holborn, and saw no signs of his pursuers. "Your troubles will be over now, I hope. I have just recollected an old friend of mine who keeps an inn near Hornsey-wood, and who will, I know, only be too happy to find a shelter for a friend of mine."

"Oh! thanks, thanks," said the girl. "How shall I be able to repay you for all that you have done to-night on my behalf?"

"Why, forget all about it, and never mention the subject. You will be wise if you banish all thoughts of Mrs. Brettel and her cruelties from your recollection."

The poor girl shuddered.

"I will try to do so," she said, "but I feel I shall never be able to be sufficiently grateful to you."

"Pho! pho! nonsense! say no more on that subject, I beg you; let us talk about something else. Look there is a nice level piece of road before us. I will show you what speed bonny Black Bess can make!"

CHAPTER X.

THE ARRIVAL AT THE "HAND AND KEYS," NEAR HORNSEY WOOD.—THE MURDER.

"AND are you really," said the orphan apprentice, as Dick, after a hard gallop, slackened speed a little, while traversing a narrow lane, "are you really that brave, true heart whose name is in every one's mouth, and to whom such generous actions are ascribed?"

"Well, I don't know about that," replied Dick, with a smile; "but I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman, whose delight is to cry, 'Stand and deliver!' to a passenger on the road; and this is Black Bess, without whom he would be nothing, if that's what you mean."

"You underrate yourself, as generous natures always do. I have heard so much of you, and so longed to see you, but I never thought I should meet with you. I am so happy."

Turpin whistled.

"I wish you would change the subject," he said. "I never feel comfortable when anyone praises me, because I know very well I don't deserve it."

"You do; you do indeed."

"I am afraid you are prepossessed in my favour. If you will believe me, it would require a vast amount of good to counterbalance the evil which I do. I wish you would talk about something else, or, if you like, we will take another gallop."

"I am willing."

Once more, after this brief dialogue, the trees and hedges seemed to fly past them, as Bess put forth her marvellous speed, and very soon the old inn known as the "Hand and Keys" was in sight.

"That," said Turpin, as he pointed it out to his companion, "is the place I intend you to take shelter in, until some further arrangements can be made for your future course of life."

It was a very large, old-fashioned building. The walls were of wood, and the immense roof, though tiled in places, was, for the most part, thatched. It stood some few yards back from the road, having a spacious yard in front, which was used in summer as a bowling-green.

Somewhat to Turpin's surprise—for it was past one o'clock, and the inn was noted for closing early—lights were shining from almost all the latticed casements, and when he halted close to the horse-trough he could plainly hear the strains of some musical instruments, and the sound of jollity and merry-making within.

"Whatever can be the occasion of this?" he asked himself. "I am quite sure it must be something extraordinary to keep Tom Davis and his wife up so late. Hi! Jabes, Jabes!"

It was the ostler he called, and who rejoiced in the name of Jabes, but, contrary to an hitherto unvarying custom, no Jabes made his appearance.

After waiting a moment Dick sprang off his mare, and assisted Ellen to alight.

"I suppose he is too busy indoors to pay any attention to us to-night; so come, I am sure you must be tired, and we will make our way in at once. We may think ourselves very lucky in having found them up. I should think such a thing never happened before."

They reached the front door of the inn, which was closed, and Turpin tapped at it in a peculiar manner.

It was opened in a moment by the stoutest man that Ellen had ever in her life beheld.

"Well, Tom, my boy, how are you? What, in the name of goodness, is in the wind, that you are all up at this hour?"

"Bless my stars!" ejaculated the landlord, "if it ain't Dick. Here, walk in—walk in. I didn't think I should have the pleasure of seeing you to-night. I am more pleased than if anybody had given me a hundred pounds."

"Whatever for, Davis?"

"Why, you see, it's just a hundred years ago this very night since the old place was built. A century, mind you. So I have invited everybody that I could think of, intending to make a glorious night of it. Now, I would sooner have you than anyone else, provided," he added, in a more serious tone, "you have not been up to your tricks in the neighbourhood, because, if you have, I should advise you to be off."

"Oh! that's all right enough. Don't let that trouble you a bit! I haven't been near here for months. But, I say, first of all, how about my mare? Where's Jabes?"

"Oh! he's indoors, and half-drunk by this time, I'll warrant. Never mind. I'll stable the mare myself."

"All right. I'll go too."

"Yes—yes. You always do that. But, I say Dick?"

"What?"

"Who's that you've got standing behind you? It's a petticoat. Oh! Dick, you're as bad as a soldier!"

The landlord chuckled gleefully at what he was pleased to consider his own wit.

"Hold your row, fatsides, and let's stable the mare. I do not want to stand on the doorstep talking all night. Make haste. I have something particular I want to say to you."

"All right—all right. Here, come along. You know the way. You had better lead Bess yourself."

The little party crossed the yard, and made their way round to the back of the inn, where Bess was carefully fed and lodged.

"Now, Dick," said Tom Davis, the landlord, as they stood in the stable, "if you've got anything private you want to say to me, why you can't find a better place or a better opportunity than the present."

"No, I was about to say the same thing."

"Well, then, let's hear it; because the sooner I get back into the room again along with the company the better!"

"Just so, and I will out what I have to say as short as possible. I met with a very singular series of adventures last night, and was wounded in the shoulder. I sought refuge at Matthew Gale's crib in White Horse-yard, Drury Lane. You know old Matthew?"

"Of course I do! Who doesn't? Cut along!"

"He found me and my mare snug quarters, and I had a comfortable nap for about twelve hours, when old Matthew woke me up and told me the grabs were down-stairs. I had stolen the golden cup from the ex-lord mayor, as he was on his way home, and he made, I suppose, a grand fuss about it, so the officers were searching everywhere for me."

"But what in the world made you take such a thing as that? Why, it's no good to you, and would, of course, bring you into trouble!"

"Well, I should never have done it for the sake of the cup itself, only I ought to have told you I made a bet of fifty pounds that I would take it, and produce it within three nights, which will be to-morrow night, so I must get back again to London."

"And have you the cup with you?"

"Yes!"

"I should uncommonly like to see it. Here, hold it up while I hold the lantern."

"All serene," said Turpin, complying with his request.

"Very pretty; very pretty, indeed. I should think the old bloke is savage."

"No doubt he is."

"Did you have much trouble to get it?"

"Scarcely any; but just before I got away up came a body of officers. Some one must have split on the job, and set them on the watch. However, I got off all right."

"I should not like to be the cove that did it!"

"You may depend if I find him out I will make him suffer for it."

"Serve him right!"

"However, I'm not telling you what I intended. It's this. The Redbreasts, as I said just now, were after me; so, by old Matthew's advice, I got out of the window of the room I was in, and on to the roof."

"And then got off, I suppose?"

"No, not altogether. They had stationed one of their men on the roof to see that I did not escape that way, and he pounced upon me. We had a desperate struggle, in which he fell over the parapet, and into the yard fifty feet below!"

"God bless me!"

"I felt sorry for him. He was a brave fellow!"

"Well, what happened next?"

"I crawled over the roofs till I came to the corner of Clare-court, and then I got into one of the houses through a trap-door in the tiles."

"Go on—go on!"

"I was halfway down the second flight when I heard such a sudden succession of shrill screams that I was almost stunned. I rushed down stairs like a shot."

"I suppose you forgot all about the officers?"

"Quite. When I got to the kitchen-door, I did not hesitate; but still hearing the terrible screams, dashed the door open, and sprang into the room!"

"What next?"

"There, on the floor, I saw this poor girl, who is an apprentice, and her barbarous mistress was standing over her, and flogging her with a strap!"

"A strap! Now, d——"

"Now, don't be rash, Tom, and hear me out to the end," interrupted Turpin, seizing the landlord's hand, which he had clenched as if about to inflict condign chastisement on some one. "Don't be rash!"

"Very well. Go on, then; but if that wouldn't make a man's blood boil, I don't know what would!"

"Nor I."

"And you saved her, Dick?"

"I did. She was a poor orphan, without a single friend to fly to for protection."

"Then God bless you for such a good deed!"

"And this," said Dick, as he took Ellen by the hand, and led her a step or two forward, "this is the beautiful girl who was the victim of so much cruelty."

"No!"

"She is, though; and now, Tom Davis, this is what I want to say to you. No one knows my way of life better than you do, and how impossible it would be for me to take charge of this poor girl. Now you, Tom, have neither chick nor child, as the saying is; so I want you to find a home for her for a little while, until arrangements can be made for getting her employment and deciding what her future shall be."

"That wants no deciding," said the warm-hearted landlord, with a tear in his eye, "leastways, if she's willing to accept what I propose. Now, my dear," he said, turning to Ellen, "do you think you could make yourself happy and contented at the old 'Hand and Keys' along with me? If you do, why all I can say is, there's a home for you as long as you like to have it, and I'll be your father. Do you consent? If you do, I shall be happy indeed, for your sweet face, and the troubles you have gone through, have quite won my heart."

The tears thronged so thickly into Ellen's eyes as the landlord made this generous offer with so much tenderness and kindness that she could not say a word in reply, but, leaving Turpin's side, where she had stood during the brief dialogue, placed her arms around his neck, and kissed his cheek.

"There, there, don t take on like that, don't take on like that," said Tom Davis, his own voice husky with emotion. "The idea of anyone, now——Turpin, I tell you plain, I can't believe it."

"Can't believe what?"

"Why, that there ever could be anyone barbarous enough to harm a poor, loving, beautiful child like this is. It's altogether impossible, and quite against human natur'!"

"One would think so," said Turpin; "but I am sorry, for the sake of that same human natur', to say there are plenty of people who are more cruel than wild beasts."

"So it seems, so it seems."

"But, Davis, when I had saved this yonng girl, I was fairly puzzled to know what to do with her."

"You were?"

"Yes, until, all at once, I thought of you, and then I felt sure that I had found this poor girl a refuge."

"And so you had. Now, my dear," said Davis, "are you willing to stay with me? because, if you are, we will get back to the house at once."

"Oh! sir, how can you ask me such a thing? You must not think me foolish, but I have for so long heard nothing but unkind words that your kind ones make me weep in spite of myself."

She laid her hand again upon his shoulder. She already felt for him the affection a daughter feels for a father.

"Now may ——" began Davis, again, and no doubt, in the height of his indignation, he was going to pronounce some terrible anathema, but Turpin stayed him.

"Come," he said, "I think we understand each other now, so the best thing we can do is to get under the roof-tree of the old inn. Poor Ellen, here, after all she has gone through, must, I am sure, be wearied to death. As for myself, I feel I require no rest at present, I had such a long, sound sleep at Matthew's; so, while you find her a bed-chamber, I will, if you are willing, join the company in the kitchen. There is no one there who knows me, is there, Tom?"

"No one that I am aware of. Bess is all safe until you want her, so we will go in at once. They will wonder what has become of us. Take hold of my arm, my dear, and I hope now I have got charge of you, you have seen all your troubles."

So saying, the trio made their way back to the inn, and entered it by the back door. The landlord's wife was called, and Ellen's story related to her. Her disposition was as open-hearted as her husband's, and, as they were childless, she received the orphan with delight.

After a few minutes' more conversation Ellen, bidding her preserver and protector an affectionate good night, left the room in company with buxom Mrs. Davis.

CHAPTER XI.

THE EXTRAORDINARY SEQUEL TO THE MURDER AT THE ROAD-SIDE INN

"I SAY, Davis!" said Turpin, as he looked down at his attire, which was most certainly none the better for the many incidents he had gone through; "I say, Davis, my boy, it is quite impossible for me to go into company in this plight. Suspicion would be immediately excited. What shall I do?"

"Why, change your dress, to be sure. Here, come up stairs along with me, and I can show you a well-stocked wardrobe, from which you can select at pleasure."

'That's the ticket. I sha'n't be long, for I am anxious to join the fun that's going on."

And Turpin was as good as his word, for in a few moments he came down again, presenting a very different appearance indeed to what he did before.

There were two large rooms on the ground-floor of the "Hand and Keys;" both of these were filled with company. In the one, young folks for the most part assembled, who amused themselves with the dance; while in the other a good number of guests were seated round the enormous fire, which reached half up the chimney, telling tales, jokes, and remarkable adventures.

It was into this latter room that Turpin went. He was hardly in a humour for dancing.

His appearance attracted immediate attention; for his manners, carriage, and attire were those of a most refined gentleman.

He bowed low to the assembled company as he entered, and old Davis, the landlord, as soon as he saw him, sprang from his seat with a degree of alacrity very unusual for him to exhibit, and, seizing his hand, said—

"Friends and neighbours all, I have the pleasure to introduce you to a very old and particular friend of mine, Mr. —a—a——"

"Richards," said Turpin, seeing the landlord was rather at a loss what name to call him by. "I am very happy to see you all, gentlemen, and hope we shall very soon be better acquainted!"

He took a seat in the chimney-corner, which was offered him by the landlord, as he spoke.

"Fill up another bumper!" cried Davis. "Don't spare, but drink to the prosperity of the 'Hand and Keys,' which is a hundred years old to-night!"

All rose, and the toast was, for about the twentieth time, drank with loud applause.

"I say, Davis!" cried a tall, thin man, as he resumed his chair in the front of the fire, "I have only just this moment remembered that to-night is also the anniversary of another event connected with the old inn. It is the eighth, I think!"

"God bless me, so it is!" said Davis, with a slight shudder. "I did not think of it before; but just eight years ago to-night a most horrible murder was committed upstairs!"

"In this house?"

"Yes, in No. 3, on the first-floor."

"I never heard anything about it before, landlord," said Turpin, as he poked the fire, and made the bright flame shoot up four feet at least. "How did it happen?"

"It was a very sad affair, neighbour Groves, wasn't it?" said Davis.

"It were; it were, indeed!"

"Let us hear it, Davis; let us hear it!" cried several voices, animated by that love of the horrible which seems an almost natural instinct. "Let's hear it!"

They drew nearer the fire as they spoke.

"Well, gentlemen," said Davis, settling himself in his chair, and pulling three or four tremendous whiffs from his pipe, "I shall be most happy to oblige you, of course, though I can't help thinking it is rather out of place to-night, when we met to be jolly."

"No—no!" cried a number of voices. "Go on!"

"All right. I dare say most of you here know something of the occurrence"

"Very little."

"Then, perhaps," said Davis, inquiringly, "it will be best for me to begin at the beginning, and tell the tale all through?"

"Of course—of course. Now don't keep us in suspense any longer."

"I won't. You must know, then, it is just eight years ago to-night, and as one or two were sitting round the fire here, as we might be now, telling tales and talking about the old house which had defied the wind and weather for so long—it was almost as late as it is now—when we were every one startled——"

"Yes—yes; make haste!" they cried, impatiently.

"Now, gentlemen, if you interrupt or bother me, I sha'n't be able to get on at all, and it won't take very long. As I was saying, it was almost as late as it is now, when we were all startled by hearing a tremendous knock at the door.

"I didn't know how it was, but just then we all happened to have left off speaking when this very loud sudsuccession of knocks were given at the front door. There was something very peculiar about them, and I never could make out what they were done with. I have never heard any knocks like them either before or since; and——bless my heart alive! what's that?"

A rapid succession of blows upon the door, of a very peculiar nature indeed, reverberated through the old building, and caused the landlord to utter his involuntary exclamation.

"It's some one knocking!" said the thin man in front of the fire, "and knocking, too, just like——"

A repetition of the summons at the door drowned the rest of his speech.

Turpin rose to his feet.

"You really don't mean to say you are all so alarmed at such a simple circumstance? Run, some one, and open the door

Nobody stirred.

Then, for the third time, came the terrific knocking at the door.

Now the prominent idea in Dick's mind was that this noisy summons was given by some body of police, who, likely enough, had tracked him to his present shelter, so, of course, he naturally hesitated to open the door himself.

Then he remembered the change he had made in his dress, and thought that the likeliest means of averting suspicion from himself was to go in person to the door, and see who was there.

No sooner had he made this resolve than he opened the door of the kitchen, and passed out into the passage beyond.

Before, however, he could reach the front door, it was flung open, and a tall man wearing a roquelaure cloak strode in.

The occupants of both rooms in the inn had rushed in a body to the doors, and stood still, gazing at the stranger.

"Well! what now? what now?" said the new comer, with a strange mixture of assurance and nervous agitation; "what kind of place do you call this? Are you all mad, or did you never have a visitor before?"

"I am very sorry, sir," said Tom Davis, forcing his way into the passage, and making a bow to the traveller, "I am very sorry we kept you waiting, but you happened to arrive at a very curious time."

"I don't see that. It is not as though you were all a-bed. However, it ain't worth making a bother about."

"Thank you, sir; thank you. Be kind enough to step into the kitchen, and we will make you as comfortable as we can. You see the old inn has been built just a hundred years to-day, and we are celebrating the event."

"Oh! indeed, landlord!" said the stranger, seating himself in the chair which had been placed for him, and looking around at the time-blackened walls with an uninterested air; "I suppose you were all too much occupied to hear me, and yet I thought I knocked loud enough too."

"It wasn't that," said Davis. "We heard you plain enough; but, as I said before, you happened to arrive at a very curious time."

"How? What time?"

"Why, just before you arrived, neighbour Groves happened to remember that it was exactly eight years ago to-night that a shocking murder was committed in No. 3 bedroom upstairs!"

The stranger gave a sudden start, and paled slightly.

"What place is this, then?"

"Why, the old 'Hand and Keys,' to be sure!"

"The 'Hand and Keys!'" repeated the stranger, in a trembling voice. "It is very cold," he added, drawing his cloak still closer round him, and almost burying his face in its folds, "I quite shiver with it!"

"You don't say so, sir! Here, Jabes! Jabes!"

"Here you are! what do you want?" said a surly voice; and the ostler, whom the knocking and the recent arrival had aroused from his slumber, got slowly off his seat.

"Some more wood on the fire, Jabes. Quick now, the gentleman is cold!"

"Oh! never mind, never mind. Don't trouble, don't trouble," said the traveller, who had a strange way of repeating his words. "I shall do, I shall do!"

Nevertheless, Jabes took his departure, and quickly returned with three or four chumps, which he threw on the fire.

By this time the guests, who had been scared by the knocking, following so close on to Farmer Groves's narrative, had sat down in their respective places, one and all bestowing the whole of their attention on the man who had just arrived.

A rather embarrassing silence followed, which the landlord broke by saying—

"Have you travelled far, sir?"

"Yes—yes; a long way—a long way," replied the stranger. "I suppose I can have a bed here?"

"Oh! yes."

"Then get it ready at once!"

"Should you like a fire lighted, sir?"

"By all means."

"Very good, sir."

"And while you are doing that, just bring me a glass of brandy—a tumbler, you understand; and let it be strong—strong!"

Old Davis executed his orders; and when the large quantity of raw spirit was placed before the stranger, he drank half of it off at one gulp.

Then again followed a pause, which every moment seemed to grow more and more intolerable. It was remarkable that those who had been talking so freely just before should now be at a loss what to say. There was something about this stranger which attracted the whole of their attention.

Turpin had taken care to seat himself in the shadow on one side of the grate, and he leaned back against the wall almost shrouded from observation. A continuity of perilous adventures made him suspicious of the slightest circumstance that had anything unusual in it

Tom Davis looked from one to another and coughed vigorously.

It was no use, he could not break the stillness which had fallen on the company like a spell.

Then he seized the poker and stirred the fire recklessly. If the truth must be told, he felt quite as disconcerted as the others did. At last, in sheer desperation, he said:

"Now, Farmer Groves, why don't you go on with your story?"

Farmer Groves looked askance at the stranger and he said:

"If the gentleman has no objection?"

"Oh! no; none in the least—none in the least. Go on—go on!"

The words were jerked out rather than uttered, and appeared to have a discomposing effect upon Farmer Groves, from which he only recovered by swallowing a huge draught of ale.

"Then the best way will be to begin again, for I almost forget where I left off."

"Very well—very well!" they all cried, glad of an opportunity of opening their mouths. "We are all listening!"

"Eight years ago this very night, as I and a few others were sitting with Tom Davis, the landlord here, as I might be with you now, chatting and laughing and the like, when all at once there came a most terrific knocking at the front door."

"You understand sir," interrupted Tom Davis, addressing the stranger, "that friend Groves had got just this far into his tale, and the words about the knocking were scarcely out of his mouth, before we heard some one begin hammering away, so we were all of us rather skeared like."

The stranger made no reply, but looked steadily at the fire.

"As it was nearly one o'clock in the morning and a most unusual time for any one to come, seeing that on any other night the inn was closed at ten to a moment,—as it was so late, I say, we wondered who it could be, and hesitated before we went to the door."

"Just as we did to-night," said the landlord.

"When we unbarred it, to our surprise, who should we see on the threshold but Reuben Simms, the steward to Sir Herbert Burrows, of the old Manor House.

"He was a very disagreeable man, and very hard to deal with, as many of Sir Herbert's tenants found. It was a sad pity things were left so much under his control; however, he's dead and gone now, though when he lived I question whether any one could have been found who would have said 'I like him!'

"'Didn't expect to see me here to-night, did you?' he said, in his sharp voice. 'Shouldn't have come, only Sir Herbert kept me so long, and I did not like to go so far by myself at night for fear I should be set on and robbed. I s'pose you can let me have a bed?'

"'Oh! yes, of course; you will walk in and join us?'

"'No, let me have a light,' he said, 'I want to go to bed and not sit up sotting with you.'

"This was quite an uncalled-for remark for him to make in reply to our civility,—at least we thought so; but none said a word, because the old man was of a most revengeful disposition, and because we knew he had the power to spite any of us; so he took a light and went upstairs, down which he never came again alive."

"And if you will give me a candle, landlord," exclaimed the stranger, rising to his feet, and apparently much agitated,—"if you will give me a light, I will go upstairs, for I hate blood and murder stories, and I can guess what's coming."

"Certainly, sir, certainly, sir; you can have a light in a moment. If we had known you had any objection, why, of course, we would have deferred the tale-telling to another time."

"Oh! never mind, never mind. Are you ready?"

"Quite; be good enough to step this way."

Tom Davis showed the traveller into his room, and rejoined the company in the kitchen.

All this time Turpin sat in perfect silence, judging it was more prudent so to do.

"Now, Groves," said the landlord, "let's have the rest of the tale."

"There's not much of it to tell now, except that we all went home about daybreak, and the next morning, about twelve o'clock, thinking it strange Simms, the steward, did not come down, his bedroom was broken open, and there he was found weltering in his blood, and the apartment in the greatest disorder."

No. 5 will be Published on the 11th.

"And was his murderer never discovered?" asked several.

"Never! Numberless people were had up on suspicion, but it could not be brought home to any of them, and from that day to this it has remained an inexplicable mystery. Sir Herbert offered a very large reward for the apprehension of the murderer or murderess. It was five hundred pounds, I think, but no one was found out."

"How strange!" said one.

"Yes; in most cases the murderer leaves some traces behind him; but in this they had been too cautious."

"And did anyone know the motive for the murder?"

"Not exactly; old Simms had many enemies, but on that particular night he had received a large sum of money from Sir Herbert, for some purpose which we never learned; but it was all stolen from him."

"It's my belief it was theft, not malice, that was the motive," said Davis.

"And mine," said Groves. "Sir Herbert had him buried, for the old man had no kindred. It was rumoured however that he had a son who had been guilty of some crime, and who was always a no'er-do-well sort of chap, who had gone abroad, but that was a many years ago, and no one knew for certain."

"Has the son ever turned up since?"

"Never, but——"

The remainder of the farmer's sentence was drowned in the loud explosion of a pistol which seemingly had been discharged just over their heads.

It was succeeded by one terrific, piercing shriek, after which all was deathly still.

"God bless my life!" said Davis, turning very pale, and staggering to his feet. "Surely another murder has not been committed."

Turpin also rose much agitated, for he had recognised the voice of the young girl whom he had befriended.

The remainder sat as if rooted to their seats.

"Follow me all!" said Dick, hastening to the door; and then, without waiting to see if he was obeyed, sprang lightly and rapidly up the staircase.

No sound of any description reached his ear as he paused for a moment on the landing and listened.

He was joined immediately by the landlord and about half-a-dozen of the most courageous of the company.

"Quick—quick, Davis!" cried Turpin. "Show me the room in which the young girl was placed."

The landlord pointed with his finger to a door nearly opposite, and without ceremony or hesitation, Dick flung it open, though his heart beat as he did so at a painful rate.

A night-light was burning in the room, and by its aid Dick saw a huddled-up mass of white upon the floor.

Instinctively he knew what it was; and while the others stood in a dense throng upon the threshold, he stepped forward and raised the form of the poor apprentice in his arms and placed her upon the bed.

She was either insensible or dead.

A glass of water stood upon a table close at hand, and he lost not an instant in sprinkling some of its contents upon her face.

Her eyes opened, and she looked around her with alarm and dread.

"What is it, Ellen? What has happened?" asked Dick, tenderly.

A smile played upon her lips as she heard his words, and then her eyes slowly closed again.

"Ellen—Ellen!" cried Turpin, "what has happened? Why did you scream?"

"I cannot tell," she replied, now perfectly aroused. "Yet stay! I remember now; I woke with the sound of a pistol-shot in my ears."

"I thought as much!" said Dick. "I must leave you now. There is no danger, and nothing to apprehend. Repose in peace.

"The traveller's room!" cried Dick, hurrying out again into the passage. "Let us go there at once!"

Davis led the way, and then they all paused in a body in front of a door opening from the opposite side of the passage.

Their numbers had been greatly increased while Dick was speaking to the young girl, and several of those who had come last carried lights in their hands.

All noticed that a figure of 8 was painted on the door.

"Why," said one, in rather a shaky voice "that is the very room old Simms was murdered in, isn't it?"

"Yes."

A disposition to draw back manifested itself instantly. Dick placed his hand upon the lock. The door was fast.

"Have you a key?" he asked.

"No. The door fastens on the inside with a bolt."

"I think we are justified in bursting the door open?"

"Certainly—certainly."

"I think," suggested Groves, "it would only be right to knock first."

"So it would."

Some heavy blows were struck upon the panel. There was no response.

"We are wasting time when every moment may be of the utmost value," said Dick.

"Right," replied the landlord; "force the door."

A simultaneous rush was made, and the door flew open in a moment.

"Lights—lights!"

Those who had hastily snatched up candles made their way into the room. The rest, who were somewhat timid, remained outside.

It took a moment for the candles to dispel the darkness in the room, and then they saw partly lying across the bed the man who had at so late an hour sought shelter.

Blood was gushing from his breast at a fearful rate, and it fell with a sickening sound upon the floor, where it collected into a huge pool.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the landlord, while those who were with him yet stood aghast with surprise. "Good heavens! what a frightful sight! The idea of it occurring at my house at all, let alone upon this particular night!"

"Does he live still?" asked one.

"I should scarcely think so," said Turpin, taking a candle from a man who was standing near him, and approaching the bed as he spoke. "I should scarcely think so; he appears to have shot himself through the heart!"

A faint sound, half-moan, half-sigh, came from the traveller's lips, and gave the lie to Turpin's supposition.

"By heaven!" they cried. "He is not dead yet! Raise him up a little!"

As Turpin had all through taken the initiative in the matter, he put the light down beside him, and, passing his arm under the body of the stranger, slowly raised him to a sitting posture.

The flow of blood was checked a little by this process, but a look of intense and unutterable suffering overspread his features.

Then he opened his eyes and glared around him as he muttered in a half-audible voice—

"Horror—horror! Why did they put me in this chamber above all others! Justice! justice! the old man is avenged at last! Off! off! You are blood! blood—nothing but blood! Father, father, I did not know you! How should I! how should I have done so! Do not look at me so awfully! Keep away—keep away! I was impelled by want to do the deed! Father, father, pity me, forgive me! Your form has haunted me sleeping and waking ever since that frightful night, eight years ago, when, in this room, I found on whom I had used my knife. What guided me here? What horrid fascination dragged me to this spot? Fate, for—I"——

A gasping kind of sob issued from the stranger's lips, and suddenly doubling together, his body, face downwards, reached the floor before Turpin could save him.

Horror—intense horror—was depicted upon the faces of the guests as they looked at each other, deprived by the fearful nature of the revelation of the stranger of the faculty of speech.

It was Turpin who broke the silence:

"Friends all," he said, in grave tones, "this is in itself a terrible spectacle, and enough to overcome the most callous heart. Let us leave this room, for we can do no good by staying in it, or we shall never be able to drive the appearance of this sight from our brains."

"Yes," added Tom Davis, with blanched cheek and lip, but yet in an authoritative voice. "Let us go away at once, for I feel sick to death!"

"And I—and I," responded many voices, in hushed accents, as they left the scene of blood, and resumed their places in the lower apartment.

The landlord went himself to the bar, and drew an each of the company a small glass of neat brandy, which was gratefully accepted by all.

There seemed to be a general disinclination to commence a conversation, and each seemed busy with his own thoughts.

"I say, neighbours," said Groves, at last, shifting about in his chair, "it appears to me that you ought to send off to Sir William at once, and let him know what has taken place."

"True," said Davis, who seemed unnerved by what had happened. "I am in such a state that I am only half conscious of what is going on."

"It is truly awful."

"It would be if it had been a simple suicide, but how horrible to think the murderer of Ralph the steward should be thus discovered!"

"And that it should turn out to be his own son, for such I take it was what the man meant."

"Frightful in the extreme. I remember him when he was a boy, and then it was prophesied by all that he would come to a bad end!"

"And so he has. I can imagine his terror and dismay when he found himself in the chamber in which he had murdered his own father!"

"Yes, and how the thought would drive him to suicide and madness!"

"Ay, indeed! It would be most strange if it did not. What must he not have suffered during the past eight years!"

"From what he has said though, I gather he had no idea when he committed the murder, doubtless for the sake of the money he had about him, that it was his own father!"

"Clearly not, or, at any rate, let us hope so."

"But," persisted Groves, "had not one or two of us better start at once for the hall. It is close upon daybreak, and surely Sir Herbert will pardon us for arousing him at so unreasonable an hour when he learns our errand."

"By all means!" exclaimed several, rising. "Do you go, and we will accompany you!"

"Agreed," said Groves, and in a few minutes afterwards a little party of about a dozen persons was on its way to the hall.

Turpin remained behind. He had many urgent reasons for doing so, but he went to the front door of the inn along with Davis to see them off, and there they stood watching them until they were out of sight.

"Tom," said Turpin, in a whisper, as they both lingered on the steps, "of course you know very well I don't wish to be mixed up with the proceedings at the inquest which will have to be held, because of the danger which would result from calling me so publicly forward; but still it would be equally dangerous for me to set out for London at sunrise. The officers just now are more than usually on the alert after me."

"What do you propose to do?"

"Just this. My evidence, as there are so many witnesses who can depose to the same facts as I can, will be of little or no service, so I need not be mentioned in the matter at all. Find me some snug little place where I can remain until nightfall, when I must be off to London."

"As you like, Dick, my boy. I see no obstacles whatever; I will find you a comfortable berth, and as you say there is no need—although you did take rather a prominent part in the affair—for you to run the risk of giving evidence. There can only be one verdict returned."

CHAPTER XII.

DICK BIDS FAREWELL TO ELLEN, AND SETS OUT FOR LONDON TO SHOW THE LORD MAYOR'S CUP TO THE "FAMILY" AT THE "THREE TUNS."

THE shades of evening were just beginning to dusk all objects, when three persons stood at an old-fashioned bow-window on the ground floor of the "Hand and Keys."

These three persons were Dick, Ellen, and the landlord.

Dick was speaking.

"Ellen," he said, "you will then stay here along with my friend Davis so long as you may choose to do so. I am certain you will find him as kind and affectionate to you as though you were his daughter."

The poor girl could not trust herself to speak, for so much kindness touched her to the heart. Her eyes filled with tears, and she took a hand of each, and pressed them in token of her thanks.

"There, there—it is all right—it is all right," said Tom Davis. "Don't take on so much. I can only say, so long as the old roof is above my head you are very welcome to share it with me."

"And now," said Turpin, "it will soon be time for me to set out for London."

"London?" repeated Ellen. "Oh! no; do not go. Why run into so much danger?"

"Danger!" replied Turpin, with a laugh. "I never think of it. I must visit London to-night, in order to receive the money I have won by taking the mayor's cup."

"How much is it?" asked Davis.

"Fifty pounds!"

"Then it is hardly worth the risk."

"Not for the amount of money certainly. But having half won the bet it would be foolish to lose it by not complying with the other part of it."

Davis shook his head.

"I know you are sure to go," he said; "but it strikes me you have the most difficult part to perform."

"Why?"

"Why? Did not you tell me some one had split upon it, and set the officers on the watch?"

"Well, yes. That was my supposition from finding them so close at hand."

"And you were right; so rely upon it, now that attempt failed, knowing you intended to carry the cup in person to the 'Three Tuns,' they will so surround you with enemies that it will be impossible for you to make your escape with your life."

"Oh! how can you think of blindly rushing into so much peril! You cannot be in earnest."

Fain would the young girl have persuaded herself so, for she could not help feeling a deep interest in her protector; but the next words that came from Turpin's lips dispersed her hopes.

"I will do it," he said, "and defy the danger! The more of it there is, the greater will the achievement be."

"I see you are bent upon it, Dick," said the landlord, "and I know before to-day that when you take a thing into your head there is no turning you, so I sha'n't say more."

"I am bent upon it," replied Turpin, "and I must say I feel none of the apprehensions which you do."

"I suppose not."

"But I do," replied Ellen. "And now that I have found a friend and protector, do not let me lose him so soon. Don't go, for my sake."

"I see you are even more timid than Davis is."

"I am always timid when there is much danger."

"And I am bold, and on this occasion I feel an assurance that I shall come off all right."

"I hope you may," said Davis. "When do you want your mare?"

"Now," said Turpin, looking through the window, and observing the aspect of the night. "It is full early yet, but a fog seems to be rising rapidly. I hope it will be a dense one, for if it is I shall stand a much better chance of success."

"Then," said Davis, "I will go round to the stables, saddle Black Bess, and bring her to the door myself."

"Do so, do so."

The landlord departed on his errand.

"And now, my dear," said Turpin, drawing Ellen towards him, "pray dismiss from your mind all foolish feeling of alarm for my safety. I have returned unhurt from many a more dangerous expedition. Be happy. Davis and his wife will try their best to make you so, and do not let them fancy you ungrateful by showing them they have not succeeded."

"I will try to be happy and content."

"And," added Turpin, if I should not return, do not be alarmed. "It is impossible for me to say at any time where I may be in three hours afterwards. Let me desire it ever so much, I may be weeks before I pay another visit here."

"Weeks?"

"Yes; and in the meantime you will find time pass pleasantly enough here."

Ellen shook her head.

"Not in your absence," she said.

"Mare's waiting at the door," said Davis, as he re-entered the room; "so I should advise you to be off as soon as possible, for you are well aware Bess never stands anywhere long together without attracting observation."

"And who can wonder at it?" asked Dick, proudly. "Her equal has never yet been found, and never will be I fancy!"

"Be off then! No one suspects your presence in this neighbourhood now, but they soon would if they saw her at the door."

"I am off. Good-bye, Ellen! Don't be alarmed about me. I shall be safe enough, don't fear. Expect me when you see me! Good-bye, good-bye!"

He hurried out of the room as he spoke.

A moment sufficed to take him to the huge front door of the "Hand and Keys," and there, just a few paces off, he could distinguish Black Bess.

The fog however was getting denser each moment.

"You will have an ugly journey, Dick," said Davis, as the highwayman mounted his mare. "I fancy it will soon be too thick for you to find your way."

"Not a bit. I could almost do it blindfold."

"I shouldn't wonder. You have been times enough."

"Rather; and I trust more to my mare than I do to myself," said Turpin, patting Bess's neck as he spoke.

"I am not surprised you are so fond of her."

"I should think not. And now, Davis, as it may be some time before I see you again, I should like to have a serious parting word with you."

"Speak out, my boy!"

"I allude to the young girl, Ellen."

"I guessed as much."

"And"——

"Now, don't let that trouble your mind at all. I will take care of her, and mind, as well, that she comes to no harm through you."

"Ah! ah!"

"You needn't laugh. I can see through a ladder before the rounds are knocked out"

"I don't doubt it."

"She has taken a fancy to you—more's the pity."

"Pho! pho!"

"There's no disguising the fact."

"Then, to put an end to all jesting," said Turpin, gathering the reins in his hand, "I will promise you she shall never be wronged by me."

"I am glad of it, Dick, very glad; for I already feel as though she was my own daughter."

"Good-bye, then, Davis, old fellow, treat her as a daughter, and I am sure you will find her all that you desire."

As Turpin spoke these words he waved his hand, and, gently pricking Bess upon the flank, was in a moment out of sight in the thick fog.

"It's a sad pity," soliloquized the landlord, while he stood for a moment on the door-step, "a sad pity, that a man like him should have taken to the road. He is a brave heart, and I don't believe he would do an ungenerous action for the world. If he had only had the opportunity many have, what a great man he would have become. Now what is he? Perhaps going to is death. It is a sad pity."

"It is indeed," said a gentle voice at his elbow, and, turning round, Tom Davis saw the young girl whom he had so soon learned to love standing by his side.

CHAPTER XIII.

TURPIN ROBS SIR THEODORE HOUGHTON ON HIS WAY TO LONDON.

"GENTLY, Bess; gently, mare;" said TURPIN, to his steed. "There is no hurry, lass. We have a good four hours before us."

Bess subsided into a gentle trot.

"Well," thought our hero, as he carried his hand to his pocket to make sure the cup was all right, "a few things have happened, certainly, since I took this cup out of the fat mayor's carriage; but the strangest thing of all, and the one I cannot banish from my imagination, is the spectral shadowy form which I feel convinced I saw in the lane. What could it be? What can it portend?

"I was a fool not to have ridden forward," he muttered, after a few moments' thought. "I will not believe it was anything supernatural. I was wounded. My brain was confused and giddy, and I had not that ready command over my actions that I generally have. Let me catch sight of it again, and I will chase the figure until I discover what it is."

His ruminations and resolves were quickly put to flight, for, indistinctly and muffled by the opaque atmosphere, came the tramp of a horse's hoofs upon his ears.

He paused to listen.

He had reached a small open space, but across which he could not see. He only knew that he was not in the roadway by feeling that Bess was treading upon turf.

The sound of the approaching footsteps came from the rear.

"It is a single traveller," said Dick, "and he comes most opportunely. My pockets are almost empty. It is to be hoped he carries a good booty."

The traveller was approaching slowly and cautiously, as though he was by no means sure of his footing.

Turpin wheeled round

Then he quietly waited until the unsuspecting rider should be close to him.

At length, when he judged from the loudness of the sound that the solitary horseman was at about fifty paces distant, he gave Bess the reins, and swept swiftly down the lane.

"Stand and deliver!" he cried in loud tones, and at the same time holding a pistol to the astonished rider's breast. "Your money or your life!"

"Neither, you villain!" said a voice; and, before Dick anticipated any such event, the rider fired a pistol point plank at his face.

Turpin shook in his saddle.

The bullet had been well aimed.

It struck his hat from his head, and ploughed up his scalp in its passage.

Before, however, the traveller could follow up the advantage he had so undoubtedly gained, Dick recovered himself, and, rapidly bringing his weapon to a level, pulled the trigger.

There was a flash and a report!

The shot was seemingly effective, for the traveller uttered a loud cry of pain.

He did not, though, fall from his seat, but preserved an upright position.

"Quick!" said Dick, "your money, watch, and trinkets! You have only yourself to thank for what you have got!"

No reply.

"Come, come," added Dick, "hand them over, or I shall be forced to take them, and, generally speaking, I am not over gentle when I do!"

"You have shattered my right arm," replied the traveller, "and I am powerless! Were it not for that, and the excruciating pain it occasions me, I would struggle with you to the last! You can please yourself how much you maltreat a wounded man who cannot struggle with you!"

"Use your left hand!" said Turpin, leaning forward towards him.

"I will, and do!" cried the traveller, in an excited voice.

At the same moment Turpin heard the click of another pistol. It simply flashed in the pan.

"You are a treacherous rascal!" shouted Turpin. "Take that."

He doubled up his fist, and struck the traveller a terrific blow in the face.

He swayed from one side of his horse to the other, and then losing his balance, fell on the ground.

"I hope that's a settler!" said Turpin. "I do hate treachery above all things. I wonder if he has got much in his pockets?"

As he asked himself this question, he dismounted and stooped over his prostrate foe, who lay very still indeed.

Turpin shook him rather roughly, as he said:

"Come, now, it's no good your shamming in that way. I have had enough of it."

An inarticulate sound, either a curse or a groan, Dick could not tell which, was all that he got by way of response, so he added:

"It's no good losing time. It's a troublesome affair, very. I only hope he has got enough about him to make it worth my while! Let's see! here's a nice watch—repeater, I think—with chain and seals. Not so bad. A pocket-book. Not very fat. A purse! Ah! heavy too. Bravo! Breast-pin. Gold of course. Two rings! Diamonds, doubtless. Anything else? No."

While uttering these disjointed sentences, Turpin made a perquisition of his enemy, and having examined the different articles which he took, transferred them to his own pocket.

"I should very much like to know," said Turpin, as he rose to his feet, "whether I did shatter his right arm as he said I did? It's so confounded dark. I can't see. Stop a bit. Yes I can."

He produced a small bull's-eye lantern from his pocket, and as his antagonist gave no signs of motion, very leisurely proceeded to light it.

In a moment or two, as the wick fairly caught light, he was able to throw a tolerably broad ray of light around him.

"Your face is damaged considerably, my friend," he said, as he turned the light full upon the traveller's features, which were covered with blood. "I never gave such a fair blow in my life! Never!"

Then he proceeded to make a more minute observation.

"What a deceitful fellow he must be, to be sure. He's not wounded in the arm. He thought of having me, I dare say, but he has found his match. That reminds me to look after the wound I fancy he gave me in my head. Oh! it's nothing—absolutely nothing! Why, I don't believe it has bled a dozen drops! I shall be none the worse for that, though it was a very narrow escape!

"What shall I do with this fellow now? Leave him where he is, in the middle of the road? It would serve him right! Ah! did you speak?"

The traveller certainly did not speak, but he raised himself up off the ground a little, looking rueful and woebegone in the extreme.

"Villain!" he said, as his eyes fell upon Turpin, "you have conquered and robbed me. I made sure I should put an end to your career!"

"How kind of you, to be sure!"

"And I should have done so if my infernal pistol had not missed fire!" he continued, for he was recovering rapidly.

"Well, why don't you wipe your face? Can't you feel it's all over blood?"

"You shall pay dearly for this, my spark," said the traveller, as he wiped his face with his handkerchief.

"You won't carry this game on always. I'm a magistrate, I'd let you know."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, and vagrants like yourself tremble when they hear my name!"

"What is it?"

"Sir Theodore Houghton, sir!"

Turpin shook his head.

"Never heard it before."

The magistrate opened his mouth to an unnatural width in token of his astonishment.

"Never heard it?"

"Never."

"Oh! impossible. My name is well known everywhere!"

"Among the 'family,' I suppose."

"The family?"

"Yes, the light-fingered profession. Easy-come-easy-go sort. You understand?"

"I do, and I can tell you it is woe to those who are brought up before me."

"Oh!"

By this time the magistrate had risen to his feet, and was evidently getting better every moment.

"I am unarmed now," he added, "or I would try what I could do."

"I suppose you called it fair play to fire upon me as you did?"

"Most assuredly! Everything is fair to a felon like you?"

"That's your opinion!"

"And everybody else's that's got any sense."

"Of course."

"Well, now, your worship," said Dick, with a mocking air, "it appears by what you have said, you have endeavoured to make your name a terror to those who might be brought up before you; and, to do so, you have, no doubt, unjustly punished many!"

"And what if I have?" asked Sir Theodore, preparing to remount his steed.

"Why, we will just have a little bit of retributive or poetical justice upon you. Remember, you are wholly in my power."

The worthy magistrate glared around in some dismay.

No living thing was either within sight or hearing, and he rather anxiously waited to hear what Turpin said next.

He was not long kept in suspense, for Dick said—

"I am going to a large meeting of the family to-night, and I am determined you shall go with me. I shall have great pleasure in presenting you to their notice, and still greater in handing you over to them to be dealt with according as they think proper. Of course, letting them know the cowardly and treacherous attempt you made upon my life!"

"Help—help! Murder!" shouted Sir Theodore, as Turpin announced this resolution. "Why, they would tear me limb from limb if they once got me in their clutches. You cannot mean that. Help—mercy!"

"I do mean it," said Turpin, "and consider I am doing no more than right, and acting in a merciful way towards you. As you have been so fond of administering punishment to others, you shall try how you like to have it administered to yourself."

During this short conversation Turpin had not once let go the grasp he had fastened upon him.

"And look here," added our hero; "do you see this?"

It was a long, bright-barrelled pistol which he asked him if he saw.

"I do."

"That's all right. Now listen to what I am going to say, and take warning. Are you listening?"

"Ye—es."

"This pistol is one by which I set great store, and I never produce or use it except upon extraordinary occasions. It is made with the utmost nicety; carries a ball to its mark as true as a hair, and never misses fire! I wish you to impress that strongly on your memory. It never misses fire! Now, if you wish to preserve your life a little longer, obey my directions, or, if you do not, why"——

He cocked and levelled the pistol in a manner by far more significant than pleasant.

The magistrate's teeth chattered when he heard the sound, and saw the weapon brought to bear upon his person.

"Now, mount," said Turpin.

Sir Theodore obeyed.

"Now take off your cravat, and tie one end firmly round your right wrist."

The pistol still covered him, so he perforce obeyed.

Turpin snatched up his lantern and caught hold of the other extremity of the cravat, having first assured himself that it was properly secured to his companion's arm, and then mounted on the back of Black Bess.

"Quick march," he cried; "and bear in mind that at the very first attempt you make to get free, I fire!"

CHAPTER XIV.

SIR THEODORE HOUGHTON TURNS OUT A VERY BAD CHARACTER INDEED.

It was in this strange fashion, then, Turpin and his companion made their way to London. Sir Theodore quietly resigned himself to his fate, and therein showed his wisdom. He was fully impressed with the idea that certain and immediate death would be the penalty for trying to get away, while he thought, by peacefully surrendering to his foe, he would be in a position to take advantage of any unlocked-for circumstance that might occur.

As, however, time passed, and they rapidly neared London without meeting a soul, he began to quake with fear, for he knew pretty well what he had to expect at the hands of the "family."

The fog which had settled down soon after sunset got no thinner as they neared the metropolis.

"And now there's one more thing, Sir Magistrate," said Turpin, breaking the silence: "if you cry out for assistance in any way, it's a case with you. As sure as you do, I fire."

"Oh! let me go, pray let me go at once! I promise to forego all idea of punishing you in any way and taking my revenge for what I have suffered to-night. Come, you are only doing this to frighten me. Let me go!"

"Shouldn't you like it? No, no! When I let you go, it will be into the hands of the 'family.'"

Sir Theodore relapsed into silence.

They reached at last the corner of Broad-street, St. Giles's. Turpin made his way down a dark-looking archway, taking his companion with him.

Several narrow turnings branched off from the bottom of this gateway, and, after proceeding a short distance down one, Turpin paused.

Then he blew a whistle which had a very peculiar sound.

"Dismount!" said Turpin, at the same time alighting from his steed, but taking care the magistrate should not give him the slip.

He blew the whistle a second time.

A man bearing a lantern came rapidly towards them.

Turpin addressed some words to this man, but what they meant Sir Theodore had no idea. It was in an unknown language to him.

The man with the lantern, however, understood him, evidently, for he said something in reply, and then, taking the two steeds by the bridle, he led them away.

"Forward!" said Turpin, seizing his companion's hand, and dragging him quickly down another alley, at the bottom of which he paused before a low door in the wall.

This door swung silently open, without any person making themselves visible.

A long, narrow passage, dimly lighted, appeared beyond.

Turpin led Sir Theodore down it.

At its extremity was a flight of steps, and then another door, opening into a huge apartment, which deserves a line of description.

It was not very wide, but of prodigious length. A table, formed of one long plank, stretched almost from one end to the other, and on both sides of this were seated probably a hundred persons, variously engaged smoking, drinking, talking, singing, swearing, all at once.

The noise was perfectly deafening.

The magistrate shrunk back in alarm.

At the further end of the table a man was seated in a chair much higher than the others.

As soon as he saw the new comers appear upon the threshold this man hammered violently upon the table with the pewter pot from which he had been drinking.

"Silence! si—lence!" he cried.

By slow degrees the tumult subsided into a low hum of voices.

Turpin stepped boldly up to the table.

"Hurrah! bravo! bravo! It's Turpin the bold! Three cheers, friends, he's brought the lord mayor's cup."

"Order!" yelled the chairman, at the top of his voice, and banging the pewter pot more violently upon the table than before—"order, pals! Who's the strange fly he's brought with him?"

Immediate attention was directed to Sir Theodore Houghton, who endeavoured to avoid the scrutiny as much as possible.

"Who is he? who is he? Name—name!" they shouted.

Turpin held up his hand for permission to address them.

"This, my friends," he said, "is a gentleman I have great pleasure in introducing to your notice. His name is Sir Theodore Houghton, and he is a county magistrate."

As he spoke, Turpin pushed his companion forward.

A deep roar of execration came from the throats of those assembled as they heard the name pronounced, and the greater part rose from their seats, while those who were nearest clutched the unfortunate magistrate tightly wherever they could obtain a hold.

He shook with fear.

"Death! death! Down with the unjust judge! Kill him—kill him!"

"Silence! si—lence!" again shouted the chairman, and making his voice heard above all the din. "On to the table with him! We'll try him. I'll be judge You shall be jury!"

"Hear, hear!" cried the thieves. "Bravo! Up with him!"

And, despite the resistance which he made, he was lifted by twenty hands at least on to the table.

He was compelled by blows to assume an erect position.

"Mercy, gentlemen, mercy!" he said, in trembling tones, and with shaking limbs. "Mercy, mercy!"

"All right! We know what you mean by mercy, and you shall have plenty of it!"

"Order!" again exclaimed the chairman. "Take your seats, mates. He shall be tried! Let us manage the affair in a decent manner."

It was a rule with that disorderly assembly that a chairman should be appointed every night by the general voice, and that he should, while he held that position, have the others under his command.

Slowly, therefore, and muttering threats against the unhappy wretch who had fallen into their power, they obeyed, and seated themselves in their respective places.

"Prisoner, advance!" said the chairman.

"Forrards!" exclaimed those who were nearest to him, compelling him to walk to the middle of the long table.

"Who accuses the prisoner?"

"I do!" said Turpin, stepping forward.

"Of what?"

"A treacherous attempt upon my life!"

"Now, prisoner, do you plead Guilty or Not Guilty?"

Sir Theodore Houghton looked about him in a bewildered manner; he could hardly believe in the reality of the scene that was enacting before him.

The chairman repeated his question.

"Not Guilty!" replied the magistrate, nervously.

"State your charge!"

"I will, your lordship," said Turpin.

There was a laugh at this.

"Silence in the court!" shouted another voice.

The laugh grew louder still. There was something so uncommonly comic about this assumption of judicial form.

"I was on the way from Hornsey to London," continued Turpin, "when all at once I heard the sound of a horse's hoofs beating against the road. Thinking I might be able to do a little business, I pulled up and waited for the horseman to make his appearance."

"Quite right!"

"Presently, when he was only a few yards off, I rode forward, and requested him to pay the toll!"

"Well?"

"Then, your lordship, without saying a word, and before I was at all prepared for such an event, he fired a pistol full in my face. It knocked off my hat, and grazed my scalp, but did me no more damage."

"That's lucky!"

"It was, your lordship! Of course, I wasn't long recovering myself, and then I fired at him in return."

"Quite right!"

"He gave a cry, and called out that he was hit, and said he could not hand over himself. Not suspecting anything, I leaned forward to clear his pockets myself, when he put another pistol to my breast, and pulled the trigger!"

"The miscreant!"

"Si—lence!" said the crier again, or rather one man who had taken that office upon himself.

"Very fortunately for me, your lordship," Turpin continued, "the pistol only flashed in the pan, so I was unhurt. I did not stop to take out another pistol, but doubled up my fist, and hit him such a fair smack in the face, that down he went off his horse into the road at once!"

"Now, prisoner," said the pseudo judge, "what have you to say in your defence?"

"I defended my property," replied the baronet, who had an idea that he might get on better if he put a bold face on the matter.

"How came you to bring him here?"

"He told me he was a magistrate, and boasted how he served those who were unluckly enough to be brought up before him."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, your lordship; so I thought as I was coming here, I would bring him with me, and put him upon his trial, and see how he liked it!"

"A very proper idea."

"I thought so, and here he is!"

"Now," said the judge, "is there any gentleman present who has suffered any injustice at his hands?"

"Yes, yes! Me! me! me!"

Twenty voices at least replied to his words.

"I can't hear you all, gentlemen! Let the one who has the strongest case against him step forward. If we find him guilty, sentence shall be pronounced!"

"Agreed! Who stands forward?"

"I do!" said a voice.

A tall, respectable-looking man got up off his seat.

"Order for Gentleman George!" shouted the chairman.

Sir Theodore turned ghastly pale as soon as his eyes fell upon this man, and he trembled so excessively that he could scarcely keep his feet.

The man who had been called Gentleman George began to speak, and there was an immediate silence.

"My case is a very hard one," he said, "but I will relate it in as few words as possible."

"Silence!" said the crier again, who, though there was no noise, thought, as the speaker paused, he ought to say something.

"It is nearly ten years ago now since I entered the prisoner's service. He was a justice then, and I was employed as his clerk. I lived in the same house with him."

Sir Theodore's agitation rapidly increased, and he glared wildly at the faces by which he was surrounded, upon every one of which he saw an inimical expression.

He evidently dreaded what was coming next.

"I shall not go minutely into my story," continued Gentleman George, "because it would take up too much time, I will only say that Sir Theodore had a daughter."

His voice wavered slightly, but, recovering himself with an effort, he went on:—

"We were thrown much together, and, as she was about my own age, there was nothing wonderful in our falling in love with each other. It was folly and wickedness on my part, but who can control his destiny?

"We kept our attachment secret for some time, but eventually it was discovered. With the exercise of that treachery and duplicity which seem native to him, he called me into his library, remonstrated with me, yet kindly and gently. I could say nothing, for I felt I was in the wrong.

"'After what has occurred,' he said, for I can recollect his words as well as I could if I had just heard them—'after what has occurred, you must feel the impossibility of remaining any longer in my service. I do not wish to deal harshly with you so long as you leave this place. If you absent yourself, there is a probability of my daughter forgetting her unfortunate passion, so I beg of you as a favour I think you ought to grant, that you will place as great a distance as you can between this house and yourself.'

"What could I do but consent? Fool that I was, I ought to have distrusted his kindness, and feared it more than his anger.

"'I have no fault to find with you,' he said, 'in the way you have executed your duties. There is half a year's salary due to you; I will write you a cheque for that amount, and two hundred pounds in addition, upon the sole condition that you never return here. It will serve to pay your travelling expenses, and to support you until you find some fresh employment. Do not hesitate to accept it. It is a sum of money I can well spare.'

"He wrote out a cheque for two hundred and fifty pounds, placed it in an envelope, and gave it to me.

"This was acting magnanimously to all appearance, and, like a fool I believed he was sincere. I ought to have known from his behaviour on other occasions that I ought to expect the worse.

"I took the cheque and bade him good-bye. I went to my room, packed up all my things, and took them down to the coach office, and secured a place for myself in the mail, as I intended to go to Liverpool, where many of my friends resided.

"The bank was at a town four miles distant from Sir Theodore's house, and I got there just as the bank was closing. However, as they knew me, the man at the counter just glanced at the cheque, and handed me over the money.

"In an hour afterwards I was in the coach and on my way to Liverpool.

"And now," said Gentleman George, as he looked around, "the black part of my story is yet to come. It is so foul and monstrous, that you will never believe it possible any man could act in so diabolical a manner."

He paused for a moment, and wiped his face, while the rest of his story was waited for with a stillness that was positively painful.

"I reached Liverpool on the fourth night. I will pass over my own feelings and reflections, but you can guess they were far from pleasant; still, the sense of no impending evil weighed upon me.

"I at first intended to see my friends, but I afterwards altered my mind, and determined to leave England for ever and go to America.

"A vessel of several hundred tons burden, was just upon the point of sailing for New York, and I engaged a berth on board.

"The following morning, just as they were about to weigh anchor, a boat filled with many persons shot out from the quay, and was rowed rapidly towards us.

"They made signals for the captain to pause.

"As the boat neared the ship's side, we all noticed it was filled with police-officers.

"'They are after some one who has absconded,' I thought, and I looked round at those passengers who were standing in a throng round me wondering which it could be.

"Five minutes afterwards, the officers came on board, and spoke to the captain. Then they came towards us.

"I looked on with some curiosity, but who can imagine my surprise when the chief stepped up to me and put his hand on my shoulder?

"'You were almost off,' he said; 'but we've caught you. Come along, and don't detain the vessel any longer.'

"I was thunderstruck.

"'Am I to understand you have a charge against me?'

"Ha, ha! That's good—werry good!' said the officer. 'Come along, and don't make a rumpus!'

"'I don't understand you,' I said. 'I have done nothing to make me answerable to the laws.'

"'Oh, no! I don't suppose you have. However, here is a warrant for forging a cheque for two hundred and fifty pounds upon Sir Theodore Houghton, and making off with it.'

"'It is false,' I cried. 'Sir Theodore wrote the cheque himself?'

"That may be. I don't say it isn't, but you must come along with me. It looks very strange, though, for you to receive this money, leave without saying a word to anyone, and then embark for New York.'

"It flashed upon my mind in a moment how bad a construction could be placed upon my actions. I was overwhelmed, but I was not conscious of the full extent of my misfortune."

Gentleman George paused a moment for breath.

All still remained silent. They seemed spellbound.

A cold sweat burst out at every pore of the magistrate's body, and he sank upon his knees on the table.

He strove to speak, but his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth.

"I have only a word or two more to say," resumed Gentleman George, sadly, "I shall not detain you much longer. I was brought back to Sir Theodore's, manacled like a felon. I was had up, the charge made, and committed to the assizes.

"A weary time to me elapsed, and then I was placed upon my trial. My friends had heard of me, and had engaged an eminent counsel for my defence. His eloquence, however, was of no avail. Sir Theodore here entered the witness-box, and perjured himself by swearing that he had never had any such conversation with me, as I said he had, and appealed to those who knew him, and asked if they thought he would be likely to have acted in such a manner? My whole statement, he said, was most preposterous and absurd, for was it probable he would give a large sum of money to one who had done him such an injury? The natural course for anyone to take would be to turn me ignominiously from the house. He dwelt, also, upon my baseness in bringing his daughter's name before the court as a screen for my bad conduct. The trial lasted many hours, and everything he said damaged me.

"In his examination, he distinctly swore that he knew nothing of my leaving him until the morning following my departure, when the cashier from the bank came over to ask him about a cheque which they had cashed just as the bank was closing on the previous day. He declared it to be a forgery, and asked by whom it had been presented.

"He was told, of course, by me.

"I was sent for, but no one knew better than himself that I was far away, and was not to be found. It was, all said, a clear case of forgery and absconding; so a warrant was obtained for my apprehension, and I was arrested in the way I told you.

"My counsel could not shake the prosecutor's evidence in any way. There was no flaw in it. The judge summed up, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty, and I was sentenced to be executed!

"And so, you see, by his diabolical ingenuity, was I, an innocent man in thought and deed, convicted of a capital offence!

"But his vengeance was not sated as I have no doubt he hoped it would be. By the assistance of my friends I was enabled to escape, and so I eluded the dread penalty of the law. But since then I have never dared to show my face. I have been forced to become an outcast and a thief!

"As for the wretch who brought all this upon me and blighted my future hopes, I have never seen him since he stood in the witness-box until he was brought in to-night, and then I recognised him instantly. If you have any doubt of my statement, look at him now, and tell me whether he looks like an innocent man!"

The man who had related this fearful tale of prospects blighted, and who was known only to his associates under the name of Gentleman George, raised his hand as he finished speaking and pointed to the shrinking, cowardly wretch upon the table.

"Guilty—guilty!" they all cried, fiercely, as they rose tumultuously to their feet, and stretched out their hands towards him.

The chairman banged the table.

"Order! gentlemen of the jury, order! Do you forget that you are in a court of justice? Be seated, and let us hear what the prisoner has to say in his defence!"

They obeyed.

"Prisoner on the table," said the judge, as soon as silence was restored, "what have you to urge in your behalf?"

White as ashes, his teeth chattering in his head, Sir Theodore Houghton rose trembling to his feet.

He licked his parched lips.

"It's all false!" he said, in a hoarse, hollow whisper. "False from first to last. He is guilty, and was rightly sentenced!"

Then he sank again, half fainting, upon the table.

The chairman, in his capacity of judge, then very formally summed up.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he said, and his tones got graver and more solemn as he proceeded, "you have heard the evidence which has been given against the prisoner, and it remains for you to deliberately weigh it in your minds. Do you consider the prisoner guilty or not guilty?"

As if with one voice those who were assembled cried, the moment the words left his lips—

"Guilty!"

Then there was a dead silence.

"Prisoner on the table," said the chairman, "you have heard the verdict which has been recorded against you. Have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

"It's all a mockery!" shrieked Sir Theodore, springing to his feet as if galvanized. "A hideous mockery! I refuse to be tried, or submit to this farce any longer!"

"You cannot help yourself; the general voice has pronounced you guilty, and the court now proceeds to pass sentence upon you. The sentence is the same that you so unjustly caused to be passed upon Gentleman George, namely, that you be hanged by the neck until you be dead!"

CHAPTER XV.

THE OFFICERS CAPTURE DICK TURPIN AT THE "THREE TUNS."

No one spoke for some seconds after the sentence was thus pronounced.

Sir Theodore strove hard to make some articulate sound, but in vain.

Horror had possession of his soul.

He knew his guilt, and he felt that the hour of retribution had at last arrived.

He clasped his hands together in an agony of mute supplication.

It was the chairman who broke the silence.

"Who will be his executioner?" he said.

A man rose instantly.

"That will I," he said, "for I have suffered much injury from this most unjust judge. I will carry the sentence into effect, and so give a warning to others. Who has a rope?"

Several pieces five or six feet in length were handed to him.

He tied them all securely together.

Half-a-dozen iron hooks were fixed in the roof, and to the largest of these the man made fast one end of the rope.

The other end he made into a noose.

The next operation was to pinion the miserable prisoner, and, in spite of his desperate resistance and frantic shrieks for mercy, this was quickly done.

A chair was placed immediately beneath the hook, and Sir Theodore forced to stand in it.

Then the rope was adjusted round his neck.

The expression on his face was awful to see.

The "family" sat looking on in grim silence.

"Help! help! Murder! murder!" screamed Sir Theodore, in a cracked voice—for the so-close presence of death restored him his voice. "Help! help! Mercy! mercy!"

"Confess, then, while yet you have time."

"I do! I do! The charge was wholly false, and I got it up to avenge the wrong he had done me. What he told you was true. Release me! Release me!"

"No, now you have confessed to the perpetration of so horrible a crime, you shall die!" said the chairman. "We can feel no doubt as to your guilt, and shall carry out the sentence without compunction!"

"No—no! Save me! Sa"——

The chair was suddenly knocked from under him, and the sentence checked upon his lips. He gave a desperate plunge, and struggled slightly—then all was over.

Sir Theodore Houghton had met with the reward he merited.

"I have him! I have him! Surrender! surrender!" cried several loud voices at this moment, as a large party of police-officers dashed headlong into the room, while half-a-dozen at least clung to Dick; and, before he was conscious of what had occurred, he found himself overpowered and a prisoner.

The attention of every one present had been so riveted upon the fearful termination of Sir Theodore Houghton's life, and so absorbed by the terrible narrative of Gentleman George, that the whole of them were, in a manner of speaking, quite deaf and blind to any extraneous circumstances; and so the police-officers, whose measures had been very carefully taken, were actually in full possession of the entire premises before the lawless company had any idea that they were menaced by danger in the least.

Even Turpin, watchful as he usually was, had been unable to resist the powerful interest which the exciting tragedy produced in every breast; indeed, so intense was it, that his breath came short and thick. In fact, he, as well as all the rest, was spell-bound.

The sudden irruption of the officers, however, and the loud shouts of their leader, in a moment aroused their slumbering activity.

Instantly all were upon their feet, and a desperate struggle immediately commenced, and several of the "family," seeing our hero so surrounded, sprang forward to attempt his rescue.

Sir Theodore Houghton was, of course, well known to all the officers, for his severe sentences had made everywhere notorious, and, as soon as they recognized him, half a dozen rushed forward to cut him down.

They were too late though to save his life.

The fall was very sudden, and the magistrate no inconsiderable weight, the effect of which two circumstances was that his neck was dislocated.

The officers were not long in discovering this, for when they set him up so that he should have a chance of reviving a little, his head lolled about in every direction.

So soon, then, as they ascertained that life was really extinct, they left him, and turned towards those who had sprung upon Turpin.

They had every need of their aid, for they found it a most difficult task to keep their hold upon their prisoner, and defend themselves at the same time from the violent assault that was made upon them.

Already had Turpin got one of his arms free, and was dealing heavy blows, which made his captors shrink, when the other body of officers reached the excited, struggling mass.

The numbers were about equal.

The yelling, shouting, and swearing were tremendous.

"Give him up! Give him up!" shrieked an officer, mounting on to the table. "Give him up and you shall all go free! It's only him we want, and we're bound to have him, so give him up at once!"

No notice whatever was taken of this speech.

Then this officer, who was doubtless one of those in command, grew furious when he found himself disregarded, and ran towards the end of the table near which the struggle was now taking place.

We have before had occasion to remark that this table in the thieves' kitchen was composed simply of one plank. This was supported on three tressels.

When the officer rushed forward so suddenly to its extremity his weight tilted it up, so down he went on the floor in a moment, and was buried nearly under an avalanche of pewter pots.

Blood was trickling from his head and face when he again rose to his feet, but, heedless of the hurts he had sustained, he dashed like a maniac into the thickest of the fight.

Turpin, too, was injured in many places, but struggled desperately, for he resolved not to be taken alive without an effort.

He got his other arm free.

Upon seeing this, the officers redoubled their endeavours.

Turpin was an immense favourite with all the "family," and there was scarcely one of them who would not willingly have laid down his life to render him a service.

Therefore they fought most gallantly in his behalf. They knew the motive which had brought him there.

Feeling that the issue of the conflict was very uncertain, Turpin commenced slowly to retreat backwards to the door, intending, if once he could get into the passage, to make a bold rush for escape.

The "family" divined his intention immediately, and so, too, did the police officers; but the former made such a sudden attack upon the latter, that they had much ado to defend themselves.

Two men only interposed between Turpin and the door he was so anxious to reach. Turning round sharply upon his heel, he, by a well-directed blow, laid one prostrate, and sprang past the other, who, however, grasped him tightly by the skirts of his coat.

Dick placed his hands behind him, and plunged forward. Many rapid footsteps followed him.

"The door is guarded!" exclaimed Dick, involuntarily, as his eye fell upon four men standing near it.

"Surrender, or we fire!" they cried, upon seeing him approach.

"Never!" said Dick; and as he spoke he ran up a narrow flight of stairs which were close at his left hand.

The next instant several of the officers who had disengaged themselves from the fray which was still going on in the kitchen, came along the passage, and sprung up the stairs after Dick, who, however, had made good use of the brief start which he had obtained.

He was already at the top.

He saw then several doors, all of which were closed.

Without pausing to choose, he placed his hand upon the fastenings of one just opposite to him, and opened it.

All was profound darkness within.

Very dimly, though, and as if a curtain had been drawn across it, Turpin saw the outline of a window.

He hastily secured the door.

He heard the officers stamping up the staircase.

Rejoiced at having successfully eluded them so far, he crept forward on his hands and knees towards the window, for he judged that to be the likeliest means of avoiding a collision with whatever furniture there might be in the room, which, for aught he knew to the contrary, might be a bed-chamber, and occupied by some one.

The room was limited in its dimensions, and he very quickly reached the window, and drew the curtain from before it.

"Bang! bang! bang! bang!" came four heavy blows upon the panel of the door.

Dick flung open the window.

It was one of those diamond-paned casements opening like a door, and permitting easy egress.

Just below him Dick saw the roofs of some outbuildings, and he dropped down upon them.

"I fancy," he said, "I shall be able to make my way into some of the courts, and then very likely I shall get free!"

While speaking he slid down the tiles, and, as he expected, found himself only about ten or twelve feet from the ground.

Grasping the gutter with his hands, he quickly, but yet carefully, lowered himself, and then dropped to the earth.

No sooner did he reach it than the window through which he had just passed was dashed open, and several persons scrambled out of it on to the roof.

Turpin found himself standing in a narrow alley, but, hearing his pursuers so close behind him, did not pause for breath, but hastily wiped the perspiration from his face and set off at full speed.

A half-shout—half-yell—from the rear told him he was already seen.

He quickened his speed.

The alley he was traversing he knew would take him into Dudley-street, and he was in hopes, could he gain it, that he would, by the intimate knowledge of the locality he possessed, succeed in baffling his pursuers.

Oh! how he wished for his bonny steed when he did reach it, and looked up and down to assure himself that no enemy was in sight. How easy, then, would have been escape! But now there was every prospect of his being hunted through the streets on foot.

"Stop him! Stop him!" he heard his pursuers cry. "Stop him! A highwayman! A thousand pounds reward!"

The sounds came upon his ears with great distinctness.

He ran across the street and down another turning into Soho, but the shouts of the officers had aroused the neighbourhood, and there was quickly a crowd at his heels which increased in numbers every moment.

In as direct a line as he could, Turpin made his way towards the Oxford-road, as Oxford-street was then called, the vague idea of reaching the country filling his mind.

He had trusted by doubling the corners of the streets suddenly to get out of sight of his pursuers, and then seek shelter and concealment in a house.

But they were too close upon his track for this hope to hold possession of him long, and the whole of his energies were bent on running at a swifter pace than they.

A considerable distance had been already passed over, and Turpin began to show signs of exhaustion. His breathing was painful, and he staggered more than once. He felt quite sure that he could not much longer maintain his present speed, and unless succour of some kind presented itself, and that quickly, he must abandon all idea of getting free from those who were hunting him.

He passed by many a turning on his route down which he was afraid to turn lest it should be a yard and have no outlet. If he once went down one of these he would be caught like a rat in a trap.

Presently he saw a street which he recognised with a throb of delight. It was a very short one, and he plunged down it, and round the corner to the right and then to the left.

His pursuers were out of sight.

He redoubled his efforts.

Half-a-dozen turnings more, and he was in Oxford-road.

It is a very difficult matter to imagine one of the principal and most crowded thoroughfares in London a quiet country road, bounded by trees and meadows, and yet such was Oxford-street at the time of which we write.

Dick could hear the voices and footsteps of the crowd, but he could not see their forms.

On the other side of the way, and near a gate in a garden wall, was a servant in livery, leading a horse by the bridle, and apparently waiting for some one.

"A godsend!" said Dick. "I shall be free now!"

He rushed across the road as he spoke, and before the servant knew at all what was going to happen, he found himself sprawling on the ground.

Turpin was seated in the saddle in an instant.

He doubled up the reins, and struck the horse sharply across the shoulders.

It was a thoroughbred animal, unused to blows, and it reared and plunged voilently for several moments, then set off at a tremendous gallop.

The foremost of his hunters, though, were fairly in the Oxford-road before the horse started.

They set up a loud shout of anger and disappointment.

To their surprise, as well as Turpin's, who happened just then to turn his head, ten or twelve officers who had been chasing him on foot swept round the corner well mounted.

They had passed some livery stables on their way, and from thence obtained the cattle. Their stoppage was what had caused Turpin to gain upon them as he did.

They were in full sight of their prey.

Very fortunate, indeed, was it for Turpin that he had been lucky enough to obtain possession of a horse. The odds now were, if anything, in his favour.

The officers came along at a good rate.

It was a beautiful steed upon which Turpin was mounted, though of course very inferior to his own noble and was, no doubt, highly prized by its owner.

He made his way due west.

At length, after a gallop of about four miles, Turpin reined up his steed upon the brow of a hill, and looked behind him.

The mounted police were just at its base, and good as was the speed he had made, he had not apparently gained a dozen yards upon them.

"The fellows must have got hold of some first-rate cattle; this one seems already to show signs of distress. Oh! for my own mare, Black Bess! Were she beneath me, I would laugh at all their efforts."

While speaking he had urged his horse to fresh exertion.

CHAPTER XVI.

DICK IS A WITNESS TO A VERY SINGULAR SCENE IN THE OLD COUNTRY CHURCH

THICK black clouds had hitherto wholly hidden the moon's face, but now through a large straggling rift she looked down upon the earth.

"Confound it!" said Turpin, as the bright rays fell upon his countenance. "I could have done very well without any more light. Now they will be able to see me a mile off."

The road was very straight; indeed, it must have been remarked by many, what a great distance it goes without making a bend either to the right or the left, so there was little or no exaggeration in Turpin's words, when he said the officers would be able to see him a mile off.

"I must get out of this, that's certain," he added. "Let me see; a little further on I shall come to what I call the Dark-lane, for want of a better name, and down that I will take my way. Ah! here it is!"

Even while he spoke, Turpin found he had arrived opposite the entrance of the lane, and he turned down it like a shot, disappearing from the gaze of the officers with a suddenness that must have appeared to them almost magical.

Turpin had very appropriately designated this lane by the adjective dark, for the trees on both sides grew to such a great height, and so very thickly together, that scarcely a ray of light of any description penetrated through them, and it seemed more like riding into a cave than aught else.

Turpin dashed onwards without suffering his horse to relax its speed in the least.

A few minutes when a horse is at full gallop will carry a rider over a great deal of ground, so in a very short time Turpin emerged from this lane into the high road again.

He could not see them, but he could hear the clatter of his pursuers' footsteps.

"Now for it," said Turpin. "I can't get clear by riding, so I will give them the slip. Ah! now that will do first-rate! Capital!"

He flung himself off his horse as he spoke.

He took the reins and tucked them tightly under the front of the saddle, then with the palm of his hand struck the horse a smart blow on the flank, which caused the high-mettled creature to gallop swiftly along the road.

Turpin passed over to the other side, and crawled through a gap in the hedge.

He found himself in a meadow, on the west side of which, over another hedge, was an old country church.

A loud shout, and apparently of gratification, let him know that the officers had reached the road.

"What can they be so pleased about, I wonder?" asked Turpin. "I will take a peep, through the hedge."

He did so, and was so astonished at what he saw that he almost betrayed his place of concealment by an exclamation!

The officers were standing in a throng near the end of the lane, looking attentively at something.

Turpin followed the direction of their eyes, and saw, for the second time, that spectral resemblance of himself.

The officers saw it, too; so it was clear there was no delusion about the matter; or rather, if there was, they were subject to it as well as himself.

The figure was standing in the middle of the highway, at about half a mile distant, looking back over his shoulder at the officers, and seemingly in such an attitude as to be able to start so soon as any symptom of motion showed itself upon their part.

Turpin was bewildered, and he looked first from the officers and then to his second self.

"What, oh! what can it be?" he asked. "What am I to think of this strange assumption of my own form! It would be perfect madness, or I would, as I resolved, rush forward and solve this mystery. Now I am compelled to inanition!"

By mutual consent, both parties seemed to have come to a halt for the purpose of resting their steeds, and so long as that distance was preserved between them neither could obtain the advantage of the other.

Turpin was full of curiosity and wonder to know what would happen next.

Suddenly the chief of the police uttered a few words to his companions, and then the whole of the troop, clapping spurs to their horses' sides sped quickly down the lane.

The spectre horseman, and whom they no doubt believed was Turpin himself, was not apparently at all disconcerted at this proceeding on the part of the officers, for he, too, gave the reins to his horse, and set off at full speed.

The officers gave a loud shout, as they commenced an immediate pursuit.

"This grows stranger, and more and more incomprehensible," said Turpin, as he rose from his recumbent position in the meadow. "Who can this mysterious being be who so closely simulates my form and dress, for that it is anything supernatural I resolutely disbelieve, and will do, yet the whole affair is most perplexing and mysterious. It is quite evident, though, that the officers are labouring under the impression that it is me. So far it is very good, since I have an opportunity of escape which I should not have had under other circumstances. Until, however, I find it out, I am quite certain I shall know no peace. I feel exceedingly desirous to know how the chase is getting on, and whether they have caught my double. Is there a tree anywhere I can climb? No!"

He looked all round as he spoke, but no tree of any magnitude, or from which anything like a view could be obtained, was in sight.

"Stop now," he added, as his eye fell upon the old church to which we have alluded. "Stop, now. That church seems to have a tolerably high spire. Now if I could only get up that I should see for miles round, first-rate."

No sooner did this thought enter his mind, than he hastened across the meadow to put it into execution. He soon reached the hedge, which he surmounted, and then rolled down a grassy bank into a very narrow, but picturesque-looking lane.

He was on his feet in a moment.

"Who'd have thought, now," he said, "that I was going to miss my footing in that manner? Never mind, it's all right. I suppose this narrow path leads to the church?"

Turpin was right enough in this supposition, and in a few minutes he reached the entrance to the graveyard.

As is often the case in country places, there was a right of road through the churchyard, so Turpin had no other trouble in entering than that of pushing through a turnstile.

He hurried up the broad, smooth, gravel path, and ascending a short flight of stone steps, stood beneath the porch.

A door was facing him, which he naturally enough supposed led into the church, and there was another on his right, which was, beyond a doubt, the one he wanted, namely, that leading to the belfry.

The almost full moon lent him sufficient light to make an examination of the door. It was fastened, but that was a circumstance of no importance, for it creaked open in a moment under the application of Turpin's fingers.

The blackness and silence of the tomb were before him.

Dimly though he could see by the faint light that straggled into the place a circular flight of steps.

He pulled the door after him, and, as it dragged a little on its hinges, it remained close shut, and to have looked at it from the other side no one would have dreamed it had been forcibly broken open.

There were loopholes in the stonework of the staircase at regular intervals, and through these the moon's rays shone with an exceedingly beautiful effect

Dick peeped through one or two of these on his way up the stairs, but the view through so narrow an aperture was too circumscribed for his purpose.

In less time than would have been believed, considering the strangeness and darkness of the place, Turpin reached the top of the steps, and withdrawing a large rusty bolt pushed open a trap-door just over his head, after passing through which he found himself standing on the square, leaden roof of the church tower.

The beautiful prospect of many a mile of moon-lit country would have been quite sufficient to recompense anyone for the trouble of the ascent, and Dick looked around him with deep pleasure.

The perfect silence and repose that everywhere prevailed lent, too, a great charm to the scene.

Dick scanned the whole of the horizon with his keen eyes, but no traces either of pursuer or pursued were visible.

The broad, nigh road could be defined with great distinctness as it wound about as sinuously as a river, and as the earth in it was of a whitish colour, it looked like a band of silver winding among the bright green trees.

Turpin made a lengthened examination of all the landscape, but still being unable to see what he sought, prepared to descend again.

Yet he lingered upon the roof-tower of the old church; he knew not why he did so, unless it was the extreme beauty of the scene, to which no words of ours could do adequate justice.

Presently there came upon his ears a faint muffled sound, and placing one hand upon the stone battlement, he leaned forward in order to hear the sound better.

It gradually increased in loudness.

"Horsemen!" said Turpin, "that's certain, and going at a tremendous pace, too. It must be the officers. Surely they will be in sight directly."

The faint, muffled sound grew plainer and plainer, until the clatttering of horses' hoofs could be heard.

Just over the tall edgerows, but at a considerable distance, Dick could see a number of riders' hats gliding rapidly along.

"There they are—there they are!" exclaimed Dick, greatly excited; "why, they are coming back! Have they caught him, I wonder, and made him a prisoner?"

The horsemen had now, within a short distance, reached a bend in the road, after turning which they would be in full sight of Dick.

"It won't do to stand up like this," he said, "for some officious personage is sure to see me. I must be quite a conspicuous object up here!"

There was in reality no ground for apprehension, for Dick, when he spoke, quite forgot the height to which he had ascended. Still, he crouched low down on the roof, and peeped over the stonework anxiously.

He found his view was not in the least impeded, and he had the gratification of seeing a horseman sweep round the corner and come at a rapid pace along the road.

Although he was quite prepared, Dick could not help feeling a little agitated when this horseman came in sight.

His resemblance to himself was perfect.

He came along the road at a rapid pace.

In another moment the officers came round the bend, and catching sight of the flying horseman, with many gesticulations urged forward by whip and spur their almost exhausted cattle.

The interest with which Dick regarded them was most intense.

"I can't understand," he muttered, "how they have turned back and preserved the same positions, unless my personator has ridden bodily through them, and I should hardly think he would be foolhardy enough to do that. It is a thing I should think about twice before I did!"

He lost sight of them all at this juncture, as the road took another sudden turn, but he knew in a moment or two they must reach that part of it which passed by the church, and which for a distance of half a mile or more each way was in nearly a straight line, while from his elevated position he would be able to see over the hedgerows on each side of the lane.

Dick's double, for so in his mind he called him, very quickly made his appearance.

"He is gaining on them!" said Turpin, a tone of satisfaction in spite of himself tinging his voice. "He will soon distance them completely."

The officers now came in view.

Their horses seemed all but knocked up.

It was a most exciting race to Turpin, and he watched it with as much interest as folks do the Derby when they have some very heavy bets depending on the issue of it.

He forgot all about the caution which had induced him to crouch down behind the coping, but rose to his feet and waved his arms, almost uttering a shout in his excitement.

He became conscious of the risk he had run by seeing one of the officers in the road below turn round and point to the tower.

Turpin dropped down like a shot.

Still he ventured to look over. The man was evidently from his manner saying something very earnestly to his companions.

"Confound the fellow," said Turpin, as he looked at him. "I wonder now whether he saw me. What a fool I must have been to have stood up in that absurd fashion!"

It would appear that what the officer said was simply relative to the edifice itself, for the whole of them turned round in their saddles and gazed at it, but they did not slacken speed while doing so.

Five minutes more and they were out of sight.

Turpin turned away.

"I can't make it out," he said, as he felt his way down the steps; "can't make it out at all. Who can this man be who bears so remarkable a resemblance to myself, and dresses so much the same. I must wait patiently, I suppose. The mystery will be cleared up some day. It must unquestionably have been he I saw when mounted in the lane, only my excited fancy just then magnified him into a spectre!"

This was a very probable supposition, but whether it was a correct one time only can determine.

Turpin groped is way down the belfry stairs, and reached the bottom in what seemed to him to be an incredibly short time. However, there, by the faint light of the moon through a loophole above, he could see the door plain enough.

He pushed it open.

Instead, however, of passing into the porch as he expected, he found this door opened into the gallery of the church.

The interior, in contrast with the dark belfry staircase, was quite bathed in light, and a vague undefined feeling of curiosity caused Turpin to pass through this door, and after walking to the edge of the gallery he sat down upon one of the front seats and looked below him.

He happened to be facing the large stained glass window over the altar, and through this the moon's rays streamed with full force, lighting up all the body of the church, and leaving the remainder in deep shadow.

Scarcely even in the many scenes which he, in the course of a long career, had met with, had he found one so imposing as this. A rapt repose, such as can exist only in a sacred edifice, everywhere prevailed; and unconsciously and despite himself strange and solemn feelings filled his breast—feelings of whose existence he had hitherto been in ignorance.

It might be that he sat five minutes, or even ten, leaning his head upon his hands, and his elbow on the railing of the gallery, with his eyes fixed upon the beautiful stained window, and his mind abstracted from all things present, when a slight rattling sound made itself heard, and immediately recalled his energies.

He started like one suddenly awakened.

The rattling noise continued, and he listened in a vain endeavour to make out what it was.

In that old silent church it came upon the hearing clearly, though probably elsewhere it would have been unnoticed.

Although somewhat startled by the circumstance, Dick retained sufficient presence of mind to remain perfectly still.

In another instant he heard a sharp click, which was followed by a grating noise.

Then he heard a voice.

"Confound the old door!" said some one. "What a trouble I had to open it, to be sure! I must have that keyhole seen to to-morrow; it kept jumping about in a very improper manner! It must be bewitched! However, I knew it would have to yield to me in the end; me, Solomon Goggs, as has been beadle and sexton here a matter of forty years! That's why I had patience—I—I knew very well, when it kept bobbing about so, that if I took a careful aim the key would sure to go in, and so it did. Hold up!"

The speaker blundered against something in his path.

The words, however, which he had uttered, made things quite intelligible to Turpin.

It was the rattling of the key in the lock that had disturbed the highwayman's ruminations, and the thick tones in which the old man had spoken, and who had named himself Solomon Goggs, proclaimed pretty loudly that he was some distance gone in intoxication.

What was his motive for paying a visit to the church at so unusual an hour he had yet to learn, so Turpin remained quite quiet, and listened for him to speak again.

As he fully anticipated, he had not long to wait, for Mr. Solomon Goggs, beadle and sexton, had reached that point in his potations at which extreme loquaciousness began.

"Oh! I see now: It's one of the benches belonging to the free seats. Confound the free seats! There had no business to be such things in the church, leastwise of all, down stairs. To be sure, they're close to the door! I should like to know who it was pulled the bench out. Some of the low-minded mobocracy sort of people. It's just like their imperance, making me break my shins agen it! Come up, will you!"

The last words, apparently, were addressed to the bench against which he had stumbled, and which might be supposed to have been somewhat refractory, for the words were followed by a rumbling, creaking sound, which echoed and re-echoed through the building.

"That's right at last! What a night of adventures, to be sure! It's infernally disagreeable to have to come here—infernally disagreeable. I am well paid though, so I ought not to grumble! Still I am always aggravated when I have to leave pleasant company at the 'Well of Content!' The sooner this job's over the better, and then I shall stand a chance of getting back again before they have all gone!"

Thus speaking, the old man, in a devious, uncertain kind of way, made his way along the aisle of the church.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SPECTRE HORSEMAN UNRAVELLED TO DICK'S UNQUALIFIED SATISFACTION.

A FEELING of mingled curiosity and interest to know what errand it was that at that unusual hour brought Mr. Solomon Goggs to the church took possession of Turpin's mind, and he waited very patiently to find out what it was.

Judging, however, that if he occupied his present position in front of the organ he would run a great risk of being discovered, he took the opportunity, while Mr. Goggs was busily moving the bench, and talking to himself, to step round to the right-hand side of the gallery, which happened to be shrouded in deep shadow, for the moon was not shining quite straight into the church, but rather obliquely; consequently, one side of the gallery was quite light, while the other was in darkness that seemed all the greater by the contrast it presented to the other. Here Turpin felt he was secure from discovery by any chance observation.

"How uncommonly bright the moon shines," continued Mr. Goggs, who was now not far from the chancel; "uncommonly bright it shines. Ha! ha! that's a good line—a musical line—ha! ha! Uncommonly bright, uncommonly bright, uncommonly bright it shines!"

Mr. Goggs, the beadle, chaunted the words to the tune of some pothouse ditty with which he was doubtless familiar. He ended with quite a loud "shines," which, in the stillness of the church, he considered came with a capital effect.

"Bravo! now, there's a stave! I wonder where anyone else is to be found, of my time of life, who could come that sort of thing. Uncom—uncom—uncommonly bright it shines! I am decidedly in voice to-night, and that makes the shame all the greater that I should have to leave my friends."

"He seems a nice sort of article," said Turpin, to himself. "I must certainly wait until I know what he is going to do. I have a presentiment that it will be something worth hearing. Hark!"

Mr. Solomon Goggs was speaking again.

"What's the good, too, I should like to know, of sending me here on such a bright night as this to light up the church? No good at all. No one would be able to see them, the moon shines so. I suppose, as it's no sort of concern of mine, I may as well light them."

With a tremulous hand, Mr. Goggs began to light, with a lamp which he carried with him, a number of tall wax candles on the altar. As he said, it did seem useless to light them, for the rays of the moon quenched them utterly.

It took Mr. Goggs some time to accomplish his task, and he kept muttering and grumbling all the while.

"I have no patience with such humbug, not I; why the deuce could not they come at a respectable hour, and not when the church ought to be left entirely to—ahem! those individuals who live underneath it!"

"Hang it! why don't he say what it is that has brought him here?" said Turpin, impatiently, "and not keep gabbling like that. I suppose if I want to gratify my curiosity I must wait."

"There, now," said Mr. Goggs, with an air of satisfaction, as the last candle took light,—"there now, that's all right, and I suppose they will be here directly, and I shall just have the place ready when they come."

Mr. Goggs now proceeded to dust and arrange some cushions, and this job seemed to require all his breath, for he did not utter a word while he was doing it.

"Ah!" he sighed, as he rose up and straightened his back, "that's done. It kill's me a'most to knock them cushions about. I'll take a walk down to the door and see if they are on their way."

"The deuce take it!" said Turpin, as the beadle tottered down the aisle, "why don't he say who's coming? I almost fancy, from his preparations, it's only going to be a marriage, and yet who can it be at this hour in this out-of-the way place? There's something mysterious in it, that's certain, and I will stay to see it out."

At this moment, Mr. Goggs opened the church-door to have a look out, and, as soon as he did so, the grating of carriage-wheels reached Turpin's ears.

He leaned over the balcony of the gallery and tried to see who was coming. He was unable to account for the intense curiosity he felt.

The grating of the wheels ceased.

Then there was a murmur of voices, and a party of five immediately entered the church.

The first who made his way up the aisle was attired in clerical robes, and, by the pure light which streamed in, Turpin could perceive he possessed a remarkable, oily-looking countenance, and a portly body to correspond.

Next came two persons, and these, in a moment, riveted the whole of his attention.

They were male and female.

The former was a fair-haired, good-enough-looking young man, though many would have been displeased with several traits in his physiognomy if they had been considered apart; but in their entirety they would, by any but a very keen observer, have been passed over unnoticed.

He was bareheaded, so Dick had a good opportunity of studying his features; not, however, that he did so particularly, for he had recognised him at the first glance.

It was the afterwards Earl of Bristol, though at that time the chances of his succeeding to the title were very remote, and he was known only as the Honourable Mr. Hervey.

With an increasing interest, Turpin turned his gaze upon the fair companion at his side, but she was shrouded from head to foot in a rich white lace veil, so he was unable to see her countenance.

From her form and carriage there could not be the slightest doubt that she was both young and beautiful.

Behind them, again, were two females, one of whom walked a step or two in advance of the other, as if to show, even in God's temple, where all should surely be alike, that she who followed was an inferior.

Neither of these where known to Turpin.

The rear was brought up by Mr. Solomon Goggs, the beadle, who seemed to have shaken off a great deal of his intoxication, for he walked along in a very pompous manner indeed.

The minister opened the little gate in the iron railings in front of the communion-table, and stepped into the enclosure.

The Hon. Mr. Hervey and his companion knelt down on the cushions, which had nearly broken the back of Mr. Goggs to dust and ashes.

The two females stood a little on one side, and spoke together in a whisper.

Mr. Goggs, from some safe corner where he had placed it, took a long black staff, with a formidable gilt affair on the top, with the sight whereof on a Sunday morning he was wont to strike terror to the souls of the charity children in the back seats in the gallery.

"It's going to be a marriage," thought Turpin, "that's evident enough. But what in the world can be Mr. Hervey's motive for coming here in the dead of night to be married? There's something wrong going on, I know! I wish I could see the bride's face!"

Never did a wish meet with a speedier gratification than this did; for no sooner were the words out of his mouth than the prospective bride raised her hands, and threw the large white veil off her face.

A very beautiful countenance was then revealed. Full of gaiety and sparkling vivacity it doubtless, from its configuration, generally was, but now the cheeks were wet with tears.

But if Turpin's surprise was great upon seeing Mr. Hervey, it was a thousand times increased when the bright moonbeams fell upon this fair face. He recognised it instantly, for he had seen it many times, and it had never failed to call forth his greatest admiration.

Her name sprang involuntarily to his lips.

"Elizabeth Chudleigh!"

This extraordinary woman, who was afterwards so notorious as the Duchess of Kingston, was at this time occupying the position of maid of honour to the Princess of Wales—the mother of George III.—and had already, by her levity and intrigues, created an unenviable reputation.

But that she should be thus about to pledge herself to the gentleman by her side filled Turpin with astonishment, for popular rumour said she was betrothed to the Duke of Devonshire, who was then travelling on the continent.

His speculations were interrupted by the minister commencing the ceremony.

As it proceeded the maid of honour became violently agitated, and she who stood behind her with the domestic stepped forward, and, placing her hand upon her shoulder, whispered a few words in her ear.

She shuddered, and became calm.

In thick, unctuous tones, the minister went on reading the service.

At length he came to that portion where the bridegroom has to place the wedding-ring upon the finger of the bride. She refused to hold out her hand.

A look of the greatest conceivable vexation crossed Mr. Hervey's face, and, seizing her by the wrist, he forced the ring upon her finger.

The clergyman pretended to take no notice of the circumstance.

Again a few words were spoken to the bride by the female, who possessed apparently much power over her, but this time in a louder tone.

Dick strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, but he could not catch their import.

They appeared, however, to have their due effect, for the maid of honour—now in name only—ceased her struggles, and resigned herself to her fate.

The ceremony was completed, and the bride and bridegroom rose to their feet.

The former was very pale.

"What secret agency," asked Dick of himself, "can be at work? What power is it that woman possesses to cause this girl to do that which I am certain her heart does not approve? She loathes this man! I can see it in her countenance! However, I cannot interfere, and, even if I could, it is now too late!"

Mr. Hervey took the hand of his young bride, and, having kissed it, placed it beneath his arm.

The whole party then proceeded, headed by the beadle and his staff, to the vestry of the church, the door of which, as soon as they had passed through it, closed after them with a bang.

CHAPTER XVIII.

DICK SETS OUT FOR LONDON IN SEARCH OF BLACK BESS, AND HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE.

"Now this," said Dick, as he rose from his seat and gave himself a good shake; "now this is a little affair which, although there does not seem to be an opportunity at the present, I shall try my best to unravel. It has in it every element of the mysterious; besides which, I feel a very warm interest in this young wife, and it will go hard if we do not become better acquainted than we are at present. Who knows my unsuspected presence at this secret marriage? and my being a witness of it may be a circumstance that will, perhaps, some day turn out to my advantage?"

By the time Turpin had finished these reflections the vestry door was opened, and the little party again made their way into the church.

They did not pause, however, but went straight to the entrance and departed.

The clergyman and the beadle remained upon the threshold.

Turpin heard the grating of the wheels of the vehicles along the gravelled avenue.

"They're gone," said Mr. Goggs.

"Sir?" said the parson, "did my hearing deceive me, or were those words addressed to me?"

"I humbly begs your honour's worship's pardon, sir," replied Mr. Goggs, in a cringing tone. "Very humbly begs it."

The parson put on an air of importance.

"You should bear in mind, Mr. Goggs," he said, pomposely, "that there is a certain amount of proper deference due from you to me."

"I humbly is aware of that, your worship. I merely ventured to remark, or rather to make the observation, that our late honoured and respected bridal party had gone."

"It was a piece of unwarrantable presumption upon your part, Mr. Goggs."

"Oh! your worship!"

"A man, Mr. Goggs, who has filled under me the posts or duties of beadle and sexton for so many years as you have ought to know better than make such a disrespectful assertion!"

"Yes, your worship."

"You should never assert anything to me as a fact, Mr. Goggs, if you are ever so assured of it; but you may venture, in a proper sort of way, to mildly suggest anything to me, but nothing more!"

"Very good, your worship."

"Now put out the candles, Mr. Goggs, and then lock up the church."

"I will, your honour's most respectful worship. Good-night, your worship!"

"Good-night, Goggs! good-night!"

"Him be hanged!" growled the beadle, as he turned and came up the aisle. "'Good-night, Goggs!' forsooth! Why don't he set me the example of being so d——d respectful?"

"That's just what I should like to know, old fellow!" said Turpin, as he leaned over the gallery, and looked with a quizzical expression into the face of Mr. Goggs.

We really wish we could convey a proper idea of the look of blank astonishment that overspread the beadle's face as the unexpected sound of a human voice fell upon his ear. He glared all round with wide open mouth and eyes.

"Don't be afraid: it's all right!" said Turpin.

As he spoke he got upon the edge of the gallery, and jumped into the pulpit, which was but a foot or two below him.

"The devil! the devil!" screamed Mr. Goggs, in an agony of fear. "Help! help! Murder! murder!"

In some inexplicable way he seemed to roll down the aisle, and out of the front door of the church in a moment.

Turpin roared with laughter as he descended the pulpit stairs.

When he reached the door the beadle was quite out of sight.

"I fancy I have disturbed his nervous system a little, and given him a fright that he won't get over yet a bit. I shouldn't wonder, though, if he don't arouse some one and come back, so I had better make myself scarce."

Turpin sauntered down the gravel path towards the turnstile.

He paused for a moment with his hand upon one of its crossbars.

"How am I to get Bess?" he asked himself.

could not help it, and yet I wish I had not left her behind. I suppose the only thing I can do is to make my way back to London with the least possible delay, and in the best way I can."

No living moving thing was in sight as he directed his steps down the green leafy lane into the high road.

"It surely must be near day break," said Turpin, as he looked up at the sky, "and yet I see no light in the east. I suppose it is because the moon shines so brilliantly."

He walked rapidly along the highway in the direction of London, and after proceeding rather more than a mile saw something which filled him with pleasure.

It was a waggon, drawn by a team of horses, creeping slowly up a hill.

"That's the ticket," said Turpin, as he changed his walk to a run. "I will try if I cannot ride the rest of the way to town."

Turpin gained very rapidly upon the waggon, and overtook it just as the driver came to a halt about half way up the hill.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE OFFICERS SURROUND THE MARKET WAGGON, AND MAKE TURPIN A PRISONER.

"Hoy!" shouted Turpin.

"Well, what now?" asked the driver, who seemed only partially awake.

"You're on your way to London, ain't you?"

"What if I be?"

"Don't be surly—I know you are. I want you to give me a lift."

The man roused up a little on hearing this, and from his very high seat looked down curiously upon Turpin.

"I don't mind if I do give you a lift," he said, after a few minutes' observation.

"All right."

"That is," he added, "if you don't mind riding a-top of the carrots and turnips, and standing some beer as soon as we reach the 'Red Cow' at Acton."

"With all my heart. How far is it?"

"Well, maybe it's a matter of four miles."

"No more?"

"No. Climb up, I mon't wait."

With a little difficulty Turpin climbed up on to the top of the waggon. It was one of those huge, clumsy conveyances, drawn by five powerful horses, which, by an early riser, are still to be seen crawling every morning into Covent-garden market.

Turpin found himself on a not very soft place to sit down upon, and about fourteen feet from the ground.

As soon as he had settled himself a little the driver addressed some words to his horses in a language which was quite unintelligible to Turpin, but apparently not so to the horses, for they shook their heads, causing the bells on their harness to tinkle, and began to descend the hill.

Turpin soon found his most comfortable position was a recumbent one, so he adopted it, resting his head on his elbow.

"You are out uncommonly early," he said to the countryman, for Turpin was one who could never remain in anybody's company long without beginning a conversation of some sort. "have you come far?"

"Just t'other side Uxbridge; that's all."

"Going to market, I suppose?"

"I be."

"What time is it?"

"Not much arter three. Kim up!"

"Three! Is it possible you get to market so early? You must start overnight."

"I be very late this morning. I shall be one o' the last in. Some'll have been there four hours before me."

"Indeed!"

"Them as comes fust gets rid o' their load fust, and gets the best price for it."

"Oh! that's it, is it?"

"Yes, it be."

"So you all try how soon you can get there?"

"We does."

"Then how is it you are so late this morning?"

"Why you see, it was through a accident. There's a very narrow gate leading from our farm into the road, as is barely wide enough to let this waggon through."

Turpin could hardly help laughing at the idea of calling it a narrow gate that would allow such a monstrous four-wheeled affair to pass through; but the man was right enough: he spoke comparatively, and all things are big or little, wide or narrow, by comparison.

"Well, what then?" he asked.

"Why there was a brick's end or summat lying in the way, and I was just guiding the team through the gate, when the darned thing turned the fore-wheel a bit aside, and bump against the post it went, and off came the hind one."

"That was a misfortune."

"But that ain't the worst part of it."

"No?"

"No. In consekence of the wheel coming off the waggon upset, and out came all the carrots and turnips. Warn't old Gripps just savagerous."

"Who?"

"Old Gripps; that's my gaffer, and him as owns the farm."

"Oh, I see!"

"He came down like a roaring bull, and didn't he set on to I? But 'twarn't my fault, I couldn't help it."

"Put you put matters all right?"

"Oh! yes; we put on a new wheel, and loaded the waggon again; but it took above five hours altogether."

"And you will lose the sale for a great deal of your stuff?"

"Oh! I don't know for that, but I sha'n't get such a good price as I ought."

In such rude talk as this Dick whiled away the time which otherwise would have passed very slowly, and he was quite surprised when the driver said:

"We're at Acton now, and yonder by the roadside you can see the truss of straw hanging outside the 'Red Cow.'"

"Oh! is that it? There seems a good many horses and men about."

"Yes, sure to be. Some'll be going to market, but more coming back, and we always stop for a little while both going and coming, so on market days they do a little trade."

"They must do."

As they approached the old inn, the bustle became greater and greater, and the road was quite choked up with vehicles.

The driver who had given Dick a lift was obliged to draw up fifty yards or so from the inn door.

"Now, my friend," said Turpin, as the man prepared to alight, "I don't want to come down and enter the inn with you, but here is half-a-crown, and you can get what you like for yourself."

"Thank your honour," he said, holding out his hand.

Turpin placed the coin within it.

The driver looked very closely and earnestly into Turpin's face as he did so, and then by the exercise of great gymnastic skill got down off his seat.

Dick laid still closer down upon the vegetables, for he by no means wished to court observation.

No thought of the danger which menanced him entered his mind, and as he laid down and looked up at the sky, he fell into a deep reverie.

We will return to the driver.

As soon as he found his feet touch the earth, he cast one anxious glance up at the top of his waggon, and then made his way as quickly as he could towards the "Red Cow."

His purpose he no doubt considered a vitally important one.

He had recognised Turpin, for he had once before had a good look at him as the highwayman stood at an inn door.

The first glance which he gave when Turpin asked for a lift, was sufficient to assure him of his identity, for the man possessed the by no means uncommon faculty of immediately recognising anyone he had once seen.

When, however, Turpin placed the money in his hand, their faces were close together, and he had an opportunity of scrutinizing Dick's closely, which confirmed him in his recognition. He was quite sure he was not mistaken.

There was a great number of people standing round the front door of the "Red Cow," drinking and making an early breakfast, and he was rather at a loss how to proceed.

He knew what a large amount was offered for Turpin a apprehension—a fortune for a man of his position; and, of course, he naturally enough wished to obtain as large a share of it himself as he possibly could.

It was in this way the large rewards offered for the simple apprehension of a criminal in those days defeated their own object, for it made people think just as the driver of the market-waggon did.

At length, after some moments' cogitation, finding himself just as undecided as he was before, he resolved to take the landlord of the "Red Cow" into his confidence, and be guided by him as to what he ought to do.

He was impelled to this course by the conviction that he had no time to lose, for if he was absent many moments the highwayman's suspicions would be aroused, and then the large sum of money would slip through his fingers.

Like most of those persons who are slow to come to a decision, the driver was in a violent hurry to act upon it as soon as it was made, and he hastened down the passage towards the bar with the dread at his heart that he should be too late.

His spirits sank to zero when he saw the landlord wholly intent upon serving his customers, whom, however, he could not supply fast enough, for many were clamouring loudly for refreshment.

It did not require a second glance to show him the hopelessness of being able to ask the landlord's advice, so he was again thrown upon his own resources.

He was beginning to despair, when he noticed for the first time that among those who were standing at the bar were four or five London police-officers.

He considered their presence as something providential.

With the manner of a perfect maniac, he made a rush at the police-officer who was nearest to him, and, seizing him by the collar, began to drag him along the passage of the inn.

The driver was a tall, robust fellow, strong enough to pick up an ox and carry it in his arms; so he had the police-officer, who happened to be the smallest of the lot, out into the yard in front of the inn in a twinkling.

The others set down their glasses, and followed them with wonder in their looks.

The driver was a little out of breath—not with exertion, but excitement; and when he had got the officer outside, he could not speak, but kept opening and shutting his mouth in a most extraordinary manner.

The officer felt convinced he was in the clutches of a madman, and he shouted for help.

The others sprang forward to his rescue.

"Reward!" gasped the driver.

The officers pricked up their ears, and thought they had, perhaps, got hold of a good thing.

The one in command, and who was a purple-faced, apoplectic-looking man, with a temper as short as his neck, no sooner heard the driver pronounce the word "reward," than he seized him by the neck, and, in the strength which passion for a moment gave him, shook him to and fro.

"Speak out, you dolt!" he cried. "Make haste! What have you got to say?"

It was a fatal course to pursue, if he wished to elicit any information.

"Reward!" was all the countryman could utter, but he pointed in the direction of the waggon. As, however, there were at least a dozen standing about, the officers were not much wiser.

"Reward for what?" they cried, while the purple-faced man looked as though he meditated a second attack.

"Thousand pounds!" said the driver.

"Dick Turpin it is!" they exclaimed. "He has caught him, and wants the reward!"

The driver nodded his head rapidly.

He did not see the sly wink the officers gave their companions, or he would have sunk to the ground in dismay. It was so dreadfully expressive.

"Where is he? Show him to us, and you shall have the reward!"

"He's lying down on the top of my waggon o' turnips. Come along; I'll show him to you."

They obeyed with alacrity, and the officer with the purple face, as he passed the front door of the inn, shouted, as loud as he could—

"Let those who wish to earn five pounds in the next five minutes follow me!"

It was ludicrous to see with what haste those who were drinking put down their glasses and made a rush out of the door of the inn.

The bar was vacant in an instant.

Then, seeing the officers a few yards off running with all their might, they hurried after them as fast as their legs would carry them over the ground.

CHAPTER XX.

DICK TURPIN HAS A VERY UNCOMFORTABLE JOURNEY TO LONDON IN COMPANY WITH THE POLICE.

In the meantime, Turpin lay placidly enough on his rather hard bed of vegetables.

Strange to say, he felt perfectly secure, and no thought of danger entered his head for a moment.

His mind was filled with the image of the fair Elizabeth Chudleigh, whose marriage he had seen solemnized under such peculiar circumstances, and so much did the subject engross his attention, that the hubbub which had taken place in the inn-yard had failed to rouse him, and it was not until the officers actually reached the waggon that he was aware of the peril in which he was placed.

He recovered, though, in a moment the use of his thoughts and limbs, and he sprang to his feet instantly.

He saw at a glance he was taken, and that, unless something most miraculous occurred, there was not the slightest possibility of his making his escape.

"Give in, give in at once, Dick!" shouted the officer with the purple face. "It's all up with you! You're done as brown as a hammer! We mean to take you; alive, if we can—if not, why dead, of course!"

He very coolly cocked a pistol as he spoke, and presented it full at Turpin.

The highwayman's position could scarcely, by any possibility, have been worse than it was. Perched up fourteen feet from the ground, and on top of objects that would impede his descent, and surrounded on every side by foes—for those who had left their drink at the bar in obedience to the police-officer's summons had placed themselves all round in a circle—all retreat was absolutely cut off; for, though these men were not armed, yet, as soon as he began to descend by the waggon, their numbers were so great, that they would have closed round him and overpowered him immediately.

Situated, too, as he was, he had no means of making an effective attack upon his foes.

"Come down, Turpin!" said the purple-faced officer again. "Come down, my boy, and give in handsomely! It's no good you getting up a row! You have led me a nice dance to-night, and how you came to be on top of this waggon I can't conceive, for I chased you as far as this in the direction of London."

Turpin smiled. It was, doubtless, his double to whom he alluded.

Still he showed no signs of complying with the officer's very polite request, who began, therefore, to grow more purple than usual in the face as his impatience increased.

"Up with you!" he shouted to his men. "Climb up on the waggon and make him your prisoner, since he's fool enough not to come down!"

With a readiness and courage which certainly did them credit, the officers sprang forward at the word, and began to climb up the ropes by which the vegetables were secured to the waggon, in a very reckless manner.

Turpin's position was getting critical.

He looked about among the turnips in the hope of finding a pitchfork, which, of course, in the hands of a desperate man, would be a most dangerous weapon, but there was not one.

In fact, there was nothing whatever on the top, with the exception of two beams of wood, the use of which he could not conjecture, but these were too heavy for him to wield.

The heads of the officers just appeared above the bunches of turnips.

"This will never do," said Dick. "Ah! why didn't I think of that before?"

The waggon was a trifle nearer one side of the road than the other, and over the hedgerow Dick could see an extensive meadow.

If it had been soil, it would have been risking life and limb to have jumped it, but he noticed that just on the other side of the hedge a quantity of loose rubbish had been heaped up, doubtless for the purpose of burning, and when he saw this the idea occurred to him of jumping from the top of the waggon upon it and then trusting to his luck.

Just as the first officer crawled on to the top of the waggon, Dick gave a spring, and in an instant alighted on the heap of rubbish.

The shock was very great, and Turpin felt as if all the breath had been suddenly knocked ont of his body, and he was a moment or so before he could rise.

That brief interval of time was fatal to him.

The officer was, of course, much surprised to see Turpin make such a flying leap, but with praiseworthy bravery he followed his example.

Turpin was just getting up, when he was prostrated again with great violence by this officer falling upon him.

The concussion almost deprived him of consciousness, but he still retained sufficient of his senses to feel himself clutched round the throat by no gentle hand.

Then a desperate struggle ensued.

The odds were fearfully against Turpin, but he fought bravely.

In a moment or two, and before he could free himself from his foe, the other officers and the market-waggoners had run a little way down the road, and climbed over a gate, and were making towards him at full speed.

They cast themselves bodily upon the combatants.

The officer with the remarkable purple visage was overjoyed, and he danced about in a most extraordinary manner in token of his satisfaction.

"Hurrah! Bravo! Nabbed at last! I knew I should have him! A thousand pounds, too! What a glorious sum! Pity it's got to be shared amongst so many!"

A cloud obscured the sunshine of his joy as this reflection crossed him, and he ceased his triumphal dance abruptly.

He began to rack his brain to devise some scheme for appropriating to himself the greatest part of the money.

Bleeding, bruised, and exhausted, Turpin was raised to a standing posture.

A dozen hands grasped each of his arms, and a pair of handcuffs were locked upon his wrists.

The redoubtable highwayman was a prisoner.

He was judged, however, to be not sufficiently secure, so a piece of strong cord was passed through his elbows, and then drawn tight behind him.

The position of his arms thus pinioned gave him intolerable pain, but he scorned either by word or gesture to make his captors aware of the fact.

The probability is, if he had, that any remonstrance from him on such a subject would meet with nothing but derision.

He was deprived of all means of effectual resistance, so, instead of further exhausting himself, and furnishing his foes with a pretext for additional ill-usage, he to all appearance quietly resigned himself to his fate.

We have said to all appearance, for though he was outwardly calm, his heart was burning against the waggoner who had so treacherously betrayed him.

Those who had succeeded in capturing him stood round in a dense crowd.

"Bring him along!" said the chief officer. "Bring him along! He shall be found in lodgings for a few days!"

As he spoke he led the way across the field, through the gate along the road, and to the "Red Cow" inn.

He was followed by his well-escorted prisoner.

All halted when they reached the inn yard.

"Fetch out the horses, Perkins," cried the chief officer. "They are already saddled and bridled, so look sharp!"

"All right, sir," said Perkins, as he disappeared into the stables.

The treacherous waggoner kept close to Dick. In his eyes he was the representative of so many guineas, and he was unwilling to trust him out of his sight.

One of the officers drew near to his chief, and spoke to him in a whisper.

"Mr. Wriggles," he said. "Mr. Wriggles."

"Well, Instone, what is it? Speak low."

This was said in quite a condescending way, so the officer who had been named Instone felt emboldened in what he was going to say.

"I hope you'll excuse me, Mr. Wriggles, but I don't like the idea of having to share the reward with all these country bumpkins"——

"Especially after the trouble we had in the kitchen at St. Giles's, and riding for hours all over the country."

"The idea is outrageous in the extreme, in my humble opinion, Mr. Wriggles."

"And mine, too, Instone."

"Well, sir, I wanted to ask you if we couldn't get out of it in some way?"

"I should like, but I don't see how it's to be done."

"Nor I! And yet"——

"Can't you suggest anything?"

"Well, no, without we fobbed them off with a promise, and then crept out of performing it in the best way we could."

"If nothing better can be thought of, we must do that. The greater part of them, if not all, have been up to London, and are on their way home, so we shall not have very much trouble with them; but, as for this waggoner who put us down on the job, why he appears to be going to London with his load, and if so we shall have a bother to do him."

"So I think, Mr. Wriggles. Just look how he watches Dick. Talk of a cat watching a mouse, why it's nothing to it."

"Nothing, as you say. Oh! here comes Perkins."

As he spoke Perkins and the ostler came out of the stable with five horses ready equipped for the road.

The poor animals, though, looked dreadfully fatigued, and it was quite evident the officers' journey to London would not be a very rapid one.

"Now, Perkins!" shouted Mr. Wriggles. "Make haste, you've been a long while fetching them."

"I know that, but I couldn't help it. The poor 'osses is so tired, I could not persuade them to get up nohow."

"Never mind! Mount! You, Instone, take the prisoner behind you. Your horse must carry double for a bit, and then we will change, and take it in turns all the way."

"Very good, sir."

Dick Turpin was raised and seated in the saddle.

Already had a plan of escape matured itself in his mind, and any resistance just then would only have had the effect of destroying it, so he suffered them to do with him as they pleased.

The men, however, were evidently prepared for a desperate struggle, and were somewhat surprised at the tameness with which he submitted to his fate.

Mr. Wriggles was well pleased to observe it, for he had rather an exaggerated idea of Dick's powers of mischief, but he did not attribute the highwayman's quiet behaviour to its real cause.

"My friends," he said to the people in the inn-yard, as he got on the back of his own steed and took his place at the head of the little cavalcade, "I promised those who assisted me five pounds a-piece for doing so."

"You did—you did!" they cried, crowding eagerly around him.

"Well, I spoke on behalf of the Secretary of State. Of course, I have not the hundred pounds or so that would be required to satisfy you in my possession now, but if you will call on the Secretary of State any morning at ten o'clock the money will be paid."

There was a look of blank disappointment upon the faces of those who, for purely mercenary motives, were so ready to lend their aid to capture Turpin. None of them seemed to like the idea of waiting upon the Secretary of State.

Murmurs of dissatisfaction arose.

"It's no good grumbling at me, my friends," said Mr. Wriggles. "You were in duty bound, without the offer of money, to lend your assistance towards making this man a prisoner, and all I have got to say is, that those who do not like to go to the Secretary of State for their five pounds must go without having them."

Turpin had scarcely anticipated this, and it, to some extent, disturbed the plans he had already made; but of course he could not let so favourable an opportunity go by without making an effort to turn it to his advantage.

He turned towards the people, and spoke rapidly:

"It's all humbug what he has been telling you. Don't believe it. He has no authority to make such a statement respecting the Secretary of State, and you would only get laughed at by the officials if you went there on such an errand. The officers here want to do you out of your share of the reward and pocket it all themselves. Set upon them; they deserve it for their duplicity. Free me from them, and I will give you every one not five pounds each, but ten, and that upon the spot. Now then, what do you say? Dick Turpin was never yet known to break his word. Set me free!"

Absolute passion prevented Mr. Wriggles from interrupting Dick in making this speech. He tried to give some orders to his men, but his mouth only opened, while his countenance changed from red to purple, and then from purple to black.

He was in imminent danger of strangulation when Dick finished, but then he recovered his voice.

"Gag him! knock him down! kill him!" he shrieked. "Don't let him utter another word!"

Dick just had time to say—

"Set me free, friends all, and I will keep my word," when a twisted handkerchief was thrown across his mouth and tied tightly at the back of his head.

"Hear, hear!" shouted several of the throng. "Set him free! set him free! We can trust to his word, but we can't to the officers'. They have deceived us already. Down with them!"

The whole of the crowd seemed to be unanimous upon this point, for, while these words were yet upon their lips, they made a rush upon the officers, who were scarcely prepared to resist them.

The numbers of their opponents were four to one, and, though they were armed and mounted, they stood but a poor chance.

Dick felt himself seized and dragged off his horse in a moment, and the gag removed from his mouth.

"Cut the cord behind me!" he cried, as he found his feet touch the ground, "and then I will assist you."

It was done instantly.

Then there were the handcuffs, which he had forgotten; but by this time the whole of the officers had been pulled off their horses, and were held firmly upon the ground.

The victory was complete.

It was an easy-enough matter to take a key out of one of their pockets and unlock the handcuffs.

Dick was once more a free man.

"Thanks for your service, my friends!" he shouted; "I will keep my word; you shall have the money I have promised, and as much over as I have got; but first let us punish these cowardly redbreasts."

"Bravo! bravo! We will! we will!"

"Then fetch as much rope as you can."

Two or three set off, and returned with a quantity of thick rope, which they had got out of their waggons.

"Now," said Turpin, naturally assuming the command, "tie them in twos, back to back."

This manœuvre was quickly executed, and then they found, of course, they had one officer over, for there were five in all.

"Tie him to the waggoner who betrayed me," said Turpin.

In spite of his protestations and desperate resistance, this was done.

They were all quite harmless and helpless.

"Now, I further propose," said Dick, "that we lift them up just as they are, and put them on their horses' backs, and start them off to London."

This was a proposition which rather tickled the fancy of the countrymen; so laughing heartily, they proceeded to put it into execution.

The officers cursed, swore, and threatened.

No heed was paid to them whatever, and they were tied on their horses' backs.

"Good-bye, Mr. Wriggles," said Dick, as he struck the horse upon which that functionary was placed a sharp blow on the flank, causing the jaded creature to set off at a trot; "good-bye—a pleasant journey to you."

The men sent the others off also, and away they went along the high road towards London, screaming out oaths and volleys of abuse the while.

CHAPTER XXI.

TURPIN FINDS HIS PURSE EXHAUSTED, AND RESOLVES TO REPLENISH IT BY STOPPING THE WESTERN COACH, IN WHICH ENTERPRISE TOM KING RENDERS HIM ESSENTIAL ASSISTANCE

THE countrymen and Dick watched the officers until they were out of sight, and then the latter turned round to address them.

They gave a cheer as he did so, but he held up his hands for silence.

"I cannot," he said, "say enough to you in token of my thanks for the great service you have rendered me. Believe me, I am most grateful. You have acted wisely, so far as your own interests are concerned, by freeing me, for the officers never intended to give you anything for your trouble, but merely use you as tools for their own ends. However, I will keep my word."

As he spoke, Dick put his hand into his pocket, and produced the purse he had taken from Sir Theodore Houghton.

"I offered you ten pounds a-piece," he said, "and I did not say fifteen for the sole reason that I did not know exactly how much money I had about me, and I did not like to promise more than I could perform."

"Hurrah!"

"However, here is my purse, and I intend to share it equally among you. I know there will be nothing under ten pounds a-piece. How many of you are there?"

There was a rapid counting of heads, and then a voice said:

"Twenty-two."

"Twenty-two; that will be two hundred and twenty pounds altogether. Stand forward one at a time."

The men readily came forward, for such a sum seemed a wonderful amount to them, for their week's earnings probably did not amount to as many shillings.

Turpin counted out ten guineas into the hand of every one, and then he found he had a considerable sum left.

"Stand forward again," he said; "I am never liberal by halves, and I will share my purse with you to the last guinea."

He gave them each five guineas, and then found a few remaining.

These he took in his hand, and flung them up in the air to be scrambled for when they came down.

"That will do to drink my health with," he said.

"We mun look sharp," said one, "for we shall be mun late this morning."

"Never mind that for one," said Turpin, catching one of the officer's horses by the bridle, and vaulting into the saddle. "I shall insist on your all drinking my good health for the sake of the landlord here. Farewell!"

Without then uttering another word himself, or giving those to whom he had behaved so liberally an opportunity of so doing, he clapped his spurs to the horse's flanks, which made him set forward as quickly as his tired limbs would allow.

Day was beginning to dawn, and he looked warily around him.

No one, however, was in sight, but ere he had proceeded a couple of miles, the faint sound of a horn came upon his ears.

He reined up at once.

"That is the western coach, or I am very much mistaken," he said, "and it comes most opportunely. I have cleared out my pockets, and I must fill them again somehow. I don't think my freedom very dear at the price I have paid for it, and congratulate myself for having got out of so awkward a scrape so well. Black Bess now is all I want."

A shade of anxiety came over his face as he reflected upon the great difficulty there must inevitably be in regaining possession of her, yet without her he felt he could do nothing.

He almost forgot the coach that was approaching, until another blast of the horn warned him that it would soon reach the spot on which he was standing.

"Oh! the coach. Now I'll warrant it's well loaded, and carries a good booty. It is rather daring to stop so many people at day-dawn, but Dick Turpin is just the man to do it!"

"This, though," he added, "is not at all a suitable place for the job. I am on too high ground. Now, there is a hollow a little further on, with tall trees growing thickly on both sides of the way, and which is always in shadow, even in broad daylight, so that will be the place. I will make the best of my way there."

The winding notes of the horn reached his ears for the third time as he urged his horse forward to the spot he had mentioned, and which was known on the countryside by the name of Deadman's Hollow.

At the rate Dick went he very soon reached this place.

As he had fully anticipated, he found it quite dark, and it became more and more so as he advanced.

Near the centre Deadman's Hollow was intersected by a narrow cross-country lane, and Dick considered if he backed his horse a little way into the entrance of it, he should be able to dart out and take the guard and driver by surprise.

With this intent, then, he increased his speed, and, on reaching the corner, was about to turn round, when, to his unutterable surprise, a mounted man suddenly darted out from it, and placed a pistol to his breast.

"Stand!" he cried, in just such sharp, sudden tones as Turpin himself made use of. "Your money or your life!"

For the space of about half a minute these two men looked at each other in silence.

The eyes of both had become accustomed to the deep gloom in the place, and they could see each other with perfect distinctness.

Dick saw before him his double, the spectre horseman.

There was, however, nothing spectre-like about him now. There he stood palpable enough, and the pistol that was pressed against Dick's breast had a most material feel.

Still he was not in the least alarmed, but only curious to know what should happen next, and who this person really was who resembled him so closely.

All this happened with great rapidity, and before the half-minute had expired Dick had drawn from his holsters a short-barrelled pistol, and with a speed and dexterity acquired only by long practice, clapped it to his opponent's breast, at the same time that he shouted:

"Stand yourself! Hand over all you possess, and that quickly, or you are a dead man!"

It was now the other's turn to be surprised, but he quickly recovered himself as he replied

"This is a poor jest, as you will find to your cost, Hand over!"

"Ha! ha! ha!

Dick laughed loudly—it seemed to him so excessively droll to be stopped on the highway by another.

The other made a gesture of impatience.

"I am a temperate man, and never shed blood if I can by any means avoid it, so to prevent my spilling yours, as I might have done over and over again, I say once more, hand over what valuables you may have about you!"

"I shall do no such thing," replied Dick. "Tell me, first, who you are."

"When I mention my name," said the other, "you will know better than trifle with me. It is Tom King."

"What?"

"Tom King! Deliver—deliver at once, for I cannot stay parleying like this; even now I can hear the coach entering the hollow. Hand me your purse, I say, before I am compelled to take it by force."

"I will give you my hand."

"You are a maniac, I think. I have borne with you so far, but I should advise you not to tempt your fate further!"

Dick replaced his pistol in the holster, and held out his hand.

"Tip us your mawley and let's have a grip. I can prophecy we shall be great friends."

The highwayman seemed rather surprised at Dick's coolness, and looked at him in a bewildered sort of way. He evidently knew not what to think.

But now Dick could hear that the coach was not many hundred yards distant, and as he by no means intended it should pass without paying toll, he said quickly to the highwayman:

"Give me your hand, Tommy, and don't be a fool. You know as well as I do there's no time to lose, for the coach will be here directly. I am known to you by name, I'll warrant, as you were to me, although we have never met before. I am he who is called Dick Turpin."

"I fancied as much," said Tom King, grasping Dick's hand, and pressing it warmly. "But I scarcely dared hope it to be true. This is what I have wished for many and many a time!"

"And so have I. Something seems to tell me we shall be great friends now we have met, and I hope we shall go through many an adventure with each other."

"So do I, with all my heart. We shall, at all events, have one, for here comes the coach."

"Tell me, Tom," said Dick, "did you really take up a position here to stop the coach?"

"I did; but when I heard you coming, of course I thought I would do a little business with you first."

"It is rather a remarkable circumstance, but I made my way hither for the very same purpose as yourself, and I was just about to take up a position, when you pounced out upon me."

"It is strange, indeed, but we must talk further upon the subject after the coach has passed, for here it is!"

"Agreed."

"You, then," said Tom King, "had better place yourself on the other side of the road, while I remain where I am, and we can then both ride forward and attack the coach on both sides at once."

"Bravo! that is a capital scheme. Take care of yourself."

"All right. Don't fear for me; we have stopped coaches before now single-handed, and I am sure we can do the thing well together."

"We ought to do. Hush! they are here!"

Dick, as he gave this caution to his new friend, backed his horse a little way down the lane, on the other side.

He had scarcely time to look to the priming of his pistols before the heads of the first horses appeared.

Then he darted out swiftly from his place of concealment, and catching the one nearest to him by the bridle, turned him completely round.

The other horses, of course, turned with him, so the cumbrous vehicle was brought to a standstill instantly.

At the same moment Tom King rode out from his side of the road, and cried, in a loud voice—

"Halt!"

"Then, before anyone had time to recover from their surprise, he discharged a pistol in the air.

The natural effect of these summary proceedings on the part of the two highwaymen was that all the passengers were filled with dread, and expected their last hour had come.

"If you attempt to drive on before the toll is paid you will have a bullet through your head for your trouble; but if you remain still you will come to no harm."

"In the meanwhile, Dick left the off leader's head, and repeated the same warning to the guard as Tom King had given to the driver.

The rapidity of their manœuvres, and the sternness of their tones, made all conscious that they had fallen into the hands of men who would not be trifled with; so the guard very prudently replaced his blunderbuss in the case from which he had taken it.

There then remained only the passengers to grapple with, and from none of these was any resistance worth mentioning to be anticipated.

Tom King let down the coach window at his side while he shouted to Dick—

"Keep a sharp look-out, and if anyone makes the least movement, fire! I will attend to the insides!"

When he looked in he found the coach tolerably full of passengers.

"Quick, ladies and gentlemen!" he said; "hand me your money, watches, rings, and trinkets, and don't be foolish enough to resist, for it can only have the effect of making things much worse for you in the end."

He played with a very elegantly-finished pistol while he spoke in such a careless manner that a nervous old lady in the coach gave a scream, and then went off into a fit at once.

"I would advise you to make haste, my friends, for this pistol has a strange knack of going off and shooting anyone who dallies, so I give you warning in time."

A young, and so far as Tom King could tell by the faint, uncertain light in the interior of the coach, an extremely pretty girl was seated next to the door; and when he had finished speaking, she put into his hand a very slender purse and a small locket.

"Take those, Mr. Highwayman, for I suppose you must have them," she said, in a trembling, agitated voice. "Heaven knows how ill I can afford them! Take them. I have nothing more!"

"If I do, may I be——! Never mind, my dear, keep them. I would not take anything from you but a kind word and glance for all the world. But you, sir," he added, turning to a portly man, who was seated opposite to her, "but you, sir, I can see can afford to lose a little without much inconvenience. So shell out!"

The man thus adjured, and who looked like a country gentleman, took a handful of guineas and put them into Tom's hand, as he said—

"There, take those, you vagabond, and be off, and think yourself lucky. It is not worth while, as you are armed and I am not, for me to throw away my life for the sake of a little money."

"You are a very sensible man, but I must trouble you to hand over a little more before I have done with you."

"No, let me be able to pay you the same compliment as you did me, and be satisified with what you have got from me, and levy your contributions on some of the others."

"You are a jolly good-humoured fellow," said King, "and I will follow your advice Come, sir," he added, addressing a thin, sharp-featured man, "let me trouble you next, if you please. I daresay you all know my name. It's Tom King. I never yet made a practice of ill-using those I have eased of their superfluous cash, but have simply taken what was offered me, provided it was any way reasonable."

With a groan, this man placed a guinea in Tom's hand, who turned it over and over with so comical an air that the other passengers laughed outright.

"That is all I can spare," said the thin-faced man. "Take it. I hope some day to have the pleasure of hearing you are hung!"

"Thank you."

Tom still turned the guinea over and over in his hand.

"I am getting rather impatient, so make haste!"

"I have given you all I can afford, indeed I have. I am a poor man, and money is of great value to me."

"Now that man is a humbug," said the stout gentleman, who had behaved so liberally. "I happen to know him very well. He is a maker of Brummagem buttons, and is better c with respect to money than anyone in the coach."

"Oh! indeed," said Tom King, "then I shall have to deal rather harshly with him for his deception. Now, Mr. Brummagem Buttons, I shall count three slowly, and if by that time you do not hand over every farthing you have about you, the pistol is sure to go off."

"No, no! mercy, Mr. Highwayman! Don't believe him—don't believe him! I am a poor man—a very poor man, indeed. However, I will give you a guinea more."

"One!" said Tom.

"Yes, yes! here it is. I said one, good sir—here it is."

"Two!"

"Don't go on, Mr. Rob—Highwayman, or I am a ruined man."

"Three!" said Tom; "now give me all you have, or I fire."

"Here it is; take it—take all I have and beggar me; I would rather part with my money than my life."

"You are wise to do so;" said Tom, pocketing a bag containing at least a hundred guineas; "the one you do stand a chance of replacing, but not so the other. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I have nearly enough, but it would be wrong to show any favour, so the remainder will please put their contributions in here."

He took off his hat as he spoke, and held it crown downwards in the coach.

It grew heavy in a very few moments, for all the travellers in the carriage could not but be conscious that Tom was, under the circumstances, acting in what he doubtless considered was a handsome manner.

As for Turpin, he had made good use of the time that his companion took to attend to the insides, for he had managed to collect, without much difficulty, a very respectable sum from those who rode on the top of the coach.

By the time he had finished, Tom had emptied the contents of his hat into his pocket, and, making a very graceful bow to the travellers, withdrew.

"Now, coachy," he said, "hold your hat; you have behaved very decently indeed, so here is something to drink my health with; and now drive on."

So saying, he tossed a guinea into the coachman's hat.

"Thankee, your honour," he said. "Good night. Don't forget Charley. What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander!"

He turned round, and saw the guard holding his hat in a most eloquent manner.

"Oh! you're Charley, are you. All right. You're a trump, so here's a guinea for you."

The coachman gathered up his reins, and, turning his horses' heads in the proper direction, drove off towards London.

CHAPTER XXII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS IT MORE DIFFICULT TO REGAIN POSSESSION OF BLACK BESS THAN HE ANTICIPATED.

"Well, Tom," said Dick Turpin, to his new companion, as he watched the coach disappear, "I consider we have had a very easy job."

"And so do I," replied Tom King. "Uncommon easy, and very profitable. The insides shelled out like bricks."

"Well, I didn't do amiss with the outsiders, but I vote we divide the swag when we have a better opportunity."

"We will. You see, in a very short time now it will be broad daylight, so I think it imperative we should look for some kind of shelter."

"It is imperative, Let us get on as fast as possible."

They both spurred their horses, and Deadman's Hollow was soon left behind.

"Where do you propose to go, Dick?" asked Tom King. "I know of no shelter hereabouts."

"I suppose not, for this is scarcely your locality. You are most heard of on the north road, I think."

"Yes, but I got down here a day or two ago, and something has been happening ever since to prevent my getting back."

"I have had a more than ordinary share of adventures during the last four days; but you will laugh when I tell you the circumstance."

"Indeed! What is it?"

"Well, you must first answer me a question."

"Very good; I have no objection."

"Were you anywhere near Wimbledon Common four nights ago?"

"Yes."

"Were you in a lane that goes by a cross-country cut to London?"

"I was; and while there a singular thing happened to me."

"So there did to me; but now I fancy it will not be strange much longer."

"You are making me very curious. Do not keep me any longer in suspense, I beg."

"It would tire you to tell you what happened during that eventful night; let it suffice to say I was wounded in the shoulder."

"Yes, yes."

"It was little more than a scratch, and I received it during great excitement; so I forgot all about it."

"I suppose it bled a great deal, and so prevented you feeling any pain."

"That was just it. I went riding on and on, never thinking; but all this while the blood was escaping from my shoulder at a prodigious rate; presently I began to get very weak, and shook in my saddle, while once or twice the clear, moonlit atmosphere, seemed changed to blood!"

"You must have lost a great deal of vital fluid for that symptom to show itself."

"Well, be that as it may, I felt something was the matter with my shoulder, and I put my hand to it, and found my coat was sopping wet. Upon this I took off my cravat, and bandaged up the wound, stanching the blood as well as I was able; but when I had finished I almost fell off my horse."

"It was a fortunate thing for you the officers did not show themselves just then, or it would have been all up with you."

"It would, that's certain. However, this is the strange occurrence of which I spoke."

"You have made plenty of prefatory remarks about it, so I should like to know what it was without further circumlocution."

"You shall; but I have said no more than was necessary for the comprehension of the incident; indeed, hardly enough."

"I will dispense with the remainder."

"Very well. As I lifted up my head from binding my shoulder my brain swam round and round, and I had the greatest difficulty conceivable in keeping my seat at all."

"You said that before."

"Oh! did I? I had forgotten; you shouldn't interrupt me—you put me out."

"Go on, then, your own way; but it seems to me as though you never meant to tell me what the incident really was."

"Oh! you be hanged. Don't be so impatient, we shall have plenty of time to talk."

"Will you tell me what the incident was?" asked Tom King, quite out of patience, "for I want to know where we are going to shelter."

"Don't trouble about that, but just leave it to me. I will find you a place where you will be as right as ninepence. Just listen to this mysterious incident."

"I've been doing that for the last quarter of an hour."

"Well, I didn't fall out of the saddle, but when I looked along the road, although my eyes were dim and my head spinning like a top, I saw something misty and shadowy approaching."

"You fancy it looked misty, but I fancy the mist was nowhere but in your own eyes."

"Very likely; but I tell you I saw something shadowy-like, and in a moment or so it took the form of a horse and rider."

"Yes; what was there wonderful in that?"

"I'll tell you. The moon was shining with unusual brightness, and when I looked closer I saw this rider was attired and mounted exactly like myself. The features, too, were just the same."

"Nonsense!"

"I fancied so, at any rate, and I believe they were. It was not a delusion. I am confident!"

"What became of it, then?"

"Why, it jumped over a hedge in a manner none but Black Bess could have done, and then both horse and rider galloped over the meadows and disappeared!"

There was a smile on Tom King's face, as he listened to his friend's narration

"It's very strange—very strange indeed! And you thought it something supernatural?"

"I confess I did until to-night, when something occurred to change my opinion."

"What was that, pray?"

"I was very closely pursued by the officers, but I had a chance of putting into execution a rather old ruse, but yet a generally successful one—that of dismounting and hiding behind the hedgerow, while I gave the horse a sharp cut, that made him fly along the road at a slashing pace."

"It's a very good dodge, and I have found it succeed more than once. However, go on."

"Well, then I got through a gap in the hedge, and then laid close down on the grass, while I peeped through to see what the officers would be after."

"Yes."

"They were quickly down the lane, and then they all halted, and appeared to be looking very intently at something. I followed the direction of their eyes, and there I saw the same figure as I had seen in the lane at Wimbledon three nights before."

"Didn't you think you saw your fetch?" asked King, with the same smile playing about his lips.

"I thought I saw my double, but the closer and better look I was able to have showed me it was only someone generally resembling me in appearance."

"Yes; as I might."

"Just so. I have hardly a doubt about the matter; but, quite for my own satisfaction, tell me whether you were in the lane I described, and whether you took a flying leap over the hedge into the meadows?"

"I was, my boy, and I did; and it was also me that you saw standing in the high road. Confound it! it appears I have you to thank for the chase the officers gave me, and the narrow escape I had, since they doubtless fell into the same mistake as you did, and took me to be you. It's a nice thing, upon my word! However, it don't matter, as they did not nab me."

"Well, Tom, my friend, whether you believe me or not, I can assure you it has taken a great weight off my mind. It is so much better to have a matter of that sort cleared up. It appears, however, that no slight thanks are due to you for the assistance you so unknowingly rendered me in making my escape."

"Don't mention that, I beg. Odd things do drop out, and one of the odd ones is that we have never met each other before to-night."

"It is rather singular, but we have always kept separate beats. As, though, we got on so well to-night together, I propose we enter into an alliance offensive and defensive. What do you say?"

"Why, you have just anticipated the proposition I was going to make to you myself in almost the very words you have used!"

"That's rather singular, and so it is that I should be stopped on the highway by anyone, and be told to fork over."

"Very singular, as you say."

"However," said Turpin, "I hope that a friendship so strangely began may long continue."

"And so do I, but I hope it won't end as it began."

"How do you mean?"

"At the point of a pistol!"

"No fear. What a strange idea that was! Dear me, everything seems to be strange to-night!"

"It does."

"Give me your hand again, my friend, and let us pledge ourselves to an eternal friendship."

"Agreed!" said Tom King, holding his out to his companion.

Dick shook it warmly, and holding his hand up to the sky, which was just beginning to be tinged by the rays of the rising sun, said—

"I swear, Tom, that through thick and thin I will stand by you, and prove myself your staunch friend!"

"And I also swear the same thing towards you!" said Tom King, returning the friendly pressure.

CHAPTER XXIII.

TOM DAVIS VOLUNTEERS TO GO TO LONDON FOR DICK TO TRY TO GET BLACK BESS BACK AGAIN.

A BRIEF silence followed these words, during which the two friends pressed their horses forward.

It was Tom King who spoke first.

"I am trusting altogether to you, Dick, to find a place of shelter, for, comparatively speaking, I am a stranger hereabouts."

"We shall be right enough."

"I only hope it isn't far off. Just look how fast the sun is mounting in the sky. We shall have everybody abroad directly."

"I should fancy five minutes will take us to it."

"Where is it, then, that you intend to go?"

"To the 'Hand and Keys,' close to Hornsey Wood. Do you know it?"

"I can't say that I do,"

"Nor Tom Davis, the landlord?"

"No."

"Oh! he is a first-rate fellow, and will be overjoyed at seeing you."

"Is he safe?"

"Yes; I have trusted him with my life a hundred times, and would do a hundred times more. We have been firm friends for years. Look," he added, "can you see that large, rambling, old-fashioned building yonder, standing a good way back from the road, and with a signpost on the footpath?"

"Yes."

"Well, that is the 'Hand and Keys,' so we have not far to go to get housed."

"I am glad of it. Our exploit to-night will sure to cause a great deal of commotion, and the search after us will be a warm one."

"I don't doubt that. I must say it was a most impudent thing for two men to stop a coach full of people by daylight."

"Rather!" said Tom, as he trotted, with Turpin, into the yard in front of the inn.

No one appeared to be about. The blinds were all down, and the inmates apparently one and all in deep repose.

"Get off your horse, Tom," said Dick. "I'll show you where the stable is. We'll give the cattle a feed ourselves, and by that time I daresay some of them will be up, and then we shall be able to get something to eat, for this keen morning air has made me as hungry as a hunter."

"And me. That reminds me I have been going to ask you ever so many times what has become of your famous mare, Black Bess. Is she laid up lame somewhere, that you are riding another?"

"No; but I was set on in London, and obliged to run through the streets on foot. I could not get at Black Bess, who, I hope, is safe in a stable somewhere. This is the second horse I have had to-night, or rather last night, and they are neither worth a rush. I must occupy myself to-day in devising some means of getting her back again."

By this time they reached the stable-door, but they found it fast.

"That's no consequence," said Dick. "I didn't expect to find it unlocked. Jabez sleeps up in the loft, and we shall soon wake him up."

Turpin kicked against the stable-door with the heel of his heavy jack boot.

He made a prodigious clatter.

"Cuss you all!" said a surly voice, "what do you want?"

The owner of the voice projected his head through a narrow window.

"Make haste down, Jabez!" said Turpin, as he caught sight of him.

"Make haste be hanged!" replied the ostler, and he shut the window with a bang.

Almost directly afterwards Jabez opened the door, and the two highwaymen led their horses into the stable.

"Who'd a'thought of seeing you here agin so soon, squire?" said Jabez to Turpin.

"No one, I fancy, for I didn't myself till an hour ago. I am sorry to fetch you up, but it's past sunrise."

Then, observing that Jabez looked rather curiously at Tom, Turpin hastened to add—

"This, Jabez, is a particular friend of mine, and a gentleman you will be proud to make the acquaintance of. He's a regular out-and-outer, and his name is Tom King."

"You don't say so?" replied Jabez. "I've heard of him many's the time lately. Why, they do say, squire, he's only second to you!"

"Well, Jabez," said Tom King, "you and Dick here seem to be very good friends, and I don't see why we shouldn't be, eh?"

"Certainly not, sir."

"Well, I'm particularly careful about my nag here, so pray use her well. Here's a guinea to drink my health with."

"Your honour's a perfect gentleman," said Jabez, as he consigned the coin to his breeches pocket, "and I only hopes as how we shall often have the pleasure of seeing you at the 'Hand and Keys.'"

"I have no objection to your having such a wish. However, first of all let me see how well you can fettle my nag. As for that one the squire's got, it's good for nothing, and is one he took off a police-officer."

"He! he! Off a hofficer! What a good joke! He! he! he!"

Jabez chuckled enormously as he went about his work.

"No one knows," said Turpin, "how overjoyed I shall be when I get Black Bess. I am certain no lover was ever so fond of his mistress as I am of my bonny mare. She is, beyond all question, the finest piece of horseflesh that ever existed. She is, to use a common expression, worth her weight in gold!"

"I can readily believe you are anxious to get possession of her again; I should think it went very much against the grain to leave her behind you."

"You are quite right, it did. But I could not help myself. It was an utter impossibility for me to reach her. The officers were too close after me for that."

"Well, let us hope you will soon have her back."

"I shall not be fit to undertake another adventure until I do."

"Then, if that's the case, I shall almost feel tempted to make a journey to London myself and fetch her."

"I am afraid you would stand but little chance of success, and besides which, you would be running your neck into unnecessary danger."

"Well, there would be some little risk, of course."

"My friend, do not think of it for a moment. I would never permit it, so say no more upon the subject."

"I will not, but, in the event of your getting her soon, will you allow me to give you a little advice?"

"Certainly; I hope you will never hesitate to speak to me with perfect frankness and candour."

"It is this, then. London and its vicinity is by far too hot to hold us, so I propose that we take a trip into some of the south-western counties, as being a portion of England we have neither of us visited professionally."

"The advice is good, and I will follow it the moment I have the opportunity. I am beginning to long for a change, and I fancy such a trip as you mention would be just the very thing. Why, we should have lots of first-rate adventures on the road there, and also during our stay!"

"We should, and they would have all the charm of novelty. I am glad you approve of the scheme."

"I do, most entirely. If I had my mare I would be off to-night. But come, Jabez has groomed and fed your horse, so we will try if we cannot get into the inn and have something to eat."

"I am awfully hungry," said Tom.

Arm in arm the two friends made their way to the back door of the inn.

It opened to their touch, and they found when they entered that Tom Davis was up and dressed and busy taking down the shutters.

"Good morning, Tom!" shouted Dick, as the landlord appeared with a couple of shutters on his shoulders. "How are you?"

"God bless me!" he said, almost letting fall the shutters in his surprise, "if it is not the squire back again. Come into the kitchen. I have got a good fire; you know you are always welcome."

"I know I am, and that's why I sought shelter here this morning."

The landlord hastily put down the shutters, and bustled into the kitchen.

"Now, Tom," said Dick, "before we go any farther, just allow me to introduce you to a new but very particular friend of mind, Tom King."

"Tom King!" exclaimed Davis, "is it possible? Here, give us your hand, my boy, I am heartily glad to see you!"

King bowed, and held out his hand in reply to this very cordial welcome.

"We are both tired and faint," said Dick, "for we have worked very hard, and have had nothing to eat, so we shall be glad of a little breakfast as soon as you can get it."

"It's as good as done, for I'll set about it myself at once. No, I won't, though, for here comes my wife, and, gadzooks! Ellen, too!"

"Ellen!" exclaimed Dick, in a tone of pleasure. "I had forgotten her for the moment. I shall be glad to look into her face again."

"It's a main pretty one, and no mistake, and the best thing is, too, that her goodness equals her beauty. I would not have her go away on any account, short as is the time she has been with us. I love her as much as I should if she was my own daughter. Ay, even more, for aught I know, for I question whether a daughter of mine would ever be so good as she is."

The words had scarcely left the landlord's lips, when Mrs. Davis and Ellen entered the room.

There was a wonderful difference already visible in the countenance of the young girl. Her cheeks had filled out, and her face had lost its ordinary paleness.

The greeting between her and Dick was warm indeed, and Tom King observed, with an expressive shrug—

"Oh! that's how the wind blows, is it? Well, all I can say is, I admire his taste."

His surprise was very much augmented when Dick introduced her to him, and afterwards, in a few whispered words told him what he knew of her history.

The huge table in the kitchen was quickly covered with a profusion of generous fare, and while this was in progress, Davis finished taking down the shutters.

Ten minutes more saw them all doing justice to the really excellent and tempting breakfast laid before them, to which their keen hunger imparted a pleasant relish.

CHAPTER XXVI.

CURIOSITY INDUCES TURPIN AND TOM KING TO WITNESS A CEREMONY WHICH, ALTHOUGH OBSOLETE AT THE PRESENT DAY, IS YET COUNTENANCED BY THE LAW.

"I NEVER dreamt," said Dick, as he helped himself to a huge slice of fried ham and a couple of eggs, "I never dreamt for a moment, Davis, when I parted with you on the door-step the night before last, that I should be back again so quickly. By-the-bye, how did you get on at the inquest?"

"Why, not at all."

"Not at all?"

"How should we? Why, it doesn't take place till to-day!"

"The deuce it don't! That's very awkward. I've half a mind to be off again!"

"Oh! nonsense, don't talk such rubbish. No one need know you are here unless you wish it."

"Then, that makes all the difference. I don't want to be dragged forward, I can assure you!"

"You must keep out of sight, then, or they are bound to call upon you if they have any idea you are in the neighbourhood."

"What inquest is it, Dick?" asked Tom King.

"On the body of a man who committed suicide in the bedroom upstairs."

"Good gracious! What an unpleasant thing to have happen in a house!"

"You're right enough there," said the landlord; "but it's one of those casualties you can't possibly avoid. I shall be very glad now when it's all over."

"Yes. Was there anything at all peculiar in the case?"

"There was; very peculiar indeed. In fact, it was about as tragic as anything well could be."

Dick then briefly gave an account of the circumstances attending the suicide of Simme, the steward's son, with which the reader is already familiar,

Tom king listened to the end with rapt attention.

"Wonderful!" he said. "The ends of justice are sometimes strangely worked out! I suppose there is very little doubt as to what verdict will be returned by the jury?"

"None at all, I fancy. As clear a case of felo-de-se as ever I heard of."

"Yes," added Davis; "the cross roads will be his grave, sure enough."

"Do you think they will carry out the law to the letter?" asked Tom King.

"I am certain. The matter, of course, has been well talked over in the kitchen here."

"I don't doubt that," said Dick. "The whole affair must have been a godsend in the way of gossip and speculation to the people in the village."

"I can assure you," said Tom King, "I cannot resist feeling deeply interested in it, and, for my own part, should like to be present while the inquest takes place."

"Well, there's nothing to prevent that," said the landlord. "I hardly think you are well known enough about here for you to fear recognition."

"I think not, and even if I was I would run a little risk to gratify my curiosity."

"Now the worst of it is," said Dick, "with respect to myself, that some of them would be sure to recognise me as Mr. Richards, and I should be called upon to give evidence—a thing I particularly wish to avoid, for, in coming so prominently forward, I should be sure to be detected."

"Perhaps not," said Tom King, "However, don't let me draw you into it. You make yourself snug here somewhere all day, but I shall watch the proceedings. Where is the inquest to be held, landlord?"

"In the clubroom upstairs. It has all been put ready, and I expect the coroner and jury here at eleven o'clock."

"Well, now it is only just six," said Tom King, as he glanced at the face of the old family clock which stood in a recess near the door, "so, if you like, I'll just take a few hours' rest, and if I shouldn't wake up in time for the performance, just give me a call."

All rose from the table as King uttered these words, and Turpin, taking Ellen by the hand, led her to the window, where they could converse together without being overheard.

"Well, my dear girl," said Dick, tenderly, "I know it is hardly necessary to ask you, but are you quite happy in your new home?"

"Oh! quite—quite happy; happier than I have ever in my life been before. Indeed, until I came here, I did not properly understand the meaning of the word. Davis and his wife overwhelm me with kindness."

"Then, believe me, Ellen," said Dick, "it causes me great happiness to hear you say you are so comfortable. I feel that my rescue of you from a fate worse than death itself is a good action in my life that will outweigh many of the bad ones I have done."

"Now, Dick," said Tom King, "are you coming to have an hour or two's rest, as well as myself?"

"Yes, my friend, I am weary. But I want to say a word or two to Davis here."

"All right! you can tell me as we go upstairs."

"Very good," said Dick. "It was concerning Black Bess I wished to speak."

"Black Bess! has anything happened to her?"

"Well, no hurt, I hope; but last night the officers surrounded the 'Three Tuns,' and made an attack upon it, trying very hard to make me a prisoner."

"I told you they would before you started."

"They did. However, there was a bit of a tussel, and I managed to make my escape through a window into a court, but the grabs were close behind and I had to run for my life

"Then, of course, under such circumstances, you could not get Bess out of the stable in the alley?"

"No, I could not, and there I have no doubt she is now, at least such is my hope. Now I want to get her back again, for without her I can do nothing."

"I fancy now," said Davis, "you have applied to just the right person in the scrape you have fallen into. If it wasn't for that confounded inquest, I'd start off now and fetch her; but, as it is, we must both be content to wait till it's over."

"I knew you would help me out of this difficulty," said Dick; "for of course you must know it would be utter madness for me to go and fetch her myself. The place is sure to be well watched by the officers."

'You may take your 'davy of that! But don't let the matter trouble you a moment longer. Rely upon it, I'll bring her here safe and sound!"

"Thanks! and now which is our bedroom?"

"Why, this attic. It has two beds in it, and is a tolerable size. You may make yourself safe here as long as you like."

"I can believe you, Tom Davis, for you have never deceived me yet."

"And never will," said the landlord, closing the door.

"Good morning, friends!"

"Good morning, Davis," replied the two highwaymen, throwing themselves wearily on each of the beds.

In less than five minutes they were both sound asleep, for they had undergone no slight amount of exertion during the preceding night, and were proportionably fatigued.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE BURIAL OF THE SUICIDE IN THE CROSS ROADS AT HORNSEY.

It wanted only a few minutes of eleven when Tom King opened his eyes again.

Dick was still sleeping heavily, so King rose and made a few alterations in his toilette in silence.

This was an operation that did not take him many moments to perform, and he was soon making his way downstairs.

He met the landlord upon the landing.

"I was just coming up to call you," he said.

"Oh! were you? Then you are a day after the fair."

"So it seems. The jury have begun to arrive."

"Have they?"

"Yes. Soon, is it not?"

"Very soon."

"The fact is, they are as impatiently curious as you are."

"The inquest, then, will begin punctually at eleven?"

"I'll warrant you, not a minute later."

"So much the better. I shan't get tired of waiting."

The speakers rapidly descended the stairs, and then Davis, pushing open a door, ushered Tom into the clubroom.

It was quite full of people, and at least ten of the jury were seated at the table, so Tom King's entrance caused no particular notice.

Scarcely, however, had he time to note the general aspect of the room, when the coroner and the remaining jurymen arrived.

Then followed the swearing-in ceremony, after which they all adjourned to view the body.

But, however full of interest the proceedings might be to Tom King, we think it hardly worth while to describe them in detail, especially when the purpose can be answered in a few words.

The coroner and the jury, then, were about as obstinate and thickheaded—the beadle as pompous—the medical officer as elaborate as they generally are under such circumstances.

On returning to their seats, the inquiry was commenced; but there was so little evidence, and that so much to the point, that when it was given, the jury required, or at all events took very few minutes to decide, and a verdict of Felo-de-se was returned, which was just what everyone had made up their minds to all along.

The poor wretch, who certainly might have been consigned to the tomb without such an indignity being wreaked upon his mangled remains, was, in pursuance of a barbarous law, which is still in force, though rarely if ever put into execution at the present time, sentenced to be buried in the centre where four roads meet, and a stake to be driven through his breast.

Even at that time the sentence began to excite abhorrence, but as it was not often a case occurred, the feeling most generally elicited was that morbid curiosity for the horrible which is to a certain extent inherent in every breast.

[THE YOUNG PRETENDER HAS A SWORD COMBAT WITH TOM KING.]

The inquest was over shortly after midday, and the burial was ordered to take place at midnight.

It was a good day for Davis, so far as the consumption of eatables and drinkables was concerned.

Tom found he was as busy as possible in the bar; so, without showing himself, he went upstairs to his attic.

"I wonder how long Turpin is going to sleep," he said. "One would think, to look at and hear him, that he had not been to bed for a month!"

Dick was, indeed, sleeping soundly; but that was a circumstance little to be wondered at, considering all that he had gone through.

"Well," continued King, as he threw himself again upon the other bed, "I suppose it is best, for he will wake up fresh and vigorous, and ready for anything."

Three hours afterwards the landlord entered the room, and finding both his guests asleep, awoke them.

"I am off now," he said to Turpin; "but I thought I would speak to you first. You say you left Bess in the stable belonging to the 'Three Tuns?'"

"Yes, the one in the alley."

"I know."

"The place will sure, I fancy, be well guarded by the police. Have you any plan for getting possession of the mare?"

"Well, I can't say I have at present, but on my way there I daresay I shall think of something!"

"I only hope you will, and that your effort will be successful. Without Black Bess, I am like a ship without a rudder."

"I'll tell you what it is, Turpin," interrupted Tom King; "as soon as there is an opportunity, you must tell me how it was you came to possess such a magnificent creature as your mare is; and there are many other passages in your history to which, in the short time I have been with you, you have alluded, and which I feel a deep curiosity to hear."

"You shall be satisfied, Tom. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do."

"What?"

"One of these very next days, when we have the time to spare, and I feel in the humour, I will relate to you succinctly the whole story of my life, from the commencement of my career until I met you in the lane, but upon one sole condition."

"And what is that?"

"That your reciprocate the favour, and in return for my history give me yours, which I am full of anxiety to hear."

"Agreed; and now finish your arrangements with Davis here, for I can see he is impatient to be off."

"Well, Davis, my friend, I don't know there is any more I can say. You, of course, will be known as coming from me, and Johnson will deliver her to you. I shall leave you to devise a means of baulking the officers, if any should happen to interfere with you, and remember, when you are once on the back of Black Bess you are safe, for the horse that can run swifter than she has yet to be foaled."

"I know you have a great idea of her speed, Dick; and justly, too, I should imagine, considering the number of times that her fleetness must have been so vital to you."

"Just so. Let us see. It is close upon four now," said Turpin, looking at his watch, "and it will take you rather better than half-an-hour to get to Seven Dials. I wouldn't hurry there, though. I think it will be better if it is dusk when you arrive."

"I shall certainly stand a better chance of getting off if it is, so I will delay my departure half-an-hour."

"Do so, my friend; and, if you are not aware of it already, let me tell you it is the worst of all policy to ruin anything by precipitation."

"I am well aware of it, and fully believe in its truth. I may be back with comparative quickness, and I may not return till morning. It is all according as circumstances turn out."

"I can trust you, I am well aware, so I leave you to do your best. By-the-bye, was the verdict you anticipated returned?"

"Yes, Felo-de-se! and they will bury him at the cross roads, with a stake through his heart, at midnight."

"Oh! indeed. Then the probability is, Davis, you will be absent from that interesting ceremony."

"And glad I shall be, for, what with one thing and another, I have had rather more of old Simms's son than I care about, though if I happened to be at home it would be a bit of satisfaction to know he was thoroughly disposed of."

"I daresay it would," said Tom King; "but it strikes me you feel just as much interest and curiosity in the matter as I do. I always make it a point of seeing all I can, and I have never had a chance of seeing one of these midnight funerals before, so intend to see this one."

"Well, I have not the least objection," said Tom Davis; "I daresay you will find it a dismal spectacle."

"What do you say, Turpin?" asked King. "I am going; will you bear me company?"

"Willingly. Not that I have much relish for such scenes; for my taste lies in quite a different direction. I shall, however, if Davis does not come back before the ceremony takes place, be very glad to accompany you, for, being anxious, the time will hang heavily upon my hands, if I have nothing to occupy my thoughts."

"That's right!" said Tom; "I didn't half like the idea of going by myself."

"And I," said the landlord, as he moved towards the door, "will go downstairs and get a cup of tea, after which I will be off. As for you, gentlemen, I shouldn't advise you to show yourselves at all till night; so I think the best thing you can do is to lie down and rest while you have the chance."

"All right, my boy," said Dick, "and I hope with the darkness I shall see you return with Black Bess."

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE BOW-STREET RUNNERS ARE VERY WRATH AGAINST DICK, AND RESOLVE TO CAPTURE HIM AT ALL HAZARDS, WHICH MAKES HIS PROJECTED JOURNEY INTO THE SOUTH-WESTERN COUNTIES ALL THE MORE IMPERATIVE.

NIGHT came.

Dark, drear, and wintry, with a blustering wind blowing up from the north-east, bringing occasionally with it a dash of heavy rain-drops, which came against all objects with as much force and suddenness as sea-spray.

From the horizon to the zenith the heavens were covered with one huge black cloud, which was in no place lighter or thinner than in others—it was like one vast funeral pall.

It was a night on which few people would move from their firesides, unless some very powerful motive called them abroad; it was, in fine, a night which fitly harmonized with the ghastly ceremony about to be performed.

It would, indeed, have seemed a profanation—a hideous mockery—if the moon had shed her fair, pure light upon so horrible a scene.

Three-quarters past eleven was just pealing out from Hornsey church when the front door of the "Hand and Keys" inn was flung open, and the burial train appeared upon its threshold.

Slowly, and with solemn steps, the little party, to the number of five-and-twenty, made their way across the inn yard into the high-road.

Six persons bore the coffin containing the suicide's remains, and which was to be rudely cast into a hole dug in the stony road, without the performance of those sacred rites the Christian church ordains.

And as if this were in all conscience not enough, the inanimate clay was to be legally mutilated.

Truly was it a deed more suited to the sensibilities of savages at some early period of the world's history than civilized men, and that, too, in the middle of the last century, when science, art, and good breeding were supposed to have reached the highest point of perfection.

It seems incredible that such could be the opinion of those living at the time when so sickening a custom was not only tolerated but enforced.

Yet, stranger still to say, this barbaric and inhuman law has never been repealed; and it is to avoid its consummation that juries, now-a-days, almost invariably return in a case of suicide a verdict of temporary insanity.

By this means only can they ensure the burial of the corpse in consecrated ground.

But would it not, we ask, be better for this most disgraceful law to be erased from the statute book of England, than for juries to be forced to give in a false verdict?

There can be but one reply to such a question.

The nearest cross roads to the "Hand and Keys"—or four lanes end, as they expressively termed it—was where the narrow country lane, in which Tom King had taken up his position to rob the western coach, crossed the highway.

At some remote period it had doubtless been the scene of a similar occurrence, from which its unpleasant designation of Deadman's Hollow was derived.

Those persons who had been selected to accompany the coffin and to relieve those who bore it from its weight, carried in their hands huge pinewood torches, which, baffled and blown about by the wind, cast but a flickering and uncertain light upon surrounding objects.

Davis, the landlord, had not returned from his dangerous mission when the procession started, so, as they had agreed, the two highwaymen descended from the attic and followed slowly after them.

They hung back, though, considerably in the rear, taking care not to expose themselves too much to the gaze of the curious villagers.

Their caution was scarcely necessary, for the coffin of the suicide absorbed all their faculties. They had eyes and ears for nothing else.

Both Turpin and King were silent. The solemnity of the scene had its due effect upon them. They felt, without knowing why, that speech would be out of place.

At their slow pace twenty minutes brought them to the cross roads in Deadman's Hollow.

Here they found a large concourse of people assembled, who were anxiously awaiting the arrival of the cortège.

The grave was already dug. The stones and yellow sticky clay, that had been turned up from it, were piled in a large mound upon the margin of the grave.

Across this mound was laid a newly-cut hedge-stake, some seven or eight feet in length, one end of which was sharpened to a point.

A few moments' bustle and confusion ensued upon the arrival of the body, but it subsided almost as suddenly as it arose.

"This is a very solemn scene, Dick," said Tom King, drawing his cloak closer round him to protect himself from the bleak wind. "What with the weather, and what with this strange funeral, I am chilled to the very bone!"

"And I, too!" said Dick. "I think, however, we may safely venture to draw closer. As we are here, we may as well see all, for it is not probable we shall have another opportunity."

"I hope and trust not," said Tom King. "I could hardly credit such things were done, and that is why I felt so curious. It is to be hoped so loathsome a spectacle will, in the course of a few years, be wholly unknown except by name."

The bearers of the coffin paused for a moment on the brink of the grave, and then, letting go the handles, dropped it in.

It reached the bottom with a strange, dull, rattling sound.

"Stand aside, there, you folks," said a man at this moment, pushing his way into the centre of the ring the bystanders had formed around the grave; "stand back, there, will you!"

This man, who was rather short and very fat, and having apparently much of the animal in his composition, drew himself up as he uttered these words with what he thought was a dignified air.

"I suppose that's the parish beadle," said Dick to a man who was standing near him.

"Yes; and parish constable too. But who are you," asked the man, curiously, "as doesn't know him? Why, everybody knows Tobias Primp!"

"We are travellers from London," said Dick, readily, "and I daresay the same motive that brought you here brought us too."

"What is that?"

"Curiosity, to be sure!"

The man turned away, and was silent.

In the meantime, Mr. Tobias Primp had taken up the hedge-stake and held it in a vertical position.

"Now, then, one or two of you lend a hand here," he said, with as much authority as if he had been lord of the manor. "Lend a hand here, and assist me in the execution of the law!"

Several persons sprang with alacrity into the ring.

"No! no!" shrieked a voice, which, from the tone, was evidently a female one. "No! no! You cannot—shall not do the deed! Fall back, and fill up the grave, but do not mangle his poor remains! You will not read the prayers for the dead over him, I know; but surely his mother's prayers will prove equally as efficacious!"

A strange and universal impulse prompted those who were thronging round to draw back, and as they did so, a woman dashed with wild gestures into the circle.

Then she fell upon her knees by the grave.

The light of the torches which the bearers carried burned much better now they were not in motion, and their light revealed with great distinctness this woman's face and figure.

She was very old. Her skin was wrinkled, and looked yellower than it really was in the dull red glare of the torches. A quantity of thin gray hairs streamed behind her in the wind, and she clasped her wasted, bony hands together with an agonising earnestness.

"Get up, low woman," said Tobias Primp, recovering from his surprise, and advancing towards her. "Get up, and don't interfere with the majesty of the law, or I'll have you locked up, I will."

"No! no! you could not keep a mother from witnessing the interment of her son! I tell you he was my son!" she shrieked. "My son! my own flesh and blood, you understand."

"This is horror upon horror," said Dick; "let us draw back and leave them."

"Never, never," said Tom King. "I will stand by to the last. I cannot prevent them from carrying the sentence of the law into effect, but if they offer that poor creature any ill-usage, they shall rue it."

"You are right, Tom. I forgot the poor mother when I spoke. I will stay."

King pressed his hand in silence.

"Stand back, I say!" again cried Mr. Primp. "Can't you hear what I said, or did the wind blow, as it were, eh?"

"My boy—my son—my only one!" screamed the old woman, springing suddenly to her feet. "Have mercy! spare him—spare him! Friends, neighbours! help me! help! Do not let them do so frightful a deed! Save my poor boy from that, at least! Save him! Oh! save him!"

No one stirred, though, probably enough, many felt an inclination to do so; but the dread of the consequences of interfering with the carrying out of a judicial sentence kept them back.

"You do not move to help me!" she cried, in anguished, despairing tones, "Must a mother pray to you in vain to save her son's remains from a ruthless law! Oh! you who are fathers and have sons of your own, listen to my prayer, save and help him——Ah!"

This last ejaculation was forced from her lips in consequence of finding herself in the grasp of two men who had been directed to seize her.

With as much gentleness as possible these two men led her away from her son's grave.

But her voice, as she shouted for her son to be saved from his terrible doom, for a long time echoed and re-echoed along the highway, but it grew each moment fainter and fainter, until it could be heard no longer.

Then the ponderous hedge-stake was raised in several hands, and swung up and down twice or thrice, so that it should descend with greater force.

It went through the thin elm coffin with a terrible, sickening crash.

At that very moment there descended from the sky a perfect deluge of rain.

It seemed as though an enormous cloud had been suddenly reft open, and its contents allowed to fall bodily upon the earth.

The torches were extinguished instantly.

Then a general movement among those assembled took place.

Those who had been engaged to fill up the grave performed their task with great rapidity.

"Stop a minute, Dick!" said Tom King, as he observed his companion about to withdraw. "Stop a minute! We are drenched to the skin now, and cannot get any wetter, so let us stay and see it all out!"

Turpin uttered a growl of impatience and dissatisfaction, but remained.

In the meantime the grave had been filled up, and the men were now busily engaged in heaping a quantity of pebbly stones round the hedge-stake, which projected some three feet above the level of the road.

"Now I hope you are content!" said Turpin, as he saw the last stone put in its place.

"Yes, I'm ready now," said Tom; "only I made up my mind to see it all out, as being one of the most singular customs in existence."

"Come along, then!" said Dick, setting off at a trot. "Why, I believe the rain gets heavier every moment. It's positively coming down in one sheet."

"Oh! never mind. I daresay you have had your skin wetted before to-day, and when you were not so close to a place of shelter as you are at the present moment."

"That's very true. I wonder how Davis is getting on. I thought he would have got back before this. I am very uneasy and impatient, I can assure you."

"I have no doubt of that, for if you should be unfortunate enough to lose your mare, you will be a long time before you find one to match her."

"I should never find one. It would be an impossibility. When Turpin loses his mare it will be all over with him."

"Well, we shall soon know the result of the landlord's errand, for the inn is not a hundred yards off now. Look, you can see the lights at the front window quite plainly."

"Yes. I am, though, under the impression Davis has not returned, or we should have seen something of him. My heart misgives me very much about it."

"So I suppose, for you speak in quite a desponding way. You may depend it will be all right sooner or later."

"I hope so, indeed!" said Dick, as he pushed open the front door of the "Hand and Keys," and entered, closely followed by his comrade.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN DEPART FOR LONDON ON THEIR PERILOUS ERRAND.

FROM the noise which greeted the ears of the two highwaymen as they made their way along the passage, it was pretty clear that the old inn was tolerably full of customers. Avoiding, however, the kitchen in which the guests were, both ascended the broad oaken staircase.

Turpin was first, and he halted as soon as he reached the landing.

"Tom," he said, "I needn't tell you how anxious I am about Davis. I wish you would go down again and ascertain whether he has returned. Not that I think he has for a moment, only it would be more satisfactory to be sure he had not."

"I'll go," replied Tom. "None will know me. Stand here till I come back."

"Who shall you ask?"

"Your flame!"

"My flame?"

"Yes, Ellen!"

"Oh!

"I think she will be the best to make my inquiries of."

"Or Mrs. Davis. It doesn't matter which."

Tom King descended the stairs and went into the bar. It was empty at first, but Mrs. Davis and Ellen entered immediately after him, each carrying several jugs.

The young girl smiled when she saw King.

"You seem busy," he said. "It's an ill wind blows nobody good. Has Davis returned?"

"He has not," said Mrs. Davis, as she wiped her face with her apron. "I wish he was safe back! Did you ever know such a wet night? When he comes he will be drenched to the skin!"

"I was in hopes he had arrived. My friend is very uneasy about him and his mare, so he sent me to inquire while he waited for me on the stairs. Let us know as soon as he returns."

"Very well, good night!"

"Good night!"

"Not come?" interrogated Turpin, as soon as he saw King.

"No! They will send us word the moment he does."

Dick sighed.

"I don't like this," he said. "There is danger abroad, or Davis would have been back before this. If he does not come quickly I shall risk all and start myself. Fool that I was to leave Bess behind me. I'll warrant I never do the same thing again."

"You couldn't help yourself, could you? However, I don't wonder at your impatience and anxiety."

"I confess they increase fearfully every moment. There is, however, one thing certain, Bess must be got back somehow or other."

"I suppose so. And the best thing we can do is to go up to our attic and wait a while, and occupy ourselves in devising some scheme to be carried out by ourselves in case Davis should fail."

"You are right, my friend. I wish we had a light though, for this staircase is most confoundedly dark. I can't see where I am going."

"Never mind, feel your way. We shall be right enough when you reach the attic."

"So we shall. Let me lead the way, my friend."

"It will be a case of the blind leading the blind, I fancy, though, of course, you have been oftener up the stairs than I have."

"Rather!"

The highwaymen felt their way slowly up the staircase, and after a little blundering reached the attic.

Both went to the window.

"Throw it open, Dick," said King. "We shall be able to tell, then, what the weather is like, and whether there is anyone on the road."

Turpin obeyed.

A sudden gust of wind, bearing with it a quantity of rain, entered the chamber.

"The weather doesn't seem to have improved, Tom. The sky is as black as ink."

"It is. I fancy, though, the rain has abated a great deal."

"Oh! it has; there is no question about that. It couldn't come down at that rate long. I never knew anything like it, and I have seen a few showers. Can you see or hear anyone on the road?"

"No; both are out of the question. It is so dark you can't see your hand before you, and just hark how the wind howls!"

A terrific gust swept round the old inn as he spoke, and moaned and whistled as it careered round the corners that obstructed its onward passage.

"Shut the window," said Dick, "and let us come away."

"No: stop! silence!"

"What do you hear?"

"I fancied just then that I heard the tramp of horses' hoofs on the roadway."

Both strained their sense of hearing to the utmost.

"I hear nothing," said Turpin, after a brief pause.

"Nor I, now. And yet I fancied I heard a horse approaching. It must have been fancy merely."

They remained listening a little longer, but as they could hear no repetition of the sound, closed the window.

"I am in a terrible fidget," said Dick, "and I get worse and worse every moment."

"I can scarcely wonder at it, for you see Davis has been gone seven or eight hours now."

"Yes; that is the circumstance that fills me with alarm. I fear Davis has been seized by the police."

"Or," said King, "he may not have left London when the rain began, and is waiting there until the weather is better."

Dick shook his head at the supposition of his friend.

"It is just possible that may be the reason, but I doubt it."

"Well, then, let us suppose Davis has failed. What steps shall you take to get Bess into your possession?"

"I have no idea; but doubtless some mode of action will suggest itself to me at the proper time."

"Well, it's always my system to mature a plan before I start, and then you set about what you have to do with greater ease and confidence."

"That is only true to a certain extent, my friend. So many things occur to alter the aspect of events, that your plan requires perpetual modification, and by the time you have to put it into execution it is quite different to what it originally was."

"I have known such to be the case."

"You must have done. Now I always think it best to set out having only your ultimate purpose in view, and then let circumstances form and suggest your plan of operation."

"Perhaps it is best. But I asked you what you intended to do, simply because I look upon the attempt as an impossibility."

"Do you?"

"I do."

"It is difficult and dangerous, I know, but it does not follow from that it is impossible."

"Well, so far as my own convictions go, I feel quite assured Davis has failed in his errand, and has likely enough been made prisoner as an accomplice. Now if he, a stranger, could not succeed, I don't see what chance you yourself have of doing so."

"I admit all that, but I don't see that it is impossible, nevertheless."

"Well, then, I suppose by that, you have resolved to make the attempt yourself?"

"I have."

"Then I have a request to make of you which you must promise beforehand."

"I can guess what it is before you speak."

"I daresay you can. It is that you will let me accompany you, and share the dangers and difficulties of the enterprise."

"I cannot say no to your request, Tom, because I would rather you went with me. As for the danger, I know you value that no more than I do."

"You are not far off the mark there; but if such is the decision you have made, just allow me to give you a piece of advice."

"What is it?"

"To lose no time in carrying out your project."

"I have no intention."

"Then let us start at once. If we do not, we shall have it daylight before we know where we are."

"We shall. Come with me. It will take but a few minutes to get the horses ready for the road."

As he spoke, Turpin left the attic, closely followed by Tom King.

On reaching the bar they paused for a moment, and again inquired whether Davis had returned, and again received a negative reply. Briefly announcing, then, their intention to go in quest of him, they hurried out of the inn, across the yard, and into the stables.

Five minutes afterwards the two highwaymen were mounted and on their way to London.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

TOM KING FIGHTS A SINGLE COMBAT WITH CHARLES STUART, CALLED IN HISTORY THE YOUNG PRETENDER.

THAT this was about the most dangerous expedition Turpin had ever ventured upon there can be little doubt, and though this fact was quite patent to him, it did not cause him to hesitate in the least.

There was some little improvement in the state of the weather perceptible. The rain had almost ceased, and the wind had lost much of its violence.

The roads, though, were in a fearful state, and were very heavy to the horses, for their hoofs sank deeply into the soft clayey soil at every step they took.

The two friends did not speak for some minutes after leaving the yard of the "Hand and Keys." They were too much occupied in picking their way to have leisure to do so.

The night was profoundly dark, so they did not venture to put their horses to a gallop, but they went over the ground at a trot that soon decreased the distance they had to travel.

At length they reached a firmer piece of road, and then Turpin, turning to his companion, said—

"This cool air clears one's faculties. While we have been plodding along, I have been thinking over Tom Davis' non-appearance, and trying to form some hypothesis to account for it."

"Indeed?"

"Yes!"

"Have you succeeded?"

"I fancy so. I seem as though I could tell just what had taken place."

"How do you account for that?"

"I cannot tell, but I have made it out bit by bit, and feel confident I have arrived at the correct solution of the affair."

"It will be a good thing if you have, for, of course, it would lend us most material aid in forming a plan of attack, and determine to a great extent whether we should use stratagem or force."

"I think we shall want a little of both."

"Very good. Let us hear your account of what has happened!"

"Well, you must know first that just before I met you I was betrayed by a waggoner and taken prisoner by some officers."

"Oh! I have heard nothing of this before."

"Dear me, no more you have. Then I shall be obliged to go back to that incident in order to make you understand."

"Well, tell it in as few words as you can, for I am rather impatient by nature, and can't bear to have to wait when I want to hear anything."

"I can assure you it is quite as disagreeable to me as to you. The fact is, as I said before, we must, as soon as we get a chance, relate our histories to each other, and then we shall be able to talk in comfort."

"We shall. You say you were made a prisoner. Never mind the particulars. What next!"

"They were the same officers that pursued you so hotly. There were five of them, and they got about twenty farm labourers to help them, so I did not stand much of a chance with so many."

"I should think not."

"However, when they had bound me, and put me on horseback behind one of the officers, the thought occurred to them how dreadful a thing it would be to have to divide the reward amongst so many."

"Yes, that is only human nature. That over-grasping feeling on the part of the officers has assisted many a one to escape."

"It has; but we will not go into that subject now. The officers then tried to diddle these men, without whom they would never have captured me; so I took advantage of the circumstances to turn the tables upon them."

"How did you do that?"

"In the simplest manner possible. I offered those men who had captured me ten pounds a-piece to set me free; so they paid into the officers, and did it at once."

"Ha! ha! Capital! That's the best joke I have heard for some time! And how about the officers?"

"I did not let them off scot-free, you may depend, but had them tied back to back, and mounted on their horses."

"Ha! ha! ha! Bravo! Better and better! I shall burst, I know I shall! Ha! ha! How droll they must have looked, one with his face to his horse's head, and the other with his face to his tail! Ha! ha!"

"It would have pleased you most to have heard how they swore when we touched up the cattle, and made them gallop along the road!"

"I should have died, I know I should."

"I did, and so we did all! I kept my word with the men, and gave them not ten pounds but fifteen."

"Then they were in ecstacies with you?"

"They were. I have made a friend of every one of them. But what I was going to say is this: the officer in command was Wriggles. Do you know him? An apoplectic-looking man!"

"I have seen him."

"Well, he is very sweet on catching me; but he wants to do it with as few persons as possible, so as to get the larger share of the reward. Now, in spite of his defeat, I feel convinced it will not be a lesson to him, but he will still try to capture me with his four men. It was he who was put up to my being at the 'Three Tuns,' and, of course, knows Black Bess is stabled somewhere close at hand. Now, his plan of operations will be this. He will look upon that stable as a kind of mousetrap."

"A mousetrap?"

"Yes. He and his officers will take up their stations in the stable, and very patiently lay in wait, and make a prisoner of everyone who enters."

"Dick, my boy, you've hit the right nail on the head this time. You may depend they have caught Davis, and are keeping him there, most likely trusting that those who have sent him will shortly make their appearance."

"That's the conclusion I told you I came to, and you think that is the real state of affairs?"

"I feel certain of it. Somehow it seems to carry conviction with it."

"I am glad you think so. Of course, I could not tell what effect it would have upon your mind. Now, don't you think I was right when I said we should require to use stratagem and force?"

"Quite right. Though, under the circumstances, I should prefer using rather more of the latter than the former."

"It would be best, perhaps. Now, what course should you propose?"

"Well, I hardly know. If it is just as you have supposed, I should be for dashing into the stable, and bringing the mare off by main force."

"So should I, Tom. I like a bold plan of operations. I think we should be a match for Wriggles and his four men."

"Oh! yes. We ought first, if possible, to ascertain whether they are there, and then bounce in suddenly upon them!"

"That will be it; and, being taken by surprise, the battle will be half won!"

"Let us push on a little faster, then, for the sooner we get there the better."

"Yes; but hark!"

"Hark? At what?"

"Can't you hear someone approaching?"

Tom King bent forward in his saddle and listened.

"Halt, Dick!" he said. "A horseman is coming from the direction of London!"

As he spoke the sound of the horse's footsteps splashing into the mud and little pools on the roadway came quite plainly to their ears.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN PROVE MORE THAN A MATCH FOR MR. WRIGGLES.

"I SAY, Tom!"

"Yes, Dick."

"This is a traveller."

"Or Tom Davis!"

"Oh! ah! or Tom Davis."

"What were you going to say?"

"Why—a-hem! The business we are on requires despatch."

"Unquestionably."

"But if this should be a traveller, my friend"——

"Yes."

"Do you think we ought to lose the opportunity of doing a little business?"

"Just as you like. Abstractedly I should say no."

"He might carry a rich booty."

"He might."

"And it would be a shame to let it slip through our fingers, wouldn't it?"

"Especially when it wouldn't delay us much one way or the other."

"I think we must stop him, Tom."

"Very well. Look after your priming. Remember it has been raining, and the chances are ten to one the charges have got wet."

King examined his own pistols as he spoke, and Turpin followed his example.

The horseman, be he whom he might, was not now many yards distant. His horse's footsteps could be plainly enough heard, but neither the form of horse nor rider could be distinguished owing to the unusual darkness of the night.

The two highwaymen had halted just in the middle of the road.

Both now were silent, for they did not wish their voices to reach the horseman, and be a means of putting him on his guard.

In another moment he was face to face with King and Turpin.

"Stand!" said the latter, "and deliver what valuables you carry with you peaceably. If you resist, your death be on your own head."

The only reply the traveller made was to draw a sword with lightning rapidity from its scabbard.

It gleamed through the air like a flash of light as it descended, for this traveller aimed a desperate blow at Dick's head with the weapon.

By something little short of a miracle, Dick drew back quick enough to escape the stroke; but the sword, in its descent, sliced a small piece of skin off the neck of his horse.

The pain, doubtless, was excessive, for the animal reared and pranced, and became perfectly unmanageable.

Dick maintained his position in his saddle, though anyone less accustomed to horse-riding than himself would, no doubt, have found it impossible to do so, and he strove to soothe the creature in the best way he could.

The man who had been attacked did not fail to perceive the advantage he had gained, and spurring forward, would doubtless have made short work of Dick had not Tom at that moment interposed his person.

He had drawn the hanger which he habitually carried by his side, and stood still and quietly on guard.

His opponent, he fancied, was in some way connected with the army, both on account of the promptitude with which he made his attack upon Dick, and because occasionally King could see something glittering about his apparel, as though he was attired in an officer's uniform.

On finding himself confronted by King, the traveller did not appear to abate his martial and valorous bearing a jot, but instantly commenced a furious attack upon Tom, who, though an expert swordsman, found himself fully occupied in warding off the heavy blows which were aimed at him.

The conflict continued for many minutes without either party gaining advantage.

The idea that he was fighting with a soldier was strengthened in King's mind by observing what perfect mastery he had over his steed, and, indeed, the manner in which he made it wheel about was well calculated to call forth surprise and admiration.

And now Turpin, who had succeeded in calming his horse, also drew his hanger, and rode forward to the assistance of his friend.

"Stand back, Dick!" shouted King, making his voice heard above the din of the clashing steel. "Stand back, and let us have fair play! It would be cowardly for both of us to attack a really brave man who is defending what he carries about him."

Without a word, Turpin drew back as requested.

"A rest! a rest!" cried the soldier, if soldier he were, for the first time breaking the silence. "Hold a moment!"

King lowered his weapon.

"You are a brave-hearted man," continued the stranger, restoring his sword to its sheath, and holding out his right hand, "and true courage and bravery are the things I admire most on earth. I know not who you are, except that you are a highwayman, yet, strange as it may seem to you, I should be proud and glad to reckon you my friend. Shake hands!"

Nothing loath, King grasped the hand so friendly held out to him; and said, while Dick looked on in wondering amazement—

"You have behaved yourself most gallantly, and I accept your cordial invitation with the utmost pleasure. Still, you will excuse me if I say that I fancy you have overrated me. Fair play is always my maxim."

"And mine too. And I must say on this occasion you have acted up to it. Here is my purse!"

"No, no," said Tom King. "Keep it! I would not take it from you for worlds!"

"I insist upon it," said the stranger, endeavouring to force a well-filled purse into his hands. "You might, if you liked, have set upon me with your companion, and deprived me of my life; for if your friend is as accomplished a swordsman as yourself, I should not have stood the ghost of a chance with you. I had much ado to defend myself as it was."

"You are very frank, sir," said King, still avoiding the proffered gift, "and I admire you for it. I must, however, refuse to accept anything from you."

"Well, then, if you will not, probably your comrade will. Here, you Sir Highwayman No. 2, here is a purse of guineas which I wish you to accept as a present for the forbearance you have exercised. Take, and be welcome!"

Turpin made a deprecating gesture.

"The case is entirely in the hands of my friend," he said, "and I must decline to interfere with it. So you must excuse me if I refuse."

The stranger returned the purse to his pocket with rather an offended air.

"Then, gentlemen—for by your manners and bearing such you are—since you will not allow me to do anything to show my gratitude for your forbearance, perhaps you will allow me to proceed on my journey."

He gathered the reins in his hands as he spoke, and touched his steed with his spur.

"One moment!" said King, placing himself directly in his way.

"What is your wish?"

"We have already passed sufficient compliments, I think," replied King; "yet, still for my own part, I have said no more than your gallant behaviour prompted me to say. I would scorn to take anything from you but your name, and that, I confess, I have the greatest desire to know. Will you give it me?"

The stranger hesitated a few moments before he spoke.

"My name," he said, "is a secret. I am hunted and proscribed, and many are thirsting for my life! I do not like to refuse you anything, and yet"——

"It appears to me," said Tom King, "that your position in that respect is very much like our own."

"It is; but most unjustly," replied the stranger, a tone of sadness tinging his words. "My position should be among the highest in the land."

A deep sigh came from his lips as he finished speaking.

Both Turpin and King were perfectly absorbed in their strange adventure.

The latter broke the silence.

"We will not press you," he said; "but still I think you may safely trust us with your name."

"Perhaps so, and if I do, a day may come when I shall be glad to avail myself of your assistance. The simple fact of your being fugitives like I am, emboldens me to confide in you. You will be surprised when I declare myself! But before I do, tell me your names."

"Mine," said Tom, "is tolerably well known. It is Tom King!"

"Tom King, the highwayman?"

"Even so."

"You surprise me, for I expected to find the person who bore that name an unmitigated ruffian, capable of every atrocity."

"Thank you!" said Tom, drily.

"Excuse me," remarked the gentleman. "I only said what sort of character had been represented to me under your name."

"Oh! no offence—no offence!"

"And your companion," continued the stranger.

"He must answer for himself."

Dick drew a little closer to the speakers.

"My name," he said, as he raised his hat and made a most elaborate bow, "is Richard—commonly called Dick—Turpin!"

"Indeed! I little expected I was in the company of two such celebrated characters, and, after receiving your confidence, I cannot withhold mine; besides, I am quite sure now I shall have nothing to fear from you."

"We will give you our assurance," said Turpin and King, both speaking at once. "We will give you our assurance that your name shall never be revealed by us unless with your consent."

"Agreed, then. Listen! I have two names by which I am equally well known. One is Charles Stuart, and the other is"——

"THE YOUNG PRETENDER!"

CHAPTER XXX.

THE YOUNG PRETENDER FINDS TWO STAUNCH ADHERENTS.

THE two highwaymen drew back a few paces when this name fell upon their ears, and though, generally speaking, they were disposed to show but scant reverence for royalty, yet, when this announcement was made, they involuntarily backed their horses a few yards, and raised their hats respectfully.

The name of the unfortunate young man was, of course, well known to both, and they were also familiar with the many reverses he had suffered. It is, therefore, to be presumed that his chivalry and gallantry, and the fact of his being hunted by almost all the world, conspired chiefly to cause a feeling of friendship for him to arise in their breasts which they would not otherwise have felt.

"My friends," said the Young Pretender in his calm, rich voice; "do not draw back, I beg. Think in how many ways you resemble he who is rightfully your king, but who is now no more than you in station. Like you, I am compelled to travel in disguise and when the sun has withdrawn his face. I am surrounded on every side by enemies who are thirsting for my life. I am compelled to be ever watchful—ever in dread of treachery. In all these respects must I—a king by birth and right—resemble you!"

These words were uttered in a tone of deep, inexpressible pathos, tinged with a soul-absorbing sadness; and as he gave utterance to his reflections, he became conquered by his emotion, and his head drooped upon his breast.

His words, manner, bearing, all combined to raise a feeling of sympathy in his behalf on the part of our two friends.

They were silent for a moment or so, and then Tom King broke the silence.

"Your highness," he said, "among all those who most profess themselves your adherents, there is not one so true, so faithful, so devoted, as myself. I consider your right to the throne of England as most indisputable, and only too gladly will I do all I can to advance your cause. You will allow, sire, that the position in which I am placed will prevent my doing much."

'Pardon me," said Stuart. "You have addressed me by a title which, at present, is not my own: though I hope some day it will be. Still, there is an old Scottish superstition which says, 'It is unlucky to give anyone a title before it actually belongs to him.'"

"I am sorry, my prince," replied King, "that I have been led into an indiscretion. Let me hope that you will receive my promise of allegiance to you."

"I do! I do! And yet to-night"——

He paused abruptly.

Neither King nor Turpin liked to speak, and a silence ensued, which they could see much embarrassed the young prince.

He got out of his difficulty by finishing the sentence he had checked himself in uttering.

"To-night," he said, "secretly and in disguise, I made a visit to the metropolis. I was induced thereto by those who had professed by oaths and protestations that they were devoted solely to my cause. Base hearts! It was a deeply-laid scheme for my capture and destruction, but by great good fortune I succeeded in eluding them, and have so far escaped in safety."

"I trust, my prince," said King, gravely, "that you will never do me the injustice to think of me in the same breath with them. You must see that it is no interest of mine, that I have no motive for siding with you save the true one, and that is, I consider, if monarchy must be a national institution, you, as the descendant of the Stuarts, possess a far better right to the throne than any German family."

"That's just exactly it," said Turpin, speaking for the first time, for hitherto he felt that respect for young Charles Stuart prevented the interruption of the conversation he was holding with Tom King. "Excuse me, my prince, but King, my comrade here, expressed so well my own convictions, that I could not forbear saying so."

"There is nothing to excuse," said the Pretender, gently. "Heaven knows every friend now is a friend indeed, and you must accept such thanks as I can offer. Believe me, I am most grateful to you both."

This was said with so much sweetness of tone, and such charming grace, that it was impossible for anyone not to be charmed with it.

"We will endeavour to merit your thanks," said Turpin, "and hope that the day is not far distant when we shall have the satisfaction of hailing you King of England!"

The eyes of the Young Pretender brightened.

"When I am," he said, "I will take care you quit a mode of life which is not worthy of you; you shall both have a position in my establishment."

"We are well enough content with our lot," said Dick, "and having once commenced warring with society, as we have, the struggle must be continued until one of us is vanquished!"

"You reject my offer. But I forget. I am not yet in a position to make it to you! I have been betrayed into a weakness. Farewel.!"

As he spoke, Charles Stuart again took the reins in his hand, and rode forward.

The two highwaymen drew aside to enable him to pass.

"I am going now to Scotland," he said, "where I hope soon to raise my standard. Will you join me when I do?"

"With all the pleasure in life. We would accompany you now to preserve you from danger, but business of the most urgent nature, and which will admit of no delay, calls us to London."

"Farewell, then," said Charles Stuart. "We part with the understanding that, as soon as you hear I am raising an army, you will place yourselves under my banner?"

"That is it," said Tom; "and rest assured we will render you all the service in our power."

"Since, then, you will not accept the purse, and which now I am sorry I ever offered you, permit me to place upon each of your right hands a ring, which will enable me to recognise you upon a future occasion."

"Willingly, my prince."

The highwaymen held out their hands, and the young Pretender placed upon each a ring of considerable value.

"I shall recognise you now," he said, "and, for the third time, let me say farewell! Day-dawn is now close at hand, and I must hasten my journey, or I may even yet be overtaken by my foes. Farewell!"

"Farewell, my prince, and may the time soon come when we can hail you King of England!"

Charles Stuart lifted his hat, and striking his spurs into his horse's sides, galloped swiftly along the road.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE FIGHT IN THE STABLE BETWEEN THE OFFICERS AND THE HIGHWAYMEN.

THE two friends for some moments pursued in silence their interrupted journey.

The adventure they had just had was provocative of thought.

But Dick, as we know, was a person who could never go far in anyone's company without indulging in conversation.

"How silent you are, Tom! Has this young enthusiast made so deep an impression on your mind?"

"He has, I must confess. I was thinking what a singular thing it was that we should have met each other as we did."

"A strange chance. I like him much, for we have had proof to-night that, if he is gentle in his manners, he can be, when he wishes, as brave as a lion."

"Yes; I do not think that I ever had so much difficulty to defend myself from anyone before. You know I pride myself very much upon my skill with the sword."

"He was almost a match for you. But come, Tom, my friend, quicken your speed. Have you forgotten our errand?"

"For the moment I had. There is no time to lose, for look, already in the east is a faint line of light."

"There is. I can see it plainly, so daybreak must be close at hand; but, let the peril be what it will, I am determined not to pass another day separated from my bonny mare."

"One thing, we are not far from our destination. A quarter of an hour, I fancy, will be enough to carry us there."

"If we make good speed, it will. But is it not singular we should have both met, and joined the Pretender's side?"

"Yes. I am rather surprised at you, Dick, for I always thought you were a staunch opposer of sovereignty and such like."

"So I am, Tom, so I am. I only sided with him because it always comes natural for me to side with the weak against the strong."

"Oh! that was it, was it?"

"It was; but still, as you yourself said, so far as title to the throne goes, I do consider he has a much better right to it than any German by any possibility can have."

"You are right there. That's just what I think; and if I can do anything towards making him king, I shall do it."

"And I will help you," said Turpin, "for the short time I was with him sufficed for him to win my heart."

"I am rather puzzled, though, at his behaviour. One would hardly have thought he would have made friends with us as he did. You may depend he has met with some great grief to-night that has chastened and subdued his heart."

"Without a doubt. Did he not say as much to you in the course of the conversation he had with you?"

"He did. He said those who had professed themselves sworn friends to his cause and party had lured him into a snare for his destruction. But come, here we are in London at last."

"I think, Tom it will only be prudent to slacken speed a little as we go through the streets, or we shall create suspicion."

"You are right And now, have you matured your plan?"

"No: that I have not. Too many things have occurred. Stop, and let me have five minutes' thought, and do you try if you can arrange some plan of operations."

Both relapsed into silence.

They were now threading their way through the densely-populated district lying north of Holborn. Although it was so early in the morning, many people were walking through the streets.

At length, without uttering another word, the two highwaymen drew up close by Montagne House, which has been transformed into that handsome building, the British Museum.

"Well, Tom, what is it?"

"I was just considering which would be best: to leave the cattle somewhere about here, or ride up to the 'Three Tuns.'"

"The latter, I think, and I'll tell you why. If I had not separated from Bess, I should not have had to run through the streets for my life as I did."

"That's true. Then you say ride forward?"

"Yes."

The horses were once more put in motion, and when they again halted it was opposite the mouth of the alley in Seven Dials leading to the stable in which Black Bess had been placed.

A poor shivering, ragged urchin was shuffling along the street, and Dick beckoned him to come towards him.

"Do you think you could take care of these two horses for a few minutes if I gave you a shilling for doing so?"

"A shilling. Oh! could I not rather. Why, holding 'osses is how I gets my living. I only wishes I could get a shilling off everybody!"

"Well, you shall off me if you mind the horses well, and so you will off my friend here, I know."

"Two shillings!" said the boy, as he made a dart at the bridles. "Oh! won't I have a breakfast, neither!"

The two friends alighted from their horses.

"Walk them gently up and down," said Dick to the boy; "but don't lead them far away. When we come back, we shall want them in a hurry very likely."

"All right, your honour," said the boy, touching his cap.

"Now, Dick," said Tom King, "as you know the ins and outs of this place, and I don't, perhaps you will take the lead."

"I will. Follow me. I have made up my mind to a bold course of action."

"That's right. I like a bold plan best; it always has a better chance of succeeding!"

"Well, my plan is very simple. I assume, in the first place, that Bess is in this stable, and that the officers are there waiting for anyone who may come to fetch her."

"Well?"

"I intend, with your co-operation, to make a bold rush into the stable, overcome all resistance, lead out Black Bess, mount her, and be off, laughing at all pursuit."

"The plan is, I must say, bold enough in all conscience. Still, I like it, and there is every chance of its being successful."

"I am glad you think so. Now, halt a minute! Just round the corner to the right is the stable."

"Oh!"

"Now, quietly! Hark!"

"What's that?"

"A footstep. Cannot you hear it."

"Yes, now quite plainly. Who can it be, I wonder?"

"I have no idea. Draw back a little, and we will see. If it is an officer we must pounce upon him, and make him a prisoner at once."

The two friends got as close to the wall of the alley as they could, and waited.

The footstep approached.

It was a lounging, careless one, as though the walker was in no particular hurry, but merely idling about to pass away the time.

In another moment, now, a strange compound between a man and a boy came round the corner from the direction of the stable.

"Oh! it's all right," said Dick. "It's only Alf!"

"Alf? Who's Alf?"

"Why, the man who looks after the horses. How fortunate we have met him."

"Why?"

"We can get all the information we require that is necessary to make our plan perfect."

"Is he faithful?"

"As a dog. I would trust him to any extent."

"Then, if that is the case, it is indeed fortunate we have met him."

"Hi! Alf! Here!" said Dick, in a suppressed voice, and putting half-a-crown into his eye as our fops now-a-days fix their eye-glasses. "Hi! Alf! Come this way."

The ostler looked up as he heard these words, and his face lighted up with pleasure when he saw Turpin.

He threw off his lounging, shuffling gait, and advanced quickly towards him.

[TURPIN AND KING ATTACK THE OFFICERS IN THE STABLE.]

"Good morning, Alf," said Turpin, dropping the half-crown into his hand. "I want a little imformation from you this morning."

"All right, your honour. I can guess what it is."

"Oh, you can?"

"Yes. It's about your mare that you left here the night before last."

"It is. Quick! tell me. Is she safe and unharmed in the stable where I left her?"

"She be as right as a trivet; but——"

"Thank fate, so far. But what?"

"Well, I'm glad I found you, for, do you know, I have been thinking about you all night, and just as I was deepest in thought about you, I heard you call me."

"Yes, that's right enough. But what were you going to say?"

"Why, Bess is in the stable safe enough. There's old Wriggles and four officers with him taking care that no one fetches her away."

"Just as I told you, Tom."

"Eh?" said Alf.

"Oh! nothing. I merely remarked to my friend here, that things had fallen out just as I supposed they would. By-the-bye, how and when did Mr Wriggles and his men arrive?"

"Ha! ha! ha! ha! ha!" laughed the ostler heartily, and yet in so subdued a way that at a few yards' distance it would have been unheard. "Ha! ha! ha! The werry best joke as ever I heard on. Oh! Squire, you is a rum 'un, you is."

"How did they come?"

"You know how they come. Ha! ha!"

"I know how I started them."

"They come here on horseback, tied back to back."

"Oh! they did?"

"Yes, and when I seed them they looked so outragious comical that I laid down and rolled in the yard, and fairly cried."

"With laughter?"

"Yes. Oh! you should have just seen what a rage Mr. Wriggles was in. His face was black——"

"Good heavens!"

"As a nigger's."

"Was there a countryman with them?"

"A market waggoner?"

"Yes."

"There was."

"And what about him?"

"Oh! poor fellow, he was in a dreadful way. I really felt quite sorry for him."

"Why?"

"Oh! he said you had ruined him. He should lose his place, his vegetables would spoil, and he should get looked up for the damage done. If you had not got off, he said, it would not have mattered, because he would have had the reward."

"Really, I am quite sorry I didnot give in at once, for his sake."

"I dessay you is."

"Is he in the stable with Wriggles?"

"Bless you, no sir! Old Wriggles is a hartful card. If he was in a towering passion, he did not lose his wits. The waggoner knew nothing about Black Bess being in the stable here, though Mr. Wriggles did, so he went off to look after his waggon and team."

"I should think he will stick to it infut ure. It will be a les son to him. Fool that he was, he might have had a handsome sum for giving me a ride to London. I should not have begrudged it him."

"I knows as how you wouldn't, squire. You never begrudges nothink."

"Well, then, this waggoner has gone?"

"Oh! yes. Like the boy's eye."

"And you have not seen him since?"

"No, squire. We haven't seen nothink ofehim."

"That's all right, then. He would hav been an awkward customer at close quarters. And tnow, Alf, we may as well know all about it. Wha did Mr. Wriggles do after the waggoner had gone?"

"Swore above six, and then drank four glasses of brandy!"

"What then?"

"Why, he said as how the stable would prove a first-rate trap, and that he should nab you as sure as eggs ain't bacon, for you would be certain to come after Black Bess!"

"Just how I told you he would reason," said Dick, turning to Tom King.

"Exactly. Go on, Alf!"

"Well, all five of them went into the stable along with the mare, and there they have been ever since."

"How do they employ their time?"

"Oh! they're all right. What with eating, drinking, and telling tales, the time passes pleasantly enough."

"And now, one thing more. Did anyone come here after Black Bess?"

"Yes, a fat man!"

"How did he get on?"

"Why, they nabbed him."

"Have they got him in the stable now?"

"Yes, tied hand and foot!"

"Poor Tom!"

"I was not about when he came, or else I should have given him the office; but he walked into the stable half soaked, and so nabbed he was!"

"How very odd, Tom. It turns out precisely as I said it would."

"It does!"

"Now, Alf, look here!"

"I is looking."

"This gentleman and myself are going to fetch the mare out of the stable, and give the officers a thrashing."

"That's the ticket! And you want me to help," said Alf, turning up his sleeves, and squaring with his fists.

"No, not exactly. That would only get you into trouble. I have got a boy outside with two other horses. Now, you would render me a service, and a great one, if you would keep an eye upon him, for it may, perhaps, be important that they should be close at hand."

"I'll see to it, squire; so that's one trouble less on your mind."

"I am glad to hear you say so, for you are a faithful fellow, and will, I know, keep your word."

"You are right there, squire; but shouldn't I like to help you slip into the officers. Oh! stockings!"

Dick and Tom could not help laughing at Alf as he jumped about the alley, as though engaged with some formidable antagonist.

"Mind the horses Alf, my boy, and you shall have a guinea for your trouble."

"Right! Stand here a minute, and I'll just have a peep."

Alf ran to the mouth of the alley, and then returned.

"Right he is! That boy'll mind 'em all right. I knows him. Now, squire, look here, I can put you up to a dodge!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

TURPIN AGAIN MOUNTS HIS BONNY MARE.—HURRAH FOR A LIFE ON THE ROAD!

"WELL, Alf," asked Dick, as the ostler approached him with a mysterious yet triumphant air, "what is it?"

"A scheme!"

"To get the mare out?"

"Yes."

"And Tom Davis?"

"Who?"

"The fat man they made prisoner."

"Oh! ah! yes! Him as well."

"That's the style, Alf. Let us hear what it is:"

"No, never mind telling you. Just follow me, and I'll show you what it is."

Alf made his way along the alley, and round the corner leading to the stables.

He was closely followed by the two highwaymen.

"Hush!" he said, and he held up his finger for silence.

They trod on tip-toe.

The sound of a voice singing a song in stentorian tones came upon their ears.

"They're making themselves jolly, ain't they?" whispered Alf.

"It seems like it."

"Now, squire, look here. Do you see that round hole there?"

"In the wall, over the stable?"

"Yes."

"I can just see it; but it's so dark."

"All the better. Well that round hole looks out of the hay-loft over Bess's stables."

"I know it does."

"Werry good! Now, do you see this ladder?"

"I understand," said Dick. "You want me to put the ladder up to the hole, and make my way into the stable that road?"

"Egzactly, squire. When you gets up in the hay-loft, creep along carefully to the left, and then you'll come to the stairs leading to the stable. Down' em you go like a shot. The officers is taken by surprise, and in consekence licked—you mount Black Bess, and off you go like a bird!"

"It ain't half a bad scheme, Alf, and I shall put it into execution."

Alf looked pleased.

"As, however," continued Dick, "absolute silence is indispensable, and you are used to moving ladders and I ain't, I will just get you to put that one up to the hole in the loft, and then we will manage the rest. What do you think of the scheme, Tom?"

"Why, I think it is a very good one. They won't dream of our making an entrance through the loft, and so the whole of their attention will be given to the door. What a voice that fellow has, to be sure."

Just as he spoke, the end of a verse had been reached, and then the whole joined in chorus, apparently with great gusto.

Alf took this opportunity to place the ladder against the wall, and the highwaymen mounted it, and were standing in the hay-loft before the chorus was concluded.

According to arrangement, Alf went to the street, so as to look after the boy with the horses.

Comparative silence prevailed after the song was finished, so Turpin and King stood profoundly still. It was no part of their plan to let the officers know they were there before they actually stood before them.

A great quantity of straw was scattered about the floor of the loft, so they were afraid to make the least movement lest the rustling should betray their presence.

"Now, Instone," they heard a voice say, in thick, guttural accents, "it's your turn now, so tip us a good one!"

"Yes, Mr. Wriggles," they heard a voice respond, which they reasonably enough supposed belonged to Instone. "I'll try my best, sir, if you please."

"Order for Instone! Silence, gentlemen, silence."

Mr. Instone now began to troll forth a song, which, however first-rate it may have appeared to his companions, does not, in our eyes, merit reproduction here.

The highwaymen waited again for the chorus, and at last their patience was rewarded.

Quick as thought, for the dawn of the new day was stealing into the sky, and their eyes had become accustomed to the gloom, Dick and Tom made their way to the staircase Alf the ostler had described.

It did not deserve the name of staircase, for it was simply a rude kind of ladder, nailed against the wall.

"Now, Dick," whispered Tom, "look to your pistols!"

"All right!"

"Mine are in good order and fit for instant service. Are you ready?"

"Yes."

"Come on then, at once."

As he spoke these words he descended the ladder with the agility of a monkey.

He reached the ground a second or so before Turpin, but that was all.

They did not pause a moment, but yet they had time to see they were in a long stable divided into several boxes, and that the officers were seated in one opposite the front door.

Uttering a loud shout, which, coming so unexpectedly as it did, struck a panic into the hearts of the officers, Turpin and King crossed the stable.

A table had, by the order of Mr. Wriggles, been carried into it, and around this the officers were seated.

They rose in confusion.

The two highwaymen were among them in a moment.

Then commenced the most desperate struggle that can be well conceived.

The officers had, in point of numbers, the advantage; but our friends, by their determination and energy, soon made the chances equal.

"Give it them, Tom, my boy! On to them! Make them remember this to the last day of their lives. That's it! Down you go!"

The deep potations in which the officers had been indulging diminished the resistance they would have made, though the heavy, straightforward blows which King administered appeared to have a sobering effect.

Mr. Wriggles fought, screamed, yelled, and danced like a madman.

"Take them!" he said. "Capture them! The one is Dick Turpin and the other is Tom King! Take them both, and then what a glorious reward will fall into our hands! Now, Instone, quick to the door! Don't let them escape!"

Instone made a rush to the door, which Turpin was trying to unfasten and fling open, but a terrific blow in the face from Dick's fist laid him prostrate on the ground.

The next minute the door was open.

A gentle light was now diffused through the stable, which enabled Dick to see the state of affairs much better.

Tom Davis he saw was bound hand and foot, but looking upon the highwaymen's proceedings with considerable satisfaction.

While Tom was busily combating those officers who could stand upon their feet, Dick made his way towards Davis, and, taking a clasp-knife from his pocket, cut the bonds by which he was secured.

The landlord's limbs were terribly cramped from being so long in one position, and he was some minutes before he properly regained the use of them.

"Get hold of Bess, Davis, my boy, and lead her out into the yard," whispered Dick, "while I give these fellows here a little more physic. I can see Tom will be glad of my assistance."

So saying, Turpin plunged into the thickest of the fight, leaving Davis to execute his orders.

The officers certainly tried very hard to conquer their assailants, but in vain. No doubt the desperate resistance they made was owing to the exasperation they felt at being so often defeated.

But they were doomed to be defeated once more, for, just as Turpin heard Davis lead his mare out into the yard, he found there were only two officers in a state to show fight.

Dick took one and King the other.

They made short work of them, and they were quickly lying by the side of their companions.

The victory was complete; and, though knives had been drawn and pistols fired, yet none of the combatants had received any injury save that derived from their fists. They found them the most convenient weapons at close quarters.

Turpin and King had, of course, made themselves proficient in every means of defence; so, as they were both excellent boxers and wrestlers, as well as being sober and determined, they could scarcely fail to gain the victory they did, although their foes were so superior to them in numbers.

All five of the officers, Mr. Wriggles included, lay upon the floor of the stable more or less in a state of insensibility.

"Whew, Tom!" cried Turpin, as he wiped the perspiration from his face and went into the yard. "It was warm work, but we have succeeded in our object. Are you hurt?"

"Bruised and battered a little, that's all; but I am unwounded, if that's what you mean."

"I say, though, we ought not to leave them like this. Let's lock them in the stable."

"Good! It shall be done."

King turned the key in the lock.

"I suppose Davis has led Bess into the street along with the other horses. Come on at once; I shall feel another man when I am once more upon her back."

"The change will soon take place," said King, as both hurried along the yard, and round the corner of the alley; "for look, there is Davis just under the archway!"

"And holding Black Bess by the bridle," exclaimed Turpin. "Hurrah! I am a man once more!"

So saying, he ran down the alley, and flinging his arm round his mare's neck, stroked her head and face with his hand.

The noble creature evidently recognized him again, for she uttered a short, low neigh of satisfaction, and returned her master's caress by rubbing her nose into his hand, and on to the sleeve of his coat.

"Now I hope you're happy, Dick," said Tom Davis, after watching the greeting between the highwayman and his steed. "Is your heart at rest?"

"It is, Davis. I don't care a straw now for anything or anybody! One! two! three!"

As he uttered the word "three," Turpin placed his hands on the back of Black Bess, and vaulted lightly into the saddle.

The magnificent animal, so soon as she felt her rider on her back, pranced and reared in the narrow street. She had been so long cooped up that she longed for a gallop into the country.

"Gently, mare, gently!" said Dick. "I will give you the rein presently, and then off you shall go as fast and as far as you like! I shall be better able to appreciate your value now, Bess!"

In the meantime King had taken his seat on the back of his own steed.

"Here, Davis," cried Turpin, "I should advise you to get back to Hornsey as soon as you can. You can take the horse that brought me hither. It is one belonging to Mr. Wriggles's troop, so mount it, and be off!"

"I will, lad, for I can't walk back again. Woa! easy now!"

"With a great deal of exertion, Mr. Davis managed to get into the saddle.

"I think it will be best for us to separate, Davis; so take my thanks with you for the service you have done me."

"Oh, don't mention it. I have done nothing."

"Remember me to Ellen and your missus. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye."

Mr. Davis trotted off down St. Andrew's-street.

"Now, Alf, look alive, my boy, for I want to be going. Here's a guinea for your trouble and assistance."

"Thanks, your honour." said Alf, touching the peak of his cap.

"And give this half-crown to the boy for minding the horses."

"I will. Here, David, here's half-a-crown for you!"

The boy, who had probably never before had so large a sum in his possession at one time, looked at the coin with quite an incredulous air.

"It's a good one," said Dick, "try it."

The boy put it between his teeth, and then, apparently satisfied that it was not counterfeit, vanished round the corner of the street.

Turpin and King laughed heartily.

"Off with you, squire, at once," cried Alf, who was standing just in the alley; "off with you. I'm blest if old Wriggles hasn't broke down the door of the stable. Here he comes."

With a perfect rush, Mr. Wriggles, followed by one of his men, shot out of the alley into the roadway.

He had recovered to some extent from the effects of the injuries he had sustained in the encounter, but his face was considerably damaged.

Two or three streaks of very dark-coloured blood crossed his empurpled visage, which detracted greatly from his personal appearance.

"Help! help!" he cried, in gasping, gurgling tones. "Dick Turpin and Tom King, the highwaymen! Two thousand pounds reward!"

The two friends easily got out of his way, but halted a few yards off.

"Two thousand pounds!" said Mr. Wriggles, "two thousand pounds. Perkins, you fool, why don't you run and catch hold of their bridles?"

Mr. Perkins shook his head ruefully, and with the air of a man who has had quite enough of hard knocks and to spare.

"We had better be off, Dick," said Tom King, "or we shall have all the neighbourhood about our ears."

"It will be quite as prudent."

He gathered the reins in his hand, but before he started he turned round and said, in a loud voice——

"Good-bye, Wriggles, my friend. Good-bye! You may as well give up, for you will never nab me. Take a lesson from experience, and don't be a fool any more. Good-bye!"

Seeing how his prey was slipping through his fingers restored to Mr. Wriggles the power of his voice.

"Seize him! Seize him! A highwayman! Two thousand pounds reward!"

"My eye!" said Alf, the ostler, as he saw the highwayman gallop off towards Charing Cross. "Ain't you coming it strong?"

Muttering a volley of oaths of the most frightful description, and tearing the hair from his head by handfuls, Mr. Wriggles made his way back to the stable of the "Three Tuns."

CHAPTER XXXIII

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN MEET WITH AN ADVENTURE ON THEIR WAY TO THE NEW FOREST.

It was broad daylight, and the sun's rays were tinting the eastern sky when the two highwaymen trotted down Cranbourne-street into Piccadilly.

They deemed it advisable, as there were no signs of pursuit, not to go at a greater speed.

The chances were, if they did, that they would immediately attract attention, and this was a thing they never wished to do.

"Well, now, Dick, we have taken the right road. Have you determined upon setting out on our country excursion at once?"

"I think it will be quite as well, eh! Tom?"

"Most assuredly."

"Oh! I know you are very anxious about it. I expect you have some particular motive, as you are so eager."

"I have not, indeed, except that I am quite tired of London, and feel as though I should like an entire change—go somewhere, in fact, where I had never been before."

"It will be pleasant enough, no doubt. And, another thing, I have had quite enough of Mr. Wriggles to last me for some time; and as, in his vexation, he will doubtless do something desperate, I think, for peace and safety sake, we ought to go."

"So do I, too. You may depend it will be first-rate, and perhaps I shall get a chance of hearing your history?"

"Oh! yes. I promised to relate my early career. I will, too. It's rather a sad story, so I tell you beforehand."

"So is mine."

"Dear me, Tom, was that you?"

"What me?"

"That spoke in that dreadful tone."

"It was. I was unconscious of the change in my voice, but I suppose it was caused by the thoughts that were passing through my mind at the moment."

"They were not very pleasant ones, then, I should think."

"You are right there; they were not, indeed. However, it is quite certain we cannot tell our stories on horseback."

"Not exactly. I shall be glad when we get free of the houses, and then we will have a gallop."

"Which will put an end to all conversation."

"It certainly will. Tom, my friend, I feel lighter-hearted than I have done for many and many a day. I have got my priceless Bess back again, and you may rest assured it will be a long time before I part with her. I am longing for the moment to come when I can let the reins fall upon her neck, and allow her to go at what speed she pleases."

"Is it not a lovely morning?" said King, as the sun rose above the houses, and cast his warm beams upon the roadway. Think how bright and green the fields and hedgerows will look."

"They will. To me there is something very beautiful about the appearance of the country at early morn, when there has been some rain the night before."

"Well, we are close to Knightsbridge now. What do you say to sweeping along a little?"

"With all my heart. Off and away!"

The speed the two highwaymen made during the next few minutes was something prodigious, and they got over the ground at a great rate.

But King's horse, although a most magnificent animal, could not keep pace with Black Bess, who, taking immensely long leaps, sped along with astonishing swiftness.

"Pull in a bit, Dick—pull in!" Tom said. "I can't possibly keep pace with you, and in a minute or two more I shall be half a mile behind."

Upon hearing these words from his friend, Dick reined Bess in, and allowed King to come up with him.

"It's no good your going at that rate," cried Tom. "I should never have believed, though famous for speed as your mare is, that she could have outstripped my horse in such a short distance as this."

"I am convinced, Tom, that there is not a steed in England that could match her either in a long or a short gallop. You have not yet seen what speed she can really go at."

"I can form a tolerable idea. But, come, what course do you propose to take?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I don't know. You mentioned a rather wide district, and I am making my way towards it."

"Just so! Suppose, now, we were to take the Southampton road!"

"I have no objection to make. I should fancy it would be a very profitable place."

"And so should I. Nothing would delight me more than to ease some fire-eating old admiral of his cash."

"Then we are almost sure to meet with one. You have decided upon Southampton?"

"Yes. I don't know any town that would suit so well. What is the state of the exchequer?"

"Oh! tolerable. There's all the booty, except a few guineas, that we took out of the western coach."

"We are not in immediate want, then?"

"By no means; but still we ought not to let anything go by us in the shape of business."

"Oh! no. I am getting very hollow though, so I propose we stop at some house of entertainment hereabouts. Do you know of any?"

Turpin reflected for a minute.

"About five miles further on there is a house I have called at once or twice?"

"What is the sign?"

"The 'Samson and Lion.'"

"Do you know the landlord?"

"Slightly. He is a very superior kind of person to country innkeepers generally, and has evidently at some previous time occupied a very different position to what he does now. I have never trusted him with my name. He knows me only as a chance traveller."

"So much the better. There is the greater chance of our being unmolested."

"There is. Shall you make a stay there?"

"I think not! Why should we?"

"Oh! I see no reason why, only I did not know what your intentions were."

"Why, to push along as fast as possible. We have not seen any signs of pursuit, and really it is such an unusual thing for us to travel by daylight, that I quite enjoy the luxury."

"So do I, and we will indulge in it for some time to come. How long do you think it will take us to reach our destination?"

"It all depends how much we are delayed. I should think some time to-morrow."

"That will suit; and there, just look, a little in advance on the right-hand side of the road there is the 'Samson and Lion.'"

"That large thatched building so surrounded by trees?"

"Yes."

"What a beautiful place! Do you know, Dick, I could make myself very comfortable as landlord of a place like that. Could you?"

"Well, I can't say I could, for it would be too inactive a life to suit me."

"It would have that against it. I suppose you will be better pleased when we place ourselves under the pretender's standard."

"Are you really in earnest about that?"

"I was never more so in my life. Have I not promised? and I never break my word."

"Then, if you go, I am quite willing to accompany you."

"It will be a stirring life for a time, and a good thing for us if he ascends the throne."

"No doubt of that, but the chances of his doing so are, I am afraid, rather slight."

"We must do our best," said King, as they both alighted from their horses, and gave the reins into the hands of a man who was lounging about, and, from his general appearance, connected with the stables.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

DICK'S DESCRIPTION OF THE CHARACTER OF THE LANDLORD OF THE "SAMSON AND LION" TURNS OUT TO BE VERY ERRONEOUS.

"Now, ostler," said Dick, "we are going to stay here a little time, and want these cattle taken care of the while."

The ostler turned the piece of straw he held between his lips over and over several times, during which operation he closely scrutinized our two friends and their steeds.

"Look sharp!" said Tom, impatiently. "We don't want to wait an hour."

"Who wants you?" said the ostler, gruffly. "I never axed you to wait! There's the front door, and if you want anything you'll find Mr. Waghorn in the bar."

"You'd best not be impudent, Mr. Ostler," said Turpin. "I'm waiting to see these horses taken into the stable and properly fed."

"Oh! you is, is you? Don't you wish you may get it! We never allows no strangers in our stables."

Turpin was about to make some angry rejoinder, when King stayed him.

"My friend, you don't seem over civil, but just listen to me!"

The ostler turned the straw in his mouth, but said nothing.

"You'll find it to your advantage, I fancy," said King. "We are a couple of gentlemen who think very highly of our cattle, and, therefore, make it a practice of seeing they are properly attended to, which is never anything out of the ostler's way."

King drew a crown-piece from his pocket as he spoke, and placed it in the ostler's hand.

The touch of the silver upon his palm produced a magical effect upon his behaviour, for he said, with great deference—

"I see, now, you is gentlemen, though at first sight you don't look it, either of you!"

Turpin and King both regarded each other, and then noticed the disordered state of their apparel, after which they ceased to wonder at the ostler's suspicions.

"The fact is, my friend," said King, "we got into a little bit of a scrape, last night. That's a thing, you know, which often happens to gentlemen."

The surly ostler deigned to smile.

"Follow me, gentlemen," he said. "You shall see your horses fed, and I'll warrant I do it to your satisfaction."

"You will, if you comply with our directions. We have our own idea about feeding them, and I dare say it differs from yours."

"All right, sir. Come along!"

Turpin and Tom followed the ostler round a corner of the building, and then at the further end of a large yard they saw the stables, which appeared, for the size of the inn itself, to be unusually large and commodious.

It was always a practice with our two friends to ascertain precisely where their horses could be found, in case anything should occur to make such a knowledge all-important to them.

They were also very careful to learn exactly in what manner the stable door was fastened.

"Put them here, just opposite the door," said King, as they entered. "Don't take the bridles off, but give them a small quantity of corn."

The ostler, who was sagacious enough to know that he would earn most by doing their bidding, obeyed.

"And now," said Turpin, taking some money out of his pocket, and giving it to the ostler, "go up to the bar and fetch half-a-pint of rum."

"Half-a-pint of rum?"

"Yes. What is there extraordinary in that?"

"Oh! nothing—nothing," said the ostler, leaving the stable.

He returned in about five minutes with the measure of spirits in his hand.

Turpin took it from him, as he said—

"And now I want a pail about half full of clean water; take particular care that it is clean."

The ostler obeyed these orders with considerable curiosity as to what Turpin was going to do.

His surprise was very great when he saw Turpin empty half the quantity of the rum into the bucket, and give it to Bess, who drank it eagerly.

"There's a wrinkle for you," said Dick, to the ostler, observing his look of astonishment. "That mare's like a Christian, and now she has drank that will travel fifty—nay, I would not be afraid to say a hundred miles without pausing for breath or refreshment."

"Gammon!" said the ostler.

"It is a fact, and I would back her to do it for a hundred pounds!"

"Be cautious, Dick," whispered Tom, "or you will raise the man's suspicions."

"True," returned Dick, in the same tone, "I forgot myself, but I am always carried away when I begin to praise her."

"There's only one horse that could do such a thing," said the ostler, "and that is Turpin's famous mare, Black Bess!"

"Pho! pho! my man; I would back my mare against the highwayman's any day!"

"Ah! it's very strange, but yours seems quite black!"

"It is, but there is nothing extraordinary in that, I imagine. But come, never mind, get another bucket of water for my friend's horse, and make haste, for I am badly in want of my breakfast, and the business, too, which I am upon is very urgent, and will admit of no delay."

The water was brought, the remainder of the rum emptied into it, and then given to King's horse, who seemed to like it quite as well as Black Bess

"Be good enough, now,' said Turpin, as he set down the pail, "to show us the way to the house."

"This way, if you please. You can see the door just opposite."

"Come along with us, and you shall have something to drink at the bar."

"Thanks, sir—much obliged," replied the ostler, leading the way.

Turpin whispered to his friend.

"He has not looked the door," he said, "but merely pulled it to, so if there is occasion we can easily get at the stable."

"I almost fear he suspects who we are. It was rather foolish of you to say what you did."

"Very foolish, indeed. I am now fully sensible of my folly. However, it cannot be helped, so we must make the best we can of a bad bargain."

"There's nothing else left for us to do. But, hush! here we are."

They entered the inn as they spoke.

It was a curious building, only one storey high, and seemed to have been converted into, and not built for, its present purpose. The door, through which they passed, opened into a kitchen of very great extent, in which were two or three people only, and they apparently belonging to the house.

The landlord, who was a very gentlemanly-looking man, came forward as soon as he perceived his guests, and bade them welcome.

"We shall not stay long!" said Tom King, "because our business is important and will admit of no delay."

"Still," said the landlord, with a smile, "you cannot travel without taking something substantial now and then in the shape of refreshment."

"That's true enough," said Turpin. "So bring us something that will suit us for breakfast. What have you got cooked in the house, for I can't stay while you prepare anything?"

"I have a nice round of beef, cold, that was boiled yesterday, if that will suit?"

"The very thing. Bring it at once, with a good nagon of your October ale to wash it down."

"Very good, gentlemen," said the landlord.

"A-hem! Dick!"

"What is it, Tom?"

"Didn't you tell me you knew the landlord here?"

"Well, only as seeing him occasionally. It is some time since I was here last, and he appears to have forgotten me."

"What do you think of him? I mean, what is your opinion of his character?"

"Oh! I hardly know. I have not noticed much, except that he seems a superior man to what people of his class generally are."

"Ah! yes. Have you looked no further?"

"No. What in the world are you driving at? Why don't you speak out? Do you see anything to cause suspicion?"

"Well, yes."

"What is it, my friend? Tell me at once. Do not keep me a longer in suspense!"

"Hush! come a little closer to me, and do not speak so loud. I am a bit of a physiognomist, and I invariably make a study of the countenance of every one I come in contact with. Now, I have studied the landlord's countenance here, and though at the first glance it seems open and candid enough, yet a little closer observation showed me that he was not all he professed to be."

"Very likely," said Dick. "Few are!"

"You misunderstand me. That man, Dick, mark my words, is a rascal, and we have everything to fear from him in case he should suspect who we are! Beneath the superficial aspect of his countenance is written plainly treachery and deceit! Do you notice what a long while it has taken him to execute our order?"

"You are strangely suspicious, Tom."

"It is because I scent danger in the air in which it is most to be feared—treachery!"

"We can but be on our guard, then, and prepared for anything that may happen. He is certainly a long time gone, but still that may, perhaps, arise from some very natural causes. I will look closer at him when he returns."

"You can do that now," said Tom, "for here he comes."

As he spoke, Mr. Waghorn entered, carrying a tray, on which was placed a large piece of cold beef and a tankard of ale.

"I am afraid," he said, as he put the comestibles on the table—"I am afraid, gentlemen, you will consider I have been a long time gone; but as I can see you are gentlemen, and expressed a wish to have some of my old October, I took the trouble to go down in the cellar and tap a fresh barrel on purpose for you."

"We are obliged by your attention," said Turpin, fixing his keen eyes upon the landlord's face. "Here's a health to all!"

Turpin drank some of the ale.

"Upon my word, that's good," he said. "Capital! And yet," he added, wetting his lips with his tongue, "it has left a strange taste behind it."

King started.

"A strange taste?" repeated the landlord, "impossible. You must have had something in your mouth. Why, that is the very best ale in my cellar. You taste it, sir."

These last words were addressed by Mr. Waghorn to Tom King, who raised the drink in his hands, and swallowed a small quantity.

"What do you think of it, sir?"

"It certainly has a peculiar smatch with it which I cannot say I like. You had better bring us some more."

Mr. Waghorn, with a look of deep vexation on his face, which might arise from two causes, left the room.

"Dick, my friend," said Tom, as soon as the landlord was out of earshot, "I was right. He is a rascal, and we have fallen into the lion's den. That ale was drugged. I recognised the peculiar flavour instantly."

"Drugged!" said Turpin, springing to his feet.

"Sit down, Dick, we will see it all right. I have not the smallest doubt left on my mind but that he suspects who we are. Either he has come to the conclusion himself, or the ostler has communicated it to him. If the latter, you have only yourself to blame, and perhaps it will be a lesson not to talk so incautiously as you did to the ostler in the stable about your mare Black Bess. The landlord here, knowing we should be likely to make a desperate resistance, conceived the plan of drugging the ale, which would render us helpless. In the meantime, he has sent off for some assistance."

This was spoken in a suppressed, emphatic whisper.

"If this is so," said Turpin, "he shall rue the day. I"——

"Sit down, my friend, and be silent. Let us assure ourselves that we are right before we proceed to action. Don't look so excited, for, hark! here comes Mr. Waghorn."

Dick assumed as great an appearance of calmness as he could, and then said—

"But this second lot of ale, Tom?"

"I shall drink it without scruple. He knows now we are on the watch, and should notice any little peculiarity in the flavour. You may rely upon it there will be no danger in drinking this. I will taste it first.'

"Do so! do so!"

Mr. Waghorn reached the table at which our friends were sitting, and placing down another tankard of ale, said—

"There, gentlemen, I have tried that myself, and think you will find it all right. I cannot for the life of me conceive what was the matter with the other. I assure you it was drawn from the very choicest cask in my cellar."

"Oh! this is better," said Tom, as he handed the ale to his friend. "Try it."

Turpin had a wholesome dread of the effect of drugs, so having had so narrow an escape, he this time scarcely swallowed a mouthful.

"Yes; that's an improvement on the other. I can't get the taste of it out of my mouth. Come, Tom, make haste with what you are eating. It is quite time we were off.

"You are making a short stay at the 'Samson and Lion.' Are you going far, gentlemen?"

"Yes, landlord, we are on rather a long journey, and have no time to spare. For myself, I have done, and am ready now, as soon as my friend has finished.

"Pray make yourselves comfortable, gentlemen. I will in hopes we should have had you here as guests a little longer."

Mr. Waghorn more left the room and closed the door after him. Then the two highwaymen noticed something that had before escaped their observation, namely, that those persons who were in the apartment when they entered had now one and all left it. It was in itself a simple enough circumstance, but after what had occurred, Turpin was disposed to eye it with suspicion.

"I have started you off," said King, "and you are just as suspicious now as you were blindly confiding a little while ago. I suppose you would say, 'Let us go at once?'"

"Certainly!"

"Then I don't. You may depend we can't much increase the danger by remaining a little longer, so make a good meal in peace, as I intend to do. We have, perhaps, been alarming ourselves with a shadow."

"Not so, my friend—not so; I feel quite convinced of that. I can feel something at my heart which tells me I am in greater peril than ever I have been in before."

"Fancy, Dick, fancy! though generally speaking I am not disposed to disregard those inward monitors. I believe that our more subtle nature is able to apprehend danger before the grosser part, but with you it arises from having drank some liquid which you believe to have been drugged."

Turpin rose to his feet, and walked impatiently about the room.

"You take it very coolly, Tom," said Dick. "Take my advice, and let us leave this place at once. It is impossible to tell what extra peril we incur each moment we remain! Look, Tom, there is that surly-looking ostler, with a most villanous expression on his face, just prowling across the yard. Tom, I tell you, I will stay here no longer!"

Turpin was in a greater state of alarm and agitation than ever his companion had seen him in.

"Why, Dick, positively I don't know you. You who, in the hour of danger, are generally so calm and self-possessed, to show so much—terror shall I call it—as this? Really, I cannot understand it!"

Dick was annoyed.

"I do not feel inclined to risk my liberty by staying here any longer. The danger, Tom, is, I am confident, much greater than you imagine, so let me persuade you to leave at once!"

"I will, Dick," replied Tom King, "leave at once. It is not worth while for us to disagree about such a trifle. Come on, I am ready!"

"I am glad of that," said Turpin; "and now let us get to our cattle as quickly as possible. But it strikes me most forcibly we shall be prevented in some way!"

"You magnify the danger. I can't make you out. You seemed quite unnerved. Surely, the small quantity of drugged ale that you drank has not had that effect upon you!"

"I cannot tell, Tom, I am sure; but I do feel very strangely. Ha! We are caught! Done for!"

"What do you mean? What is it?"

"Turn round, Tom," was the reply, "and look!"

King had his back to the window, and in obedience to his companion's words, he turned round and looked through it.

"Good heavens, Dick!" he said, "there is danger indeed. The yard is full of officers!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

MR. WAGHORN COMES OUT IN RATHER STRONG COLOURS, AND SO DOES JACK THE OSTLER.

THIS was a sight which would not fail to fill the breasts of the two highwaymen with consternation, but before we relate what they did upon making such a discovery, it is necessary we should inform the reader how it was the officers in such force came to be in the yard of the "Samson and Lion."

The incautious words which Turpin had uttered in praise of his mare Black Bess raised a suspicion in the mind of the ostler which every moment increased.

It will be remembered that Dick tried as well as he could to allay the man's suspicions, and had taken him with him to the bar, where he had told the landlord to give him what he liked to have to drink, and then leaving them made his way with his companion into the kitchen.

The ostler chose three-pennyworth of gin neat, and when Mr. Waghorn came back to the bar to execute the orders given to him by his guests, the ostler said—

"Mr. Waghorn! Mr. Waghorn!"

"Yes, you villain."

"No hard words, now. Did you look at the coves in the kitchen?"

"Confound your impudence, what's that to you? Be off."

"Mr. W., don't be a fool. This will be a good day for us."

"Oh! bother."

"It will. Those men represent a sum of somewhere about fifteen hundred pounds!"

"Fif—fifteen"—

"Hundred pounds!" iterated the ostler.

The landlord stared aghast.

"What do you mean?" he said; "speak out, you fool, do."

"Oh! go and be hanged," said the ostler, who did not seem to be over particular as to how he addressed his master.

Mr. Waghorn shook his fist.

"Listen!" said the ostler, catching him by the arm, and dragging him towards him, and whispering in his ear—

"Dick Turpin!"

"The devil?"

"Tom King!"

"Why don't you say what you have to say at once," said Mr. Waghorn. "Do you mean to tell me that our guests are those two notorious highwaymen — Dick Turpin and Tom King?"

"I does, governor. There's not no sort of mistake about it."

"And what do you say the reward is?"

"Fifteen hundred pounds!"

"What a sum, Jack!"

"It is, that's certain. Why, it's more nor we could make if we worked hard for a year."

"Silence! Have I not told you a thousand times never to allude to what we do?"

"All right, guv'ner. No harm done. I didn't say nothink, only a guilty conscience needs no accuser. I 'spose you intend to nab these highflyers?"

"Oh! yes, I should like; but how are we to do it? They are desperate fellows, and won't give in without a hard struggle, you may depend."

"Lor, guv'ner, do you mean to say you don't know how to make them 'ere as harmless as two blessed babbies?"

"No!"

"What have they ordered?"

"Some cold beef and ale. I must make haste, or my long absence will perhaps rouse their suspicion."

"Cut along, then, and just put some of this in the ale!"

The ostler, as he spoke, handed the landlord a small packet containing a white powder.

"What is this, Jack?"

"Oh! a soother, that's all. Just put it in the ale and stir it up, and if they drink it they will be all right in half-an-hour."

"But suppose they should not drink it; what then, Jack, eh?"

"Don't you think they will?"

"Oh! I don't know, they are very suspicious fellows, and they might fancy they tasted something."

"So they might."

Jack, the ostler, scratched his head.

"That's no obstacle," he said, after a pause. "I'll tell you how to manage it. Get them to drink the ale if you can, and I will mount a horse and ride to Guildford and fetch some officers. I can be back in half-an-hour."

"But the reward, Jack?"

"That'll be right. Can't you see that is the only way to make sure of it?"

"Not at all. The officers will want to share it, and then it won't be worth our while."

"You don't see the thing right yet. Get them to drink the ale if you can. Should they do so, they will in ten minutes afterwards be dead drunk, and incapable of moving in the least. When this happens, all you will have to do will be to get some ropes and bind them securely. Do you understand?"

The landlord nodded.

"When the officers come, then, supposing the highwaymen to drink the ale, they will not have to capture them, for they will be already captured, and, therefore, will not be able to claim any part of the reward."

"You're a sharner chap, Jack, than I gave you credit for being."

"Oh! I knows a thing or two. And now, look at the case in another light. Suppose as they don't drink the ale and get suspicions like. What must you do?"

"I look to you, Jack, to know."

"Why, you must smooth things off as well as possible, and when you go out lock the door after you. Before they can escape, I shall be back with the officers, and then they can nab them, we going shares in the reward. So, you see, guv'ner, we makes sure of summut, let things turn out as they will."

"Unless, after all, they should make their escape. I tell you, Jack, they are daring fellows."

"May be—may be. But they won't be daring enough to get off this time. I wager. Now, guv'ner, take in the grub, and I'll be off for the officers. I shall be back in half-an-h ur."

"Very good, Jack."

We have seen how the landlord took in the drugged ale, and how, in consequence of their putting too large a dose in it, the highwaymen had found it out, and were upon their guard, ready to defend their liberties with their lives, and how they looked through the window and saw the yard full of officers.

The ostler's plan was a very good one, and he certainly deserves credit for his ingenuity in devising it; but we have yet to explain how it was he got back with the officers so much before the time he had mentioned.

The fact was that, as he was on his road to Guildford, he saw a largeish body of men approaching him, and when he got nearer he found they were police-officers conveying a prisoner from Guildford to London.

A few words sufficed to make them aware of the posture of affairs, and they pushed forward as rapidly as they could.

They reached the "Samson and Lion" in less than ten minutes, and eight of them alighted from their horses, leaving the remainder to keep guard over the prisoner.

By the ostler's directions they came round to the back and into the inn-yard, and they were advancing in a body to the door when Turpin called Tom's attention to them.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

TURPIN AND KING MEET WITH NOTHING BUT DANGER ON EVERY SIDE, AND BEGIN TO LOSE ALL HOPE.

THE position of our two friends was certainly very critical, and really we do not see how they possibly can make their escape this time from the toils that have been spread around them by the cunning ostler and the landlord of the "Samson and Lion," of whom Turpin had had such a good opinion.

But he was destined before long to make one or two very startling and unexpected discoveries in connexion with Mr. Waghorn and his mode of life.

We must not anticipate.

On perceiving the officers in such numbers, the two highwaymen stood for a moment irresolute. They knew not how to act.

Tom King made a dash at the door.

"Fast!" he said, as he found he was unable to move it in the least.

We must beg our readers to remember that in the good old times, as some eccentric people call them, things were made in a very much more substantial manner than they are at present. Now-a-days a thing is not thought good unless it is light and fragile, but our forefathers thought nothing was good unless it was cumbersome and heavy.

So with this door at the "Samson and Lion." Had it been such a one as we see in our modern dwellings, it would scarcely have opposed Tom in the least; but, as it was, he was unable to shake it even, for it was made of stout oak, and weighty and strong enough to have served for the door of a prison.

"What is to be done, Dick?" asked King. "I am sorry I disregarded your foreboding as I did. It was foolish of me, and if you get into any trouble on my account through my obstinacy, I shall never forgive myself. Silence!"

A subdued murmuring sound came from the other side of the kitchen door.

It was the officers in consultation as to what they should do.

The two highwaymen listened intently, but all they could hear was now and then a word spoken in a louder tone than the others, but, of course, from this they could glean no sort of information.

"What course shall we pursue, Dick?" asked King. "What plan will be the best to adopt?"

"That is very hard to determine," replied Turpin, as he glanced round the room.

"It is. You are right enough there, and I look to you to devise some mode of operations."

"You must assist."

"We must be quick, too, or we shan't have a chance," said Tom, as he heard three heavy knocks given on the panel of the kitchen door.

"What is to be done? I am quite at a loss to think. We may as well, though, come away from the door, for it is quite evident we cannot make our escape that way."

"Not exactly; though, if nothing better turns up, I—— What's that?"

A key rattled in the lock.

"I forgot, Dick," said King. "Of course the door is locked on the outside, and they can come in when they think proper."

"No, they cannot," replied Turpin.

As he spoke, he sprang suddenly to the door, and, before the person who held the key could turn it in the lock, he slipped a couple of strong iron bolts into their sockets.

"They'll have to undo them before they get in," he said, after executing this feat.

The man, whoever it was, turned the key in the lock and shot back the bolt.

Then he paused.

He evidently hesitated to lift the latch and enter, for he by repute well knew the dangerous characters he had to deal with.

At last he summoned courage, and lifted the latch, expecting, of course, that the door would swing open to his hand.

To his surprise it was fast.

"They have bolted it on the inside," shouted a voice, in loud enough tones to penetrate through the thick oak, for the two friends heard them distinctly.

Then there was a murmuring sound.

"Batter it down! batter it down! Take them alive or dead!"

"Alive, if you please," said another voice; "and then we gets our blood money!"

The next moment a violent assault was made upon the door.

But while this was taking place, Turpin and King had not been idle. They had together made a very careful examination of the room, but the result of it was by no means to their advantage.

The thought of escape by the window of course occurred to them, but they found it was one that did not open, such being the fashion of making them at a time when the necessity of ventilation and fresh pure air was not so well understood as at present.

The window was, besides, protected with a number of iron bars, which effectually put an end to all hope of their making their exit that way.

The wily ostler had, doubtless, taken care to make the officers acquainted with that fact, or they would have endeavoured to make their way through it into the room.

The two highwaymen looked around them in despair.

Nowhere could they see the slightest probability of making their escape.

"I am afraid it is all up with us, Tom," said Dick, "and that we shall be nabbed at last. The only thing that remains for us to do is to fight it out when the grabs enter. But what possible chance can we stand against so many?"

"None at all!"

"You should have taken my advice. I knew we were in great danger, that's why I was so anxious and agitated."

[TURPIN AND KING ESCAPE FROM THE "SAMSON AND LION."]

"Don't say a word about that, Dick. I know it's all my fault, and that if anything happens to you I shall have to answer for it. How they are banging at the door! They will have it down in a few minutes."

The din was something terrific.

The officers had evidently been supplied with some heavy battering instrument, for the blows came upon the door with great force, and the thick panels were beginning to crack in many places.

Then it started a little from its hinges.

The officers gave loud shouts as they perceived this symptom of yielding, and increased their efforts.

"Well, Dick," said Tom, "it's no good our standing here like this. It appears to me that, since we can't get out, the best thing we can do is to delay as long as we can the officers making an entrance."

"To be sure, that will be it. Help me move this table. There, now! push the end close up to the door, and then we must get something to wedge between it and the wall."

"That will be the ticket. We shall stop them for a little while, that's certain; and now let us resolve what we are to do."

The police must have had some idea that a barrier had been put before the door, for some one cried in a loud, authoritative voice—

"Resistance is worse than useless, so give in at once. We are bound to take you, for you cannot possibly escape. Yield, therefore, with a good grace, to superior numbers, and prevent the needless spilling of blood."

The officer waited a minute or two for a reply, but none was made.

"Surrender!" he cried again; "it will be the best policy. We will give you three minutes to open the door. If you do not do so at the expiration of that time, the consequences be on your own heads."

No. 9.
GRATIS with this Number, the SPLENDID COLOURED PICTURE: CLAUDE DUVAL DANCING A CORANTO WITH THE LADY ON THE HEATH.

The three minutes elapsed, but no sound of any kind came from the kitchen.

"Curse you both, then!" yelled the officer, in a great rage. "I will not be played with any longer. Draw your pistols! Make ready! Present them to the door! Fire!"

There was a stunning report arising from the discharge of about six or seven pistols.

The bullets crashed through the door and lodged in the wall opposite.

The officers waited until the smoke had cleared away, and then as all was still silent as before, they began again to hammer at the door.

Neither Turpin nor King were in the way of the shots that came into the kitchen, for they had resorted to the only outlet there was to the room, and that was the door at the top of the cellar steps.

It was simply the instinct of wishing to get as far as possible away from their foes, and placing an additional barrier between them, that made Turpin and King take refuge behind this door.

To be sure, doing so did not better their condition in the least; but still, as Tom remarked, while securing the cellar door on the inner side, it could not possibly make it any worse.

A crashing sound, now mingled with the blows upon the kitchen door, which plainly enough told our friends that it was giving way before the vigorous assault that was made upon it.

They were surrounded by utter darkness.

Unfortunately the door at the top of the cellar steps, behind which were the two highwaymen, was rather a slight one, and there was certainly no hope that it would withstand for any length of time a resolute attack upon it.

"Come away from the door, Tom," said Dick to his friend. "You are in danger of receiving a chance shot."

"I am almost afraid to move in this strange place. I can hear your voice plain enough, and tell to a trifle whereabouts you are standing, but as for seeing you it is quite out of the question.

"Will it be safe, think you, to show a light?"

"Oh! yes; I should think so. But have you the means about you for procuring one?"

"Certainly. I am never without. Stop a moment; we will soon see what kind of a place we are in."

Turpin took from his pocket a small lanteru, which, considering the state of the manufacturing arts at the period, was certainly a wonderful object. It carried a small wax taper, which Dick ignited by means of a phosphorous match, then, and for many years afterwards, called thieves' matches, because when they were first invented they were almost exclusively used by members of that fraternity, who found them exceedingly useful.

The flame from the taper which Dick lighted was only a tiny one, and by itself would scarcely have dispersed the gloom for a foot around it, but placed in the lantern, which was fitted with a reflector of highly polished silver, and a lens of peculiar construction, Dick was enabled by its means to cast a broad, bright beam of light in any direction he thought proper.

Holding it by the handle, the highwayman moved the lantern rapidly about, and flashed the light upon all the objects by which he was surrounded.

In this way, then, the two friends were enabled to form a tolerably correct idea of the kind of place they were in.

They found they were standing at the head of a flight of steep brick steps, leading down apparently into the cellars of the "Samson and Lion."

It must be remembered that though it has taken us some time to relate what occurred after the two highwaymen passed through this door, yet a few moments elapsed in reality until Dick lighted his lantern.

A terrific crash at this moment announced that the officers had succeeded in entirely demolishing the door.

Then arose a loud shout of triumph and gratification, which was quickly changed into one of surprise and disappointment at finding the room empty and their prey nowhere to be seen.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

TURPIN AND KING DISCOVER THE SECRET OF MR. WAGHORN'S OCCUPATION.

"TREAD carefully, Tom," said Dick to his companion, not, however, raising his voice above a whisper. "The stairs are wet and slippery, and if you lose your footing you will bring the officers upon us at once. Follow me; we may perhaps succeed in placing another door between ourselves and our foes!"

Dick commenced the descent of the steps.

"Hold!" said King, in a whisper. "Listen!"

Some kind of altercation seemed to be going on in the kitchen, and both listened intently, for they might hear something that would be of service to them.

Suddenly they heard a rapid rush of footsteps across the kitchen, and something plump against the door.

"I tell you, you shan't! Not one of you! You should have broken down the door sooner before they escaped! You must not—shall not pass through this door unless it is over my dead body!"

The friends recognised the voice.

It was Mr. Waghorn, the landlord's.

They looked at each other, as well as they could, in that dim place, with astonishment depicted upon their features.

Before, however, they could communicate with each other by words, they heard a harsh voice reply to Mr. Waghorn, and all their faculties were bent to hear what this voice said.

"Stand away from the door, Mr. Waghorn! Your conduct is singularly suspicious, and almost sufficient to warrant my taking you into custody; besides which, you are interrupting officers in the discharge of their duty. Let us pass at once, for every minute that we delay only gives them a better chance of ultimate escape! If you do not stand aside at once, my men shall force you away, and you will besides have to account for your extraordinary behaviour!"

"What can be the meaning of this?" asked King, still speaking below his breath. "I am fairly puzzled! What do you think, Dick?"

"Simply this. There is something here which Mr. Waghorn does not wish found out."

"It must be that. I wonder what it can be?"

"Ah! that I cannot tell. However, one thing I think is certain; and that is, that it will turn out to our advantage if we immediately act upon what we have heard."

"I think it very likely. Lead on, my friend! How fast they are talking, to be sure! How is this adventure to terminate?"

Very carefully the highwaymen descended the greasy steps, holding by the dank walls as they went.

They reached in a moment or two the bottom of the steps, and found themselves in a vault or cellar of considerable extent.

There was no light in this place, with the exception of that which proceeded from Turpin's lantern; this, however, was amply sufficient to light up, one after another, every nook and corner in the vault.

From the landlord's manner, both Turpin and King had expected to find something of a very extraordinary nature in this place, and no words can possibly express how much surprised they felt when they found it was absolutely empty.

Scarcely crediting that their eyes had not deceived them, they made again a rapid examination of the cellar.

But no; nothing was there. Not so much even as a barrel or a jar.

"Well, this beats all," said Dick. "Why, the landlord must be a perfect maniac. What earthly reason could he have had for wishing to prevent the officers coming here? This is a mystery, indeed!"

"You are right there, mystery is the word! Recollect we have only made a most cursory examination of the place. Lend me the light, and I will examine it more closely. I only hope Mr. Waghorn will keep the officers long enough at bay to enable me to have a good look about me. They seem to be going it now!"

The subdued murmuring sound of many voices reached their ears in one indeterminate hum.

Tom King took the little lantern from Turpin's hand, and, casting its light downwards, made a careful exploration of the floor.

There was nothing to recompense him for his trouble.

the flooring was uniformly composed of very-much abraded bricks, but there was nothing in any part of it that indicated a secret outlet, which was what King was looking for, and what he fully expected to find.

He rose from his stooping posture with a feeling of annoyance.

"I can find nothing, Dick. Surely it must be a secret entrance into some other place that Mr. Waghorn is afraid the officers will discover."

"Very likely that is it," said Turpin, turning away from the foot of the stairs where he had been standing while King made his search; "very likely. Look round the walls, and see if you can find anything."

"That is our last hope," said Tom, as he bit by bit examined the walls of the vault with the lantern.

"Mr. Waghorn is still speaking," said Dick. "I feel curious beyond measure to know what he can possibly have said to delay the officers so long as he has. I"——

A sudden exclamation from his comrade's lips arrested the remainder of his speech.

"This way, Dick," cried Tom; "I have discovered it at last."

Turpin hastened towards his friend, and found him standing in a little recess, almost cupboard-like in shape, from the right-hand side of which opened a small door.

Dick's astonishment was very great.

"How could we possibly have missed seeing this door? Why I, when we first examined the place, cast the light of the lantern into it."

"I know you did; but are you not aware the light fell only upon the wall opposite to you, leaving the sides of the recess in deep shadow? Now, as you see, it is from the side of the recess that the small door opens."

"I see."

"There does not appear to be the least attempt at concealment, and that, very likely, is one reason why we did not see it."

Dick laughed.

"We must not stay now to go into that subject," he said. "Quick, pass through the door, for, hark! the sounds of contention up above grow louder every moment."

"Come on, then," said Tom, as he passed through the mysterious portal; "I am ready."

Dick pressed through close behind him, and secured the door as well as he could.

Just as he did so, he heard the officers descend the steps with a rush.

He turned to his friend, who was a foot or two in advance of him, for the door they had so providentially found was at the commencement of an arched passage.

"The officers are in the cellar," he said, in a low voice, for he did not know how plainly sounds from the place he was in could be heard in the outer cellar. "Mr. Waghorn has not succeeded in his attempt to prevent them doing so, as I most devoutly wish he had."

King made no reply to this speech, but, looking carefully around on all sides of him, made his way as quickly as he could along the passage.

It was quite impossible to see its extremity, so they were forced to the conclusion that it was of considerable length.

There was nothing remarkable in its appearance. The walls and roof were composed of old red bricks, but the floor of nothing but hard earth.

At last, after proceeding about twenty yards, they came to another door, which was the termination of the passage.

Rough bands of iron crossed this door in many directions, and were fastened at short distances by large nails, the heads of which projected at least three-quarters of an inch from the woodwork.

The two friends both looked at this door, and mentally calculated its strength. They raised their eyes at the same moment.

"This is a barrier!" said King. "It strikes me we have done for ourselves at last, for here we are like rats in a trap—and hark! the officers have discovered the door through which we have just passed."

Some heavy blows, and the shaking of the door in its frame, reverberated with unpleasant plainness along the passage.

"We mustn't give up, Tom, for all that. It's a ticklish situation to be in, to be sure, but we must make the best of it."

Bang! bang! bang! bang! came the blows on the door.

"We must get through, and that quickly," added King, "if we wish to preserve ourselves skin-whole. If they were to take it into their heads to fire through that door, as they did through the other, we should stand but a poor chance of escaping the bullets."

"We should, indeed," said Turpin, feeling in a moment the full danger of their situation. "This door must be forced."

"But how are we to do it? It's all very well to say the door must be forced, but such a job as that would require both tools and time, neither of which we have just at present."

"That's true enough. Have you tricd the door, though? If you recollect, the one at the top was not fastened, and perhaps this is not."

"Perhaps not," said King, seizing upon the supposition with a feeling of hope springing up in his breast. "It's no go," he added, almost immediately; "the door is as firm as a rock."

A silence of a minute or two followed this announcement, and then both the highwaymen felt how very tightly they had laid hold of this faint hope.

A look of desperation quickly succeeded upon their faces the one of disappointment they had worn, and both began to examine their weapons.

The altercation between the landlord and the officers seemed to be by no means over. The blows had ceased, and therefore the voices could be heard plainly enough, though not the words that were uttered.

This cessation of attack on the part of the officers the friends felt boded no good to them; and in that strange place, into which they had so imprudently ventured, they waited with great anxiety to know what would happen next.

The peculiar accents of Mr. Waghorn's voice rose above all the others.

Dick had placed the lantern on the floor, and with its lens turned towards the door they were so anxious to penetrate, so that the greater part of it was lighted up with great distinctness.

As, however, Turpin raised his eyes from the priming of his pistols, and looked towards this iron-bound door, he uttered a slight exclamation.

Tom King was standing with his back to him, and he turned round instantly.

"What is it?" he said.

Dick placed his hand upon the door.

"We are a couple of fools," he replied. "We have been troubling ourselves all this while to break open this door, and the key in the lock all the time."

"Impossible."

"One would think so. But look, here it is; my eye lighted upon it by the greatest wonder in the world."

"Your sight must be very keen, my friend. Of course, now I can see it; but it is a very small key for so large and so heavy a door."

"It is. I am quite surprised. And yet key it must be; still I can see no signs of a lock."

"Nor I. Turn it, my friend, quickly, and try. The officers have renewed their attack upon the door."

"And as if they meant to break it down, too. Whatever can they be striking it with?"

"Axes, I should say, by the peculiar sound. If it is so, they will soon have it down. Does the door yield?"

"Yes."

"Hurrah!"

It was in quite a faint way that King said "Hurrah!" but he gave a sigh of relief as he did so. Then, catching up the lantern, he followed his friend, and closed the door quickly after him.

Dick had taken the key out of the lock, and so it was soon inserted in the keyhole, and the door locked on the other side.

Both then became sensible that they were in a much warmer atmosphere than they had been previously.

There was, too, a strange, sickly smell pervading it.

But although they felt this, neither alluded to it by speech at present, but turned their attention to making the door as capable of resisting an attack as their means would permit.

They were in hopes of finding some bolts on the inner side, but they saw none. Apparently the only fastening the door ordinarily had was the lock.

"I remember once, Tom, being in a place underneath a woodman's hut, and I thought that about the strangest subterraneous place there well could be, but this beats it alt ogether!"

"It is a strange place," said King, as he glanced around him; "but before we examine it at all let us try if we cannot find some means of barricading the door."

"There ought to be two bars somewhere; for look, Tom, here are the staples on each post."

"And here is one of the bars," said King, raising a large piece of iron from the ground.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

DICK AND TOM RATHER PREMATURELY CONGRATULATE THEMSELVES UPON HAVING MADE THEIR ESCAPE.

It was with a sensation of much greater security and satisfaction than he had hitherto felt, that Turpin took the iron bar from the hands of his friend, and placed it in the staples.

It crossed the door in a slanting direction.

"Now, if we can only find the other," he said, "and get that fixed in, the officers will be some little time forcing an entrance, I fancy."

"So should I. The other bar, I should think, is sure not to be far from where we found that one."

"I should think not. Just show a light. Ah! here it is!"

Turpin picked up the other bar, and having fixed it, turned his attention to the place they had entered.

The blows on the door at the other end of the passage could still be heard, though but faintly, in consequence of the second one fitting so closely in its frame.

For a moment or two, as Tom King turned the light of the lamp in different directions, the two highwaymen looked around them in silence.

They were at one side of an almost circular-shaped vault, which they roughly estimated could not be more than eight feet high, nor more than thirty in diameter.

"Whatever place is this?" asked Turpin. "Dear me! who would have thought, to have looked at Mr. Waghorn, that he was such a mysterious character!"

"Not many, perhaps; and yet, as you know, I noticed something peculiar about him the moment we met for the first time."

"You did. But do you feel how tremendously hot this place is? It is quite like an oven!"

"It is, and what kind of business the landlord carries on down here I am quite at a loss to conceive!"

"But we shall quickly find out," said Turpin, stepping forward. "I only hope we shall be fortunate enough to find some other mode of egress from the place than the door by which we have just entered."

"And so do I, for I shall be glad enough to exchange this close, stifling atmosphere for the fresh air and daylight above. What part of the inn are we under now, I wonder?"

"I can't imagine. Yet stop! Yes, I can! We were at the back of the house, weren't we?"

"Yes."

"Then we went down the cellar steps, and the passage we found runs at right angles to them."

"That is right."

"We must, then, I take it, be somewhere under the yard."

"I think so, now I come to call to mind the bearings of the different places."

"Then," said Dick, looking up at the black roof, "we may console ourselves with the idea that the blue sky is over our heads!"

In a more earnest manner they commenced looking for some means of leaving this circular vault, but they could not help pausing with deep curiosity to examine several things in the centre of this place, which in a moment explained Mr. Waghorn's motive for not wishing the police to descend into the cellar.

In the first place they found a strangely-constructed furnace, in which a few embers still smouldered.

It was from this source that the sickly and oppressive heat proceeded.

Close by was a number of odd-looking instruments, and Turpin took one in his hand in order to look at it more closely.

King pressed forward with the light, and as soon as he perceived the object his friend had taken up, he exclaimed—

"I see it all now. Everything becomes comprehensible in a moment! Do you know what you are holding in your hand?"

"Yes, a mould, though I have never seen one just this shape before."

"I have. A chap showed me one just like it once. He said that it would make better counterfeit money than could be made by other means."

"I should think it very likely," said Turpin, who had been turning the mould over and over in his hands, and carefully examining it. "This one appears to be for half-a-crown."

"And here is one of the casts from it," said Tom, taking up a bright-looking coin, from a heap of others that were partially covered with sand.

"It is really very good, and though this one is, I suppose, scarcely finished, yet it has a very genuine appearance. And so it turns out mine host of the 'Samson and Lion' is a coiner on a very extensive scale."

"And you may depend he has made the subject his study. Now, one would scarcely have thought he would have ventured to have called in the officers, as he appears to have done."

"The thought that his secret would be discovered did not, perhaps, occur to him. I dare say from the look of the place he has been carrying on this trade for a good many years, and so, having escaped so long unsuspected, has become reckless."

"That is just it. Now, I'll tell you what I think we are really compelled to do."

"What is that?"

"Why, find some means of getting out of here as quickly as possible, and when we find we can leave instantly, we will unbar and unlock the door we have carefully fastened, and let the officers come in without their having to force an entrance. I think that is the best way we can be revenged on Mr. Waghorn."

"And I! It shall be done, too, if possible. I expect, though, to hear the officers make an attack on this door every second."

"Come on, then, at once. I feel certain somehow that there is another means of exit."

"Well, I only hope there is. Do you carry the lantern, my friend, and I will go a little in advance of you."

Tom King took up the lantern, and Turpin crossed over to the other side of the vault.

But though they subjected all sides of it to the most rigid scrutiny, no signs of an opening could be seen.

They were soon convinced there was no door except the one by which they had entered, and they once more advanced to the furnace.

"It strikes me very forcibly," said Dick, "that we shall be found along with Mr. Waghorn's coining apparatus. Ha! did you hear that?"

"Well, rather, I should think. That officer must have some muscle to give a door a whack like that."

"No, no, Tom. I did not mean the blow on the door, though the sound followed close upon my exclamation. I think we're saved, my friend, for I heard as plainly as ever I heard it in my life, the peculiar neigh Bess often gives when she is anxious to be off."

"You did?"

"Yes. The sound came from just over my head. We thought we were under the yard, but it seems, instead, we are under the stable."

"If such should really prove to be the case, I shall have strong hopes indeed of our making our escape. You are sure your ears did not deceive you?"

"Quite sure."

"Then if the stable is just over our heads we will quickly make our way into it. The roof, fortunately, is not a high one. What can we get to stand upon?"

"This mound of turf, I should think, if we move it where it will be of service."

"That will do capital. Make haste, for if our friends have any idea we are making our escape they will fire at once, and it is not worth while to risk being put out of the world, or even injured, by a shot of that sort."

"It is not"

Both now set about removing to the centre of the vault the turf, of which there was a tolerable quantity close to the furnace, where it had doubtless been placed to serve as fuel.

They piled it up as high as they could, and when they carried the last, had the satisfaction of finding that it was just high enough for the purpose.

Dick mounted upon it instantly, and, taking the lantern again into his own hands, made an examination of the ceiling. He knew not as yet how much difficulty there might be in making a way through it.

But, to his unbounded joy, his eyes fell upon a small trap-door.

"We're saved, Tom! we're saved!" he cried, yet not loudly. "Were saved! There is a trap-door in the ceiling here, which opens into the stables. Hurrah! old fellow, we shall do Mr. Waghorn yet. When once we get to our cattle and mount, I will give them leave to catch us."

The discovery of this trap-door was so unexpected that Tom could hardly believe it was real. He feared the news was too good to be true.

He mounted therefore in a moment upon the mound of turf, and, as Dick turned the bright ray of light from the lantern upward, there he saw the trap-door plain enough.

It was small in size, yet large enough for a slim man to pass through easily. It did not appear, though, to have been used for many a day, for the two bolts that fastened it were completely rusted in their sockets.

The woodwork of it, too, was covered with that fine, disagreeable-looking moss which grows so plentifully in dark, damp places.

Dick made several efforts to draw back these bolts, but it was some time before he succeeded.

The second bolt was even more obstinate than the first, but it went back at last with a kind of shrieking creak.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN REGAIN THEIR STEEDS, MOUNT, AND MAKE ANOTHER ESCAPE.

WHILE our friends were thus occupied, the blows were still rained upon the door.

There was a little circumstance connected with them which they entirely overlooked.

This was, that, though the door was struck, still so violent an attack as might have been expected was not made upon it.

Had our friends noticed this, they probably enough would have set it down to its real cause.

But they did not notice it. They were too busy with the trap-door.

Still, we feel that it is with the highwaymen, and not with the officers, that we have to do; so we will not, by any allusion, anticipate events.

When the second bolt was withdrawn, it became rather a serious question whether they should boldly open the door and emerge into the stable—supposing Dick was right in coming to the conclusion that it was the stable—or should they first endeavour to ascertain what was on the other side.

The latter was the most prudent course, so they resolved to adopt it.

Dick accordingly raised his arm to push open the trap-door a little way and then peep through.

It was as firm as a rock.

Upon making this discovery, he could not restrain a groan of disappointment.

"It's no good," he said. "We must remain. The door is either fastened on the other side, or else there is something so heavy upon it that it cannot be raised."

"Or," said Tom King, taking up the poker from the furnace, "it has been closed for so long that it has stuck in its frame as the bolts had. Stand aside! let's have a try!"

"Hold a moment!" said Turpin. "Make no reckless noise. We may give the alarm to some one in the stable, if it should happen to be tenanted."

"You take the poker, then, and try if you cannot force the door open."

Dick did so, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the door give most unequivocal symptoms of yielding.

"There! I told you so!" said King, as it was loosened all round, and Dick gave the tool back into his hands. "I thought the wood had only swelled and stuck."

"And you thought right! Silence though! I am going to lift the trap a little way."

Very carefully, then, Turpin raised the trap about a couple of inches.

His first supposition was confirmed at once. The door opened into the stable.

It did not take long for his nose to make him cognizant of that.

He listened, but he heard nothing save the restless movements of the horses in the stalls.

He spoke in a whisper to his companion.

"Come on," he said. "All's right! But pray be quiet!"

As he uttered these words he took hold of the frame of the door, and, by the muscles in his arms, drew himself slowly and carefully upwards.

All was still, and in another instant he was standing in the stable.

He caught hold of Tom's hands and assisted him up.

Then they closed the trap-door, and crept stealthily to the end of the stall they were in, and looked round to see if any one was in sight.

No, the coast, apparently, was quite clear; so they ventured to walk towards the door, which was just pushed to, but not latched.

Black Bess and Tom's steed were in the same boxes they had been placed, and all ready for immediate service.

But just as they mounted—which they lost no time in doing—they heard a loud shout in the yard.

At the same moment, too, there came up through the trap-door, which Dick had been unable to fasten, some of the officers who had been battering at the door.

To have hesitated would have been to be lost; so, uttering a hasty hurrah, Turpin and King, stooping low down in their saddles, dashed at full speed into the inn-yard.

The officers, who had been standing in a dense throng near the threshold, were rather disconcerted at this sally, which was as sudden as it was unexpected, and they gave way on all sides.

As no violence had as yet been done to them, both highwaymen disdained to draw their hangers, as they might have done, but simply swung their riding-whips around them.

These were loaded at the handle with lead, and, in a vigorous grasp, were very dangerous weapons.

The officers did not take long to recover from their panic, and they rushed forward to seize the horses in a body, but they might as well have attempted to stay a whirlwind.

Without suffering the least injury whatever, Turpin and King were fortunate enough to reach the highroad.

They did not pause in the least, but dashed along in the direction they intended to travel, but the hasty glance they gave at the front of the inn showed them that both Mr. Waghorn and Jack the ostler were there as prisoners.

The reader will remember that a man had been left in charge of the horses and prisoner, and the officers, before the highwaymen could reach a bend in the road, had mounted them, and were in full pursuit.

"Forward! forward!" shouted Dick, as he turned back and saw his foes behind him. "We shall have some sport now, Tom. The chase gets interesting."

"Rein in a little, then," said King, who was already falling in the rear, for the words of her master, spoken, as they were, in exhilarating tones, caused Black Bess to almost double her speed. "Pull in!"

"You must urge your nag forward, Tom. The officers appear well mounted and their horses fresh."

"They do," said Tom, and he struck his spurs into the flanks of his horse

The officers, who, in their anxiety to take Turpin alive, had acted so considerately towards him, now that they saw he was in a fair way of making his escape, fired volley after volley from their pistols.

But too great a distance had been placed between the fugitives and the police for these shots to have any effect beyond that of startling every living creature that made the lane and the adjoining meadows its home.

Still they fired as fast as they could load, and by means of goading their cattle to the utmost, contrived to keep Turpin and King in view.

It was only by a long gallop that our friends could hope to escape, for the country was flat, and there was no cover visible for many a mile around.

They were careful, though, not to distress their horses, and so only put them to just sufficient speed to maintain a safe distance between them and the officers. They trusted by this means to tire out their pursuers, and when this was the case, by putting their steeds upon their mettle, to get quite clear of them.

The officers, however, pushed on in a most determined manner, so that, although Bess easily enough performed the feat, Tom's horse had occasionally a little difficulty in keeping pace.

At last, after a two hours' ride, the highwaymen felt it to be imperatively necessary to breathe their horses for a few moments.

They had just crossed a common of considerable extent, and they could see uninterruptedly behind them for a great distance.

But though they gazed long and anxiously in the direction they had come, and shaded their eyes with their hands, they could not see the smallest signs of the officers.

"We have escaped them for a time, Dick, I really think," said Tom King. "They have held out well, I consider."

"They have, indeed; but I am in hopes, now they have relinquished the chase, they must have felt the utter hopelessness of capturing us."

"Yes. We have, nevertheless, had a narrow escape, as narrow as ever either had, I fancy. Very fortunate, indeed, was it for us that Mr. Waghorn was a coiner, and carried on his business underground!"

"Yes, or I scarcely fancy we should have been here now. However, who knows?"

"It is some consolation to think the officers have made the rascally landlord and his ostler prisoners. They will have some difficulty in getting off at the assizes."

"Oh! none at all! The judge will very soon dispose of them. They may safely consider they have seen the 'Samson and Lion' for the last time."

"No doubt, no doubt!"

We must beg our readers to call to mind that at the time of which we are now writing, and, indeed, for long afterwards, many offences which are now visited with a comparatively slight penalty, were then capital ones, and persons who were convicted of making bad money were hanged without mercy. It was an offence which neither the first, second, nor third George forgave.

Therefore it was that Turpin spoke so positively about their fate.

Tom and Dick now gathered the reins once more in their hands, but before they started, they turned round, and again looked keenly and scrutinizingly in their rear.

The police-officers were not in sight.

"They have turned back, depend upon it," said Turpin, "and we can now pursue our journey in peace, and more at leisure. Your horse, Tom, seems quite blown."

"He does; and, although Bess shows no signs of distress, you must bear in mind we have come a long distance and at a great speed before we halted."

"So we did. However, it has carried us a long way on our journey, for I took care to shape my course as well as I could. I don't suppose we have gone far out."

"Oh! no; I have taken notice how the land lies."

"Well, then, can you form any idea of whereabouts we are?"

"I should think about twenty miles from the New Forest."

"Then," said Dick, "we will try if we cannot perform the rest of our journey at a moderate rate. I shall want a good rest after this."

"Still, I think we have got out of Mr. Wriggles's way. It will now be a feeling of revenge against us that will actuate him, and he will spare nothing to have us captured."

"I fancy not."

"But if we stay here a time, and I daresay it will be even more profitable to us than in London, we shall give his anger time to cool."

"Oh! I don't care a fig for him nor his anger either. Push along."

CHAPTER XL.

THE TWO FRIENDS FOLLOW THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT THROUGH THE NEW FOREST, AND MAKE A PROFITABLE DISCOVERY.

WHEN Dick Turpin and Tom King, three hours afterwards, reached the borders of the New Forest, it was quite dark.

They were holding a rather animated conversation as to whether they should proceed still further.

"What's the good?" said Turpin. "We may as well have a rest somewhere as not. Remember, we have been a long time upon the road, and a merciful man is merciful to his beast."

"That's right enough; but I don't see where we are to put up, and I don't much relish the idea of spending the night in a tree."

"Nor I."

"Very well, then, let us proceed. As it is, I see no signs of human habitation, but we must do so if we keep on."

"I don't know that. We are in a very sparsely-populated district, and, instead of going in the direction of dwellings, we may only be plunging deeper and deeper in the wood."

"I admit there is the fear of doing that, yet I think if we take care to keep where the trees are thin, we shall soon find a place—a cottage, or something of that sort—where we can rest."

"Forward, then! I don't see what else is to be done."

They started their horses afresh, and though Black Bess presented no very palpable signs of flagging, she must have been suffering from fatigue.

In this way they went on, at scarcely more than a walking pace.

The darkness increased every moment.

In spite, too, of their efforts to keep amongst the trees at the margin of the forest, they found they were gradually getting farther and farther in.

At last, Turpin pulled up.

"It is folly going farther like this. We shall be benighted here, that's clear enough; so let us stop at once. We may find a less comfortable place."

"I should not give in yet," said King. "It's confoundedly dark, but it appears to me if we bear a little more to the left we shall get clearer of the trees."

"They don't grow so closely together there, I really think. Come on, we may as well make the attempt."

"Of course we may. And look, I am right, there is a light among the trees there."

"Where?"

"It has gone now. Stop; there it is again!"

"Oh! I see it. Is it a cottage, think you?"

"I hope so."

"It can't be that," said Dick, a moment or two afterwards; "the light is not stationary."

"Halt a moment and let us see; I fancied the light shifted, but we may have been deceived by our own motion."

"No, that cannot be, for look! it is almost out now, and"—

"Now it has gone altogether."

"No; there it is, a little farther along. Do you see it?"

"Yes, plainly enough. It is either the will-o'-the-wisp or else some one carrying a lantern."

"If it is the former, the less attention we pay to it the better, for you know well enough a will-o'-the-wisp will only flicker before us, and lead us into some morass."

"We shall soon know whether it is that, my friend, if we follow it a little while."

"So we shall. Come along, then."

"Be careful where you tread; the ground may be treacherous."

"I am not afraid. Bess is sure-footed, and I can safely trust myself to her. You can follow close to me."

The mysterious light still flitted before them, but in a tolerably direct line.

What in the world can it be, Dick?" asked Tom, after regarding it for some moments attentively. "I fancy if it is a man with a light; we ought to see some indications of his form."

"Well, I don't know. I should say seeing is quite out of the question. I never knew it so dark before as it now is."

"I can hear nothing," said Tom. "I think it something rather singular."

"Then we will soon find out what it is. Push your horse on a bit faster."

King did so, yet they could not perceive that they approached the light in the least.

And now every moment saw them still deeper involved amongst the trees; but the intense curiosity they felt to know the meaning of the strange light made them quite heedless of this circumstance.

That it was not what they first fancied it—namely, a will-o'-the-wisp—they were quite certain. Its course was too direct, and the flame too constant, for it to be that strange emanation from the earth.

In fact, they found now that it was only invisible for a moment, as though a person in carrying it had passed behind some opaque object.

But in a short time the trees grew so thickly together, and the underwood got so dense, that it became almost an impossibility to proceed, and so Dick and Tom drew up.

There was the provoking light, flitting before them in just the same fashion.

"I feel very tired," said Turpin, "but I am determined to prosecute this adventure to the end. I should never feel satisfied if I left without finding it out."

"Nor I," said Tom.

"Alight then, my friend; we can fasten the horses to the trunk of this tree, and creep forward on foot."

"That will be it."

"You must lose no time, though. Look how fast the light travels."

"It does, indeed. We must make them secure. We shall soon overtake the light, I make no doubt; but there is another thing to be taken into consideration.

"What is it?"

"Why, if we go wandering into the forest, how are we to find our way back to the horses? Recollect, it is pitch dark."

"You need not remind me of that. Confound it, I have just stepped into a hole full of mud."

"We must both be careful; but, seriously speaking, if we tether the horses here, how are we to find our way back to them?"

"Oh! I can get out of that difficulty with very little trouble. Take hold of this."

"Take hold of what?"

"This ball of fine twine. It is of considerable length. Tie one end of it to the tree and unwind the ball as you proceed, letting the string fall on the ground; you will easily enough find your way back then."

"So we shall, unless the string should not happen to be long enough."

"There is no fear of that. I have two more just such balls in my pocket."

"Oh! then, of course we shall be right. Now then, are you ready?"

"Quite."

"Come along, then, it is high time, for the light is almost out of sight."

"It is. I can see it though. Ha! it stops."

"Does it?"

"Yes, I am sure. Hurry on, we shall find all out now."

Taking care to pay out the string as they went, which, in the event of their return, would most certainly prove an excellent clue, the two highwaymen struggled through the furze and gorse bushes in the direction of the light, which now seemed to be quite stationary.

As they drew still nearer to it they advanced with more caution.

But just when they were within, as they fancied, a dozen yards or so of it, it danced away again.

Turpin and King stopped at once.

"This is a regular wild-goose chase," said Dick; "you may depend it is nothing more than some marsh light, and it will lead us about all night."

"It cannot be that," replied Tom. "Listen. I can plainly distinguish a crashing among the bushes, as though some one was passing through them!"

Turpin bent his ear towards the ground.

"Your hearing has not deceived you," he said. "The sound is very faint, but I can certainly distinguish just such a noise as would be produced by some one forcing their way through thick vegetation."

"Then it can't be a will-o'-the-wisp, that's certain. At least, I have never heard that it makes such a sound in its progress."

"Oh! it is not that. Be as careful as you can, and make no more noise than you can help, for I do not want our presence to be suspected."

"Certainly not, but I don't see how you are to help a dry twig snapping under your feet."

"Oh! no; and such a sound would pass unnoticed. Be quick! Why, hang it all, it's gone!"

"Gone? So it has. Dear me, how sudden!"

"Hush! don't speak loud. Voices travel a long way in these silent places. I dare say we shall see it reappear directly."

They were mistaken.

One, two, three—five minutes elapsed, but no signs of the light could be seen.

"This is very odd," said Tom King. "However, don't let us hang back. I can see just where the light vanished from. I have had my eyes fixed on the spot and have never moved them once."

"Lead on, then, as straight as you can!"

Tom King, taking hold of his companion's coat, walked on carefully. Their progress was not rapid, for the ground rose rather suddenly.

Without speaking another word, for fear their voices should travel before them, they breasted this little hill and looked around.

They did not see the light at first, but a more careful observation brought to view a very faint light far down beneath them.

It was quite stationary.

Turpin and King both saw it simultaneously, and with greater caution than ever made their way towards it.

Rather more than a dozen steps brought them to the brink of a dingle.

As well as they could make out it was about fourteen feet in depth, and the sides were literally covered with rank vegetation, such as is common to such spots.

The light seemed to be just at the very bottom.

And now, as they listened at the top of this dell, there came up to their ears a sound which they immediately recognised.

Some one was digging.

The sound of a foot striking upon a spade, and of earth being thrown up, could be plainly enough heard.

There was something mysterious and provocative of curiosity in the fact of any one penetrating so far into the forest at so late an hour, and then, in that lonesome spot, making an excavation, that the highwaymen both found their interest in what was going on increase tenfold, and they bent over the ridge anxiously.

Presently King felt his companion's hand upon his shoulder.

"What now?" he asked, in a scarcely audible whisper.

"The sides of this dingle," replied Turpin, "are so thickly wooded that it would be impossible for us to descend without causing sufficient noise to attract observation towards us."

"I am aware of that."

"But I have found what seems to be a narrow, beaten path, leading circuitously to the bottom. Now, I think if we exercise proper caution, we can make our way down without our footsteps being heard."

"Yes, yes! Where is the path?"

"Here it is, Tom. Let me go first, and then you will see!"

"Agreed! Go on!"

Treading on his toes, and taking long, silent strides, Turpin preceded King down a path not more than eight inches wide, that seemed to run corkscrew-like to the bottom.

The shrubs with which the sides of the dingle were lined rose up almost to their waists on each side of them, but still, as none grew on the path itself, they were able to descend without making sufficient noise to be the means of attracting notice to them.

As they went lower and lower, the sound of the man digging—for that was what they concluded it to be—got louder and louder.

If any one had asked our friends what they expected to find on reaching the bottom of the dingle, they would have unhesitatingly replied, some ruffian who, in that deserted spot, was endeavouring to hide the evidences of his crime.

In fact, that some one was digging a grave.

How great, therefore, was their surprise, when they saw through the bushes the form of an old gaunt man, the very reverse of what they had expected to see.

But it was he evidently who had so puzzled Turpin and King with the light, for on a mound of the earth he had turned up was a common stable lantern.

Under most circumstances it was, no doubt, considered to give forth a very insufficient amount of illuminating power, but in that intensely dark dell it seemed enough to reveal everything.

Its rays fell with full force upon the face and form of the old man who was digging, and our friends examined him attentively.

From his thin, white locks, sunken eyes, and attenuated frame, one would have judged his age to be something remarkable, and yet there was none of that stiffness in his limbs which is apparent in men who are far down in the vale of life.

On the contrary, his arms, which were bare to the shoulders—for he appeared to have taken off his coat and rolled up his shirt-sleeves in order to better execute his task—although little more than skin and bone, were yet sinewy and strong, and he seemed to stand firmly and erectly upon his legs.

But upon his shrunken and emaciated countenance was written plainly the word AVARICE.

Mingled with that expression now, though, was one of apprehensive terror.

His spade was clutched tightly in his hands.

His head bent forward as if to listen.

Then in a strange, piping voice, he spoke—

"I thought I heard some one," he said; "but all is still now, quite still. I can hear the rustling of the branches, but that is all. I fancied, too, on my way here I heard strange sounds behind me, but I did not look back, I did not look back!"

He shook his head tremulously to and fro as he repeated the words.

"They say there are strange sounds to be heard, and horrible sights to be seen, in the forest after dark, but I don't fear them. I don't—ha! ha!—believe in such nonsense. There is only one thing I believe in, and that is gold, bright gold—ha! ha!—and I only fear those who are strong enough to deprive me of it. I thought I heard some one creeping after me, but I suppose that was only my fancy. It is very hard to think a man cannot get a few pounds together without having everybody after him. It's very hard, too, to think that I should be obliged to bring my money to this place at night to hide it. If I had it at home, I should not be able to sleep in my bed; but it is safe here, quite safe."

The wretched old miser—for such he was—recommenced his toil.

So close as the two highwaymen were to him, neither could have spoken a syllable without running the risk of being overheard, and they did not want just then to make themselves apparent.

But it strikes us that if the thought that two such notorious characters as Dick Turpin and Tom King knew of the exact locality of his hidden treasure he would, to use his own expression, have never been able to sleep in bed.

Presently the old man found it necessary to rest again from his labour.

"It is terrible tiring work," he said, half-aloud and half to himself,—"terrible tiring work. I should think now I cannot be many inches off the iron casket which contains my riches. It is not much, but there are plenty who would not scruple to rob a poor man of his hard-earned gains."

"I shall be rich some day," he added, after a moment's silence, "and I shan't want to save up then as I do now. Very soon I shall have enough to live on, and then these hard, fatiguing night-excursions to the recesses of the forest will be at an end. I shall be glad of that, very glad. Five minutes more, and I shall reach the box, and then, when I have added what I have brought with me to-night, I can feast my eyes with its contents. Oh! it is a brave sight—a brave sight!"

The poor wretch—for, though he possessed doubtless a larger sum of money than many a rich man, he was a poor wretch—the poor wretch, we say, once more bent his back to his task.

Shovelful after shovelful were thrown out on to the mound.

Suddenly the miser stopped, and pressed both his hands to the side of his head.

An idea—so horrible that it almost destroyed his reason—flashed upon his brain.

The agony he endured was something awful, and surely a foretaste of that punishment to which he was so justly decreed.

But it was only for a brief instant that he stood thus. Uttering a wild, yelling shriek, which echoed and echoed through the trees, startling many a bird from its perch, the miser snatched up the spade and threw up the earth at a furious rate, until he had made another mound of the same height as the former one.

And all this while he never gave vent to a sound.

The whole of the faculties he possessed seemed to be centred in turning up the earth.

The rate he worked at would have been surprising in a young man, but what was it in a feeble, emaciated frame like his?

Simply astounding.

"My gold!" he shrieked, with terrible agony in his tones. "My gold—my treasure—the fruits of a long life of penury and grasping! Who has been here? Am I mad, or dreaming, or what am I? No—no, I am here, in the dingle where I hid my gold, but it has been stolen from me! It is gone—gone. Some one has dogged my feet and deprived me of my all—of all that I cared to live for. No—no, it cannot be true! It would be too, too horrible! I must have missed the spot, and yet I marked it well. No—no, I did not miss the spot, but, he! he! how funny! I have not dug deep enough! Ha! ha! not dug deep enough. What an old fool I must have been to make such a mistake and frighten myself so much!—he! he! I should never have believed I could have done such a foolish thing! I must dig deeper and I shall find it then, of course!"

There was something so horribly dissonant and unnatural about the miser's laugh that Turpin and King shuddered involuntarily.

It was wonderful to see with what breathless rapidity the old man threw out the soil.

At last he stopped.

The delusion with which he had endeavoured to cheat his mind could now no longer be maintained. He knew he had dug many feet below the spot where he had concealed his treasure. He knew that he had made no mistake in its whereabouts; he knew, too, worst of all, that some one had been there before him—that his precious gold was gone.

For a moment or two he stood incapable of speech or motion, but his thoughts were busy, and his brain dizzy and whirling.

Then he found his voice.

It was choked with sobs.

His anguish, no doubt, was great indeed—greater than many can perhaps imagine.

Large tears of agony started from his eyes, and streamed down his sunken cheeks.

"My gold! my gold!" he said; "who is it that has stolen what I prized more than life itself? May my withering curse cling to him through all eternity! May he be bereft of all he holds dear in this world, even as he has bereaved me! Oh! I am old now; old, old! My strength is gone, and I cannot live long enough to save any money now. I shall die as I knew I should—as I always said I should—a pauper, a pauper!"

He sat down upon the edge of the excavation he had made, and looked down into it.

"The long, long years of toil it cost me! The privations I endured in order to add to its amount, if it was ever so little, for I knew those little sums would tell up some day, and now it is gone, all gone; gone at once. I have only now left to me that little I have about me. Oh! what shall I do? What will become of me?"

Then his voice became suffocated in his sobs.

Presently, however, he recovered himself, and sprang suddenly to his feet.

The soft night breeze blew his long hair from his face, and made it stream in a strange fashion behind him.

[TOM KING AND DICK WATCH THE MISER DIG FOR HIS TREASURE.]

His hands were clenched tightly.

The fire of insanity was in his eyes.

"I know what I will do now!" he yelled, in startling tones. "I know what I will do! I will seek him who has robbed me of my treasure, seek him by day and by night unceasingly! I shall find him, for my wrongs will urge me on. I shall find him, and then let him beware! I am a poor, weak old man, but yet I have power left to rob him of a treasure which he can never regain, and which, perhaps, he values almost as much as I did my darling gold! I will find him, and then I will take his life! Not all at once, as he deprived me of my treasure, but bit by bit, drop by drop! I will find him! I—ah!—help!"

The loud report of a pistol rung on the night air,

The miser pressed his hands upon his breast.

His body swayed to and fro.

He made frantic efforts to stand.

He tried to shriek, but his lunge were filling rapidly with blood.

A sickening, gurgling sound alone came from his lips.

Then he turned slowly round upon his heels, staggered, and, uttering a strange, gasping sob, fell headlong backwards into the hole he had dug with so much toil.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN DEAL RETRIBUTION TO THE MURDERER OF THE OLD MISER.

OUR two friends were so much absorbed by the strange scene in the dell, that, had their lives depended upon it, they could not have stirred a step.

When, however, the report of the pistol came so unexpectedly upon their ears, both gave a sudden start and almost lost their footing.

By an impulse which he could not control, Dick sprang forward, but Tom King held him back as he whispered impressively—

"Silence! Do not stir! We shall see the man who fired that cowardly shot, or I am mistaken."

Dick obeyed.

At the same moment a great rustling among the trees took place, but, of course, in the profound darkness they could see nothing.

Then they heard a heavy footstep, crunching on the gravelly soil.

With their eyes wide open and their heads stretched forward, the highwaymen waited with indescribable impatience for this individual to make his appearance.

They were not long kept in suspense.

The lantern which the miser had placed upon the little mound of earth still shed its faint glimmering light upon the scene.

But it was on the bleeding corpse of the old man that its rays fell with the most force and intensity.

To the excited fancy of the highwaymen it seemed as though the light had concentrated itself there specially.

But this was only fancy, for something, at first dim and undefined, came within the sphere of the lantern's beams, and at a considerable distance from the body.

Presently this something came more fully into the influence of the light.

And then they saw a man.

He was advancing in a strange, creeping, stooping fashion.

But as he came from the opposite side of the dingle to that upon which our friends were standing, they of course saw his face with great distinctness.

It seemed terribly repulsive—most likely more so than it really was. It was seen under peculiar circumstances, and such as were by no means to his advantage.

When within about six paces of the old miser's body this man paused.

He put up his hand to shade the beams of the lantern from his eyes while he took a long look at his victim.

Then he spoke in a deep, hoarse whisper.

"Is—is he dead?" he asked. "Is he quite dead? He seems still enough! He—he must be dead! I have used a pistol too often to miss a mark like that! He must be dead—dead! Hn! Mercy—mercy! Help! help!"

He uttered loud screams and flung himself upon his knees.

And yet there was, to all appearance, nothing to cause this sudden outbreak of terror and alarm.

Our friends could not fail to be much startled by it, and they looked round with something like dismay, wondering what was going to happen next.

But all remained just as it was before.

Quite bewildered, the highwaymen kept their eyes upon the man who, after making several unsuccessful efforts, at last rose to his feet.

With an intensity and anxiety which cannot be described, our friends listened for this man to speak.

It was from his lips alone that they could hope to learn the reason of his mysterious fear.

He soon spoke.

"What a fool I must be!" he said, nervously, "to frighten myself in that way. It was n—nothing after all. Nothing! I thought I felt some one clutch me by the throat! Could it have been all fancy! No—no! It was—it was something! I felt something touch me, surely! What was it? What was it?"

He looked upon the ground near his feet, as well as his trembling limbs would allow him.

"Of course; why this must be it, and so I have alarmed myself with nothing! This little branch it was that fell from one of the trees above, and struck me on the back, I suppose. Curse it!"

He threw the branch upon the ground as he spoke.

The cause of the poor wretch's terror was now sufficiently explained.

By some means, a little branch from one of the trees had become disengaged from its hold upon the parent stem, and falling down, had struck the murderer upon the back, filling his very soul with a mortal terror, such as he had never before felt.

How true it is a guilty conscience needs no accuser.

Considerably relieved, our friends continued to watch him attentively.

It would seem as though he had gathered courage from the discovery he had just made, for he walked now quite up to his victim.

"He is dead, sure enough, and I—I am a murderer! I have shot many a bird and many an animal before to-day, but never a human being! But why did he tempt his fate? My life would have been one continual dread if he had lived after he swore to haunt me! It was his own fault—his own fault! Surely, what I did was but acting in my own defence!"

In this way, as he stooped over the stark and prostrate corpse, did the murderer endeavour to deceive his conscience.

"I will bury him here—here, where he buried his treasure! He cannot grumble at that, surely. Then I will flee far, far from this spot, which to me will be always full of horrors! With his riches I shall be able to live like the great ones of the land. Ha! that were indeed worth something! I shall soon forget, in the pleasure of possessing it, the manner in which I obtained the wealth—very soon. And then all will be well."

"No, villain!" cried Dick, in his loud, clear voice, which struck terror to the soul of the guilty man; "no, all will not be well. Murder will out! With the death of a human body there arises an invisible avenger which pursues the murderer until the ends of justice are appeased!"

"Ha!" yelled the man, as he turned to fly; "discovered! A thousand curses! All is lost now!"

But he was not suffered to escape. King sprang forward, and grasped him tightly by the throat.

And then this man, who in more than one respect resembled one of those ferocious animals which will fight only when placed at bay, faced about and commenced a desperate struggle with his captor.

He was a tall, powerful man, and now despair seemed to have redoubled his strength; and King felt that if he wished to secure him he would have to call his friend to his assistance.

Turpin sprang forward.

Between them the murderer stood not the ghost of a chance, and he was overpowered almost immediately.

King placed his foot upon his breast, and, drawing his hanger, held it at his throat.

Its sharp point just penetrated the skin.

"Move hand or foot," said King, "and you are a dead man. Now answer me, and truly: who is it you have so treacherously murdered?"

The man remained doggedly silent.

"Answer," said King, again: "who is it you have shot in so cowardly a manner?"

Still no reply.

Tom pressed slightly upon the hilt of his hanger, and, as the murderer felt it entering the flesh, he cried—

"Curse you both! would you murder me by inches? It was my master."

"Your master! Then the crime is doubly enormous! What was his name? Who was he?"

"Olinthus Furze, the miser."

"It was you, then, that came here and dug up the old man's treasure-box. To what place have you removed it?"

"I will not tell you," said the man, fiercely. "You shall kill me first!"

"Now, look here, Tom," said Dick, who had been very busily engaged about something during the past few minutes. "Look here, Tom, I will show you how to deal out retribution to this fellow."

King turned round, and saw his comrade holding a piece of rope with a large noose at the end of it towards him!

"Are you going to hang him?"

"Yes, but not by the neck, though. You keep him in his place, and I will slip it over him!"

And, although he experienced considerable difficulty, Turpin slipped the noose over the man's head, and drew it tight under the armpits.

The other end of the rope had been cast over the stout limb of a tree a few feet overhead.

Dick began to haul him up.

The man shrieked, and kicked, and struggled, but all in vain!

Up he went.

They drew him up until his feet were about four feet from the ground.

Then the highwaymen secured the rope to the trunk of the tree.

The murderer swung round and round, and swayed to and fro.

The expression of his face was so awful that when they saw it the highwaymen shudderingly withdrew their gaze.

The rays of the lantern sun played upon the form of the old miser, and upon this object the eyes of the murderer were fixed as if with some terrible fascination.

"Here you will remain," said Dick, "in the company of he whom you have deprived of life until some one shall find you here, and convey you to the nearest prison."

"Curses on you!" howled the man; "curses on you both! What was it I did to you? Why did you interfere with me? Curses on you!"

"You can cry out as loudly as you please," said Tom King, "some one will doubtless hear your shouts. May the terrible spectacle before you prove some slight punishment for the deed you have done."

As he spoke, Tom and Turpin picked up the ball of string, and began to thread their way back to the place where they had left their horses.

It was well they took the precaution, for, without some such guide, it would have been impossible on that dark night to have found their way through the mazes of the forest.

The loud shouts and frantic screams of the murderer of the old miser echoed and re-echoed along the glades, rousing from their night's repose many a wild denizen of the forest.

At last they ceased with a suddenness and abruptness that was startling in the extreme.

CHAPTER XLII.

OUR FRIENDS ARE OVERWHELMED WITH ADVENTURES OF THE MOST EXTRAORDINARY DESCRIPTION.

"What is the meaning of that?" asked Tom, of his companion.

"I hardly know, but I was thinking just as you spoke about the miser's casket of gold!"

"Well?"

"Oh! nothing, only I cannot help thinking that it is not far from where we stood."

"What makes you think that?"

"I'll tell you. But while I do so let us retrace our steps to the dingle and ascertain the meaning of the cessation of the man's shouts."

"Is it worth while, think you?"

"I do. I am sure of it. Listen!"

"I am all attention."

"In the first place, then, let us set about to account for the presence of the murderer at the spot where the robbery was committed, and at so late an hour."

"That, I presume," said Tom, "can be accounted for in two ways. Either he had only just removed the casket and had not time to get away before his master came, or I think, most likely, he had, after taking it from his hiding-place, merely secreted it somewhere in the bushes, and had visited the place to-night to carry it off completely."

"Exactly. Now, under either of these circumstances, the casket of gold must be somewhere close to the dingle."

"Of course."

"Very well, then, don't you consider it would be very wrong on our parts to leave such a treasure to the chance finding of anyone?"

"H—m! perhaps it would! But what could we do with it, and, to tell you the truth, Dick, I don't like the idea of having anything more to do with it. The miser's curse will cling to it, and it will I fancy prove anything but a blessing to its possessor."

"Pho—pho! Tom. Shake off such foolish notions as those I beg. Really now, I did not think you were so superstitious."

"Don't laugh at it my friend. You will find it turn out a serious matter."

"Oh stuff! Now look here, I'll tell you what I'll do." They reached the brim of the dingle as he spoke, and they paused there to continue the conversation.

"Well?"

"Let us look about the dell in every part until we find the casket. We will then bury it in some place that we shall easily recognise at a future time. Of course, I needn't tell you anything about the precarious nature of our profession, and who knows, if we bury this treasure, that we may not some day be very glad of it, and find it of the utmost service."

"Why, indeed?"

"You consent, then?"

"That we shall look about in the endeavour to find the casket? Yes."

"And if we do find it, to bury it?"

"Yes."

"Come on, then! Be careful of your footing! What can have caused the man to be silent so suddenly, I wonder?"

"We shall soon know that. I can just see him now. How very still he hangs! Is he dead?"

"I should think it would be scarcely probable. And yet I don't know, either. He might be!"

"He might!"

"I hope not, however, for I am greatly in hopes of being able to extort from him some particulars respecting the whereabouts of the casket."

While speaking, they had reached the bottom of the dingle.

The lantern still burned clearly, and Tom King went towards it and took it up.

Then, carefully avoiding the bleeding body of the miser, he made a detour, and reached the tree to which he had suspended the servant.

He cast the light upwards.

"Your hopes of learning anything are at an end, Dick. See, he is quite dead! He must have shouted until he broke a blood-vessel; for see, it has streamed all down his clothing, and is even now bubbling from his mouth!"

"Turn the light away, Tom, I cannot bear to look upon him. Well, he has met with no more than his deserts!"

"True, and yet when these signs of the tragedy are discovered, as they are sure to be sooner or later, how inexplicable it will all appear!"

"I think myself they will have some difficulty in arriving at a correct solution of the affair."

"If they are left to draw their own conclusions from what they see they certainly will; but I think we shall be only doing our duty by leaving them some clue."

"What do you propose?"

"Oh! it can be done simply enough. Get your lead pencil, and write a few words upon the leaf of a pocket-book, and place it somewhere about his person."

"A good thought; it shall be done. I have, though, one little amendment to propose."

"What is that?"

"Why that you write the document."

"Oh, very well; just as you like."

"Why the fact is, where I went to school we did not pay much attention to writing and such like. Now I know you are a good scholar."

"Middling, as to that. Still I can manage a job of that sort."

"Very good, then; suppose you begin at once, because the sooner we get back to the horses the better."

"Just so," said Tom, as he took out an elaborate pocket-book, and prepared to write; "what shall I say?"

"I shall leave that to you."

Tom sucked the end of the pencil very deliberately, in order to collect his thoughts.

Then he wrote, bearing very hard upon the paper, so that the writing should be as black as possible, the following words:

"We, Richard Turpin and Thomas King, do hereby certify that, having witnessed this man, whose name we do not know, commit a deliberate murder upon the person of one whom we believe to be known as Olinthus Furze, the miser, did pass a rope under his arm pits and suspend him to this tree in order that he might be discovered and punished for his crime, which we cordially detest.

"And we hereby further certify that, hearing his shouts and screams suddenly cease, we did retrace our steps to learn the cause, and found him dead and bleeding from the mouth, having apparently broken a blood-vessel in his frantic screams.

"(Signed) "Richard Turpin.
"Thomas King."

"That will do capitas," said Dick, as Tom finished reading it to him,—"capital! And now put it into one of his pockets."

This was done.

"Thank goodness!" said King, "he's done with. And now about this treasure. If you'll take my advice, my friend, you will not meddle with it."

"Pho! pho! I am ashamed of you. Come along."

Rather unwillingly, King again took up the lantern and followed Dick, who commenced a very systematic examination of the dingle.

At last, and just as he was beginning to despair, he struck against something which was partly on the brink of the dell.

He made an examination of the object instantly.

It was a large oak box, crossed and recrossed in every direction with stout bands of iron.

"Here you are, Tom," he cried, in an exulting voice. Bravo! it's close to the top, so we shan't have the job of pulling it up, and there are handles on each side, I declare. Why, if you take hold of one handle and I take hold of the other, we shall carry it off first rate."

"Ah! yes, I dare say. We shall want the spade though, and as you are so anxious about the job you had better go down and fetch it, and take hold of the string at the same time! You had forgotten that, had'nt you?"

"I had, for the moment! but, however, if you have any objection to going, stay here for a moment, and I will quickly fetch the spade."

Without waiting for a reply, Dick plunged quickly into the dell, and in a few moments returned with the articles of which he went in quest.

Then, together, the two highwaymen carried the box for some distance into the recesses of the forest.

It was very hard work, for the box was a great weight.

About fifty yards from the dell was a tree, with a monstrous hollow trunk, from the summit of which there grew out a young tree.

This could not fail to be an unusual object, and therefore was well qualified, on that account, to point out where the treasure was hidden.

"You could'nt find a better place if you searched the whole forest over," said Dick, as he reached it, "and so here goes!"

There was a piece of level ground near the trunk of the tree, and Dick with the spade very carefully cut away the turf in long strips, about a foot in width, which he placed on one side, so that when the hole was filled up, the turf could be replaced, and so the ground show no symptoms of having been disturbed.

Dick set to work with a will, and soon had a tolerable sized hole dug.

Tom King sat down upon the edge of the miser's box.

It was not necessary to dig to any great depth, so the pit was not long before it was in readiness to receive its precious contents.

As they lowered it into the hole, Dick felt a very strong inclination to open the box, but the fastenings were of so complicated a character, that, after making one abortive effort, he gave up the attempt in despair.

"You must bury your riches unseen, my friend," said Tom King, "and if you will be guided by me, you will let them always remain where they are."

"How absurd! Do you think any luck, good or bad, attaches itself to the treasure? Nonsense! Now, I contend it will be vastly pleasant, when we are distressed for money, to know just where to put our hands upon a large sum."

"Perhaps so, perhaps so! Come, do not linger over your work! I think it's quite time we got back to look after our cattle."

"It is, Tom," said Dick, as he patted the turf down in its place. "I don't like the idea of leaving them at all; but I have done now. I will just take one more look round at the place, and then we will be off."

They did so, and Turpin caught hold of the string which they had provided as a clue, and once more threaded the intricacies of the old forest.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE GIPSIES AFFORD SHELTER TO THE HIGHWAYMEN.

WITHOUT any accident, save that of stumbling occasionally over some projecting root, our friends reached the place where they had left their steeds.

Both animals were stretched upon the grass. They could not be other than much fatigued.

Upon, however, hearing their owners approach, both started to their feet.

"And now, Tom," said Turpin, as he settled himself in his saddle, "what are we to do next?"

"I don't know, I'm sure, but one thing is certain: we must stop somewhere, not so much on account of ourselves as our horses."

"True. And yet they ought, I think, to hold out, if we travel gently, until daybreak."

"They will have to do so if we cannot find a halting-place. And now, which way do we go—to the right, or the left, or straight on?"

"To the right, I fancy. We will keep as much as possible upon the edge of the trees."

They did so, and for hours and hours they continued on their route without meeting with a single person or seeing a sign of a human habitation.

Horses and riders were completely tired down by the time the first flush of dawn appeared in the eastern sky.

They were glad when they saw this token of the coming day. It seemed to promise repose for a short time, and also served to indicate their course.

They found they were but little out of their way, and soon after leaped over a low hedge into the highroad.

"Surely, now," cried King, "we cannot go far without meeting with some place where we can shelter for a little time."

"One would think not. It is a high dawn this morning, Tom; we shall have a glorious day."

"I think so, myself. Ah! already I can see the edge of the sun's disc; and look! is not that a wreath of smoke curling up yonder?"

"It is. From some farmhouse or cottage, probably. Let us hasten."

King urged his horse to make a little better speed, and a word from her rider caused Bess to make a sudden dash forwards.

The smoke which the highwayman's keen glance had detected was some distance ahead of them, and considerably west of the highroad they were travelling.

They found it necessary, therefore, in a short space of time, to forsake the highway and strike across the fields.

The soft turf was peculiarly grateful to the tired horses' hoofs.

After crossing several meadows, they reached the brow of a hill—if hill it could be called, for in reality it was little more than a piece of rising ground—and, looking down, saw at their feet a gipsies' camp.

There were two or three of their houses upon wheels grouped round, and an equal number of canvas tents.

In the centre of the circle which these objects formed, was a fire, made chiefly of green twigs, and which sent up the dark blue vapour which had arrested King's attention.

About a dozen persons—men, women, and children—were crouching around this fire, and watching anxiously a large iron pot, which was suspended in the usual fashion over the flames.

"This will be the very thing for us," said Dick. "I have more than once had occasion to seek shelter from these strange, wandering people, and always found them faithful. Come on, Tom, we shall be almost sure of meeting with a welcome."

King needed no pressing to do this, and, alighting from his steed, he made his way down the hill on foot.

Dick followed his example.

At the sound of their tread upon the grass, the gipsies turned round, and then rose one and all to their feet.

A man who might perhaps be considered handsome, were it not for his beetling brows, stood forward from the rest.

"What want you, strangers, with the Zingari? Speak, let us know your will."

"We are travellers, and, as you say, strangers—that is, to this part of the country. Our horses have been for many hours upon the road, and we seek food and shelter for them, and for ourselves who need it scarcely less than they do."

"You are welcome to the tents of the Zingari," said the man. "Fear nothing! Truth is stamped upon both your countenances. Hi! Sebo! Sebo!"

A lad of about sixteen came forward, to whom he addressed some words in the gipsy tongue.

Of course, neither of our friends knew what had been said, but they had no difficulty in guessing the import of the words, for the boy advanced to their steeds, taking each by the bridle.

Turpin made a step forward as if to follow him, but King detained him, as he whispered—

"These are strange people, and you must be careful in your behaviour. Just watch whereabouts he bestows the cattle, but do no more. They will be safe beyond a doubt. Let us hasten to eat with them, for when we have, no temptation on earth would be powerful enough to make them betray us; nay, if we are attacked, they will even defend us with their —— Hush! say nothing! If we whisper thus, we shall perhaps make them suspicious of us!"

This reasoning was so cogent that Dick said not another word, but turned towards the man who had greeted them. He was looking at them attentively.

"The fare of the poor Zingari is hard," he said, "but the weary stranger is welcome to a share. We cannot long afford them shelter, for we are about to depart."

"The deuce you are," muttered Dick, and then he added—

"It is not so much food as rest that we require, though we are sadly in want of both. If you will allow us to join you in the consumption of the meal you are preparing, and then let us rest somewhere, we shall not only thank you, but leave some substantial token of our gratitude behind."

"You are welcome," said the gipsy, who seemed by no means displeased at this promise of payment for services rendered. "Sebel will tend your steeds! Advance, and we will break bread with you."

Five minutes more saw Turpin and King seated with the gipsies round the fire, and apparently quite at home. They jested, laughed, and talked to each other as though they had been acquaintances of many years standing.

As the gipsy had said, the fare was by no means sumptuous. It consisted of a stew, which both our friends pronounced as being most delicious, and only needed the accompaniment of something stronger than water to make it a first-rate meal.

The production of a couple of guineas proved sufficient to induce the wanderers to postpone their intended journey, so a tent was provided for the two highwaymen, into which they soon afterwards passed, and, as they felt in no way apprehensive of danger, either from attack or treachery, they stretched themselves upon the rude pallets prepared for them, and in a few minutes were sound asleep.

The sun had passed the meridian when they awoke and looked out of the tent.

All was calm around them. The sky was without a cloud, and birds were chirping merrily from every bough.

The gipsy who seemed to be in some sort of command over the others, upon seeing the friends at the opening of their tent, walked rapidly towards them.

"The strangers have slept long and soundly in the gipsy's tent," he said. "The sun has already begun his downward course, and the people are impatient to begin their march."

"And we are quite ready to go," said Dick, as he stepped outside. "Fetch us our horses, and we will be off!"

"It shall be done," said the gipsy, moving rapidly away.

"I feel now," said King, "as though I should like a good swill. That would be a refresher."

"You can have it then," said Dick, "I am certain, for I can hear a stream bubbling somewhere close at hand."

"And so can I now. It seems to be just beyond those shrubs there."

"It does," replied King, as he hurried forward in the direction indicated.

On the other side of the shrubs Dick had mentioned was a scene of rare picturesque beauty.

Before them was a little hollow, down one side of which flowed a pleasant little brook, which, as it danced over the mimic obstructions in its course, created the pleasant gurgling sound which had been the means of directing Dick's attention to it.

The water was clear and cold, and the highwaymen dashed it plentifully over their faces.

Considerably refreshed by this primitive ablution, they rose to their feet and made their way back.

They saw the gipsy and the boy Sebel standing near the tent with the horses, which had been carefully groomed down, so that they looked quite fresh and vigorous.

Turpin's eye brightened as his glance lighted on his mare.

As he sprung upon her back, she uttered a low neigh of pleasure.

King also mounted.

Then, giving the gipsies a liberal gratuity, and especially the boy for the care he had taken of the horses, the two highwaymen, at a gentle trot, regained the highroad, and continued their journey.

CHAPTER XLIV.

TURPIN AND KING ACHIEVE A RATHER LUDICROUS ADVENTURE WITH CAPTAIN SALEM NIDGET OF H.M. SHIP "PLOVER."

"It is a lovely morning, Dick, is it not? I do enjoy it! Let us go at a more easy rate; there is no occasion now for hurry."

"It is Bess. When she has had a good rest, there is no such thing as holding her in."

"So it appears. And now, do you know, I fancy we have come quite far enough to commence operations."

"I was thinking so a few moments ago, and was going to ask you how much longer you intended to keep on like this, when you spoke."

"Then, my opinion is, the sooner we begin business the better. It will be, I take it, a very profitable place; still, we must be careful not to decrease our distance from London, but approach rather to the sea-shore."

"Very good. I advise, then, that we look to our pistols, so that, should anything occur, we may be prepared."

They drew up for a moment, while they re-primed and loaded their weapons, and then proceeded on their way.

Those who have visited this portion of the country will not need to be told of its exceeding beauty; and our friends, who had a keen appreciation of the beauties of nature, but not much for those of art, enjoyed the prospect amazingly.

At four o'clock they had only passed a few houses, and had not met with anything of importance on the road.

This was rather surprising and quite at variance with their anticipations.

But presently, at the very extremity of a long line of road, they saw a faint cloud of dust arise.

"Here is something at last!" cried Dick, "really I had begun to despair of meeting with an adventure before night."

"So had I."

They walked on very gently.

The cloud of dust, as it came nearer and nearer, increased rapidly in size.

Now our readers will doubtless think to themselves, Dick Turpin and Tom King were daring men, but surely the writer does not wish to make us believe that he contemplated stopping a carriage on the highroad at daylight. But we do, and a few moments' reflection will show that there is nothing so very improbable or impossible about it.

A reference to the newspapers of the period will show that it was by no means a rarity for people to be stopped on the highroad in the daytime, and even within sight of their own dwellings.

In a little while the highwaymen were able to distinguish through the dust the outline of a carriage.

It was a very showy affair apparently, and was drawn by four horses, attended by two postilions.

"This is a wedding set out, you may depend," said Dick; "I can see very plain we are going to have some fun."

"I have no objection," said King, "provided a little profit attaches to it."

"Get out! you are always looking after the loaves and fishes. Now I should be content if there was only a little pleasure to be derived from this adventure."

"We shall see. However, Tom, you take one side of the road and manage the postilions, while I go on the other and peep at those inside."

"As you like," said Tom; "they will be here directly."

"Yes; now then. Trot forward, not fast enough, however, to excite suspicion."

"All right."

The carriage was now only about fifty yards from them, and the distance was, of course, diminishing every moment.

That their first conjecture that it was a wedding carriage was a correct one there could be little doubt.

The postilions seemed to take no particular notice of the two advancing horsemen, and their astonishment was most unbounded when Tom King rode close to them and shouted—

"Pull up, or I fire!"

The rays of the declining sun glistened dazzlingly upon the long barrel of the pistol which Tom King held out at arm's length.

The postilions, as the reflection flashed into their eyes, stopped the carriage at once.

Before, though, Dick could reach the carriage door, the window was let down violently, and a head projected out of it.

Is was a remarkable looking head.

The face was very full, and of a deep crimson hue, to which a very white powdered wig formed a peculiar contrast.

His first words betokened his profession, even if his attire did not.

"Avast, there, you swabs!" he shouted. "Avast! What do you mean by overhauling us? If it wasn't that I have just got married, and don't want to frighten my wife, I would pretty soon settle you, you piratical rascals!"

"Easy does it!" said Dick, who saw at a glance the speaker was unharmed. "Easy does it! We want your purse and watch, and so forth."

"And you call that easy, you loblolly, do you? You want a good rope's-ending at the grating, and if I'd got you aboard my little ship Pluvver you'd very soon have it."

"Oh! indeed! Then I presume you are the captain of the Plover, or Pluvver as you call it; eh?"

"Yes, you son of a gun! I——"

"Then just hand over a good booty."

"Never!" said the captain, in a towering passion, as he sank back into his seat.

Then Turpin caught sight of a female with a very graceful figure, and pleasing countenance.

Dick took off his hat and made a very deep bow.

The lady returned the salute.

The captain uttered a suppressed growl, but as he had no weapons he did not relish attacking our hero, who held a pistol negligently in his hand.

"Surely, madam," said Dick, with his head still uncovered, "surely you will not object to myself and friend drinking your very good health and happiness in the married state?"

The bride made no reply.

"Then I shall consider silence gives consent. Come, captain, hand over your purse like a sensible man, for heaven knows I wish there to be no bloodshed or violence. Let me request you to advise him to do as I require," added Turpin, turning again to the bride.

"Now, Salem, give him your purse, there's a good man, and let us go on our way in comfort!"

"Never!" said the captain. "I have never struck to the enemy, yet, and, damme! I never will. I can't defend myself, you land pirate, and you'll have to take all you get."

"Very good," said Dick, "if you prefer it, I don't mind."

So saying, he very skilfully took the captain's watch out of his fob.

It was a chronometer set in a gold case, and attached to a massive gold chain, at the other extremity of which dangled some very large seals.

The captain of the Plover could not restrain a groan when he saw it disappear in the profundities of the highwayman's pocket.

"And now your purse," said Dick. "Remember, discretion is the better part of valour."

"For heaven's sake take it and be off," said the captain.

"All right! And now, madam," said Turpin, in his most insinuating tones, "let me exact a tribute from you. I will not take anything from you in the shape of jewels or trinkets, but simply a kiss from your ruby lips."

"By God!" said the captain, springing to his feet, "this is too much. Damme! I have given in quietly, and now you want to kiss my wife before I have kissed her myself! No, I'm d——d if you shall!"

But the lady blushed, and looked anything but displeased or reluctant to comply with the bold highwayman's demand.

In fact, Dick was a very good-looking fellow, and of a style and colour that is always pleasing to the ladies.

Dick shook his hair back from his face and smiled.

The lady bent forward.

But the captain interposed.

"Draw back your smirking figure-head, you piratical swab, or I'll spoil the colour of it, damme! And you, madam, draw back. You are my wife, recollect, and I'll make you suffer for your conduct!"

But Turpin was not so easily to be baulked out of his kiss, when he saw that the lady was evidently not disinclined, so he held his pistol at the captain's head significantly.

"Seat yourself," he said. "Remember, I have your life in my hands, and I can deprive you of it in an instant. If you value it, sit down."

Now, Captain Nidget—for such was his name—was a bold enough man in his way, but just then he did not feel desirous of leaving the world and a widow.

So he sank back in his seat, and glared at his wife and the highwayman like some wild animal.

Not heeding him, however, Dick put his arm in the carriage, and taking the lady round the waist, drew her towards him.

She made a show of resistance, but when her face was close to the highwayman's, she suddenly ceased her struggles, and Dick pressed not one, but a dozen kisses on her lips.

They were not only received, but returned.

The husband was furious.

But Dick was aroused from his blissful occupation, by hearing Tom King shout in a loud voice:

"Look out, Dick, look out! Be off at once! Here come the officers again! They are straining every nerve!"

The words were followed by the report of a pistol and the trampling of horses' feet.

CHAPTER XLV.

TURPIN AND KING TAKE REFUGE IN THE OLD MANSION AT DURLEY CHINE, AND MEET WITH A SERIES OF UNPARALLELED ADVENTURES DURING THEIR STAY THERE.

OUR friends make a slight mistake when they came to the conclusion that the Guildford police-officers had abandoned the chase.

The fact was, they found their horses completely knocked up, so were obliged to come to a standstill, but they sent off one of their band, mounted on the best horse in the troop, to fetch fresh cattle and also a reinforcement. This necessarily delayed them for some time, but they calculated upon the highwaymen relaxing their speed, and perhaps even halting when they found they were no longer pursued, and, therefore, had great hopes that if they could follow they would soon overtake them.

By dint of numerous inquiries on their route, they succeeded in tracing Turpin and King to the gipsies' camp, which they reached only a few hours after they had left it. They spurred on their horses, and saw at last, to their great satisfaction, the persons whom they sought actually robbing a carriage by daylight.

They increased their speed, and it was not until the postilion waved his arm that King knew of their approach. It was then he gave the alarm to Dick in the manner recorded at the end of the last chapter.

At the same time, he himself turned his horse's head round, and set off at full speed, leaving Dick to follow his example as quickly as he could.

Turpin pressed one more kiss upon the bride's lips, and then giving Bess the rein, sped off like the wind.

He overtook Tom King in a few moments.

In the meantime, Captain Nidget learned with great satisfaction that a body of police were close at hand.

He opened the door of the carriage, and stepped out into the roadway a second or so before the officers reached him.

He pulled off his white-powdered wig, and waved it aloft in the air.

"After the pirate!" he cried. "Board them and string 'em up to the yard-arm! They have keel-hauled me, damme, and kissed my wife!"

The officers could not contain their laughter.

They did not nevertheless, relax their speed, but plied whip and spur most vigorously.

The horses they had beneath them were of capital quality, and were, besides, quite fresh; so that the highwaymen had everything to fear, and the officers everything to hope, from the pursuit.

King and Turpin, however, had an excellent start, and they took care that the distance between them and the officers should not diminished.

The road, too, beneath their feet was smooth and even.

Now, had Turpin been by himself, there is no question he would have been easily enough able to distance his foes in a very short space of time. But then King was not so well mounted as he was, so he had to keep Bess back.

As the officers pressed very hardly upon them, Tom King noticed this fact, and he said, as well as he could, for galloping at such a rate as they were made conversation difficult—

"Leave me to shift for myself, Dick, my boy. I won't consent to allow you to lose your own chance of escaping because my steed is not so good as your own. Shoot ahead as fast as you can, and leave me to my own luck!"

"Nonsense! I shall do nothing of the kind; you know that well enough. Keep your horse as well up as you can. I will stick by you to the last! Remember what they say at sea—'A stern chase is a long chase.'"

As he spoke these words, he leaned forward in the saddle and grasped Tom's horse by the bridle.

In this way, he compelled him to gallop faster.

Fortunately they were out of range of the pistols, so they had nothing to fear on that account, so long as they kept up the distance.

They found, by the increasing number of vehicles in the distance, that they were approaching a town, so they turned off to the right across the country.

In some places the cross lanes were very miry, and the horses with difficulty struggled onward.

When dusk came, the relative positions of pursuer and pursued were unchanged.

The officers had determined to hunt them down.

It was something to be wondered at that King's horse had kept up so long and so well as he had, but now he gave evident signs of utter exhaustion.

"I cannot keep up many minutes longer, Dick. Let me advise you, while you have the chance, to clear off and leave me; it is no good for one to destroy the other."

"It seems evident we cannot outrun them, so we must have resource to a little stratagem. Look, yonder is a dense clump of trees. Now if that should turn out to be a wood of any extent, and we can make our way into its intricacies, I think we may set them at defiance."

Tom King looked in the direction to which his friend pointed, and saw, as he said, something that looked like a wood of considerable size. It doubtless was a portion of the New Forest which had been cut off from the remainder.

"It is our only chance, he said, "and but a faint one, if you make the best of it. Still, there we should be able to hold ourselves at bay."

"It will be a difficult matter to fight so many with any hope of proving victorious."

"How many are there?"

"Eight or nine; I can't tell which."

"That is long odds. We must make the best of it."

And now a new difficulty presented itself.

The wood they were now, of course, anxious to reach as speedily as possible, was on the other side of a hedge, which, though not so high as to be insurmountable under ordinary circumstances, was yet too high for the tired horses now to venture.

The only resource that was left to them was to ride on as swiftly as possible until they came to a gate.

About a quarter of a mile lower down they found one.

Dick dismounted and tried to open it, but found it fast.

It was secured by a huge padlock and chain.

A large, round pebble of several pounds' weight was lying in the lane, and Dick took it up in both hands and dashed it against the lock.

It gave way at once.

He held it open while Tom and Bess passed through. He then closed it and remounted.

But although this had been done quickly, it consumed time, and the officers consequently gained upon them considerably.

The field was a ploughed one.

"Everything seems against us," said Dick. "Here, this field, for instance. We shall have to make our way round the edge of it, along the beaten path. To attempt to cross such heavy ground would be utter madness."

"It would, so we must do the best we can."

At little more than a walking pace they crept along the narrow path, with a deep fetid ditch on one side of them, and the soft ploughed land on the other.

Meanwhile, the officers came galloping down the lane.

They passed the gate though.

Then, evidently, they had not seen our friends pass through it.

A little farther on, however, as they heard nothing of their prey in front, they drew up, and, having listened, consulted with each other as to what they had better do.

They little thought it; but at that very moment all that separated them from the highwaymen was the hedgerow.

Our friends had taken the precaution to draw up so that no sound should reach the ears of their foes; but their care was of no avail, for King's horse suddenly lowered his head, and gave vent to that strange, gasping cough, so often uttered by horses when much distressed.

A curse came from the lips of Tom King, and a shout of gratification from the officers.

They prepared to leap the hedge.

"No, no," they heard a voice say. "Go through the gate!"

"What gate?"

"The one we passed a minute or two ago. Come on!"

The officers retraced their steps.

There was nothing left for our friends but to make as much speed as they possibly could.

The ploughed field led into a meadow.

Across this and another, and then another, with the officers close upon their track they went.

And now the officers found themselves near enough to make use of their firearms, and the report of a pistol suddenly arose.

It was simply a trial shot.

The spent ball struck Dick upon the back.

"That was well aimed," he said, "and if the distance had only been a little less, I should have been done for! Whip your horse! Spur him to the utmost! Do not spare him!"

The officers appeared to be well satisfied with the shot, for it was followed by an irregular volley, which did no harm, save inflicting a few trifling wounds upon the fugitives.

Tom King's horse, although at the last gasp, kept up bravely.

"Now, Tom," exclaimed Dick, as they crossed the last hedge that intervened between them and the wood they were so anxious to reach. "Now, Tom, one more effort, and then all will be well."

Tom King made one more desperate effort.

He plunged still deeper his spurs into his horse's sides.

The exhausted creature staggered onwards.

Loud voices, mingled with the discharge of many pistols, called upon them to surrender.

But the highwaymen pay no heed to them. Every nerve is strained to gain the confines of the wood.

It is but a few hundred yards distant from them.

They increase their efforts.

It would seem as though the horses the officers bestrode were almost as much knocked up as the highwaymen's were, for despite the cruelty with which their riders goaded them on, they could scarcely gain upon their prey.

The officers well enough knew that their chances of capturing our friends, should they succeed in reaching the wood, would be materially diminished, but still their tired cattle could not be made to proceed faster.

They reloaded their pistols and fired another volley.

Then Dick heard Tom King utter a sudden exclamation.

"What is it, Tom?" he asked. "Are you hit?"

"It is nothing. A bullet has struck me on the left arm."

"It is not a serious hurt, then?"

"Oh! no. I cannot tell exactly what it is, but it appears to have furrowed the skin from my shoulder to my elbow."

"If that is all, it will not prove serious. Strive again to make your horse keep pace with Bess; a minute or two more will take us into the wood."

In obedience to the application of both whip and spur, the poor animal seemed to concentrate in its limbs the whole of its remaining strength.

The speed it made for the next few seconds was something wonderful, it even shot ahead of Bess herself.

But when the borders of the wood were just reached, it reared suddenly, staggered, and then fell heavily to the ground.

Tom had anticipated this catastrophe, and had therefore prepared himself for it.

When his horse fell, his feet were already freed from the stirrups, and he stood upright, when the horse with a dull heavy thud, reached the ground.

There was no time for regrets, or even for speech.

The officers shouted with gratification when they saw the horse fall. Surely, they thought, we shall have one of them in our power.

But Tom, without pausing a moment, had set off on foot at full speed.

He was an excellent runner.

It was not long before he had the pleasure of finding himself beneath the shadow of the trees.

Then Dick dismounted.

Bess, now, would be an encumbrance, but still they were obliged to put up with that as best they could.

Dick caught her by the bridle, and led her into the mazes of the forest.

The trees in it were very old, and in size, gigantic. They grew closely together, too, and they found many places where it was impossible to force a passage between their trunks.

The soil was covered with gorse and brake in great profusion.

Ere, however, they had advanced many yards, they could hear the officers crushing through the trees.

Fortunately for our friends, the undergrowth and trees, as well as the darkness, prevented the police from keeping them in view.

The gloom in the forest increased at every step they took.

And now it would have been an easy enough matter to have eluded their pursuers if they had not been so close upon their track as they were, but, as it was, the noise they made in their progress sufficed to enable them to keep accurately upon their track.

Still they were in hopes, by pushing vigorously forward, of increasing the distance between them.

In this they appeared to partially succeed, for the sounds of the pursuing footsteps came by no means so distinctly upon their ears as they did.

Then Tom King broke the silence which had been preserved between them since they entered the wood.

He spoke in a low voice.

It might have been that he was faint, or that he did not wish his voice to reach the officers.

"Dick," he said, "Dick."

"What is it, my friend?"

"I am sorry to say it, my friend, but we must come to a halt at once."

"Come to a halt?"

"Yes. I bore up as long as I could, and as well as I could, but I am done up now."

"Good heavens, Tom!" exclaimed Turpin, "what is the matter?"

"My wound is, I fear, more serious than either you or I at first imagined."

"Stop a moment, then, and let me examine it. Is it painful?"

"Not in the least."

"Why did you not speak before? You must have been losing blood at a great rate. However, it is only loss of blood you are suffering from, and I will soon remedy that."

So saying, Dick tore off his scarf hastily, and bound it tightly round Tom's arm.

"That will be better," he said, as he completed his task. "I am sorry you did not mention it earlier. However, take a draught of this."

Dick produced a good-sized flask as he spoke, and handed it to his friend, who took a good draught at it.

"That's real genuine brandy as imported," said Turpin, as he placed the flask to his own lips.

But, short as was the time they had consumed, yet it sufficed for the officers to gain upon them surprisingly.

When the highwaymen looked behind them, they saw, to their great astonishment, a number of lights flashing through the trees.

It was therefore evident that the officers had in some way possessed themselves of either torches or lanterns, which would greatly aid them in their search.

Their having kept so well upon our friends' track can be easily accounted for.

The wound which King had received in his shoulder bled plentifully, and all the way he came he left behind him such a track of blood, that they followed it with the greatest ease.

But now, as the effusion of blood had been stopped, the officers would no longer have this guide.

Tom felt much better after the draught of brandy; he followed Dick through a dense thicket.

The officers must have caught some glimpse of his retreating form, for several pistols were discharged in that direction.

By great good luck, though, neither of them were sufficiently well-aimed to have effect.

The highwaymen struggled on, now sinking ankle deep in some slough, and then forcing a passage through the dense vegetation.

The officers were close behind them. Indeed, they seemed to be making much better speed than our friends were.

They were inspired to do this because the only guide they had for their track now was the sound of their footsteps, and they knew when once they lost the sound the highwaymen would easily escape, and so all the trouble they had had would result in nothing.

Hence, they pressed onwards with incredible eagerness.

More than once they fancied they could distinguish the dark forms of those they sought creeping in advance of them, and then pistols would be immediately levelled and discharged.

But although this manœuvre had been several times repeated, it had not yet produced any results.

Dick felt that Tom drew his breath slowly and laboriously.

His heart grew heavy with anxiety.

"Tom, my boy," he said, "hold up! Don't give in yet, if you can possibly help it. Cheer up, old fellow, we shall do them yet. Take another pull at the brandy!"

"Thanks!"

Tom's voice was very faint.

Without pausing in their speed, Dick again took out his flask, and passed it to his comrade, who took a deep draught in silence.

The spirit had the effect of infusing a fictitious vigour into the muscles of the highwayman, and he strode forward twice as rapidly as he had done before.

But now they made a discovery which much disconcerted them.

The undergrowth was getting more scanty.

The trees grew at a greater distance from each other.

A faint, soft light stole over the scene.

In fine, there was every appearance of their having reached the other side of the wood.

"We are done for, after all, I am afraid," said Turpin, as he one by one noticed these things. "We must bear to the right, Tom; perhaps we shall do better there."

"Impossible! Look! The officers have spread out on each side of us. We should have to fight our way through them."

It was as Tom had said. The officers had separated themselves, and formed into a line, the extent of which the flashing of the lanterns which they carried plainly indicated.

At the ends this line now began to curve slightly.

"We are being surrounded," said Turpin, as he observed this change in the position of the lights. "They will form round by ,in a circle. There is no help for it. We must push forward!"

[TURPIN AND KING ENTERING THE MANSION AT DURLEY CHINE.]

In a few minutes after this they emerged into a small open space.

It was not the extremity of the wood which they had reached, as they at first fancied, but one of those small open spaces covered with soft turf which are not unfrequent in forests of considerable extent.

"We must fight it out, Tom," said Dick. "I wish we had known, we would have begun before. Still, never mind! Cheer up!"

"I feel very weak and cold, my friend," said Tom, "though I think I am not quite so bad as I was a little while ago. Let me have another drink at the brandy. It is the real stuff."

"With all the pleasure in life. Finish it off. It's no good disguising the fact, we have hot and dangerous work before us."

"Look," said Tom, as he returned the flask, "there is a tree which has been cut down. Let us place ourselves behind its branches. We shall be better prepared for resistance then."

"We shall. Quick! or we shall be intercepted!"

The two highwaymen made a sudden dash across the open space to where a large tree had been felled, and ensconced themselves among its branches.

It had not evidently been long in its present position, for the leaves were plentiful upon it, and green and fresh.

They took up this position only just in time, for seven or eight officers, uttering loud shouts to each other and cries to our friends to surrender, rushed into the enclosure.

If they had sought for hours in the forest, they could scarcely have found a better place for defending themselves from attack than the one they now occupied. The stout, straggling branches of the tree would be very puzzling obstacles to overcome, and very difficult ones when two desperate men were behind them, who had firmly resolved to die rather than yield.

Turpin and King drew their hangers, and placed themselves on guard.

CHAPTER XLVI.

TURPIN AND KING DISCOVER THE MYSTERY OF DURLEY CHINE.

BLACK BESS had followed with noiseless step and rare sagacity in the footsteps of her master and his comrade.

Her fine perceptions seemed to make her conscious that silence was absolutely required, and she trod as stealthily as cat after its prey.

The posture of affairs in that little open space in the forest was rather singular in itself and most perilous for our friends.

At some not very distant period it would seem that one of those gigantic oaks, for the growth of which England is so famous, had—

"Reared its tall branches to the sky"

from the centre of this clearing, but now it had been felled preparatory to removal.

Its branches were many, wide spreading, and stout, and covered a large piece of ground as it thus lay upon one side, which, of course, had the natural effect of causing them to spread out laterally to a great distance, while in many places they rose vertically to a considerable height.

In all the forest it is questionable whether there could have been found a place more suitable for intrenchment, or a position where two men could better defend themselves against a host.

The capacity of this place was, of course, immediately perceived by Turpin, and he at once turned it to its greatest possible advantage.

The branches interlaced each other in a very puzzling manner, but the two friends penetrated them for some distance, leading Black Bess by the bridle.

Then, having reached a part sufficiently free from obstructions to allow of such a feat, they forced Bess to lie down upon her side.

But our friends were fully alive to the vital importance of celerity of action, and all this was done with great rapidity, and before the officers could reach the tree.

In a moment afterwards, however, and before Turpin and King could look to the priming of their pistols, they were upon them.

"Stand firm!" said Dick to his comrade. "Stand firm! Remember this will be no child's play! We are fighting for our liberty and life against four times our force—men who have determined to deprive us of one of them! Now, Tom! Here they are! Upon them!"

As he spoke, Turpin advanced a few paces.

He waited, though, for the police to commence the attack, who had completely surrounded the fallen tree and were crying in loud tones for the highwaymen to surrender.

But, finding not the slightest notice taken of their words, they fired an irregular volley into the tree.

This was done, of course, at random, for they had no idea whereabouts among the foliage their prey had concealed themselves, but they trusted one of the shots would find them out.

Not the faintest sound, however, came from the branches of the tree, so they fired again.

This volley was succeeded by a shot from the tree, and one of the officers placed his hands upon his breast and fell backwards.

There was one foe less for our friends to contend against.

The others, however, marked the spot from whence the flash and the smoke of the discharged pistol proceeded, and half-a-dozen shots were fired in that direction.

Our friends, though, had taken the precaution to crouch as low down on the ground as they could, so the bullets passed harmlessly a foot or two above their heads.

Another and another shot was fired by the highwaymen, both of which took effect upon the police, whose numbers were thus rapidly and unexpectedly reduced one-third.

"This will never do:" King and Turpin then heard a voice say. "We shall be picked off like sparrows on a fence. Charge at once, and rout them from their cover."

But the officers were but men, and had a wholesome dread of death, besides which, the fate of their companions was not without its effect upon them, and they hung back a little from executing the orders of their chief.

They huddled together in a denser throng.

They were quickly made aware of the imprudence of this, for two more shots were fired from the tree.

"Charge! my men! charge!" again cried the officer in command. "The danger in doing so will be less than it is now. Upon them, then! Charge!"

As he spoke—for he was a brave man—he drew his own cutlass from its sheath and sprang forward.

The others could not do otherwise than follow his example.

In their progress, though, they were greeted with two other shots, with equally good effect as the preceding ones.

But they did not draw back a moment, or hesitate in the least.

The number of officers was now reduced to four, and all this while neither of the highwaymen had received any injury worth speaking of.

There is a little mystery in connexion with the pistol-shots which we have yet to reveal.

Crouching down low upon the ground, Tom King loaded the pistols, and handed them to Turpin; who, resting the barrels upon a limb of the old oak, was thus enabled to take a most careful and deadly aim.

The lanterns which the officers carried assisted him greatly in doing this.

He had reduced the number of his opponents to less than one-half.

It was very repugnant to Dick to pick the men off in this way, but he felt that unless he chose to allow himself and his companion to be taken prisoners, there was no help for it.

But the officers now, as we have said, charged boldly at the highwaymen.

It would have been much wiser on their parts if they had adopted this plan at first, but the peculiar place in which our friends had taken shelter baffled them.

But Dick and Tom felt from the vigour with which the officers now pressed forwards to attack them, that they would yet have to struggle desperately for their lives and liberty.

Therefore, after one more discharge, they both took up their hangers.

Dick felt a desire to whisper to King, and tell him to try his best, but he was afraid his voice would reach the ears of the police-officers, and make them aware of their exact hiding-place.

Instead of speaking, he simply pressed his comrade's arm.

And then the officers were upon them.

But our friends had securely intrenched themselves behind some of the interlacing boughs of the tree, which formed a kind of barrier almost breast-high.

The officers had drawn their cutlasses.

They did not wait now to load and fire their pistols, but each wielded his weapon with an impetuosity which he hoped would quickly overcome the resistance offered to to them.

But they were mistaken.

Turpin and King were both excellent swordsmen—it had been imperatively necessary that they should become proficients in every means of defence—and in a few moments two of the foremost officers fell beneath their strokes, while they themselves had received no further injury.

There was another circumstance, too, which we forgot to mention, and which gave the two friends no inconsiderable advantage.

It was this.

The ground upon which the tree had fallen, rose into a little hillock, and it was upon the summit of this elevation that Dick and Tom stood.

They were, consequently, at least two feet higher than the police, which enabled them to reach over the barrier of branches.

But the two remaining officers—one of whom was the chief—were very bold, determined men, and they resolved by their own efforts either to capture the highwaymen or die in the attempt.

They were worked up to a perfect pitch of frenzy.

Dick and Tom received their onslaught with coolness, and calmly defended themselves while watching their opportunity to deal them a slashing cut.

Turpin was the first to disable his antagonist, whom he wounded so severely in the shoulder that he was fain to sink upon the ground, and proclaim himself vanquished.

Then he turned towards Tom King, whom he knew, from the wounds he had received, must be nearly, if not quite, exhausted.

Dick found him engaged with the chief of the police, who had already forced his way through the umbrageous barricade, and was pressing hardly upon him.

In fact, it was well for Tom that Turpin turned his attention to him when he did, for his foot slipped, and he fell heavily upon the ground.

He was so faint he could not rise, for he had, since the wound he received just before entering the forest, lost an enormous quantity of blood.

Before, however, the chief officer could follow up the advantage he had gained, he found himself suddenly confronted by Dick Turpin, who at once attacked him.

The chances between the two combatants were nearly equal—if anything, the chief of the police was the taller and more powerful man of the two.

Dick could not but admire the bravery of this officer, who, although he knew all hope of victory and capture was at an end, yet did not in the least abate the strength of his blows, or indicate the least idea of surrender.

On the contrary, he fought, if possible, with greater fury than before, and for once Turpin found some one who was fairly entitled to be called his match.

Still our hero did not like the idea of slaying this man, foe though he was, and he, therefore, sought to disarm him.

In this he was for a long time unsuccessful, for the officer, with loud cries for him to yield, attacked him with great resolution.

There was very little light, too, for them to fight by. The lanterns had become one by one extinct, and it was only because their eyes had got thoroughly accustomed to the darkness that they could see each other at all.

At length Dick, who was fairly weary of the fray, dealt one terrific sweeping blow with his hanger, which, striking through all guard, reached the head of the brave officer, who fell to the ground suddenly and heavily as though he had been knocked down with a pole-axe.

The highwaymen were masters of the field.

CHAPTER XLVII.

OUR TWO FRIENDS ENTER UPON QUITE A NEW LINE OF BUSINESS.

At the moment the officer fell to the ground, Tom King raised himself a little upon one hand and looked confusedly about him.

In fact, during Dick's contest with the chief of the police, he had lain in something that closely resembled a swoon.

For a minute or two he remained rather in doubt as to what had happened, and he passed his other hand over his eyes repeatedly.

But just as memory was flooding back upon him, the familiar tones of Dick's voice reached his ears.

"Tom—Tom," he heard him say, "the day is ours. Get up! get up at once! All is over now! I mean there is no danger! Our foes are all slain or wounded, and I myself am unhurt. Come, get up—get up!"

"All right," replied King, in what he intended to be a cheerful voice, but he found to his surprise that the words were almost inaudible.

He made a stronger effort.

"I am afraid I am badly hurt," he said, and he raised himself still further from the ground. "Help me up, Dick. I fancy when once I reach my feet I shall be able to stand all right enough."

But even as he uttered this assurance, so sudden was the accession of weakness came over him, that he sank back upon the sward.

"Hilloa!" said Turpin, in some surprise, for until then he had no idea of the condition of his friend. "Hilloa, Tom! are you so bad as that? Eh?"

But no sound responded to his words, save a strange half sigh, half groan.

Seriously alarmed, Dick knelt down hastily by the side of his friend, and placed his hand upon his heart.

It was beating regularly but very feebly.

"Oh! it is not so bad, after all, as I thought it was," he said, while he gave vent to a sigh of relief. "Not so bad as I thought it, but if something is not done, and that quickly, it soon will be worse. Let me get my lantern out of his pocket, and then I shall be able to see what I am doing!"

The reader will recollect the lantern of which Dick now spoke. It was that one which had rendered them such signal service while escaping from the "Samson and Lion."

Turpin was not long finding and lighting it.

He first cast the broad, bright beam of light upon his friend's countenance.

It was very pale, and streaked with blood in many places.

Tom's eyes were closed, and he looked for all the world as though Death had written Finis to his career.

But such was not the case, nor was it to be until he had seen stranger and more perilous adventures than any with which he had yet met.

King opened his eyes.

It is most likely the bright rays of the lantern falling upon his eyelids aroused him.

But he could not see his friend, who held the lamp before him, and whose form was consequently shrouded in darkness.

He heard his voice, though, for Dick, as soon as he saw Tom's eyes open, spoke to him cheeringly.

Then the administration of some more brandy from the flask greatly aided his recovery; in fact, in a few moments he was able to sit up.

With all imaginable tenderness Turpin made an examination of the wounds which Tom King had received.

He was overjoyed to find them all of a superficial character—the first one he had received looked the worst, but that was owing in a great measure to the coagulated blood about it, which had forced itself through the bandage he had so hastily tied on.

"You will be right enough in a very short time," he said, as King looked inquiringly at him. "Absolute rest for a time will be indispensable, and then you will be as sound as ever you were."

"I am glad of that assurance, my friend, for I do assure you I feel about as bad as I well could just at present."

"No doubt—no doubt! Congratulate yourself that you have got off so well as you have."

"I do—and you?"

"I am, as I may say, perfectly unhurt, though I expect to find a scratch here and there. However, stay where you are for a moment. I would lie down if I were you—it will rest you more, and you will recover your strength better. In the meantime I will try if I cannot find some water that will do to wash your hurts with. You will find a plentiful application of cold water will make a wonderful difference to you."

"I should be glad of some water, indeed!" replied King, "for the wounds smart and burn unbearably."

"That is inflamation—a thing to be especially eschewed—and you may make up your mind that if the hurts are not well cooled with water, they will take a dangerous turn. I shall not be long gone to fetch some, so be patient. I will just put Bess upon her legs again."

So saying, Turpin made a few steps further among the branches and helped his mare to her feet, for he had at the commencement of the contest commanded her to lie down, and so she had remained.

It was one of the things he had been most careful in teaching her, for he was well aware of the value it would be to him. In the present instance she had by lying down been entirely out of the range of the pistol shots.

When she reached her feet she rubbed her nose affectionately against Dick's breast, who in return patted her upon the neck.

Then, after a word more to King, Turpin left the tree which had been of such essential service to him, and crossed the little open space.

Bess followed him with the docility of a dog.

He listened for a long time for the sound of flowing water without result, but presently there came to his ear—

"——the bubbling music of some little stream Dancing over rocks."

He quickened his steps, and soon found himself upon the margin of one of those little brooks, which sometimes divide estates and counties from each other. He noted the spot carefully, and then retraced his steps.

King he found was already wonderfully better.

With his assistance Tom rose to his feet.

"Lay hold of my arm," said Dick. "Don't be afraid of leaning on me. I can bear your weight well enough Or would your prefer mounting Bess?"

"I would rather walk," replied Tom. "I find I am gaining strength momentarily, and we have not far to go, have we?"

"Not a hundred and fifty yards."

"I can manage that then, especially if we walk slowly."

"To be sure you can. Come along, Bess!"

It took them some minutes to reach the little brook, and, when they did, Tom was fain to sit down upon the bank, which happened to be rather precipitous. The exertion of walking even that short distance completely exhausted him.

When he had rested a little, he, by Turpin's directions, got still closer to the water's edge, and put his arm so that the water actually flowed over it.

Dick then, by filling his hat with the pure fluid, poured a considerable quantity upon the upper part of his arm, near the shoulder.

The beneficial results of this treatment were soon apparent, and when the clotted blood was completely washed away from the wound, it did not look half so ghastly and formidable as it did before.

When this operation was completed, and the arm had been thoroughly drenched with the cold water—which, of course, had the very natural effect of staunching the blood to some degree—Turpin formed a portion of his clothing into a long bandage, which he first soaked thoroughly in the stream, and then bound tightly around Tom's arm.

"I think the worst part of the job is over," he said, as he rose from the crouching posture he had assumed. "How do you feel now?"

"Quite well!"

"I suppose you mean quite well to what you did a little while ago?"

"That's it! And I fancy now if you will only bathe my head and neck in the same way, I shall be as right as right can be."

"Very good! Hold your head over carefully."

Tom did so, and the copious stream which Dick poured upon it allayed instantly the smarting of one or two slight wounds which were in themselves nothing.

After the application of the cold water had been continued for about five minutes, Tom King felt himself well and strong enough to rise and walk without assistance.

Turpin observed this with pleasure, but he said:

"You must not tax your newly-gained strength too much, or you will suffer in the long run. I consider it imperatively necessary that we should seek a shelter somewhere. I mean a place where we can, if we choose, remain for a day or two without molestation."

"I do not know where such a place is to be found," said King, "though I should be glad enough were it discovered. If I could rest for a day or so, it would be a good thing for me, for in that time I should quite get over the effects of this night's work."

"We must try, though of course just now it will be more difficult than usual, for our fight with the officers will rouse all the county."

"It will, indeed! I did not think of that when I spoke. Why, the difficulty is ten times increased."

"It is! We left London because we made it too hot to hold us, but I fancy what we have done will make this place hotter still."

"You may depend upon it it will! It is unlucky for me—very. Still we can only make the best of it. Is it, though, really possible that we have overcome so large and well-armed a body of officers? I can scarcely credit it."

"Unfortunately for us, and for them also, it is too true! However, I did but defend myself."

"And your wounded comrade."

"I think you did a fair share towards defending yourself. More than most men would have been able to do with such hurts as you had received."

"But now," said Tom, as they both reached the little clearing again, "let us go back to our original consideration. What is to be done?"

"I have no idea further than that we push on as fast as possible."

"Yes, I am quite sure the greater distance we put between ourselves and this place the safer it will be for us. Have you any idea of the time?"

"The night must be young yet. However, we will consult the captain's watch."

"Oh! he was a captain, was he? Did you get anything like a booty?"

"Pretty fair," said Turpin.

He smiled as he took the lantern from his capacious pocket, and directed its light upon the face of the chronometer. It was just half-past ten.

"There is plenty of time for a great deal to be done before daybreak," remarked King.

"True!" said Turpin, returning the articles to his pocket; "and now the next thing you will have to do will be to mount."

"On Black Bess?"

"Yes."

"And what shall you do?"

"Walk, of course! Both of us cannot be on her back at once very well, and surely you would not have me ride, while you, wounded, walk on foot? Come, get up without any nonsense! You will find you will not be able to go on at any great rate for two or three reasons, so I shall be easily enough able to keep up with you."

"But——"

"I tell you, Tom, I will have no buts in the case, so mount at once. You must be aware that every moment may be of the utmost importance to us."

Finding it utterly useless to remonstrate, King suffered Dick to assist him on to Bess's back, who, in her way, seemed rather at a loss to account for the change which was made.

Tom seated himself in the saddle. He was beginning to find he was not so strong as he fancied he was.

"There is one thing more to be considered before we start," he said, as Dick took hold of Bess's bridle to lead her away.

"What is that?"

"Simply this. If you have not lost all count of our course, I have, and I should just like to know which is north, east, south, and west. We ought to be going south."

"I confess," said Turpin, "I had lost my reckoning, and was about to lead you off without considering the way. However, I am very glad you mentioned it, because we shall easily settle the point."

"How?"

"With the captain's watch."

"The captain's watch?"

"Yes; I have noticed that many watches made for seafaring people have a compass fitted in the back, and I daresay this one has."

"It will be capital if it has."

"We shall soon know," said Dick, as he once more produced his invaluable lantern, and looked at the watch by means of its rays. "Here you are, just as I expected."

The highwayman then placed the watch in a horizontal position, and found that the south was just before them, so that Dick had by chance hit upon the right direction.

But now, feeling themselves quite sure upon the point, Turpin took hold of Bess's bridle again, and pushed onwards at a good speed.

Just then the clouds parted a little, and allowed the moon to take a peep at their proceedings.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

A SUCCESSION OF STRANGE EVENTS—DICK TURPIN RELATES HIS EARLY HISTORY TO HIS FRIEND, TOM KING.

DOWN many a glade—through many a thicket—over many a stream and treacherous morass—sometimes lighted by the straggling moonbeams, and sometimes in the profoundest darkness—our two friends made their way. Dick Turpin had hold of his mare's bridle, professing to lead her, but although he did shape her course, he trusted entirely to her finer instinct to keep out of any dangerous place.

As for Tom, he sat very quietly upon the back of Black

Dear, he was more prostrated from the effect of his wounds than he cared to acknowledge, even to himself.

From time to time, as they proceeded on their way, Dick had recourse to the compass in the captain's watch, in order to make sure they were not travelling in the wrong direction.

It was obviously their best policy to get as far from London—or, in fact, any town—as possible, and then lie concealed for a little time until the noise their last exploits would be sure to make should, in some measure, have died away.

Both were well aware that if they persevered in the course they were taking, they must reach the sea coast at some point between Southampton and Portsmouth.

They continued, therefore, to follow a passage in this direction, for they argued that if it should become imperative, they would no doubt be able to slip over to France for a time.

It was not until they had gone many a mile, apparently where no man had gone for a hundred years at least, that Tom spoke.

"Dick—Dick," he said.

His voice was low but firm.

"What is it, my friend? Are you better?"

"Much! But when you again look at the compass to make certain of our route, turn the watch over on the other side and tell me what the time is."

"I will do that now, for I was about to look when you spoke. It wants a little more than half an hour of midnight."

"Indeed, so late! Surely, now, in half an hour we shall emerge from this place, of which I am most heartily tired, and we shall be able to tell whereabouts we are."

"I suppose the necessity of rest grows upon you."

"No, I cannot say that is altogether it; but I feel impatient, and long to place myself where I shall be more secure than I am now, for I can assure you I could now do very little in the fighting way."

"I should think not; so, for your sake, I hope we shall meet with no interruption."

It was verging closely upon midnight when the two friends emerged from the forest.

A scene of surpassing beauty met their gaze.

Before them, glistening in the moonbeams like polished silver, was the English Channel. It stretched to the right, to the left, and straight on before them, as far as the eye could reach.

The landscape, too, was very rich, and very thickly wooded.

There was but one habitation in sight, and that was a very fine old Gothic hall, or mansion, which was built upon the summit of a rock, and overlooking the sea.

It was surrounded by a park of vast extent, which had rather a sombre appearance, attributable, however, to the great number of chestnut-trees that grew in it.

The moon was barely half way between the horizon and the zenith, but she had risen above the thick bank of clouds, and her bright rays fell upon the roofs and chimneys and one side of this mansion with an exceedingly beautiful effect.

For some time the two highwaymen remained quite motionless, gazing upon the magnificent panorama spread out before them, in which, at that still hour, the longer they gazed the more beauties they found.

Dick was the first to break the silence.

"This is splendid!" he said; "I never saw anything one half so lovely. Did you, Tom?"

"I must confess I never have," said King, "and yet this place is most deceitful."

"Deceitful, Tom? Why, what do you mean? Do you mean to tell me it will fade away—vanish—like that, what-do-you-call-it the travellers say they see in the desert?"

"The mirage? No, that is not what I meant. Do you see the mansion up there?"

"Yes."

"I have heard of it many times, and recognise it from the descriptions I have at various times had of it, and sketches I have seen. You, doubtless, when I mention it, will know its name, or, at all events, have heard it before."

"What is it, then? You fill me with curiosity."

He drew closer to King as he spoke.

"It is known," said Tom, "by the rather singular name of Durley Chine."

"Durley Chine?"

"Yes. Is it possible you have not hitherto heard the name?"

"I have no remembrance of it."

"You surprise me! A few years ago there was a great talk about it. However it turns out an excellent thing for us."

"You talk rather enigmatically, Tom, and you jump from one thing to another strangely. What is it you mean? You spoke at first about this beautiful prospect being deceitful. Now, I should like to know first what you meant by that."

"I will tell you."

Dick looked with increasing earnestness into his companion's face.

He anticipated some remarkable and interesting revelation.

"When I spoke of its being deceitful," continued King, "I alluded chiefly to the air of peaceful serenity there is about this place, and thought of the strange occurrences that happened some twelve or fourteen years ago, when I was a boy."

"Indeed! What were they?"

"It will be scarcely worth while to tell you now," said Tom, "nor would it be wise. We shall soon have a more fitting opportunity. I intend we shall take up our abode in that mansion for a time! No one will think of looking for us there."

"And how about the residents?"

"The place is uninhabited, and has been for the period of time I mentioned."

"Fourteen or fifteen years?"

"Yes."

"How extraordinary! Whatever can be the reason that such a magnificent property as this is deserted?"

"That forms the sequel to the account I have to give you of the things that happened there. It was one of those domestic tragedies, the remembrance of which endures for a generation, and is then forgotten."

"You have filled me with curiosity and interest."

"I do not doubt that; but come, do not stay here like this; let us push forward. In a very short time now we shall be secure from all search; and I shall, besides, be able to have that rest which I feel is so vitally important to me."

"I am glad to hear that. But the place of concealment had need to be a good one, if we are to escape discovery. There will be a hot search made."

"You are right there, but I am not much afraid now. Take the bridle again, and keep on in as straight a line as you can."

Once more then the little party set themselves in motion.

The road they took, which was nothing more than a footpath through some fields, was somewhat declivous, so that in a little while they lost sight of the sea, but the gabled roofs of Durley Chine, owing to their elevation above the surrounding scenery, were still visible.

A little more than a quarter of an hour's walk brought them to a broad cross-country lane.

Turpin unfastened the gate, and passed out of the field into it.

The opposite side of the lane was formed of wooden palings, some six feet in height.

They were nailed close together—one strip of wood overlapping the other.

A green, mossy parasite had overgrown this palisade, and imparted to it a neglected appearance, while here and there some trailing plant had twined itself fantastically about it.

Above this paling, and effectually preventing any one from surmounting it or even seeing what was on the other side, grew a large quickset hedge, which was in the full glory of unrestricted growth.

Above that could be seen the tops of numerous large chestnut-trees.

"This, I take it," said King, after Turpin had refastened the gate, "is the boundary paling of Durley Park. How gloomy it looks."

"And how impregnable. How are you going to effect an entrance?"

"Why, not by climbing over that hedge, you may be sure. If we follow the palisade we must arrive at the entrance gates."

"Yes; but do you think of getting through them?"

"Why not?"

"Oh! I see no reason why not."

"Of course, if we find a gap in the palings we may as well pass through it. But I do not suppose we shall."

"Not see a gap in the palings, and the place been so long deserted? I should think we shall be sure to do so."

"You will know more presently."

"You are very mysterious about it."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure."

"Well, I will tell you how it is. I said just now I was acquainted with some particulars of certain events that happened here and led to its being closed up. I want to give you those particulars in the form of a narrative, unspoilt by my telling you anything you might construe into a solution of the mystery!"

"Then I only hope it will prove interesting enough to compensate me for my patience in waiting for it."

"I can promise that it will beforehand; and look, do you see the top of some white object just in advance?"

"Quite plainly. I was just going to ask you if you knew what it was. It looks like some monument or other, but it cannot be that, surely?"

"I have never seen it, but only heard that it is here to be seen by anyone who takes the trouble to look."

"What is there to be seen?"

Tom laughed as he replied—

"You must wait and see."

The lane curved round a good deal to the left, so that, although the moon's rays, which became every moment more brilliant, showed the top of some monument, the lower part was not to be seen.

That part which was visible resembled the apex of an obelisk.

Dick's curiosity, which was now raised to the highest pitch of endurance, was soon gratified, for in a few moments they went round the bend in the lane, which then for a mile at least stretched out in a straight line before them.

Near the middle of this straight piece of roadway—that is to say, rather less than half a mile distant was that which the highwayman had seen the top of over the trees.

It was clearly a monument of some kind, though it seemed a very strange place for such a thing to be erected.

In a very few minutes Turpin and King reached it, and by mutual consent both stopped to examine it attentively.

The strange and startling events that are about to be related in connection with the old mansion at Durley Chine, make it imperative that we should be a little more precise than usual in describing it.

Its height from the ground to the point at the top was not much under twenty feet, so that, placed as it was in the centre of the lane, it formed a very conspicuous object.

It was built entirely of white marble, very highly polished, and the moonbeams fell upon it with rare beauty and effect.

The base of this monument consisted of a square pedestal about five feet in height by three across.

Upon the top of this pedestal (one at each corner and the other in the centre) were placed five stone balls, resembling cannon balls in every respect save colour.

These formed a support for the upper part of the monument, which was composed of a pyramidally-shaped block of marble, at least ten feet in height.

Such was the peculiar object before which the two friends paused.

The singularity of its shape was sufficient in itself to attract, under any circumstances, something more than a passing observation, but its strange situation made it still more remarkable.

The highwaymen looked upon it for some moments in silence.

Tom King was determined not to be the first to speak. He had not to wait long, for Turpin asked—

"Has any one been buried here? or what is it?"

"Look a little closer at the pedestal, my friend, you will see that there is upon it an inscription."

"No, there isn't; it is a coat of arms, or something of that sort."

"And is there nothing more—no lines under it?"

"No."

"You must be making a mistake, or else I have been informed wrongly."

"Oh! I see," said Dick, who had made a re-examination of the pillar, "I see how it is! There is a coat of arms on two sides of the pedestal, and an inscription on the others."

"I thought so. I had always been told there was. Can you read what it is?"

"On this side I can, for the letters are large and deeply cut."

"That will do, then. The inscription on the other side is merely a duplicate of this one."

"Listen."

Dick then read as follows.

We give the inscription just as it appeared upon the stone.

In obedience to the instructions
Contained in the last Will and Testament of SIR ERNEST DANE, Kt.,
This Marble Monument has been in this place erected
by his Executors,
In order to make known to all persons that the Will of the deceased Baronet strictly injoins that,
Dating from the time of his funeral,
The 25th JULY, MDCCXVII.,
No foot be placed
Either within the mansion of Durley Chine or the park surrounding it
For the period of One Hundred Years;
But all things left
Untouched as they were at his death.
And
Should any one be found sufficiently abandoned to disregard the last injunctions of the dead
(which should always be held sacred),
They will in the eyes of the law be guilty of a trespass, for which
They will be prosecuted with the utmost rigour,
Sir Ernest having caused to be set aside
A sum of money
For that especial purpose.

"What do you think of that, Dick?" asked Tom King, when his companion had finished reading the above inscription.

"What do I think of it? Why, that altogether it is the most extraordinary thing I have ever met with."

"I don't doubt that."

"What in the world could be his motive for abandoning such a beautiful residence to decay?"

"You may depend it was an all-powerful one."

"Do you know what it was?"

"Rumour has given several reasons," replied Tom, evasively. "When this monument was first put up it called forth a great deal of remark."

"It would be sure to do that. And these armorial bearings on the other side are, I presume, those belonging to the family of the baronet?"

"Yes."

"How strange, to be sure! And I see now, as you pass down the lane either way, the inscription is before you."

"Just so. That was in order every one should see it."

"I wonder if his wishes have been scrupulously observed."

"I cannot tell, my friend. I can only say this, if they have hitherto they won't be much longer!"

"Then, do you think of taking refuge in the mansion?"

"I do. I resolved upon it the moment I saw the building."

"Now, I should have thought," said Dick, half seriously, "that from what you said about the miser's box, you would have had too great a reverence for the wishes of the dead to disobey them."

"So I should, if they had been at all reasonable. But when they are ridiculously absurd, like these, I consider I am quite justified."

"And so do I. For I tell you plainly it is not because this place will afford us such complete concealment that I am anxious to enter it, but I have made up my mind to see if I cannot find out the reason why Sir Ernest made so peculiar a will."

"With all my heart, do it," said Tom.

"I think I never had my curiosity so much excited about anything as it has been about this."

"It looks like it. However, I have heard an account of the mystery of Durley Chine, but how far it is truth, and how far fiction, I cannot tell until we have actually seen the inside of the place."

"Come along, then, at once! But you speak a great deal better than you did."

"Oh! yes, I am much stronger now than I was. Yours was very judicious treatment, Dick."

"It was simple, and it appears to have been effective."

"It has. I shall soon be all right again, thanks to you. And now we ought not to lose any more time than we have already. Let us see about making an entrance into Durley Chine."

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE SECRET OF DURLEY CHINE.

OUR friends now, having given one more glance at the obelisk, turned round.

Then, and not till then, did they notice that they had reached the termination of the park paling, and that there was in its place the entrance gates to the park.

They were flanked by very large solid stone buttresses.

The hinges of the gates, which were of wrought-iron, were secured in two high stone pillars, which had upon their tops the crest of the family sculptured in stone.

This was a lion seated, with one of his fore-paws resting upon a vertical shield.

"I don't think we shall have much difficulty over this job," said Turpin, who carefully examined the lock. "It is large and formidable-looking, but it will be all the easier picked for that!"

"It will; but are there no other fastenings?"

"None that I can see, with the exception of two bolts."

"Oh! they are nothing. But, Dick."

"What?"

"You must be careful how you open the gate. You must do it so as to be able to fasten it again, and leave it without the appearance of its having been tampered with. If you do not, you will destroy our safe hiding-place at once."

"I'll take care of that. You watch for anyone coming."

"All right! There is not much to fear, though, I fancy, in the way of an interruption. Still it is best to be prepared."

In the meantime, Turpin had produced a pick-lock from his pocket, with which he immediately commenced operations.

The gate lock baffled him for some time.

At last, however, its bolt shot back with a sharp click.

It was then an easy matter to withdraw the bolts, and swinging one half of the gate open, Turpin entered, closely followed by Tom King, who was mounted on Black Bess.

As soon as they had passed through, Dick shut the gate, bolted it, and then, by the aid of the little instrument which had already been so useful, relocked it.

They were now standing in the main avenue of Durley Chine, or rather in what once was the main avenue.

Now it presented no claim for such a designation, for the fine gravel was completely overgrown by a mass of luxuriant undergrowth, through which they had some trouble in forcing a way.

It grew darker and darker at every step they took.

The huge horse-chestnut trees with which the park was literally filled, stretched out their massive branches, loaded with dark leaves, in every possible direction, and making too dense a canopy overhead for the moon's rays to penetrate.

A row of these sombre-looking trees had been planted at each side of the avenue, and doubtless, when properly trimmed, looked handsome enough; but now, for more than fifteen years, they had been allowed to grow unrestrainedly, so that they had put forth branches here and there, until the whole were inextricably interwoven with each other.

Our friends' progress was necessarily slow, for they felt it incumbent upon them to proceed with caution.

It was one comfort, though, to find the ground beneath their feet firm and even.

The avenue was serpentine in shape, so that they could not obtain a glimpse even of its termination, nor of the mansion they were so anxious to reach.

Dick's thoughts were running upon the mysterious monument.

"Did this Sir Ernest Dane," he said, after a few minutes silence, "have no heirs?"

"None very closely allied to him, but several distant relatives."

"And did they not contest this will?"

"I believe they did all that could be done to set it aside, but their attempts failed utterly. The baronet was one too many for them."

"How very strange! But stop! What is to become of the place at the end of the hundred years?"

"It is to go into the possession of his nearest heir then living. You must understand that this estate is, or was, but a portion of his property. The remainder he divided pretty equally among his descendants."

"Then they ought to have been satisfied, and have left him to the quiet indulgence of his whim."

"I don't know that. It was argued that no man had a right to do as he had done, and I think it was argued very justly."

"Perhaps so, for a multitude of evils might spring from such a state of things."

"You are right enough there, but you see here the place remains as he ordered it, though whether it will remain until 1817 is more than I can tell."

"Or care to know. Thank goodness!" exclaimed Turpin; "we have reached the end of this avenue at last."

It was as Turpin had said; they had reached the end of the avenue, but before they gained the mansion they would have to cross a lawn of unusual size, on which the grass had grown to a height of three or four feet.

Before them, however, was the picturesque residence called Durley Chine.

They were facing, of course, the front of the house.

It was in deep shadow, for the moon was hidden behind; still her rays served to outline it with great distinctness.

Our friends made a strange, rustling sound, as they crossed this neglected lawn.

"What a very pretty place this is, Tom," said Turpin. "Really, the more one sees of it the greater seems the shame that it should be left to rot away."

"And yet, Dick, you ought to recollect that our recent adventures will be the means of bringing us into great peril; so you see Sir Ernest's whim has done some service to us, at least, for you may depend, if we only act with moderate caution, we shall be able to stay here unmolested as long as we think proper."

"Perhaps so."

"There is no perhaps in the matter; for, unless they had conclusive evidence that we were hiding here, I am certain neither officers nor anyone else would be permitted to search here. I very much question even if they would be allowed were they quite certain."

"This, then, we may say, is a sanctuary?"

"Exactly."

"And that all they could do, if they found we were here, would be to starve us out."

"They could do that, certainly."

"But come, never mind that now. Here we are."

"Yes, my friend; but, before we try to make an entrance, had we not better house Bess somewhere?"

"I don't know; I fancy it will be the best to take her round either to the side or the rear, and tether her to a tree, so that she can feed upon the grass, for we have no other food to offer her."

"Be it so, then. But you must take care not to place her where she can be seen by any one overlooking the place."

"Oh! yes, that will be managed easily enough."

Bess, accordingly, was led round to the back of the mansion; and our friends having found a kind of shrubbery, they tied her by the reins to one of the trees near it, leaving her sufficient length to crop the rather rank herbage about her feet.

Dick was also careful not to actually secure her to the tree, for he knew his mare was sagacious enough to understand she was not to stray from where she had been placed; at the same time, should anything occur to make such a thing necessary, she could release herself from her bondage.

This having been done, King and Turpin once more made their way round to the front of the mansion.

The hall-door was reached by two flights of stone steps, each of which had a massive balustrade.

Two lions, chiselled in stone, similar to those upon the park-gates, but much smaller in size, were upon the end of the balustrades.

Decay, however, had already begun to exert its influence upon both balustrade and steps; for the former were crumbling at the edges, and moss-grown, while the latter were broken in many places.

Day by day, year by year, had dust accumulated in the crevices of the stonework, and then the seeds of many curious wild plants had drifted there, and grown up, but, from want of space to take proper root, dwarfed in their proportions.

In fact, when the two highwaymen ascended the flight of steps, and stood upon the huge slab in front of the hall-door, the traces of desolation and neglect became more and more apparent.

The massive doorway itself was a perfect marvel in the shape of grotesque carving, but the finer portions of it had long since crumbled into powder.

The door was large, and of solid oak. Its colour now, however, was difficult to determine.

It was gracefully ornamented, and, at the same time, strengthened by a quantity of filagree ironwork running over it.

There were shutters to all the windows, but they were closed. They were of a kind very rarely to be met with now. In shape they more than anything else resembled the modern venetian blind, except that they were large and strong, and were hung on the outside with perpendicular hinges.

It was quite clear that to whomsoever the eccentric baronet had delegated the carrying out of his instructions had done their duty, for the place was strongly barricaded.

Turpin took hold of the large knob upon the door, and tried to shake it.

He might as well have tried to shake the great door of Newgate itself.

It was as firm as a rock.

"It strikes me, Tom," he said, "that this place may be, after all, just a little bit too secure."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, that we shall not be able to get in."

"Do you think not?"

"I fancy we shall have considerable trouble. Just put your shoulder against this door, and try to shake it!"

"Not I! It is quite immovable, no doubt."

"What are you going to do, then?"

"We must seek some weak part of the defences to make an entrance."

"And where do you imagine you will find it? It appears to me the place has been fastened up with the greatest possible care."

"It has, unquestionably, but they have left one point unguarded."

"Where?"

"These little windows!"

Tom King, as he spoke, pointed to two small latticed casements.

They were placed upon each side of the door, and probably for the purpose of illuminating the hall

They were tall, and comparatively narrow.

They were filled with a great number of minute stained glass, diamond-shaped panes.

But they were unprovided with shutters.

The little side windows had, evidently, either been entirely overlooked, or else, finding there was no means of fastening them, they had been left to take their chance.

When Tom King called Turpin's attention to them, both became aware that a soft light had stolen over the scene, and that they could see now with much greater distinctness what they were about than they could before.

They turned round to see from whence this sudden accession of light had come, and found that the moon had just made her way round to the front of the mansion, and was shining softly upon them.

Dick took from the pocket in his coat, which he had made expressly for it, a small steel crowbar.

"This will facilitate operations, I rather think. It is a beautiful little weapon, is it not?"

He held it out to Tom as he spoke.

King took it in his hands, and, just glancing at it for a moment, said—

"It will be of most essential service. But we have wasted sadly too much time already. So, here goes!"

He made a step forward to the little window.

"Nay, nay," said Dick, "you are wounded, my friend, although you must be getting much better, or you would not have needed me to remind you of it. Still, I fancy I can do it better than you."

"I had forgotten it for the moment, I confess. But take the jemmy, and start at once!"

"All right!" said Dick. "It will be easy enough to get in now."

But he found much more difficulty in effecting an entrance than he at all expected.

CHAPTER L.

RELATES THE STRANGE SIGHTS AND SOUNDS WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN SAW AND HEARD IN THE DESERTED MANSION AT DURLEY CHINE.

HOLDING the little crowbar firmly in his hand, and mounting upon a portion of the stonework, Dick Turpin made an examination of the fastenings of the tall, narrow windows.

He quickly found they were very simple, so he broke one of the little panes and introduced his hand.

Simply turning round a button handle undid the casement, and he flung it open at once.

Then he, for the first time, became cognizant of the fact that the hall window was protected on the inner side by some ornamental iron-work.

He communicated his discovery to Tom King, who remarked—

"That is very awkward, but we ought to have foreseen it. You must break it down, but be careful to do so, if possible, in such a manner as not to excite notice—I mean, in the event of any one coming here to look for us."

"I shall have some trouble in doing that. However, I will do my best."

A grating, crackling sound now ensued, which showed that Turpin had already done some execution.

"Does is yield easily?" asked Tom.

"Oh! yes. I suppose the damp has got to it in some way, for it hardly holds a bit in the setting. That's the last one! There it goes!"

The iron screen which Turpin had displaced bodily fell with a loud clang upon the flooring of the hall, raising a thousand and a thousand echoes in the dismal building.

All within was as dark as the very tomb.

Turpin leaped down again on to the stone slab.

"Now, Tom, my friend," he said, "enter! The way is clear before you! I will follow!"

So saying, he caught hold of his comrade and assisted him on to the piece of stone coping from whence he could without difficulty make his way through the window into the hall.

Tom King got quite through the window, but did not jump down.

He seated himself upon the inner sill, and, turning round, said—

"Light that lantern of yours, Dick, and hand it up here. It is positively so dark that I could not see anything within an inch of my nose. And before I shift from where I am I should like to see where I am going to."

"You are wise. Stop a moment."

Once again, on that memorable night, did Dick produce his lantern, which had been of such good service to them, and, having ignited it, gave it to his friend who stretched out his hand to receive it.

Tom King then cast the broad ray of light full into the interior of the hall.

Its vastness, both in respect to length, height, and width, was something wonderful. A carriage and pair could have been turned round in it with ease.

But Tom King did not attempt to make any particular examination of the hall while in his present position; he merely noticed the distance to the floor, and, finding it insignificant, dropped it at once.

[DICK TURPIN RELATING HIS EARLY HISTORY TO TOM KING.]

In another moment Turpin had scrambled through the window and was standing at his side.

King stooped down and picked up the iron screen from the floor of the hall.

"Take this, Dick," he said, "and before we do anything further, or look at anything, let us restore the window to the same state as it was when we first saw it."

"It is a good advice, and I will follow it. First, however, I will close and refasten the window."

"Good; but you must see to do it by the aid of such light as comes to you from without."

"Why not turn the lantern this way?"

"It would be most unwise to do so. We do not know but even at this moment some person may have his eyes fixed upon this building, and whose suspicions would be immediately excited if he saw a light flash from one of the windows.'

"You are quite right, Tom, and I admire your caution," said Turpin, as he forced the fastening of the window into its place. "Hand me the piece of iron, and I will fix it up again."

This was the most troublesome job of all; but at length, after repeated efforts, Turpin succeeded in replacing it.

To be sure, the least touch would have knocked it down again, but they did not expect any one would be there to touch it, so they considered they had done pretty well.

The pane of glass which Dick had broken would, of course, have to remain as it was; but, even in the event of any one coming to that door, such a little thing as that might elude their observation.

When Dick stood on the hall-floor again, he took the lantern from Tom's hand, and looked all about him by its aid.

From the very first he had felt a deep curiousity about this so strangely deserted mansion.

He turned the beam of light first upon one walls

For about half-way they were composed of black oaken panelling, very richly and grotesquely carved.

The figures upon them seemed to be in some way connected with each other, as though the whole formed an allegorical or emblematical device which Dick fancied pertained to the chase, but he did not pause to examine it with sufficient attention to say whether it was or not.

Between the top of the panelling and the ceiling were some large paintings—at least, such, from the frames, they imagined them to be; but they were so thickly incrusted with dust it was quite impossible to make anything out respecting them.

Several large doors opened from this entrance-hall in both sides of the wall, and in its centre almost was a spacious staircase, with a balustrade harmonizing with the panels.

On the first landing of the staircase they could dimly see a handsome window of stained glass.

From the roof of the hall depended a chandelier, in which were many pieces of wax candle.

Pieces of sculpture of various kinds were placed in the hall, as well as a huge ornamental flower or tree-pot, in which a withered, ghostly-looking stem still remained to show what had once been there.

But upon every object lay dust in surprising quantities. The floor of the hall was so thickly covered with it that the highwaymen's feet sunk into it like snow.

Such was the general appearance of the place into which our two friends intruded.

Can we wonder that, finding some fresh wonder at every turn, they stood for some time motionless and speechless.

At last when they had, bit by bit, seen the whole of the hall, Dick spoke.

He could not tell how it was, but somehow he involuntarily spoke in a subdued voice to his companion.

"What do you think of all this, Tom, my friend?" he said. "Is it not strangely and wonderfully solemn? What a pity, too, to see a place, like this must have been at one time, in such a state. It is shameful!"

"You are right there! But we have not, I fancy, seen one half of the wonders of Durley Chine, and, doubtless, the remainder will well pay us for our trouble."

"If it is at all like this it will. But come, where shall we go first?"

"I should advise," said Tom, "that we make our way into some one of the apartments, and there make ourselves as comfortable as circumstances will allow."

"But the peep at the rest of the building, which I am so anxious to have?"

"It will, I fancy, be wisest to postpone that until to-morrow when we have daylight to aid us."

"Oh! we can do without daylight," said Dick. "This lantern will answer the purpose. Come along!"

"I can make every allowance for your curiosity and impatience, but I must really remind you of two things."

"What are they?"

"Why, firstly, that though I have held up very well considering, yet it has cost me an effort, for my wound is still painful, and I am yet weak."

"Pardon me, my friend, but I had forgotten that. We will find some place where we can rest at once."

"And not only that," continued King. "You must not forget that we shall only be safe here so long as we raise no suspicions of the place being inhabited. Now, it appears to me an impossibility for you to walk about the house with a light without its being seen at some of the windows, and then, of course, we should be done for at once."

"You are thoughtful and prudent," said Turpin. "It would be almost, if not quite, impossible not to show some light at the windows."

"Very well! Then I propose, as I said, that we make ourselves as comfortable as we can in one of the rooms. What do you say to this one?"

While he was speaking, Tom stepped across the hall, and put his hand upon the handle of one of the doors we have mentioned as opening out of it.

"Oh! let it be that one by all means," said Dick; "does it open?"

Tom turned the knob, and tried the door.

It was fast.

"If we get in here," he said, "we shall have to undo the lock. Can you manage that, Dick?"

"I dare say I can," said Turpin; "just hold the light for a minute or two, while I try."

Tom King took the light, as he was requested, while Turpin produced a small bunch of skeleton keys.

After trying several, he found one that would unlock the door.

It was very hard to turn, but it all at once shot back with a sudden snap that in that deathly, silent place, was positively startling.

Dick threw open the door, and paused for a moment on the threshold, so that whatever foul air that had accumulated there should be displaced.

Then both entered.

"Shield the lantern a little, Dick," said Tom, who had returned it to Turpin while they paused at the door. "Darken it for a moment, while I see whether there are shutters to this window, and whether they are closed."

The slide of the lantern was turned, so that only a fine pencil of light was allowed to pass through the lens.

The room was pitchy dark.

In a little while, though, they could distinguish from the rest of the gloom a few faint lines of light.

"We were right to take the precaution of dousing the light, Tom. Do you see? The night light is just visible there."

"It is. Do you recollect the peculiar shutters?"

"Yes."

"Well, it is through them that the light comes."

"That's it."

"We must stop them somehow from the inside, for, of course, if we can see the light from without, it is only fair to infer that our light will be seen from within."

"Of course. But how shall you stop up the window?"

"That remains to be seen. Throw the light just before our feet, so that we can see where we are going."

The room was of tolerable dimensions, for they were some time in reaching the window.

The floor of it was, if anything, more thickly covered with dust than the hall was, at seemed to be different and of a lighter character, for clouds of it arose at every step they took.

"Now," said King, as they paused before the window, "If there are only some inside shutters we shall be able to shut out the light without difficulty. Are there any?"

"No, none," said Turpin, after a minute's examination; "but there are apparently some very thick curtains, and I should think, if we draw them closely and carefully, they would answer the purpose quite as well."

"Almost; but not quite. However, draw them, and let us see."

But when Dick caught hold of the curtain and gave it a jerk, there fell down such a quantity of dust that he was fain to retreat.

He waited until it subsided a little, and then made a second attempt—this time with greater care.

But, nevertheless, the dust continued to fall, though not in such large quantities.

It was very fine, pungent, disagreeable dust, too, and made our friends' eyes smart intolerably, while they kept on sneezing, as if for a wager.

At length, after frequently relinquishing the task, they succeeded in drawing both curtains completely across the window.

They then turned away.

To their great vexation, however, they saw there was another window in the room.

However, there was no help for it, so they were forced to go through their disagreeable task once more.

"I think tha' will do," said Turpin, as he carefully lapped one curtain over the other. "I think that will do."

"No doubt, and now let us have the full benefit of the light from your lantern."

"With pleasure," said Dick, as he withdrew the slide and allowed the full light to stream into the room.

The first thing they did was to turn it in every direction, so as to see what kind of place it was in which they stood.

From its dimensions, and the appearance of the furniture, which, although antique, was very beautiful, despite the coating of dust upon it, they concluded it was the dining-room of the mansion into which they had made their way.

Everything they saw was full of interest to them, and our friends spent a good ten minutes in looking at the different objects.

A large, substantial-looking table ran down the centre of this room, with a dozen or so chairs placed around it.

But what was most singular was, that upon this table were a number of small articles, which a closer examination showed our friends were the remains of a repast.

They were astonished beyond measure.

"It seems to me," said Dick, "that the old baronet's will was carried out to the very letter."

"Most singular," said King. "But Dick, my friend, I am very cold!"

"So am I. This place strikes as cold and damp as a charnel-house."

"It is very natural it should when we consider how long it has been shut up. We must remedy it."

"By lighting a fire, I suppose you mean? Do you think it would be safe to do so?"

"Oh! yes! Look, there is the fire-place."

"I see it, but I don't perceive any fuel."

"That won't be a difficulty. Just lend me that little jemmy of yours, and I'll soon have some fuel."

Dick gave King the crowbar which he carried with him.

As soon as he had it, Tom commenced a very ferocious attack upon one of the chairs, and soon had it lying in fragments on the floor.

Another shared its fate.

Then he carefully placed a portion of the wood upon the hearthstone.

It was one of those old fashioned grates, provided with dogs, as they were called, which were pieces of iron for wood to rest upon horizontally.

Tom King laid the remains of the chairs in the shape of a pyramid, and then set light to them.

It was some time before he could get them to ignite properly, but when they fairly burst into a flame they burned away first-rate.

In a short time, now, quite a brilliant light filled the apartment, and revealed its most hidden recesses.

Very picturesque it looked in the ruddy and incontinent firelight, which made strange, oddly-shaped shadows flicker on the wall.

"We must look out for seats of some kind now," said Tom King, "and then we shall be quite cosy and comfortable."

"We cannot have anything better than a couple of these old arm chairs."

"But the dust!"

"Oh! we can easily get rid of that."

So saying, Tom King set about freeing his chair from the heaps of dust upon it.

Turpin took another, and followed his example.

And now, as the dust was removed, the richness and beauty of the chairs became at once apparent.

In particular the one which Turpin had taken for his own use.

It was the one that stood always at the top of the table.

The back was very high, and cushioned with crimson velvet, upon which the coat of arms belonging to the Durley family had been embroidered in gold.

The velvet had faded slightly in places, but the device itself was as bright as new.

The arms and legs of this chair were also very beautifully carved, while the upper part of the back had been wrought into the shape of a coronet.

Dick was pleased with the grandeur of this piece of furniture, and he was very careful to cleanse it from every particle of dirt.

Then he looked at it with admiration, and called his comrade's attention to it.

The firelight fell fully upon it, and imparted to it an appearance of great magnificence.

"Beautiful!" was Tom's involuntary exclamation when he gazed upon it.

He had been busily engaged in dusting his own chair, and had not paid any attention to Dick, so the beauty of this chair burst upon him all at once.

The one which King had was a very handsome one, but it would not bear comparison with Turpin's.

"I suppose," said the latter, when they had both looked at it sufficiently, and as he seated himself in it, "I suppose this is the chair in which Sir Ernest and his forefathers were went to sit."

"There can be no doubt of that," said Tom King, as he also seated himself. "I wonder if he ever thought it would be occupied by Dick Turpin, the highwayman?"

CHAPTER LI.

DETAILS HOW IT WAS DICK TURPIN TOOK TO THE ROAD. AND HOW HE OBTAINED POSSESSION OF BLACK BESS.

"Not exactly, you may depend," replied Dick, as he settled himself more comfortably in the family chair, and stretched out his legs towards the glowing embers. "Heap on a little more wood, and then, while we are taking our ease, just tell us what you know about Durley Chine."

"Certainly," said Tom, casting the remainder of the chairs upon the hearth.

This had the effect of dulling the light for a few minutes, while the smoke arose in quite a thick mass.

"Tom," said Dick, suddenly. "You've done it!"

"What?"

"You know how careful you were about not showing a light, and drawing the curtains over the windows?"

"Well, well?"

"Well! You have just put on all that wood, and where do you think the smoke's going to?"

"Out of the top of the chimney, of course! It was an oversight on my part, certainly. Still, as it is night, and the chimneys are very high, I don't suppose it can possibly be seen, for it will be little more than vapour by the time it reaches the top."

"I suppose not. However, if it comes out in a cloud, it cannot be helped now."

"No, but I shall certainly be more careful the next time I put any on."

"Do so. Ah! that's better!"

A broad flame shot up the chimney as Dick spoke, and so put an end to the smoke by consuming it."

"We are very snug here," said Tom, taking off his hat, and hanging it on one of the projections of the carving on his chair back, and throwing his pistols carelessly on the floor; "quite snug and cosy."

"We are that; and after knocking about as we have been lately this is quite a grateful change."

"I only hope we shall be left undisturbed for a day or two, and then I shall be able to get my strength up."

"And I."

"In the morning, though, and when we can have day-light to aid us, we will make a thorough exploration of the place, and, if we can, visit every nook and corner in it."

"Agreed! I should like that vastly. But come, in the meantime, just be kind enough to put me in possession of the facts you know concerning the assertion of Durley Chine."

"The facts?"

"Yes."

"Those simply?"

"Of course."

"Oh! I meant to have thrown all that I have heard, without reference to being facts or not, into the form of a narrative."

"H-m! ah! perhaps it will be as well."

"It will not take very many words, or a very long time. The story is, in itself, simple, yet most terrible."

Tom paused a moment or so.

Dick kicked the fire together with his foot.

"You must understand, first of all," resumed Tom King, "that when Sir Ernest Dane died, that is to say in 1717, he was verging closely upon sixty years of age.

"In all the accounts that I have ever heard of him he has been represented as a dark-souled, evil man, whose youth was spent in riotous living and debauch, and his old age in sorrow and in shame."

"I am afraid, Tom," interrupted Dick, "that the description would apply to very many baronets; and not only baronets, but those who rank among the highest in the land."

"Yes; but thank heaven: if there be many like him, yet there are some who show us what human nature ought to be when the accident of birth raises it above the majority of mankind."

"I don't deny that; but never mind, get on with your story."

"Yes; but, bear in mind, I cannot vouch for the truth of any of these assertions, for not only was I never in this part of the country before, but I have never seen Sir Ernest Dane."

"Then you speak by hearsay?"

"Quite. I have been told, that at the age of fifty, he was remarkable for his shrivelled diminutive person, and his vindictive malice, which peeped out on the most trivial occasions."

"What a delightful old man!"

"Despite his numberless extravagancies, which would have been sufficient to ruin most men, he, at the time of which I am speaking, namely, ten years before his decease, was possessed of considerable riches, as well as many estates, which were all, however, strictly entailed."

"That accounts for it, perhaps."

"Very likely. Now this old, hoary-headed sinner, had not at all improved since the days of his youth. To be sure, his body failed him, for excesses such as he had indulged in always leave their traces behind them. Yet the salaciousness of his disposition was in full vigour, and the old lecher professed to fall in love with the daughter of a Mr. Enderby, a gentleman of means, who resided not far from Durley Chine."

When King reached this part of his narrative, Turpin removed his eyes from the fire upon which they had been resting, and fixed them upon his comrade's countenance. He already anticipated the catastrophe, and he listened with intense interest for the continuation of the story.

"It was said that if you had searched the counties of Dorset, Devon, and Hants, you would never have found a maiden who could compare with Kate Enderby, either for personal beauty or those manifold attractions which are most endearing in woman.

"Such, then, was the being whom Sir Ernest Dane polluted with his thoughts. She—fresh, rosy, and seventeen—he jejuned, decrepit, and fifty, with one foot already in the grave.

"But Sidney Enderby, the father of Kate, was a man in whom no generous emotions could be found. His disposition was more sordid than it is easily possible to conceive any one's to be.

"He and Sir Ernest Dane formed a pair well suited to each other."

"You have drawn a nice portrait of them at all events. Upon my word, Tom, I should never have believed you were so graphic."

"Now, stop that, Dick, or not another word do you get out of me."

"Oh! never mind! I only said what I thought! Get along!"

"No sooner, then, did Sir Ernest apply to Mr. Enderby for his daughter's hand, than the latter, with many extravagant protestations of delight, assured him that his dearest wish was to see Kate united to his friend and neighbour.

"And so, without having a whisper, let alone a voice, in the matter, Kate Enderby was disposed of to Sir Ernest Dane.

"It was in vain she prayed and wept not to be forced into so hateful an alliance—in vain she urged that she had plighted her troth to another who was then upon the bright, blue waters—her father was deaf to all—and, terrified by his violence, and more dead than alive, the beautiful young Kate Enderby, who, one would have thought, certainly deserved a happier and more congenial fate, was wedded by that outrage upon humanity, the owner and resident of this mansion."

Dick looked around him, by the aid of the bright firelight, with a strange feeling in his breast. He could almost fancy—although Tom had given him no description of her personal appearance—that he could see the unhappy bride, pale and sad, seated in one of the gloomy, funereal-looking chairs.

Indeed, so strong did the delusion grow upon him, that he was obliged to rise and walk across the room to where he fancied he could see her, before he felt quite certain that it was a trick of his imagination.

His comrade watched him with some surprise, but he said nothing.

Then Turpin re-seated himself, and King went on.

"For two years all went quietly, and, to all appearance, well. Poor Kate's face, whenever it was seen, had always the traces of a heart's sorrow upon it; but, for all that, she looked beautiful, as she flitted like a spectre about the ghostly mansion.

"As for Sir Ernest, he grew more hateful and more hideous every day.

"At length, a change came over Kate.

"She no longer looked sorrowful, as she did, though her face wore anything but a cheerful expression. The colour began to return to her cheeks, and her wasted form to fill out to its proper proportions.

'How was this?' asked those who saw her, 'Has she at length resigned herself to her lot, and resolved to be as happy as circumstances would allow.' Alas, no! It was neither of these causes that induced the change in Kate's appearance.

"No one marvelled at it more than her husband.

"He revolved the matter continually in his mind, but he was unable to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion.

"The surprise which he first felt very quickly merged into undefined alarm.

"Among the servants belonging to the mansion of course this matter was freely canvassed, and they soon felt sure they had penetrated to the core of the mystery.

"More than one while out at a late hour during the night, or while gazing from their chamber windows, had observed a shadow form flitting from tree to tree.

"They immediately—rightly or wrongly—connected this circumstance with the alteration in their mistress, and many sly hints were dropped about it.

"Shortly afterwards, however, Sir Ernest's wife was observed to lapse into her old tristful state.

"For nearly four years, then, did this state of things continue; but at the expiration of that time, one of the keepers in the park, while out late one winter's night, saw the mysterious shadowy figure.

"Naturally enough they looked towards their mistress for some visible manifestation of this, for they still persisted in the connection they had formed between her and the figure; but they were disappointed. Lynx-eyed though they were, they failed to perceive any difference in her countenance. It still wore the same air of deep dejection that it had during the last four years."

Tom paused for a moment to regain his breath, but Turpin, who was breathlessly interested in the story, waved his hand impatiently for him to go on. He was too inwrapt to speak.

"I have not much more to tell you now. All at once a report was circulated that filled the mansion and the country surrounding it with blank astonishment.

"It was some time before it was believed, but every day some new fact turned up to stamp the rumour with the indelible impress of truth.

"Sir Ernest Dane's young wife had eloped!

"But with whom?

"That was the question.

"Then the story of the shadowy figure which had been seen, got talked about and known.

"Sir Ernest had the country scoured in search of his lost bride, but all in vain. Not the slightest trace of her was found.

"In prosecuting their search, it also became known that Ralph Anderdon the young sailor, to whom Kate was betrothed, had returned in safety in his ship to Plymouth, that he had left her on leave of absence, and then never re-appeared.

"This seemed to point strongly to the supposition that it was with Ralph that Sir Ernest's wife had eloped.

"Of this, however, there was no proof; but young Anderdon never rejoined his ship, and Kate was never found!"

CHAPTER LII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN DISCOVER THE SAD FATE THAT BEFEL RALPH ANDERDON AND KATE.

DICK TURPIN waited in silence for Tom King to continue his mysterious narrative.

To his surprise he remained silent.

"Surely," Dick said, at length, and it was in a tone of disappointment and vexation that he spoke, "surely, you do not mean to say that this is all you can tell me about the desertion of Durley Chine?"

"Almost it is!"

"Then it is most unsatisfactory."

"How deep an interest you have taken in it. But what more did you expect to hear?"

"All the particulars about shutting up the place in this fashion, and the motive for Sir Ernest making the strange will he did."

"Then, my friend, you want to know more than any living person knows, I fancy."

"But, surely, some account was given of it."

"Oh! very many; but whether true or not, who can tell?"

"And what happened here after the elopement? Can you tell me that?"

"I can give you some particulars of it."

"Do so, then, I beg, by all means."

"For some months after the event Sir Ernest roamed about the old mansion like an unsettled ghost. He grew excessively frightened, and would not venture anywhere alone! His eyes got bloodshot and deeply sunken in their orbits. He refused to eat, and became the living personification of a conscience-stricken man.

"There were some who went so far as to say that guilt of the deepest blackness could alone wreak such an effect upon anyone; while others, who were more charitably disposed towards him, assigned it to the remorse he must have felt for having blighted the fair future of the girl who had been forced into a union with him, and whose life he had made a miserable burden.

"I ought to have told you that immediately after the elopement of his wife, Sir Ernest caused the room which she habitually occupied to be shut up, and forbade any of his dependents to ever enter it."

"That is a very strange circumstance," said Turpin, "is it not?"

"Well, I don't know. It is only natural, I think, that he should wish her to be forgotten, and, if possible, to forget her himself."

"Then he took the step that was, above all others, calculated to cause her to be kept in remembrance, that's all I can say."

"Like enough—like enough!"

"But go on, my friend. Just let us hear of the closing up of the place."

"In a little while, then, Sir Ernest took to his bed, and he never rose from it again.

"About three hours before his decease he had his will made, which, after having stated in what manner his property was to be distributed, stipulated that immediately after his funeral the mansion of Durley Chine should be vacated; that all things which it contained should be left in the precise positions they then occupied; that every door was to be locked; every window fastened; the park palings to be thoroughly repaired in every part; that the entrance gates should be firmly locked; and then the whole left unvisited by a human being for the space of one hundred years, dating from the day of his demise."

"What a singular will! Surely, such a one was never known before."

"Scarcely, I should think, and yet some strange things have been done in that way, and doubtless will be. To finish—he bequeathed a sum of money for building the monument in the lane, about which he gave the most minute instructions, and also sunk a farther sum which was to defray the expense of keeping the palings and the monument in repair; and also to prosecute any one who was found trespassing either in the house or on the adjoining lands."

Tom paused, and then, observing Dick was silent, he added—

"Surely you do not wish me to tell you that the baronet's instructions were carried out to the very letter. I should think you have already seen sufficient to tell you that."

Dick raised his head.

"I was not thinking of that exactly."

"What then?"

"I was running the whole story over in my mind, and endeavouring to come to some conclusion."

"And have you succeeded?"

"To a certain extent I have."

"To what conclusion, then, have you come?"

Dick placed his hand upon the corner of the old-fashioned dining-table, and, looking King full in the face, replied, in a tone of deep and earnest conviction—

"The conclusion to which I have come I make no doubt will surprise you beyond measure, unless your thoughts have happened to take the same turn as my own."

It was now King's turn to feel anxiously interested, and he asked—

"Tell me what it is."

"I am firmly of belief," said Dick, "that Sir Ernest's wife never eloped at all!"

The deliberate manner in which Turpin enunciated this opinion quite staggered Tom King.

"Really, Dick," he said, "that is an extraordinary idea; but, now you have started it, I begin to be quite of your way of thinking."

"And is it possible, Tom, that it has never occurred to you before? Why, a thousand things indicate such a thing."

"I must confess," said Tom, "I never thought of it. I somehow or other quite took it for granted that Sir Ernest's wife eloped."

"And many more did beside, and so thought no more about the matter; but, take my word for it, Tom, there is something more in this than the world, perhaps, will ever know."

"Very like—very like. Now you have given me the start, or clue, as I may call it, things innumerable come thronging into my mind."

"Let us wait until the morning, Tom. We will then together spend the whole of the day in searching over the place, and it will be odd to me indeed if what I suspect is not in some way or other confirmed. I wish I knew which was the room Sir Ernest's wife occupied."

"I cannot guide you in that, for I have no more idea than yourself. Still, I should think, in going over the house, we shall find it."

"No doubt of that. The difficulty will be to know when we do find it."

"That's it, but don't let us vex our brains by thinking any more about it to-night. We cannot elicit anything more. Consent to let the subject drop until the morning, when I hope we shall be able to renew it, and arrive at some satisfactory result."

"With all my heart. I say drop the subject, if you have grown tired of it. But what shall we talk about or do instead, for I can assure you I do not feel sleepy in the least."

"Nor do I. I feel that it would be quite out of the question."

"Well, then, I ask what are we to do. Start another subject, Tom, or else let us go back to Sir Ernest Dane."

"No—no, don't let us do that. I have, believe me, heard quite enough about him for one night."

"Very well. What shall be the new subject?"

"What should you like?"

"Oh! anything, I am not in the least particular."

"Very well. Do you recollect that you made me a promise, and repeated it more than once? Now we are as quiet and comfortable, I am sure, as anyone could wish to be, and I am sure you will never have a better opportunity, and it will be some hours to daybreak, and"—

"There, stop—stop! that will do!"

"You guess, then, what I am about to say?"

"Of course I do!"

"Well."

"You want me to relate some of my back history to you?"

"That's it."

"Before I made your acquaintance?"

"Exactly; before I had the honour of your acquaintance."

"Well, then, if you are inclined to listen, I will tell you all, from my birth upwards."

"You need not go quite so far back as that."

"Very well. But there is a condition. Can you guess it?"

"I can."

"If we are here, then, to-morrow night, as we are to-night, that you will relate your life, for I am very anxious to hear it. I know it must be full of interest."

A slight shade overspread Tom's countenance, as Dick spoke, but it disappeared almost immediately, as he replied:

"I do not know what your opinion will be as to its interest, but I can tell you beforehand that it will be rather a sad affair."

"Oh, never mind that. Mine is not altogether cheerful, but you must promise to return the compliment before I begin."

"I will; and now start at once."

"Don't be too impatient! I must have time to think it over a little. But don't you see how low the fire is?"

"I do now, but I didn't when you spoke."

"It must be replenished. Why, I do believe if we had left it a quarter of an hour longer it would have gone out altogether."

"Yes; a fire soon dies out when it once takes the turn. Stop a minute, and I'll soon have some more fuel."

"But it seems a great shame to destroy such handsome furniture."

"It does, I quite agree with you; but it cannot be helped. Can it?"

"I don't see how it can."

"Lend me the jemmy, then, and I'll soon have this one to pieces."

So saying, Tom dragged one of the chairs towards the fire, and, having received the crowbar from Dick, he very quickly broke it up into fragments.

He placed a good half upon the fire.

"Now, Dick," he said, as he reseated himself, and leaned back in his chair, "I'm all attention, so just make a start."

"Very good," said Turpin, who, after a premonitory ahem! commenced the story of his life without further preface or hesitation.

CHAPTER LIII.

DESCRIBES HOW TURPIN COMMITTED HIS FIRST BOBBERY ON THE HIGHWAY.

"You must know, Tom," said Dick, "that I cannot boast of anything grand with respect to my parentage. My father was a butcher——"

"And so was Wolsey's," interrupted Tom.

"He was generally considered a well-to-do man by his neighbours; but, in the course of time, one or two things dropped out that had rather a damaging effect upon his character.

"It was always their intention to bring me up to the same trade, but somehow I did not like it. In fact, I was ambitious to be a gentleman.

"However, not far from where I was born, namely, at Thaxted, in Essex, there was a very large estate and a park that was quite overstocked with deer, belonging to a magistrate named Sir Thomas Deane.

"Well, in spite of the strictness with which he endeavoured to keep up the the game laws, and the heavy punishments he visited upon offenders, somehow or other, the keepers were always reporting the loss of his deer.

"There was about a dozen harum scarum fellows like myself, always hanging about, and having apparently nothing to do, and we were everyone of us looked upon with the greatest suspicion by Sir Thomas Deane and his keepers, though, for a long time, nothing could be brought against us.

"One fine night, though, as the whole party of us were standing over a fine buck that had just been brought down, we heard a loud shout, and before we could as much as look round, we found ourselves hemmed in by keepers and various other people belonging to the estate.

"Resistance was almost useless, but we showed fight, and one or two managed to get off, but the remainder, myself included, were captured, handcuffed, and lodged in the village cage, round which guard was kept until the morning, when we were marshalled into the presence of the magistrate, Sir Thomas Deane.

"He scowled upon us when we entered, and took his seat upon the bench. You may depend he treated the case in a very summary manner. He found us all guilty, and committed us to the assizes.

"As it so happened, we had not long to wait, for on the Monday morning the assizes commenced, and our case came on for hearing on Wednesday.

"The evidence against us was very conclusive, so the jury brought us in guilty, and the judge sentenced them all very heavily, with the exception of myself, who he let off lightly, so he said, because I was the youngest of them all, and the only evidence against me was that I was standing with the others. I ought to have told you that my father got a counsel to defend, and the line he adopted was that I was passing through the park at the time and stopped to see what was going on, and so came to be apprehended. I therefore got off with six months' imprisonment in the county jail with hard labour. But I found it terribly irksome and disagreeable, and before I had been in prison a fortnight I made up my mind to escape.

"An opportunity soon afterwards occurred, and I availed myself of it, and, after some trouble, did get free.

"Thaxted was very quickly left behind me, and I shaped my way directly for London. Of course, I had no money in my pocket, the jailors took good care of that. I was, besides, clothed in the prison dress, and this it was imperative I should get rid of, or I should be detected and apprehended immediately.

"I was walking along the London road, turning these things over in my mind, when I heard some one coming towards me at a sharp trot. It was just getting daybreak.

"'Now, what shall I do?' I thought to myself. 'Here is come one coming who doubtless possesses the very articles so necessary for me to have. Shall I strain a point for once, and take them from him?'

"The traveller I could hear coming nearer and nearer.

"'It must be so,' I said. 'Such a chance will perhaps never happen again, and, now I have gone so far, I am determined not to be caught and taken back to jail.'

"So, having come to this resolution, I drew aside into the shadow of the hedgerow, and waited for the traveller to pass me.

"In a minute or two I saw his horse's head on a level with me, and shouting, 'Stand!' in as loud and as gruff a voice as I could assume, I darted out from my place of concealment, and caught the horse by the bridle.

"'Stand!' I said again. 'I am a desperate man! Your money or your life!'

"'You shall have neither, you villain!' said a voice which I recognised instantly. 'Take that!'

"It was the voice of Sir Thomas Deane.

"Chance, then, had thus strangely brought about a meeting between us.

"I was rather startled, you may guess, and almost frightened, for this was the first affair of the kind in which I had ever been engaged.

"When Sir Thomas said, 'Take that!' I saw a faint flash, and heard a click.

"He had aimed a pistol at me, but it had missed fire.

"He uttered a curse as he found this was the case, but before it was well out of his mouth I had sprung upon him, wrested the pistol from his grasp, and dealt him a heavy blow on the head with the butt end of it.

"He fell off his horse at once.

"I was rather scared, I can tell you, when I saw the effects of my blow, but I felt I had gone too far to retreat, so I stooped down and began to rifle his pockets.

"I found in them a considerable sum of money, for he had been up to London to draw some money out of the bank. I also took a handsome gold watch, of which I knew he was excessively proud, and several other articles of less value.

"I had done all this without finding him give the least signs of life, but he now began to be aroused.

"Thinking it best to be prepared, I went up to his horse, which was standing still enough in the middle of the road, and took the other pistol from the holster.

"When I got back to Sir Thomas, he was sitting up in the road and rubbing his head in a very lugubrious fashion.

"I had not done with him yet.

"'Come, Sir Thomas, arouse yourself. Strip off your clothes immediately; or if you don't like to do that, I will put a bullet through your skull, and take them off after you are dead, which will save you the trouble.'

"I could see Sir Thomas shook a little at this, and like a prudent man he began to divest himself of his clothes.

"He pulled off his coat.

"Then his vest.

"He would have stopped, but a menace caused him to proceed.

"He took off his cravat and ruffles, and then his shirt.

"He paused again.

"'Be quick,' said I; 'off with your breeches and boots!'

"He looked at me in amazement; but finding I was terribly in earnest, complied."

"He took it very quietly, I think," said Tom; "didn't he?"

"He did! The fact is, he was only half conscious of what he was about. A good crack with a pistol is apt to have a confusing effect."

"I believe you. However, go on. What did you do when he had stripped himself?"

"Why, I stripped off my own clothes in a twinkling, and attired myself in his.

"'There,' said I, when I had done. 'You needn't look so down. You can put on the clothes I have just taken off.'

"He glared at me for a moment, and then began scrambling them on.

"'If you hadn't been so particular after your deer, one or two of which you could very well afford to spare, this would not have happened. Do you recollect me?' I said; 'I am Jack Palmer, whom you sentenced a little while back at the assizes.'"

"Jack who?" said Tom King.

"Jack Palmer. I forgot to tell you that is my right name."

"Oh! indeed!"

"Yes, I assumed the name of Richard Turpin some time afterwards."

"The deuce you did! However, go on with your story."

"He recollected my name, of course.

"'Curse you, you villain!' he said. 'Curse you, I wish you had been hanged!'

"I daresay you do! Good morning, Sir Thomas! a pleasant journey! This seems to be a nice little bit of horseflesh, I'll borrow that, too.'

"So saying, I jumped on the horse's back, and turned his head towards London.

"To my surprise, as I rode off, I actually heard Sir Thomas give vent to a chuckling laugh, which sounded more like a gander in the last agonies of strangulation than anything else.

"A sharp canter, though, soon left him far behind."

CHAPTER LIV.

RELATES HOW TURPIN STOLE HIS CELEBRATED MARE BLACK BESS.

"And so that was your first little adventure on the road, was it, Dick?"

"It was."

"Well, all I can say, you did things in a very bold and creditable manner."

"Rather! but you have not heard the best of the joke."

"What is it, then?"

"This. I was just entering London when I found what it was Sir Thomas was so spasmodically laughing about."

"Oh! what was it?"

"When I took off my prison clothes, and gave them to him to put on, I forgot to——"

"Ha! ha! ha! Ha! ha! ha!" roared Tom King, heartily. "I see! You forgot to transfer the booty out of the pockets."

"Just so."

"Ha! ha! ha! Really now. No wonder the magistrate laughed!"

"None, indeed! But you must make some allowance for me, Tom."

"Oh! certainly, certainly."

"I was rather flustered, you know. It was quite strange to me."

"Oh! don't make any excuses, I beg. I can quite understand it. I think it served the old magistrate jolly well right!"

"So do I, for he was a selfish, hard-hearted rascal. However, I can tell you one thing, and that is, I never made such a mistake again."

"No, I should hardly think you would. But come! What did you do when you found you had no money?"

"Oh! I was not altogether penniless. I found some loose silver in the pockets, which I had disdained to take before."

"But which you were glad enough of now. Proceed!"

"Well, I rode into London, and put up at the 'Saracen's Head,' in Skinner-street, Snow-hill."

"I know it well."

"I had a very good breakfast, but I noticed that the landlord eyed me rather suspiciously. My clothes did not altogether look as though they had been made for me.

"Still he did not venture to make any remark, so I paid him his bill, and went to look after my horse.

"It was brought out to me very nicely fettled, and, take it altogether, it was a very creditable looking piece of horseflesh.

"Indeed, the ostler made a remark to me to that effect, and added, that if I wished to part with it, he knew someone who would be very glad to become a purchaser.

"Here was an excellent chance of getting a little money, so I at once told the ostler that though I had not thought of selling, yet I was open to receive a reasonable offer, adding, as well, that I should stand something worth his while if his customer behaved handsomely.

"I waited in the stable a little while, while the ostler went into the house to fetch the would-be purchaser, who, I found, was staying there.

"After a little badgering, he agreed to give, and I agreed to take, fifty guineas for Sir Thomas's nag.

"The money was paid, so I slipped a guinea into the ostler's palm and made myself scarce, for I was sharp enough to know the sooner I was off the better.

"Indeed, just as I passed out of the archway, I saw a body of police coming from the direction of St. Martin's-le-Grand, so I hastened down Snow-hill, and soon found myself at the back of Field-lane.

"I had often heard of this place, though I had never seen it.

"As I perceived no signs of a pursuit, I did not go down it, but found my way into Hatton Garden, and thence to Holborn, where I entered a coetumier's and purchased some clothing that suited me better than those I had taken from Sir Thomas Deane."

"And what did you do next?" asked Tom.

"You will hardly expect it, but I set out, and for days and days tried to obtain some kind of honourable employment."

"You succeeded, of course?" said Tom, with a tinge of irony in his words.

"I did not. My efforts were entirely useless. Everyone to whom I applied wanted some account of my past life, which, of course, I could not give them; though towards the last, the philanthropic appearance of many of the persons to whom I made application, induced me to tell them of my misfortunes, but I was met with such looks of indignant horror for having entertained the idea of asking them for employment, after having been in jail, that I very quickly gave that up."

"It is always the way, my friend," said Tom King. "I have found it so to my cost. When once a man is down, his fellow-men turn upon him like wild beasts, and keep him down. Woe to the unhappy wretch who first loses caste, for let him try afterwards, as he will, he will never be able to regain his position."

"That is unfortunately too true, my friend. Heaven knows it was from no wish or predilection on my part that I became a highwayman. I was forced into that career in spite of myself."

"Well, well; do not begin to reflect upon it in that way. It is a subject that will not bear much reflection. It is a short life and a merry one, checkered by many a strange episode, that does not fall to the lot of common humanity."

"It is. And so, of course, Tom, it is nothing surprising that when my money was all spent I went upon the highway seeking more."

"Not at all—not at all. You had your choice of two evils—to starve or go upon the road—and you chose the less."

"Many and many a strange adventure have I had, Tom, during my career, but still such as we may meet with again."

"Just so. I will, however, give you credit for having made yourself notorious in a very short space of time."

"Pretty well. Not more so than yourself."

"You have created for yourself such a reputation as no highwayman since the days of Robin Hood has, and such as no highwayman ever will again. Your name is one that will never be forgotten."

"Pho! pho! stop that. I have only one more point upon which to satisfy your curiosity, and I am done."

"And that is"—

"To tell you how bonny Black Bess came into my hands."

"Ah! yes. I want to hear that above all things."

"Very well, then. It was some little time after I took the road that I stopped the Dover coach."

"Indeed, I remember that little circumstance very distinctly, my friend. It caused quite a consternation."

"A little. You doubtless remember the rewards offered for me?"

"I do. They represented a large amount. The government gave so much—two hundred pounds, I think—and the travellers in the coach made up a like sum."

"They did, and the chase was very hot and close after me. I had many narrow escapes, but the narrowest of all was one fine summer's afternoon, while riding on the high road between Kilburn and Edgware.

"I was going at a very easy pace, for I did not anticipate pursuit, when all of a sudden I was startled by something whistling past my face, and then there was the immediate report of a pistol.

"I confess to being startled greatly, but I had sufficient presence of mind to clap spurs to my steed and then gave a hasty glance behind me.

"Five well-mounted officers were coming along after me at full speed, and as soon as they saw I perceived them they set up a loud shout, which they doubtless intended should have an intimidating effect upon me.

"I was not without a certain misgiving as to the result of the chase, for the horse I was on, though well competent to run a short distance at an amazing speed, yet had not enough bottom in him to keep up for any great length of time. Now, a horse to be really serviceable should combine fleetness with endurance."

"He should," said Tom. "But such horses are very rarely to be met with, even let alone purchased."

"Well, to go on with my story. I had, in a very short time, the satisfaction of seeing that the distance between myself and my pursuers were considerably increased.

"As soon as I observed this, I determined to take all the advantage of it that I could, for I knew my horse would soon slacken speed so much as to allow the officers to overtake me if I kept him upon the highroad.

"I, therefore, sought about on both sides of me for one of those narrow sinuous lanes which are so plentiful in that part of the country, and sure enough before I had gone a hundred yards further, I saw one, and turned down it like a shot.

"From the loud cry to which I heard the officers give mouth, I could tell this manœuvre had been seen.

"I gathered the reins in my hands, and struck the horse several sharp blows with them about the neck, and at the same time burying my spurs in his sides.

"And now another misfortune happened.

"By some perversity or other, this lane, which was at first rather too serpentine, suddenly straightened, and continued so for as far as I could see.

"I had not bettered my position in the least. The officers would be round the bend in a few moments, and then they would be able to keep me in view.

"Just then, on looking in advance, I saw, nearly a mile off, a man on horseback, attended by a groom.

"Here was a new source of vexation, for, of course, the gentleman, as I took him to be, seeing me flying from the police, would try to impede my progress—perhaps even attempt my capture; and, although he might not succeed, yet a collision between us would infallibly give the officers time to pounce upon me.

"All these circumstances and their results passed with full force upon me, and I goaded still more my almost knocked-up steed.

"He had some of the true blood in him, for, when he felt the sharp points of the spurs, he uttered a loud snort, and set forward at a rate that absolutely amazed me.

"The gentleman in advance came at a trot, looking curiously upon me.

"His groom had fallen back considerably in the rear.

"In another moment we met.

"I had noticed, as I neared him, that the animal which he rode was of the most faultless shape, and exquisite symmetry.

"But when his horse's head was on a level with mine, he pulled up abruptly, and, by a dexterous movement, caught hold of mine by the bridle.

"The officers were thundering along the lane.

"'Hands off,' I cried, 'or it will be the worse for you! I am a desperate man, and flying for my life!,

"'Oh! you are, are you?' he said; "then I will see if I cannot put a stop to your gallop! Hi! James. James!'

"James, I made no doubt, was the footman I had seen."

"I just glanced before me, and saw him coming along at a good speed.

Matters were growing desperate.

"'Let go my horse!' I cried again, and the loud cries of the officers, and the din of their horses' hoofs almost drowned my voice. 'Let go my horse, I say, or take the consequences.'

"I could tell he tightened his hold.

"Then there darted into my mind a wild idea of escape.

"I did not wait to calculate its probabilities of success. If I had, the chances were that I should have abandoned the scheme as absurd, but I did not pause, but instantly put it into execution.

"Before the gentleman on horseback had the least notion of what I was going to do, I clenched my left fist tightly, and struck him a terrific blow on the head.

"The blow alighted somewhere near his ear.

"He fell off his horse as though he had been shot.

"This was what I hoped, and I had prepared myself for what I was next about to do.

"That was to spring upon the back of the gentleman's matchless steed.

"I accomplished the feat, difficult in the extreme as it was, but I was saluted with a volley from the pistols of the officers, who had now got into alarmingly close quarters.

"By good fortune one only wounded me, and that was only slightly.

"I turned the horse's head that I had become so strangely and unexpectedly in possession of, and just touched her side with the spur.

"The bound forward that she gave was so terrific that I was almost thrown.

"I, however, succeeded in keeping my seat.

"Away we went, like the very wind itself.

"James made one abortive effort to stop us, but he got rolled in the dust for his pains.

"Yells and screams of disappointed rage came from the throats of the officers.

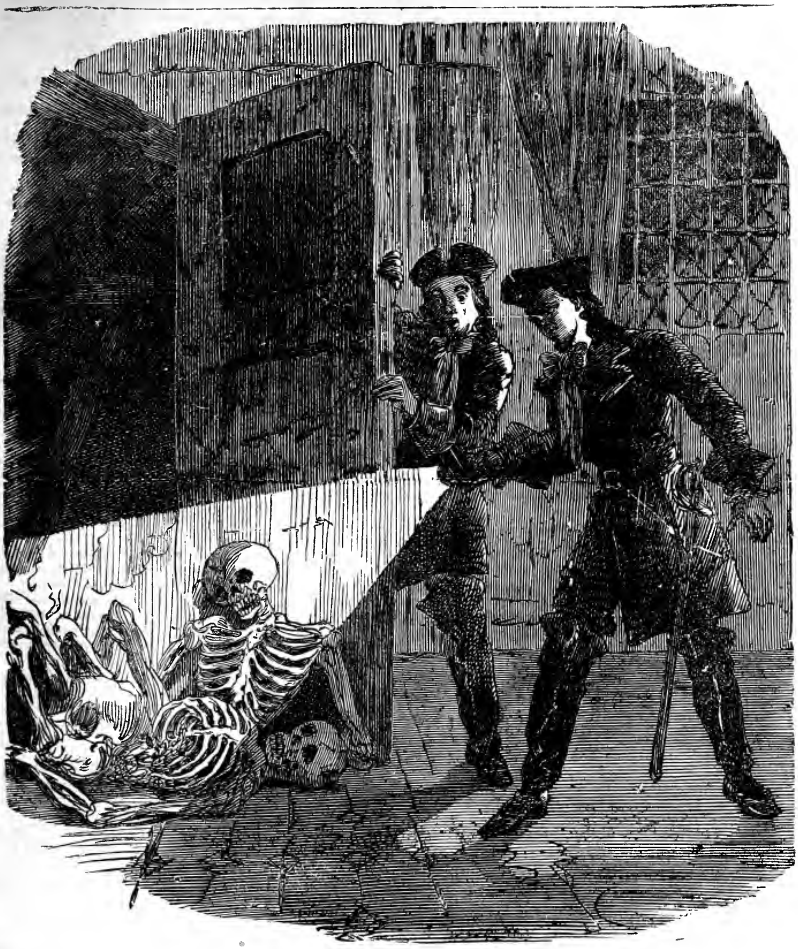
"But away went the gallant steed, with a rapidity which more and more astonished me, and in a short time the officers were left far behind.

"That bonny mare I have never parted with since, or trusted out of my sight for many hours together. She saved my life then, but it is by no means the only time. I named her Bess in remembrance of some one whom I knew, and black, because that was her colour."

"And it was by such a chance circumstance as this, then, that you became possessed of the finest piece of horseflesh in the kingdom?"

"It was, my friend. Such was the way in which Dick Turpin became the owner of Black Bess."

CHAPTER LV.



THE SEARCH THROUGH THE OLD MANSION AND ITS RESULTS.

As Turpin uttered these words, he rose from his seat, and walking up to the windows, drew back the thick heavy curtains.

The pale golden beams of the rising sun found their way into the apartment through the many chinks in the curiously-fashioned shutters.

"By Jove!" said Tom King, in accents of surprise, "it is morning! I had no idea of it!"

"Time soon slips away in conversation, and now let us at once commence the exploration of this building."

[TURPIN AND KING DISCOVER THE LOVERS' REMAINS AT DURLEY CHINE.]

"You are very eager about it, Dick."

"I am, and cannot help feeling so. Of this I feel certain, that we shall find something that will amply compensate us for our trouble."

"I wish I could feel as certain that we should find something that would amply compensate us for a breakfast, but I'm afraid we shan't."

"So am I. But come along, who knows what we may not find? You had better shut the door after you, Tom!"

They stood now in the spacious hall belonging to the mansion. The sunshine entered freely through the windows on each side of the door, or at least as freely as the thick coating of dirt with which they were encrusted would allow.

The numerous objects around them looked strangely spectral and ghostlike in the morning light.

The dust, which had looked black, now seemed of a whitish colour, and it lay upon the floor of the hall like snow.

Our friends' footsteps were perfectly noiseless.

Turpin led the way up the staircase, and Tom followed him in silence.

On the first landing they paused.

Doors they could see in abundance, but where they led to they could not tell. They tried the handles of several, but, as they had been led to expect, found them fast.

"Not here, I fancy," said Tom, "shall we find the wife's shamber, but on the floor above. Good heavens! Dick, what's that?"

Turpin turned round with an expression of alarm upon his face.

A strange noise, like the shrieking of ten thousand fiends, seemed to fill the air around them.

But only for a moment.

It died away then, not with the same suddenness as it arose, but in a faint, hoarse, hollow murmur.

Then all became as silent as the grave.

So abruptly had this sound come upon them that our friends were quite unnerved.

By an effort, Dick Turpin found his voice.

"The mysteries of Durley Chine are beginning to develop themselves," he said.

"It would seem so," replied Tom, uneasily. "But what was it? From whence did it proceed?"

"I can form no idea," said Dick. "It seemed to come from all sides, and whether from above or below I can form no manner of conjecture."

"Nor I. Let us hope that we may never hear such a sound again!"

"Nay! On the contrary, let us hope to do so, and let us be upon our guard, and not be taken by surprise when we do."

Scarcely had those words left his lips, and before Tom King could utter a reply, than there arose, with twice its former intensity, the same fearful sound.

Our friends fastened their eyes upon each other to note the effect this would have.

Both were pale.

Both felt the same question surge up in their minds.

Was what they had so often heard about the supernatural, and what their minds had never hitherto given credence to, real and true?

In that foot-deserted place, so long closed against human beings, it is no wonder such a question and many another of a kindred nature should be engendered.

Despite the control which he habitually had over himself, Dick felt his limbs tremble under him.

Tom King spoke.

His voice was quavering and unsteady.

"This is horrible, Dick," he said, "most horrible."

"It is," said Turpin, "most horrible. I am convinced no living human being could have given utterance to those unearthly sounds."

"Do you know what you imply?"

"I do! And, though as free from superstitious influences as a man can safely assert himself to be, yet I cannot close my eyes to the fact that what we have just heard, and which we are certain can be no delusion of the senses, is sufficient and has indeed sufficed to make me waver in my belief."

"It is enough to do so, and I must confess to the same thing myself, though I am very loath to do it, for I have ever, until now, scouted such things in scorn."

Again arose the awful shrieking cry.

But Dick had been waiting for it—expecting it—and was prepared.

"That came from somewhere above, Tom," he said, "I am certain of it! Follow me!"

He turned and would have sprang up the next flight of stairs, but King caught him by the arm.

"What would you do?" he asked.

"Do?" repeated Turpin. "Why this! Feeling confident that the horrible sound came from the upper portion of the mansion, I will ascend and not pause until I have pried into every nook and corner! Why do you hold me back?"

"I know not," said King, confusedly, for he was ashamed of the weakness he had shown. "Come on."

"That's right, my friend! Let us use our best endeavours to discover the source of those dreadful cries! Think how great a satisfaction it will be if we can succeed in discovering from whence they proceed, and trace them to some natural causes!"

"It will—it will!"

"Quick, then, Tom! Hark, there it is again!"

The unearthly cry once more sounded in their ears.

"How much more this would have scared us in the night time!" said King. "Darkness would have endowed it with threefold terror."

"It would. That is only natural. But what surprises me is, that it is so continuous."

By this time our friends had reached, as they thought, the topmost story in the house, but they found there was yet another flight of stairs to be ascended.

Ere, however, they could cross the landing to them, they were again startled by the mysterious cry.

It was pretty certain that it came from above, for the sound reached their ears much more intensely than it did, and they could distinguish in it a strange howling note which they had not previously noticed.

Without the loss of a moment, and before the echoes had entirely died away, Dick sprang up the flight of steps, which were narrower and steeper than the preceding ones.

Tom King followed closely.

At the top of the stairs they emerged into a large room or attic.

There were in it two windows, but as they had not been provided with shutters, were boarded over.

The planks, however, did not fit closely enough together to exclude the light, which entered freely in long pencils through the joins.

It is probable enough that when first put up these boards were joined to a nicety, but in the lapse of years they had shrunk, as wood is apt to do.

Our friends could see around them without difficulty.

The attic appeared to have been used merely as a lumber room, for many odds and ends were scattered about the floor.

They looked over every part of it with the utmost attention, but he saw nothing that in any way tended to explain the cry.

"We must give it up, I am afraid," said Tom King. "I can see nothing here to cause it."

"And no human being can have been in the place, for look, except where we have ourselves trod, the dust is undisturbed; and no one ascended the stairs before us, for I was careful to look upon them for the imprint of a foot, which would have been as plainly visible as in snow."

"Right!" said Tom. "We must then consider this to be one of the mysteries of Durley Chine which we cannot solve."

"For the present," said Dick, "only for the present. Although we have failed in our first attempt, we may be more fortunate in a second!"

"Perhaps so; but I am afraid not. There is only one thing. Did the sound actually come to us from above when we stood at the foot of the last flight of stairs?"

"So far as my sense of hearing serves me, it did. But I may have been mistaken, for it is always a matter of extreme difficulty to trace such noises to their true source, unless you have something more to guide you than your ears."

"Just so. But is it worth while to stay here any longer? We have seen all there is to see, I fancy."

"I would rather we did not go until we heard the cry again. I have noticed that it has occurred at something like regular intervals."

"So have I."

"Do you then, my friend, stand with your back to mine, so that your eyes command the opposite half of the room to what mine do. Let nothing escape your observation, but have all your senses on the alert!"

"I understand," said Tom King, as he placed himself in the required position. "You think, then, that if we both do this, we shall not only be able to tell beyond a doubt whether the sound actually proceeds from this place, but if it does, be also able to tell from what precise portion of it!"

"Exactly! That, I fancy, is the only means by which we can do it. I'm only impatient now for the cry to come. Fail not to have every sense awake, but do not keep yourself too much on the stretch, or you will defeat yourself that way!"

"I am aware of it. Let us be silent now in order that our speech even may not be the means of confusing us."

With an anxiety, greater than our readers can conceive, the two highwaymen stood back to back in the attic of the deserted mansion, and waited for the repetition of the strange cry, which had naturally so scared them when they first heard it.

Turpin certainly deserves great credit for the manner in which he managed this affair, for surely no better mode of determining from whence the noise came could be devised.

The windows we have mentioned as being in this attic were placed at each extremity.

The ceiling was low, and sloped from the centre.

It would appear that this attic ran from the front to the back of the mansion, for the windows were both in gables of the building.

As our friends thus stood, of course each had a window before him.

In waiting for the strange sound to again make itself heard, Tom King, whose eyes had rested with the keenest scrutiny upon every object within their sphere, noticed that in the boarding of the window opposite to him there was a small round hole.

Three fingers held close together would have about filled it up.

It was a very trifling thing to notice, but Tom's eyes were just then required to notice trifles.

"There's been a knot there, I suppose," he thought, "and as the wood has shrunk away from it, it has tumbled out. That must be it!"

At any rate it was a probable enough supposition.

At length, and just as their patience was getting exhausted, the terrible cry again resounded in their ears.

That it came from the place in which they stood there could not be a doubt.

Tom King echoed it with a shout of gratification.

"Hurrah!" he said, "I see it all now! We have been frightening ourselves about nothing!"

"What is it?—what is it?" asked Turpin, anxiously. "Tell me at once!"

King led him to the window.

"There is the secret," he said. "Do you see that round hole in the board?"

"I do."

"Look a little closer, and you will see that the pane beyond is broken!"

"So it is, Tom!" said Turpin, after a momentary observation. "But do you mean to say that the noise came from there, and that the wind blowing through caused it?"

"Most certainly I do! I noticed the hole in the board and fixed my eye upon it, and presently the noise came, and I was confident, through that hole. I take it that when a gust of wind comes in one particular direction, it rushes through that little hole with extraordinary violence, and makes the horrible sound which so alarmed us!"

CHAPTER LVI.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN MAKE A FORCIBLE ENTRY INTO SIR ERNEST'S CHAMBER, AND DISCOVER THE TRACES OF A FRIGHTFUL DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

THAT this was the real solution of the mysterious cries there could be little or no doubt.

Just the least tinge of vexation was apparent in Dick's voice and countenance when he spoke.

"What fools we both were to allow ourselves to be terrified by a sound that admits of so easy explanation!"

"Do not chafe, Dick!" said Tom King. "I regard it as being extremely fortunate!"

"How so?"

"Thus. In our exploration of the mansion, which we cannot say we have fairly commenced, if we hear any sound for which we may not be able to account, the simple means by which this horrible howling is produced will teach us not to be alarmed at it in the least, and induce the belief that it is produced by natural causes only!"

"Looking at it in that light it certainly is fortunate," replied Turpin; "but what annoys me is that I should have allowed it to unman me as it did. I ought to have known that an old deserted place like this would be full of strange noises."

"I can find every excuse for you, Dick. The cry was certainly a most fearful and unearthly one, and sufficient, coming unexpectedly as it did upon us, to strike terror into the bravest heart. Hark! there it is again!"

With a prolonged, wailing howl, the wind again rushed through the circular hole in the board.

"Come away, Tom! Come away!" said Turpin. "It is useless to stay here any longer. Let us try to find out something more about Ralph Anderdon and Sir Ernest's wife!"

"Agreed! But is it possible, think you, to put a stop to this noise? Although we know what it is, it is none the less unpleasant!"

"A good thought, Tom. It shall be done. A large piece of paper screwed up and pushed tightly in, will stop it up as well as anything."

"It will."

Dick rummaged his pockets, and at last found a piece of a newspaper.

This he folded and rolled up tightly in the form of a plug, and stuffed into the hole.

"That will do it, I think," he said. "Now, Tom, come along!"

The highwaymen then, without further delay, left the attic.

They paused upon the landing beneath, from which two long corridors ran right and left, having doors opening from them.

"What do you think of doing with these rooms, Dick? Surely you do not intend to open them every one? If you do it will take us some time, for they are sure to be all locked. I should imagine these were the servants' dormitories."

"Very likely! I think, however, just to satisfy ourselves, we will open one of the doors. Should your supposition turn out correct, we will leave the others as they are."

To this Tom at once agreed; and Turpin, producing a bunch of skeleton keys, very soon had the door open.

They entered with great curiosity.

It was plainly furnished, and evidently, from its appearance generally, a servant's bedroom.

Our friends merely glanced round this apartment and then retired. There was nothing there at all extraordinary.

Dick was careful to lock the door again after him, so that at a future time no suspicion might be aroused that they had entered there.

"I think we may safely jump to the conclusion that all these numerous doors open only into such chambers as the one we have just seen the interior of.

"Very well; we will try the floor below."

Accordingly another flight of stairs was descended, and they found themselves standing upon a landing precisely similar to the one they had just left.

Here the doors were wider and higher and not so close together.

Turpin again had recourse to his skeleton keys, and one after another opened these doors.

They were all bed-chambers.

At last, after having well nigh lost all patience, and hope of finding Sir Ernest's bed-chamber, our friends came to a door where some substance had been placed over the keyhole.

Dick wiped away the dust which lay very thickly upon it, and found it was sealing-wax, or some similar substance which had been placed over it.

A closer examination showed him that Sir Ernest's coat of arms was impressed upon this seal.

He called Tom's attention to it.

"If we had known," he said, "that the lock had been sealed, we should have been spared a great deal of trouble, for I make no doubt that as we have found none of the other doors with a seal upon them, that this is the one opening into Sir Ernest's own room."

"Nor I, either. Break the seal, Dick, and open it at once."

With his knife, Dick chipped away the sealing-wax which had become almost as hard as iron.

To his mortification, however, he found, when he had taken the trouble to do this, that the keyhole itself was filled up with some hard substance, which clung so tightly that he gave up all hope of getting it out, after making several efforts, and breaking the point of his knife in the attempt.

"What is to be done?" he said. "Confound him for fastening up the door in this fashion!"

"So say I. There is but one course left, my friend, and that is to cut out one of the panels with our hangers, and enter the room in that fashion."

"I do not see in what other way we are to accomplish our object, and yet I am reluctant to destroy the door. However, it cannot be helped, for I have set my mind upon finding out something more about the ultimate fate of poor Kate."

"Here goes, then," said King, who had drawn his hanger; "leave this job to me."

"Not so, my friend. You forget your wound. It is evidently getting better, but take my advice, do not use it any more than you can help just at present."

"Very well," said King, drawing back. "do you do it, then."

In a very business-like manner did Turpin set about cutting out the panel.

His weapon was strong and keen-pointed.

Taking a careful aim, he gave a sudden thrust.

The sword went quite through the panel at that part where it was mortised into the door, and consequently thinnest.

Then by working it about, and pressing heavily upon the back, he cut completely down one side of it.

He repeated the same process with the other side.

There then remained the most difficult part to do, namely, to cut the top and bottom of the panel, which would be, of course, against the grain of the wood.

A little perseverance, however, will do wonders, and our friends soon had the inexpressible satisfaction of seeing a hole in the door large enough for the man to pass through one at a time.

This room was in the front of the mansion, and the sun, which was shining upon it, found its way in through the bars of the shutters, the peculiar shape of which we have already described.

Turpin's impatience to enter this room was so great, that scarcely had the panel fallen bodily inward, than he crept through the hole he had made, leaving Tom to follow his example as best he could.

King was soon in also, and the highwaymen looked about them with the greatest curiosity and interest.

The subdued light which filled the room seemed more congenial than if the broad daylight had revealed its every nook and angle.

The apartment was a spacious and a lofty one.

The furniture was massive and gorgeous.

In one recess was a huge funereal-looking tent bedstead, of that kind in which our ancestors used particularly to delight.

The curtains were drawn closely around it.

They looked heavy and sombre.

The four posts of the bedstead were surmounted with a large plume of feathers, resembling those which are seen on hearses at the present day.

It was full five minutes before either of the highwaymen spoke.

The whole of their faculties were bent upon an attentive and minute examination of the chamber they had entered, and which they were firmly of opinion was the one that used to be tenanted by Sir Ernest and his wife.

Tom King was the one who spoke first.

The intense stillness of that gloomy room oppressed him.

"I think we have entered the right place, Dick, don't you? An apartment like this would surely be the one set aside for the occupation of the owner of the mansion."

"Yes—yes. In this room, Tom, beyond a doubt, the baronet's fair wife, in whose mysterious fate I feel so deep an interest, pined away her young life, like a wild bird in a cage."

"You seem strangely moved, Dick."

"I am. I feel the profoundest pity for the unhappy girl, and there is also some prescient feeling within me which makes me conscious that this long shut-up room has been the scene of a terrible tragedy."

"How strange!" said Tom, and his voice grew hushed and solemn. "The words you have just uttered seem to have given consistency and method to the vague and undefined ideas which were floating about in my mind."

"The simple circumstance of being in a deserted chamber, and being surrounded by a silence so intense as we are, is sufficient of itself to people the brain with thick-coming fancies, but, apart from them, I feel that we stand upon the threshold of a discovery that will cause the current of our blood to stagnate in our veins."

"How seriously and earnestly you speak, Dick, said Tom King, who remained for a moment or two quite motionless and silent after his companion spoke. "You infect me with your own gloomy forebodings!"

Turpin made no reply.

His eyes were roaming over every portion of the apartment.

To him all things in it were distinctly visible, though if any one had suddenly come in out of the sunlight they would not have been able to see at all.

But Dick's eyes had become perfectly accustomed to the dim light.

He crossed to the side of the room opposite to where he had been standing, and appeared to scrutinise something very closely.

Then he turned towards King, who had not moved from his position, and said—

"Look here, Tom! Unless I am quite out in my calculations, it is here we must look to find the solution of the mysterious disappearance of Ralph Anderdon and Sir Ernest's fair young bride—the secret of Durley Chine!"

CHAPTER LVII.

DICK TURPIN SETS OUT UPON A RATHER PERILOUS EXPEDITION.

THERE was something so very solemn and impressive in Dick's manner that Tom King was completely overawed, and it was with a strange beating at his heart that he made his way towards the spot where his friend stood.

"What have you found, Dick?" he said. "What is it?"

"This," replied Turpin, placing his hand upon a door in the wall. "This door is of iron, and can only lead to one place, and that is a small strong room wherein jewels and such like things are kept."

"I am aware," said Tom, in a tone of disappointment, "I am aware there are usually such places in the chambers of the great. But what has that to do with the secret of Durley Chine?"

"Everything!" said Dick, who in this instance seemed to be gifted with a strange kind of foresight. "The secret of Durley Chine will I fancy turn out no secret to me! I seem somehow to have divined it from the first, and as soon as I saw that door I was convinced that I was right!"

"I confess I am fairly puzzled to understand you. However, if that door is all that hides the secret from our view, I say open it at once!"

"I intend to do so, my friend. It will, though, I think take some time."

As he spoke, Turpin produced from his pocket several small implements, with which he at once made an attack upon the lock.

Not rudely, but gently. He knew well it was a door built for strength, and that it would be hopeless to think of forcing it, and that if it was to be got open it would be by coaxing.

His patience was put to a severe trial.

Originally no doubt the lock was made as unpickable as possible, but now, having been left to itself so long, it had got thoroughly rusted into its setting, so that, even if he had had the proper key, it would have been a matter of some difficulty to turn it in the wards.

But this opposition to his wishes only served to make him more determined.

He had to pause more than once.

At last the bolt of the lock was bit by bit forced back

But the door did not open.

It seemed to be fastened into its frame.

There was, however, near the centre of it, a large octagon-shaped knob, and this Dick caught hold of and pulled with all his might.

The door shook slightly.

He tried again.

Tom King lent his aid by clasping him round the waist.

Slowly, with a harsh grating sound, the door opened.

But only while they pulled with their utmost strength.

When it was open about eighteen inches, something, which must have been leaning against the door, fell fluttering and rattling into the apartment.

It lay on the floor in an unshapely huddled-up mass.

The dust rose up in clouds.

Instinctively, the two highwaymen sprang back and retreated until they were brought to a stop by the huge bedstead.

Tom King was startled, and so was Turpin, but not to anything like the same extent as his companion.

Neither, however, moved or spoke until the dust had to some extent subsided.

"What—what is it?" gasped Tom. "What is it?"

We must approach to know that, though I more than suspect what it is. Stay, the light in the room seems to be fading. Can it be possible that the day has gone?"

"It would seem so; but do not dally! Quick! Light your lantern, we shall then be able to see better."

"I was thinking of doing so," said Turpin, producing it from his pocket, and igniting the small wick within it by means of a phosphorous match.

In another moment now a clear beam of light streamed through the crystalline lens.

Our friends then made their way towards the strong iron door, directing the ray of light upon the object which had fallen forth.

A cry of horror came from Tom King's lips.

What had fallen were the mouldering, festering remnants of a human body.

The bones, which could be seen here and there, were bleached and bare, and the clothing that lay about and around them seemed to be of no greater consistency than tinder.

But their first natural shock of terror and disgust at meeting with such an object over, the curiosity of the two highwaymen resumed its sway.

By Dick's advice the strong door was pulled as far open as it would come.

They then stood on one side, so that the charnel-like odour which filled the closet might mingle with the purer atmosphere in the large apartment.

Then, with slow steps, they walked to the spot where the human remains were lying.

"See," said Dick, "here is that which explains all."

"It does; but look, do you perceive, my friend, there is more than one body here."

"I am aware of it; I felt sure there was!"

"I can distinguish several portions of a woman's dress, and here and there the bright brass buttons belonging to a naval uniform."

"It is even so. You see how I was right when I said Sir Ernest's wife never eloped. Here is the proof, for that this is all that remains of the unhappy Kate there can scarcely exist a doubt."

"And of her old lover, Ralph Anderdon."

"And of her old lover, Ralph Anderdon, as you say. The vengeance of Sir Ernest was complete. Here is the key to the desertion of the mansion. He calculated that in a hundred years all traces of his crime would have disappeared, and so the name would remain untarnished. I somehow saw through it all at a glance. I can tell what occurred almost as well as if I had been here to witness it."

"It is not difficult to do so now."

"No, nor was it to me from the first. You may depend Sir Ernest Dane surprised his wife and Ralph Anderdon here together. He then, by some means, contrived to put an end to their existence, probably by poison, and then locked them in this strong room."

"That, I think, with all due deference to you, can hardly have been the actual state of affairs."

"Why not?"

"You seem to overlook the circumstance that they were both leaning against the door; they could not else have fallen out as they did."

"True."

"That, then, I take it, clearly indicates that they were put in there alive, and that they died leaning against the door, perhaps in the hope of releasing themselves from their place of confinement."

"Yes, you must be right in that respect, but it makes Sir Ernest's crime ten times more horrible. They must have starved to death!"

"Or, which is more likely, perished for want of air."

"Or the two causes combined. Sir Ernest, however, displayed some ingenuity. There was no bungling in his work."

"None. At least, to all appearance."

"So probable a story that his wife had eloped with her former lover would, of course, be easily believed by those who were acquainted with the history of her life and young affections."

"It was believed implicitly, and I think you are the very first that ever expressed a doubt upon the subject; at least, that I have ever heard of."

"Some intuitive feeling caused me to do so."

"The circumstances altogether are most strange."

"Most strange, indeed!"

"It is a sad sight. Beautiful as I have heard Kate was, there are no traces of her beauty now."

"But can you wonder that Sir Ernest should wander spectre-like about the house, and that he should dread always to be alone? In this gloomy place, and with the weight of his fearful crime pressing upon him, it is no wonder he became the living personification of conscience-stricken man!"

"My very words!"

Dick smiled.

"Never," he said, "to the longest day of my existence, will be obliterated from my mind all that I have seen and heard respecting Durley Chine!"

"I can readily believe that."

"Poor girl!" said Turpin, looking down at the grisly bones lying at his feet. "She is greatly to be pitied—far more to be pitied than blamed—though that she was guilty I think there is conclusive evidence."

"Her punishment was great."

"You are right there. No one, unless those who have actually experienced it can tell how horrible it is to die from want of food."

"And this young sailor. His career was a short one, and its termination inglorious. He is more guilty than Kate, but it is very, very easy to forgive him!"

"He had a consolation, and he may perhaps have considered it a great one, that of dying with her he loved, for it is probable that one did not long survive the other."

The more our friends pondered upon the lovers' unhappy fate, the more deeply they felt moved.

Both were for some minutes silent.

All that had happened in that old mansion was perfectly apparent, and the thoughts of each were busy in running over the several details.

"Come, Dick," said Tom King, first breaking the silence. "We shall do no good now by staying longer in this place. Come!"

With an effort, Turpin roused himself from the reverie into which he had fallen.

A deep, long-drawn sigh came from his lips.

"Yes, Tom, my friend, we will go, but I fancy that what we have just seen will furnish us with the material for many an hour's conversation."

"Yes, unquestionably it will; but, come, do not let us stay here any longer!"

"I will but take one more glance around me," said Turpin. "Here is the place behind the door which we have barely looked at."

Turpin accordingly raised his lantern and cast its beams into the strong room.

Walls, roof, and floor presented one uniform smooth level surface, and were apparently of iron.

It was perfectly empty, and not more than four feet square.

"That is all," said Turpin. "But what are we to do? Leave the place just as it is?"

"There is no help for it. Come along! I am already sick and faint beyond endurance! Come!"

Slowly and reluctantly Dick left the apartment, but some strange fascination made him gaze about him until the last moment.

CHAPTER LVIII.

IT TURNS OUT THAT OUR FRIENDS ARE NOT THE SOLE INHABITANTS OF DURLEY CHINE.

THE air in the corridor seemed by comparison a thousand times purer and sweeter than it was, and Tom drew several long breaths, so as to expel all the miasma his lungs had absorbed while gazing on the frightful spectacle in Sir Ernest's room.

It was quite dark now, and the lantern which Turpin had was of great service.

"What is to be done next, Dick? I can scarcely believe that time has slipped away so fast, but positively night seems to be closing in."

"It does," said Turpin, consulting the chronometer, which he had taken from Captain Nidget, "and it is, too! Why, would you credit it? it is close upon seven?"

"Well, what are we to do, Dick? There is little more, I fancy, to be seen worth seeing in the mansion."

"No, perhaps not. I think, however, that considering all things, it will be much more to our safety if we remain hidden here for twenty-four hours longer."

"I don't dispute that in the least, but in the meanwhile just let me ask you what we are to do for food during that time?"

"It is some time since we had any last!"

"I am painfully aware of that. I have before now more than once had to fast for a lengthened period, but I never went so long before, and never felt so hungry as I do now!"

"Nor I; and it is quite certain, Tom, that if we are to stay here we must have something to live on; but how to get it is the question!"

"I think, considering the length of time the place has been shut up, there is very little likelihood of our finding anything in it at all comestible."

"None at all, I should say. The only thing is, if we chose to go groping about in the cellars, we might find a bottle or two of choice wine."

"We must have something to eat first. However, let us go first to the room where we passed the night."

"Agreed!" said Tom, and they both descended the stairs, and in a minute or two more were standing at the door of the room.

It will be recollected they fastened it when they quitted it in the morning.

Dick unlocked it, and they entered.

"Look here, Tom, I'll tell you what I will do. Just clear my clothes from dust as well as you can, so that my appearance will not excite suspicion, and I will, as it is now quite dark, go out and see if I cannot get something at the nearest village."

"But with me, of course?"

"No, I think it will be better if you stay here. Alone I shall not be so likely to excite suspicion. Do not let us waste time by parleying about the matter. I want to go at once."

"Then I hope, since you have made up your mind to that effect, that you will not be any longer gone than you can possibly help."

"You may rest quite easy on that score. I shan't. While I am gone, however, do you light a fire, and so forth, so that there may be no time lost when I arrive with the provisions."

"Trust to me for that. But shall you not disguise yourself at all?"

"How can I?" Besides, I think it hardly necessary. It is not likely there is any one here who knows me, or, at all events, who would be able to recognise me, in the dark; so that I run little or no risk."

"Still, be most careful."

"I will."

"Above all, take the greatest care that no one sees you leave the grounds, for if they do so the country will be roused immediately."

"Don't let that trouble you. Now, shall I do?"

While they had been speaking, Tom had been busily engaged in cleansing the dust and cobwebs from his friend's apparel.

"Yes. Be off with you, and don't be long, and above all, do not excite suspicion by either word or action!"

"All right. Mind you have the fire alight when I come back. Good bye!"

"Good bye, Dick," said Tom, as he assisted him through the small hall window.

Turpin sprang upon the doorstep, and then ran lightly down the crumbling perron on to the lawn.

Tom King followed him with his eyes as long as he could, but Dick was soon lost in the gloom of the evening.

"I only hope he will come safe back," said Tom, as he returned to their room and prepared to make a fire. "I wish now I had insisted upon going with him, and yet, perhaps, it is best as it is. I will try to think so, at all events!"

That was very good philosophy upon Tom's part, and leaving him to follow it, we will turn our attention to Dick Turpin.

No sooner had he plunged among the trees on the lawn, than he heard a faint whinnying sound, and the rush of horse's footsteps.

"That is Bess," he said, and in another minute the sagacious creature was rubbing her head against his shoulder.

Dick caressed her gently.

He knew that was the best way to soothe her.

Then taking the bridle in his hand, he again led her to the shrubbery, and tethered her to a tree.

This done, he hurried rapidly away.

His mare cast after him that melancholy gaze so often to be observed in a horse or a dog who is more than usually devoted to his master.

Making as little noise as possible, Dick recrossed the lawn, and made his way down the carriage-drive to the entrance gate.

Here he paused, and listened with intentness that soon became painful.

But all was still.

No approaching or receding footstep disturbed the solitude of that place.

Dim, ghastly, gaunt, and half-confused with the dark shadows of the trees, stood Sir Ernest's monument.

Dick waited full five minutes before he ventured to stir.

Then feeling confident there was no one at hand, he picked the lock in the gate and passed through, taking care to lock it again after him.

He crouched down in the shadow of the buttresses, and again waited.

His caution was scarcely necessary.

So evil a name had Durley Chine got among the inhabitants of that district, that not one of them would have ventured anywhere in its vicinity after dark, even if they were offered untold wealth for doing so.

Feeling certain that he was the only living human being near that spot, Dick stepped out boldly into the road or lane, whichever it might be called.

Then a very interesting question arose in his mind.

To reach some place where he could purchase the things he required, should he turn to the right or the left?

He paused and considered, and then, remembering that he had come with his companion some distance along the road to the right, and that they had not seen anything like a human habitation, he made up his mind to turn to the left.

It was a lucky thing that he chose the way he did. In less than a quarter of an hour he reached a small hamlet.

What was the name of it he had not the remotest idea.

The inhabitants seemed all to be indoors.

Dick passed as quietly and stealthily as he could along the little straggling village street.

Presently he came to an alehouse.

He hesitated a moment, and thought of attempting to get there what he required, but, fearful of raising suspicion, he turned away.

He was looking for one of those miscellaneous shops which are to be found in most villages, where every description of goods can be purchased.

"Surely," he thought, "this village will not be an exception to all others, and be without one?"

He began to think so, for he had passed completely through it when he saw a light shining from a window a little in advance.

Hoping it would prove to be the place he wanted, he quickened his steps.

He reached it in two minutes.

Yes; there was the small latticed window crammed with goods of every description, chalky-looking sweetmeats in blue bottles preponderating, which invariably distinguish the village hucksters.

Dick drew close to the window and tried to peep in, but the things were stacked so closely together that he found it impossible to obtain a glimpse even of the interior.

Then a fresh difficulty arose in his mind.

Would it not seem strange for a person of Dick's appearance to walk into a shop and purchase bread and such like necessaries?

Of course it would.

Curiosity would be at once aroused.

Dick hesitated.

He pulled the ends of his moustachios.

"It's lucky," he muttered, "that I happened to think of it before I went in. If I hadn't I should have made a mess of it! Something must be done! Let me see! Oh! ah! that will do!"

Dick had hit upon a scheme.

He lifted the latch of the shop door.

As he opened it a bell rang furiously.

In obedience to the summons, a tall, thin, shrivelled old woman entered the shop.

"What is it?" she asked, in an unceremonious voice.

Dick put on an air of immense importance, and spoke in a pompous sort of way.

The woman became obsequious instantly. She thought Dick was a lord at the very least.

"My good lady!" he said, "I want you to assist me. I was walking homewards when I heard cries of distress, and in a little shed that had only three sides to keep out the cold, I found a poor family actually starving."

"Yes, sir—my lord, I mean!" said the woman, confusedly.

"Address me by the first title, if you please," said Dick, in a manner that made the woman more and more convinced the second was the one belonging to him. "I found this family, ten of them in all, actually dying of hunger—dying of hunger!"

"Lor' a mussey, sir! You don't say so!"

"It is true! For the shame of England, it is true. They were all so far gone that not one was strong enough to come here and get some food, so I determined to come myself, and take it myself. I never do good actions by halves. So just put what articles you think proper into a basket so that I may carry them conveniently, and I will pay you liberally for the whole!"

CHAPTER LIX.

TOM KING IS MUCH ALARMED BY HEARING A MYSTERIOUS VOICE IN THE OLD MANSION.

"Yes, sir, I am sure your lordship is very good. It is not many that would do as you've done! I s'pose, though, you are a stranger in these parts. Excuse, me, my lord, for venturing to say so much."

The woman bustled about and procured a wicker basket as she spoke, into which she stowed some bread, butter, tea, eggs, and such like.

"Yes, I am a visitor here."

"I thought so, sir. At Lord Wingfield's, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Dick, who no more knew who Lord Wingfield was, than the man in the moon, but conjectured he was some nobleman who had a residential estate in the neighbourhood. "I have come down to my cousin's for a short visit."

"Oh! indeed, my lord. I didn't know Lord Wingfield had a cousin, but of course now he must have"——

"How much will they all come to, my good woman? I am anxious to get back. They will wonder what has become of me, for I only went out for a stroll after dinner!"

"Well, sir, your lordship, I mean," said the old woman, who was rather at a loss how to appraise her goode, but thought she ought to avail herself of this opportunity to get profit. "Altogether, basket and all, they comes to seven—yes, eight-and-sixpence."

She would have sold the same articles to one of her ordinary customers for half-a-crown.

"Very good," said Dick, "here's half-a-guinea. You need not trouble about the change."

If the old woman had had any doubts about Dick being a lord, they were completely dissipated after that one politic speech.

"Your lordship's very good—very good," she said, regretting that she had not asked more. "I am sorry, but I am a lone woman, and there is no one I can send to carry the basket for you."

"And a deuced good job, too," muttered Dick to himself, "for such a thing would have been very embarrassing."

"There's my neighbour's little boy, Josiah, would have been glad to carry the basket for your lordship. It seems ridiculous for you to have to do it."

"Not at all, not at all," said Dick, placing the handle of the basket. "There's no false pride about me, and I am never ashamed of being seen doing a good action."

"Ah! my lord, them's the sentiments I should like all lords to have. Old England would be very different to what it is."

"It would—it would!"

"Allow me to open the door for your lordship," said the woman, rushing hastily round the counter, and bringing down an avalanche of bottles in her course. "Allow me."

Dick stood aside, and permitted the old woman to open the door.

"Good night, my good woman, good night."

"Good night, your lordship!" repeated the woman, curtseying to the g—— "Who'd ha' thought I should have lived to see the day that I should have waited on a real lord, and Lord Wingfield's cousin, too, and then to see him carry the things away on his own noble arm! Oh! it clean bangs all, that it do!"

Dick Turpin hurried off along the village street, and was so fortunate as not to meet a soul.

His ruse tickled his fancy mightily.

But it had taken more time to obtain the provisions than he had calculated upon, and he knew that Tom would be losing all patience, if not getting positively uneasy about his safety.

So when Dick reached the lane leading to the gates of Durley Chine, he set off at a trot, which, though apparently not calling forth any particular exertion enabled him to get over a good deal of ground in a short time.

Very soon he had the satisfaction of seeing the iron gates before him.

He unlocked them and entered, carefully relocking them behind him.

Then, noticing that the long grass had the appearance of having been trampled upon, he spent a few moments in restoring it to a perpendicular position.

In this he succeeded very well.

Running along the carriage drive he soon emerged upon the lawn, which he crossed without relaxing his speed, and then bounded up the steps.

Tom he found was standing at the window watching for him.

"Success!" said Dick, handing him the basket; "there's enough there to keep us nearly a week."

But Tom took the basket in perfect silence, and then, holding up his hand, he said impressively—

"Hush!"

Dick was astonished.

"What is the matter?"

"Hush!" said Tom, more earnestly than before.

"Oh! I see how it is," said Dick to himself. "He has gone too long without food, and his wound has made him slightly delirious!"

This was a natural enough supposition, and certainly Tom's behaviour was sufficient to induce it, for what earthly motive could he have for saying, "Hush!" in so mysterious a manner?

Dick put his foot on the balustrade, and crawled through the window.

As soon as he stood in the hall, he felt Tom clutch him tightly by the arm, and whisper—

"Hush!"

Dick began to feel alarmed.

"Hang it all, Tom, what the deuce is the matter?" he said. "Speak out, what is it?"

Tom did not reply, but drew him into the room which they had occupied on the previous night, and closed the door cautiously behind him.

In obedience to his promise, Tom had made a fire.

It was burning brightly, and diffused a pleasant light.

Dick looked anxiously at his companion's countenance.

Tom was pale.

There was, too, something like a scared look about his eyes.

Dick was more and more bewildered.

"For heaven's sake, Tom, my friend," he said, "speak! put me out of my suspense by telling me what has happened to cause this great change in your behaviour!"

Tom came forward.

"Keep your distance!" said his companion, retreating as he advanced. "You look just a little mad!"

"I do feel strangely!" said Tom; "but, Dick, so sure as you and I are present here in this apartment, so surely are there other inhabitants of Durley Chine beside ourselves!"

"Pho—pho!" said Dick, drawing a long breath, "and is that all? Here help me with the supper, and let's have something to eat!"

"Do not disregard or disbelieve what I tell you. I am convinced that what I say is true!"

"Very well. I don't say it isn't," said Dick, who thought it would be best to humour him. "But before I listen to what you have to say further, I must have something to eat!"

Accordingly Dick commenced transferring the contents of the basket to the table.

The craving of hunger was strong in Tom's breast, and the sight of the plai yet tempting viands made him forget all else.

For the next ten minutes both were perfectly silent.

By the end of that time, however, their appetite having been appeased, Dick spoke—

"It was quite time you did have something eatable, Tom," he said, "for I do believe if you had gone much longer without, you would have clean lost your senses. I am sure you were a little mad when you stood at the window and said 'Hush!' in the fashion you did!"

"Perhaps so—perhaps so! My wound—fasting for so long—and the day of excitement we have had, may have caused my senses to play me false."

"I should think such a result was very probable."

"And yet," said Tom, "surely I cannot have made so great a mistake. Listen!"

"He got up as he spoke and opened the door a little.

Then he assumed an attitude of intense listening.

"I can hear nothing," said Dick, "except the sighing and murmuring of the wind in the deserted corridors. Do you?"

"Not now," said Tom. "But let the door remain as it is, just a little way ajar."

"Very well. You are on the side to feel the draught, not I!"

"I do not care for it," said Tom, resuming his seat; "and now I will try to tell you what I heard after you left me."

"Do so."

"I stood at the hall window watching you until I could see you no longer. Then I returned to this room, broke up a couple more chairs, and lighted the fire."

"Yes, what then?"

"This, of course, took up some little time, but still I thought it almost time you were back. I felt dreadfully sick and faint for want of food. My wound smarted horribly, and I continually saw bright moving figures, sometimes like stars and sometimes like faces, flitting before my eyes."

"Those symptoms are easily accounted for."

"I am aware of it! Well, I sat here in the chair for what seemed to me to be an endless time, and then I got up and staggered to the little window in the hall. I say staggered, because I found my legs had scarcely strength enough to support the weight of my body!"

"Well—well, go on! What next?" said Dick; "for goodness sake don't be so prolix!"

"So what?"

"Oh! hang it all, don't beat about the bush so much. Come to the point."

"I was at it, and should have told you by now if you hadn't interrupted me. Don't be so impatient!"

"Go on! Go on!"

"You may laugh at what I say as much as you like, but I'm confident it's true for all that, and that if I was exhausted from want of food, that my senses played me no trick. While I was standing at the hall window waiting and watching for you to make your appearance, I distinctly heard a voice."

"A voice?"

"Yes, a voice."

"What words did it utter?"

"I could not distinguish the words. It was a voice alone I heard."

"Nonsense, Tom, you must have been mistaken. Who is there here besides ourselves possessing the faculty of speech?"

"That I cannot say," said Tom, "but I am as confident as I am of my own existence at the present moment, that while I was at the window in the hall I heard the sound of a voice, if not voices, and that is why I said 'Hush!' as soon as you appeared, for I thought it only natural that, if I heard someone speak, that someone would hear us speak also!"

CHAPTER LX.

THE TWO FRIENDS PROBE YET DEEPER INTO THE MYSTERIES OF DUDLEY CRYPT, AND GET TAKEN PRISONERS FOR THEIR PAINS.

Dick Turpin looked narrowly into Tom King's face as he spoke, and saw at once that his comrade was fully convinced of the truth of what he had uttered.

That there was anything supernatural about it, Dick would not for one moment believe.

He could not yet divest himself of the idea that it was Tom's fancy.

Yet it might not be, and it most certainly behoved him for his own safety's sake to act with as much precaution as possible.

"You do not credit me," said Tom, "but it is true for all that! Now what voice could it have been?"

"How should I be able to tell any more than yourself? Now pray, Tom, recollect how startled—I might say frightened—we both were this morning at hearing that awful shrieking sound, and yet how simple was the cause that produced it!"

"I know it was," said Tom King; "but I could credit the wind making such a sound as that, but not imitating a human voice. There is something about that, I take it, that makes it impossible for anything to imitate it."

"True!" said Dick, uneasily. "True! We ought not to dismiss such a thing as this without further consideration, even if we could."

"And that I very much doubt," said Tom. "But come, my friend, I am refreshed. My brain is clear. What are we to do?"

"That is very hard indeed to say!"

"It is."

"If we could only hear the sound again, we should have something like a foundation to go upon!"

"I am aware of that, and that is why I put the door open just now, in order that we might hear what was taking place outside with greater plainness."

"Exactly! We will listen! And now, Tom, assuming that your hearing did not deceive you—and setting aside all thoughts of supernatural agency—from whose lips, think you, was it likely the sound came?"

"There you puzzle me, I cannot form the least idea. The place has been so long closed up, and when we came we found no traces of any one having made an entrance before us."

"That we certainly did not!"

"And I think we may say, with greater safety still, that no one has entered during the time we have been here."

"We have not heard any one, and surely no one could have got in without our doing so."

"Certainly not."

"Who can it be then?"

"Not a friend!"

"No—more likely an enemy! Yet stay, Tom. Do you think there is a probability of our being tracked hither by the police, and that they have found some means of entering the place so distant from this as for us not to hear it?"

"I am bewildered, and know not what to think!" said Tom, springing from his seat, and pacing up and down the room.

"So am I; but it will never do to remain so. We must make up our minds to a certain course of action, and that at once."

"What do you advise?"

"I must think what will be best. You know, in nearly all cases, I am in favour of a bold course of action!"

"It is generally best."

"Shall we adopt it in the present case? Say the word. I consent!"

"I think it will be best," said Turpin. "Come along, Tom! Look to your weapons carefully, and we will soon see from whence this mysterious voice came!"

As he spoke, Dick, with an air of great resolution, now that he had made up his mind what he was going to do, rose from his seat, re primed his pistols, took up his lantern and crow-bar, and closely followed by Tom King, left the room, and entered the hall.

Turpin had taken the precaution to turn the dark slide of his lantern, so that not the faintest ray of light proceeded from it.

Tom King gently closed the door.

They stood then surrounded by a darkness and a silence that were positively dreadful.

Without making the least sound our friends crept along the hall.

As soon as they reached the extremity both paused and listened.

When Tom heard the voice he was too much su to take particular heed of the exact direction from whence it came. It was somewhere in the mansion, he felt confident.

Therefore, unless they should hear it again, they would have nothing to guide them.

Not half a yard from where they stood was a flight of steps leading to the lower portion of the building.

Dick touched Tom lightly on the arm and whispered:

"Shall we go down here and see if there is anything to rouse suspicion?"

"Yes, by all means; I feel it would be impossible to rest until this affair is thoroughly sifted."

"I should not exactly be at ease. I fancy there is little likelihood of anyone being above, considering we explored that part of the place!"

"You may depend the voice ascended these steps," said Tom, "for although everything has been so silent ever since, I am still firmly convinced that I did hear a voice!"

"Very well, my friend, follow me, and we shall soon know whether you were right or not."

So saying, Turpin fearlessly descended the stairs.

Still he did not go rashly, for he knew not how sure his footing might be; but the bright rays of the lamp showed him that all was well.

On reaching the bottom of the stairs they saw before and on each side of them several doors. These were tried one after another, and found fast locked.

Dick turned round to his companion with a smile upon his lips.

"There is nothing here, you see, or, at all events, everything has the appearance of not having been disturbed. I am sure it was your fancy, Tom! Do you feel inclined to prosecute your search any further?"

"I do," said Tom, who was vexed to think Dick should be so sure he was mistaken. "Here are some more steps. Let us go down them!"

"With all pleasure imaginable. These lead to the cellars, I should think. Perhaps we may be lucky enough to fall across some wine, which would be very acceptable just now!"

The stairs certainly did have the appearance of leading to the cellars.

They were of rough bricks, and so were the walls.

Both were covered with humid exhalations.

It became now absolutely necessary for our friends to tread with the utmost caution, and feel one foot secure before they moved the other, for the slime on the steps was treacherous in the extreme, and there was nothing on either side that permitted a hand hold.

At length, to their great satisfaction, the bottom of the steps was reached.

The descent had occupied many minutes, for the steps were numerous. They were now on a level with the foundations of the building.

The atmosphere that entered their lungs was most impure and chill, and they breathed with difficulty.

The lantern seemed to have diminished the brilliancy of its light, or else the air itself was of a greater density than that above.

They could not see to any great distance around them, but they appeared to be standing in vaults of great extent.

The flooring was quite wet.

Our friends kept on in as direct a line as they could, expecting in a short time to come to some obstacle that would prevent their further progress.

In this anticipation they walked on for a hundred yards or more.

Still there was no appearance of a termination.

Black empty space was on all sides of them.

There was another circumstance that had made itself manifest for some little time.

The ground gradually sloped lower and lower.

Dick came to a halt and flashed the lantern about him.

"I'll be hanged if I half like this place," he said. "I am cold to the bone, and we seem on the highroad to the infernal regions. What's the good of going any further? I think it is pretty clear now you made a mistake!"

"I don't see it," said Tom, obstinately. "Let us go on further. This place must have an end somewhere."

"One would think so; but I can see neither beginning nor end. However, if you are resolved, come on!"

They, therefore, once more resumed their course.

The descent became more rapid at every step.

But there were no signs either of roof, sides, or end; the only thing they could see was the ground, which was running with moisture everywhere.

Their footsteps echoed hollowly in that gloomy and sepulchral-looking place.

"I am puzzled beyond measure to think what kind of place this is."

"Are you? Well, I cannot say that I am!"

"Indeed?"

"Yes; the mansion above us is built upon a rock which overhangs the sea, and I fancy these are natural cavities in this rock which were used for cellars; and very good ones they would make!"

"Ah! just so! I don't doubt it. They are extensive enough, goodness knows!"

"They are! How far, think you, are we from the end of this place?"

"That's just what I should like to know. It seems pretty clear there is no one here but ourselves!"

"Have you anything small and heavy in your pocket—a stone, or something of that sort?"

"No, I haven't. What do you want it for?"

"Why, if one of us took a stone, or something of the kind, and threw it straight before us, we should have some idea of how far we have to go, for I have quite made up my mind not to turn back until I have seen where this leads to!"

"The deuce you have! However, I haven't a stone, but here is a bullet. I daresay that will answer the purpose just as well!"

CHAPTER LXI.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN HAVE SOME SINGULAR ADVENTURES IN THE VAULTS, AND ARE RATHER TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

"It will be the very thing!" replied Tom King. "Hand it here!"

Dick accordingly gave to his comrade a bullet of rather large size.

"Stand aside," said Tom, preparing to throw it. "One—two—three!"

As he uttered the word three Tom threw the bullet straight before him in the darkness with all the power he had in his arm.

They waited anxiously to hear it strike.

In the intense stillness that was around them they expected the slight sound it would make would reach their ears, even supposing the bullet fell at a considerable distance.

But they waited in vain.

Not the faintest sound arose.

"This is incomprehensible!" said Dick.

"It appears to be; but let us push forward. We must find out something very soon!"

They now resumed their course.

In a few minutes the nature of the ground changed.

Up to now it had been wet, but tolerably hard. Now it was very soft and their feet sank deeply in.

By the reflection of the lantern too they could see that here and there the water had accumulated into small pools.

Foul and noisome insects, such as damp and darkness combined never fail to generate, crawled lazily from before their feet, or plunged with a dull plash into the pools.

"This solves the mystery of our not hearing the fall of the bullet at once," said Tom King. "It would sink into this soft ooze without a sound!"

"It would. But hark! Cannot you hear faintly a strange rumbling noise! What can it be?"

"There is only one thing that can cause such a sound!"

"What is it?"

"The washing of the sea against a rocky coast."

"You are right—that is it! Come, it is possible we may find some mode of exit from Durley Chine which is either unknown or forgotten!"

And despite the disagreeable nature of the ground they pushed forward with fresh spirit.

As they advanced, the rumbling sound became plainer and plainer, until at length they could distinguish the dashing of the very waves themselves.

The path descended very rapidly.

"Hilloa!" said Dick suddenly, as looking before him he saw the beams of the lantern rested on something. "Hilloa, Tom! what have we here? This is a discovery, indeed!"

"That it certainly is! Why, they are casks without number piled up!"

"They are!"

"Shift the light a little! There, that will do! Why, they stretch out on both sides as far as we can see! Well, I never! Are they full, I wonder?"

Full of surprise at coming so unexpectedly upon a larger number of casks than they had ever seen at one time in their lives before, the two friends hurried forward to obtain a nearer view.

Yes, there was no mistake, there the casks were. They were small ones, and of the kind generally called kegs.

Dick knocked several with his knuckles.

From the dullness of the sound it was quite certain they were full of liquid of some kind or other.

"I say, Dick," said King, rather triumphantly. "Do you think I was wrong when I said I heard a voice?"

"It would be premature to say yet! There seems some degree of probability about it now!"

"Rather! Just look at the ground!"

Dick did so, and was astonished to find the impression of numberless footsteps on the soft floor of the vault.

This was confirmation indeed.

Our friends got anxious and excited.

They could feel their hearts knocking against their ribs, and their breathing became short and laboured, as is often the case when people are under more than usual circumstances of excitation.

"Some one has been here, that's very certain!"

"No one can dispute the evidence before us, I should think," said Tom King. "If my stomach was empty I was certain I heard a voice!"

"Well, it seems as if you did. Still they must have been nearer the stairs than we are now or you could never have heard them!"

"I don't doubt that for a moment!"

"I wish we had thought of looking for the traces of footsteps before, but the truth is, I placed no credence in your story!"

"I know you did not, and therefore said nothing; but if you were not looking out I was, and I saw the foot-prints quite close to the bottom of the steps!"

"Then why didn't you speak?"

"Why didn't I speak?"

"Yes"

"Because I thought I would serve you out if I could, though of course if you had stoutly refused to go any further I should have told you!"

"Well—well! It appears to me we have by no means come to the end of the remarkable sights at Durley Chine!"

"No! On the contrary. I think we shall find we are on the threshold of some new discoveries!"

"No doubt of it! But I should uncommonly like to know what there is in those casks! Have you anything you can tap one with?"

"I have not."

"Nothing that would answer the purpose?"

"No. I left an auger which I had with me on the table in the room above."

"That's a pity! However it is not worth while to go and fetch it. Let us see what more there is to be seen."

"It will be best to follow these foot-marks. They will surely lead us somewhere."

"Yes, it seems almost like a path. Come along!"

They made better progress now, for they had firmer ground to walk upon.

About two minutes brought them to a place where the path led right through the casks, which were piled up on either side like a wall.

The murmuring of the sea grew plainer and plainer.

But now another sound begun to mingle with it.

The hum of many human voices.

"Look to your pistols, Tom," said Dick, as soon as his ear detected the new sound. "Look to the priming. There must be many people here, and they are more likely to be enemies than friends!"

"Unfortunately, yes!"

"Still I fancy as we are, should any one take the aggressive, we should be a pretty good match for more than half-a-dozen!"

But scarcely had this assertion left his lips than the highwaymen emerged from the path between the casks into an open space, and before either knew what had happened the lantern was dashed violently from Dick's hand on to the ground, and both our friends felt themselves seized upon from behind by numberless hands.

They were strong hands too, and each one gripped as though he never meant to loose his hold.

Resistance was impossible.

They were completely overpowered.

At least half-a-dozen hands held them firmly by the arms.

Dick Turpin and Tom King were prisoners.

CHAPTER LXII.

FURTHER PERILOUS ADVENTURES IN THE CAVERNS.

So utterly unexpected was this attack, and so suddenly ended, that it was a minute or so before either of our friends had any clear idea of what had taken place.

They were soon aroused to the fact that they were captives.

But who were their captors?

That they would have given no inconsiderable trifle to know.

But all was darkness the most intense and profound.

Both could hear the heavy breathing of those who held them prisoners, and could tell to a little whereabouts they stood in consequence, but not the least bit could they see.

It was Dick who spoke first.

"Who are you that have dared to lay your hands upon us? Speak. Speak at once!"

"Ha! ha!"

That was the only reply he got to his speech.

But almost immediately a gruff voice said—

"Bring them along! Quick! I will await them in the lower cave."

"Oh, indeed!" thought Dick, "now I wonder who you are? Not a police officer certainly, so there's some consolation in that!"

There might be, but it was no great one, one would think.

Obeying the orders they had received the men who held our friends set forward.

Tom began, in spite of the wound in his shoulder, to struggle most desperately.

"Easy does it, Tom!" cried Turpin as he heard the scuffling behind him. "Give in quietly. It will soon be all right provided you don't say who we are."

The men took no notice of this. At all events they made no remark about it.

Tom ceased his efforts, and allowed himself to be hurried along in the intense darkness without the least resistance.

Their captors must have been very familiar with the place, for seeing was quite out of the question. Yet they did not make one false step.

Those who held Dick walked first.

About half-a-dozen steps behind them came the others.

Presently a voice said hoarsely in Dick's ear—

"Descend the steps! They are thirteen in number and steep!"

The same caution was given to Tom King.

The whole then passed down the steps.

Still in deep darkness.

They were hurried along another passage, at the extremity of which they could see a faint ray of light.

So faint that in any less darkness it would have been imperceptible.

Dick hailed it with pleasure.

In a few moments now would his curiosity be gratified, and he would surely know by whom he had been taken prisoner.

The ray of light increased in brightness.

The muttering of voices reached their ears.

The passage seemed a most interminable length.

But, as the longest lane must have a turning, so must the longest passage have an end, and in a few minutes, to Dick's great satisfaction, a kind of curtain was drawn aside, and he was hurried forward into what he supposed was the lower cavern.

One hasty glance around was sufficient to enable him to have a clear idea of what kind of place he was in.

But it will take us some few minutes to describe it.

Contrary to the place they had just left, this one was well lighted—at least, the contrast made it appear to be.

It was a very lofty cavern, with long graceful-looking stalactites depending from the roof.

In shape it was irregular, but very spacious.

The floor was hard and calcareous.

At irregular intervals round the walls, long pinewood torches were stuck in the crevices, and these diffused a ruddy light over the place, as well as marked out its extent.

Near the centre a group of about a dozen men were congregated.

Several of these held torches above their heads.

Our friends saw at once into whose hands they had fallen.

Smugglers.

There could be no question of it.

No doubt there was some little unknown creek which led from the sea into that cavern.

The vaults under Durley Chine were made the receptacle of the smuggled goods, where they were housed for whatever time they thought proper.

Many things lying about showed that they had only just completed a large and valuable run.

The casks which our friends had seen had not been there above twenty-four hours.

The semi-nautical garb which the men wore, and the circumstances by which they were surrounded, betrayed at once their occupation.

These things were noted by our friends as they were led across the cavern to where the group we have been speaking of were standing.

Among these was one whose gigantic athletic form and authoritative air pointed him out as the chief of the lawless gang.

As our friends approached, the little group dispersed to the right and left, so that they stood face to face with the captain.

By his command the torches were so held as to cast their full light upon the prisoners, who were still held tightly by the arms by those who had secured them.

The smuggler chief—or king, as he delighted to be called—surveyed the highwaymen with undisguised surprise.

"Capsize me in a squall!" he ejaculated. "What strange fish have we here? They don't belong to the coast-guard, I'll be sworn!"

We have before had occasion to state that the dress worn by Dick Turpin and Tom King was a kind of undress military uniform, and such as was worn by cavalry officers when off duty.

But this attire was by no means confined to persons in the army. Many of the young lords and beaus about town clothed themselves in a similar manner.

A hundred years ago or so, the difference of rank, station, and occupation was more easily distinguished by the dress than they are at the present day.

Now it is difficult, with respect to dress merely, to tell a peer of the realm from a clerk in a lawyer's office

Then it was quite different.

The smuggler chief therefore saw immediately that the persons he had taken prisoners were not revenue officers, as he had no doubt fancied they were, but perhaps gentlemen of birth, fortune, and position.

His bearing and manners, therefore, were comparatively civil.

While this scrutiny was going on, both the highwaymen were occupied with the same thought.

Should they make themselves known?

Dick looked at his comrade.

He saw at once that he was considering the same thought as himself.

Dick shook his head slightly, with a motion that no one would have noticed.

But Tom saw and understood it.

They were to keep their identity a secret.

This took place just as the smuggler chief finished speaking.

Dick considered it a favourable moment for him to make some remark.

He therefore fixed his eyes boldly upon the smuggler's countenance, and said, with an air of most perfect calmness and hauteur—

"My friend and myself are waiting for some explanation, which I suppose must come from you, as you appear to be in command. Why are we made prisoners, thus?"

Dick's tone and bearing produced upon the smugglers just the effect he desired and intended it should.

Tom King sustained the character of an injured gentleman to perfection!

"Yes," he said, as soon as the words were out of Turpin's mouth. "I wish to have an explanation of your conduct in dragging me here like this."

The smuggler chief felt convinced they were of the blood royal itself.

"We are sorry you should have been found spying about our warehouse. You know our secret. Our secret is our lives. Therefore you must die!"

"Nonsense," said Dick. "Not till our time comes! Let us be released, we wish to speak a word or two to you in private."

The smuggler reflected a minute, but then feeling sure he had his prisoners quite safe beyond all hope of escape, he made a sign with his hand to the men who released the highwaymen at once.

"Follow me," said the chief.

With an assumption of great dignity, our friends marched behind him.

The remaining smugglers, who had every confidence in their chief, troubled themselves no more about the strangers.

At the far side of the cavern the chief paused, and drawing aside a curtain, motioned the two friends to enter.

They, seeing that they stood upon the threshold of an apartment luxuriously furnished with articles of foreign manufacture, did not hesitate to obey.

This room was lighted with three large lamps, and a bright fire was burning on the hearth.

The chief entered, and, with the manner of one who feels he is at home, sauntered across the room, and flung himself upon a large silken ottoman.

One would have thought, by their manner, they had lived there all their lives, and so far from being strangers and prisoners, intimate friends of the chief, for both Turpin and King swaggered up to two chairs, which they very coolly carried to the vicinity of the fire, and where they could see what expression the smuggler's face wore.

Then they seated themselves.

Turpin crossed one leg over the other, and leaned back in the chair in a negligent posture, while he twirled the ends of his fine mustaches with a grace that was quite perfect.

As for Tom King, he was determined not to be behindhand with his comrade.

Observing an iron bar upon the hearth, he took it up and arranged the fire with it to his satisfaction.

Then he took hold of his chair and sat down in it, with his legs astride the seat, and his hands leaning upon the back.

On these he rested his chin.

The smuggler king neither moved nor spoke, but sat gazing at the highwaymen with the most unbounded surprise.

The coolness of their behaviour, when so environed with peril as they were, quite staggered him.

But he was a brave man, and, like almost any one who is truly brave, admired and appreciated bravery in others.

He admired their slim and well-knit figures, and made a mental estimate of the amount of strength possessed by each.

And now, to his surprise, the smuggler king felt himself embarrassed.

The time had come for him to speak, and he knew not what to say.

Dick and Tom waited quietly.

The smuggler settled himself in an attitude upon the ottoman.

"A-hem!" he said.

Our friends took no notice.

They enjoyed the scene mightily.

They were amused to think what a difference their putting on the calm resolute bearing they did made.

But the smuggler felt his embarrassment, so far from diminishing, increased.

The longer he waited the worse he was.

He resolved to make a bold plunge.

"Gentlemen!"

He spoke in quite a deferential and subdued tone of voice.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I can see, without looking twice, that you are persons of high birth; I can also see, which gratifies me much more, that you are a couple of singularly brave men. Your behaviour here sufficiently proves that."

The chief paused.

Our friends waved their hands deprecatingly as he uttered his compliments on their prowess, and at the same time in a manner which meant "Go on."

"But," said the smuggler, seriously, "you were found under very suspicious circumstances—excuse me for saying as much. Never mind; I saw you were gentlemen, and I treated you as such!"

It was pretty clear the chief expected that this speech would call forth some sort of reply.

He was disappointed.

His guests contented themselves with simply bowing carelessly, as if in assent to his proposition.

"I say, gentlemen, you were both found under very suspicious circumstances. You were prying about our storehouse. You discovered our secret, and that the vaults below the deserted mansion of Durley Chine were made the receptacle of smuggled goods. I say you have found out all this. Now a code of laws has been framed by which we all act, and from which we never deviate. In that code of rules it is expressly stated that, should any person discover the secret, they should have the choice of two alternatives—it being at my option whether the alternatives are given—to submit to be put to death, or else become members of the band."

The smuggler chief, as he finished this very long speech, wiped the perspiration from his face with a French silk pocket-handkerchief, and waited with great eagerness and anxiety for our friends to make some reply.

CHAPTER LXIII.

PERILS AND DANGERS THICKEN ABOUT OUR FRIENDS.

To the surprise, then, no less of the smuggler chief than Tom King, Dick Turpin put on an appearance of great candour as he spoke to the following effect.

"I have nothing to complain of in the way of treatment, and I am sure I can answer for my friend; but if you will listen I will give you some explanation of our presence among your goods."

"I shall only be too glad to pay the greatest attention to what you have to say, gentlemen. But first help yourself to a glass or two of wine."

The highwaymen accepted his invitation.

"You must know, in the first place," said Dick, reseating himself, while Tom looked wonderingly at him to know what he was going to say, "you must know, in the first place, although we do not want it mentioned, we are of very high rank, indeed. That is to say, our fathers are, which is much the same thing."

"Exactly!" said the smuggler, with a gratified smile at his own perspicacity. "I could see at once that you were gentlemen—real gentlemen!"

Both highwaymen perpetrated two very deep bows.

Dick resumed.

"At present I cannot inform you of our precise rank and station, for obvious reasons!"

"Ahem!" coughed Tom, but Dick went on without taking the least notice of the interruption.

"But you, as a man of discernment, must be well aware that not one young man in a thousand manages to live in London upon the allowance which is made him."

"That's very true," said the smuggler, sententiously. "Dice, wine, and women is the very devil!"

"Well, a day or two back—mind I am telling you this in confidence!"

"Yes—yes!"

"Well, a day or two back we found ourselves literally penniless, and what to do we knew not. We had exhausted every resource, and were driven to our wits' end. At length my companion mentioned Durley Chine to me."

"Ah!"

"Yes. He told me the strange story about it being shut up and so forth, which I daresay you know very well!"

"I do!"

"Well, he suggested that we should make our way down here secretly, enter the mansion by stealth, and then see if we could not find some valuables to take away with us. My friend here said there was every reason to believe there was a large sum in gold, jewels, plate, and such like scattered about the mansion."

"Ha! ha!"

"You laugh?"

"Excuse me, I beg! Go on, sir, if you please."

"Well, I thought the suggestion good, and down we came. We got in unperceived, and began our search for the valuables."

"Ha! ha! ha! What did you find?"

Dick stroked his moustache.

"Why," he said, "we had a great deal of trouble, but found nothing!"

"I thought not!"

"You—you thought not?"

"Yes!"

"May I ask why?"

"Oh! certainly. I paid the place a visit myself about—let me see—twelve years ago, and carried off everything that was of value!"

"Ha! I see! That's why you laughed?"

"It is."

"But, since you yourself thought well of it, you must give us credit for having hit upon a good idea!"

A complacent smile stole over the smuggler's face. His vanity was tickled.

"Yes," he said. "But finish, pray, though it is scarcely necessary."

"It is not! However, after searching every room, we came to the stairs leading to the vaults, and the idea then very naturally occurred to us of descending and searching them also as a kind of forlorn hope!"

"Just so! And while you were thus occupied my men, thinking you spies, made you prisoners."

"That's it! So now you are in possession of all the facts, what do you intend to do?"

The smuggler reflected.

Dick's story was so natural and circumstantial, that he never for one moment thought it fictitious in the least particular.

Tom King was exceedingly pleased with his companion's inventive genius, which so far had helped them out of what at first appeared an insuperable difficulty.

But, although they did not suffer the ghost of such a thing to appear upon their countenances, we, as faithful historians, must inform the reader that they waited with great anxiety for the smuggler chief to speak.

"Well, gentlemen!" he said, at last, "it appears to me now that your being taken prisoners by my crew will turn out a very lucky thing for you!"

"I shall be very glad if it does," said Dick.

"It is quite clear your expedition to Durley Chine would have been a futile one, for I give you my word that there is nothing in the vaults that was worth your carrying away. But, as you seem to have the right spirit in you—brave, and all that sort of thing—in want of money, and not over particular how you get it, why the very best thing you can do is to join our band for a time! What do you say?"

This was what Dick had hoped for.

But he pretended the proposition came quite unexpectedly upon him, and he asked for a few minutes to consider upon it.

"Oh, certainly!" replied the smuggler, rising from his seat. "Take as long as you like. Talk it over between yourselves, for it is necessary I should run down to the beach for half-an-hour. I will leave you here as you are, if you will give me your words of honour not to attempt to escape!"

"Willingly," said both our friends in one breath, as they, too, rose. "We give you our words that we will make no attempt at escape."

"Very well, gentlemen! That is all I require," said the chief. "You may depend the best thing you can do will be to accept my offer!"

So saying, the chief pushed aside the curtain, and passing into the outer cavern, left our friends alone.

Neither, however, uttered a syllable for some moments. They were on their guard.

Dick drew Tom into the centre of the room, and spoke to him in a whisper so faint that it was almost inaudible.

"We are safest from eaves-droppers here," said Dick. "No one can be very close to us. It is my belief that the smuggler has only made a feint of going away, and that he has made his way to some place where he can both see and overhear what happens!"

"Like enough," said Tom. "Like enough!"

"I may be wrong, but it can be no harm to be on the safe side. What did you think of my narrative? Was it plausible?"

"First-rate; and as for the chief, I look upon him as a jolly old file."

"What I want to say is this. By no means let slip a hint which will serve to make him aware who we really are."

"I will take care of that!"

"So will I! And now most unquestionably the best thing we can do is to join his band!"

"Very well, my friend. If you are willing I am!"

"One of my principal motives for wishing to join is that we shall be quite lost sight of, and shall be able to return to the road with spirit!"

"Ah! the road!" said Tom King. "Hurrah for the road—hur—"

Dick put his hand over his month.

"You have forgotten your caution."

"I did for the minute."

"Be careful, or you will spoil all. Now for my own part, to return to the subject, I see no great harm in smuggling!"

"Certainly not!"

"Very well, then. The conscientious part of the business is settled!"

Tom laughed.

"I daresay we shall like the change very well for a time, and when we are tired of it we will give them the slip. We shall be sure to have plenty of chances!"

"Oh, yes, that will be no trouble! But how about Bess?"

"Ah!"

"You had forgotten her!"

"I had."

"What shall you do?"

"What can I? The only thing will be to let her remain where she is and take care of herself. I'll warrant she does not stray far. Perhaps she is safer there than in any place we could find."

"If she is not seen."

"That is the only thing. But come, have you made up your about joining?"

"Quite."

"Very well, be circumspect and don't forget the parts we have assumed."

"Do not fear! We will take our seats now, and wait for the arrival of the chief."

In ten minutes afterwards he entered.

From the appearance of his clothes, which were muddy and wet, they considered he was quite in earnest when he said he was going down to the beach.

Our friends were pleased.

"It will be a rough night and no mistake!" he said. "I never saw the ocean such a colour but once before, and that was a matter of twenty years ago, when a hurricane swept over all England, and destroyed nearly all the shipping off the coast! That was an awful night indeed!"

"And you say the sea looks the same colour to-night!"

"It does! Thank goodness, our cargo is safe on shore. But come," he added, "have you made up your minds? Do you accept my offer?"

"We have talked the matter over."

"Yes."

"And, under the circumstances, have come to the conclusion, we had better join."

"Bravo!" said the chief, his eye sparkling with gratification. "I shall be proud of having two such brave hearts under my command."

To conceal a smile, as much as anything else, the two highwaymen bowed deeply.

"Are you ready to join now."

"Yes," said Dick and Tom, in one voice, "at once!"

"And your names?"

"Those we shall be obliged to keep secret, as well as our rank, as we said before.

CHAPTER LXIV.

DOINGS IN THE SMUGGLERS' CAVE.—OUR FRIENDS BEGIN TO HAVE SOME MISGIVINGS.

"VERY good," said the smuggler chief, "you can keep that a secret as long as you like, but you will have to choose two names by which you may be known."

"Just so," said Turpin. "You can call me Richard."

"And me, Thomas," said Tom King.

"Let us go, then, into the outer cavern. It will be necessary for you to take the oath of fidelity in the presence of all the crew."

To this proposition our friends were obliged to consent.

It seemed strange, having been so long accustomed to command themselves, to be under the orders of another.

And yet the thing pleased them, from its perfect strangeness.

On reaching the large cave, they found assembled there a goodly number of men.

On a future occasion Dick counted them, and found they were twenty-three in number. Including the chief and themselves, twenty-six, in all.

Rather a formidable gang.

It would seem from their manner that they already were aware that two more members were about to be added to the band.

As soon as the two made their appearance, the whole of the smugglers formed themselves into a circle round them.

The oath was then administered.

Tom King and Dick Turpin were thenceforward sworn smugglers, and in duty bound to obey the chief, or, as he was styled, king.

In a very short time our friends contrived to make themselves at home.

They became immediately immense favourites with the crew.

It was at a late hour when they separated.

Three days passed thus, during which time Turpin and King took their turns with the rest in keeping guard.

One of the smugglers, who was well skilled in wounds, had attended to Tom's shoulder, which was now quite well.

But however grateful this rest at first was, our friends quickly wearied of it, and longed for the excitement of action.

The smuggler king still maintained his friendly demeanour towards them. He was delighted beyond measure that chance had thrown two such people in his way.

But on the evening of the third day, they observed an unusual amount of bustle and activity.

Of this, however, they feigned to take no notice, but waited for some explanation to be given them. They would not seek it.

Their curiosity was soon gratified, for the smuggler king approached them and said—

"To-night, you will have an opportunity of showing the crew what you are made of."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; we hope to land safely a very valuable cargo of French silks, in doing which, we shall want you to lend us a hand."

"We shall only be too glad to do that," said Dick, "for we were both growing tired of our inactivity. When shall you want our services?"

"In two hours," said the chief, "and during that time I should advise you to lay aside the clothes you have on, and attire yourselves like the rest. You will find them more suitable."

To this both consented, and when they, at the expiration of the time specified, made their appearance, the smuggler king scarcely knew them.

"Come on," he said. "Do nothing but follow me, and obey the instructions which I give."

We should have stated that during the three days neither of our friends had been permitted to approach the outlet of the caverns.

Now they were going to do so they looked about them observantly.

The large cave communicated, by means of a long winding passage, with a large natural hollow in the rocks.

At short and regular distances along this passage sentinels were always posted.

At the end of the passage nearest the beach was a door so artfully formed of stone that, when closed, it could not be distinguished from the remainder of the rocks, even by the keenest eye.

The door was thrown wide open, to allow the crew to pass out.

The cold night air, for it was long past sunset, came most refreshingly upon our friends.

They were the last to pass through the door and then it was closed quickly behind them.

Both looked back at the sound, but no trace of the outlet through which they had passed could they see.

The black shiny rocks rose up on all sides of them in huge gloomy masses.

The hollow in which they stood was almost in the shape of a horseshoe.

At low tide, which it then was, the sea left it firm and dry.

At high tide the water rose to a level with the little door in the rocks itself.

The waves beat with a sullen dash upon the sand.

At a word from the smuggler king the men divided themselves into two companies, and each one going to a particular crevice among the rocks, drew forth a cutter.

Slight judges of nautical matters as our two highwaymen were, they could not help noticing the beautiful make of these vessels, which were about the size of those with which men of war are provided.

The two boats were pushed into the water.

The smuggler chief took his seat in the larger one of the two and motioned our friends to sit near him.

They obeyed, and were followed by eight other men, who seated themselves at the oars.

All were fully armed.

The other boat was manned by ten more of the crew. Their directions were to follow the first cutter.

The boats were shoved off.

Very glad were Dick and Tom that they had not been separated.

The men at the oars bent to their task with right good will, and they made great speed through the water.

As soon, however, as they got far enough out at sea to feel the breeze, which was quite fresh, the smugglers laid aside their oars and hoisted a sail.

Those in the second boat did likewise.

Their speed was now much increased, and despite the shrewdness of the wind, our friends could not conceal a feeling of exultation as they went bounding over the waves.

Their pleasurable emotions were also still further increased from the fact that they were quite in the dark as to what they were about to do, or where they were about to go. The extent of their knowledge lay in the few words the smuggler king had spoken to them in the cavern.

As they looked back they could see the gable roofs of the deserted mansion at Durley Chine clearly defined against the lighter colour of the sky.

But their attention was quickly distracted from this object by the captain's motions.

A packet of some kind which he had taken from the pocket of his overall, lay upon the prow of the cutter.

It was conical in shape, and about six inches high.

The top was a sharp point.

To the surprise, then, of our friends, the smuggler king produced a match, with which he lighted the point of the conical package.

It flamed up suddenly for a moment, and then burst into a beautiful green flame.

For a space of time during which a person might, with moderate speed, have counted a hundred, the bright light continued.

The dark surging billows which rushed past the boat, had their crests tinged with a rare beauty as the light fell upon them, but its effect upon the faces of the crew was to make them look ghastly in the extreme.

At the expiration of the time mentioned, the bright and beautiful light faded away, leaving so black a darkness behind it that the nearest objects became for a few moments invisible.

That this was a signal was pretty evident, and our friends looked for its result with very great interest.

The smuggler king, who, in accordance with his invariable practice, had never spoken a word during the expedition, except when giving brief directions to his men, scanned the horizon with a keen and searching glance.

He was clearly expecting some reply.

But none came.

Dick, who was seated nearest to him, noticed that he sat down with a vexed and disappointed air.

In the meantime, the little vessels scudded at a prodigious rate through the water.

Our friends looked round.

The darkness had rapidly increased.

The moon would not rise for nearly five hours, and the heavens were besides covered with a huge slate-coloured cloud.

It required an effort for them to see the second cutter, which still kept precisely in their wake.

After a little time, however, the smuggler king produced another conical package which he placed upon the same spot as he did the former one.

Ere he lighted it, however, he placed a powerful night-glass to his eye, and carefully examined the whole of the horizon with it.

When he was looking in a direction in a line with the course the cutters were taking, Dick fancied he heard him give vent to an ejaculation, but of its signification he had no idea.

The smuggler king put down his glass.

He applied a light to the second package.

This time the light was yellow, or amber-coloured.

As soon as it had become quite extinct, Dick saw another light of precisely the same tint, but apparently at a great distance.

It looked like a torch, for the flame was not any larger, and, unless it had been looked for, would scarce have been perceived.

The smuggler chief, as he resumed his seat laid his hand upon Dick's shoulder, and said—

"All's well!"

CHAPTER LXV.

HIS MAJESTY'S REVENUE CUTTER "OSPREY" MAKES SAD HAVOC AMONG THE CREW OF THE SMUGGLER KING.

It was something quite unprecedented for the smuggler king to make the remark he did, for one of the laws he was most stringent about having observed was, that no one composing the crew should utter a syllable while out upon one of their excursions, and himself to do no more than give orders which were absolutely necessary.

But he made an exception in favour of our friends.

Never was a man more confident upon anything than he was that the new members of his band were really part and parcel of the aristocracy of England.

It is a misfortune that it should be an element in the mental composition of most people to have too lofty an idea of the excellence of birth, and too poor a one of genuine merit when displayed in any of its numerous forms.

But it is probable enough the smuggler would not have been so much in favour of our friends had it not been for the calm contempt of danger which they both displayed.

Bravery in a man was a sure and ready passport to the smuggler's rugged heart; but still we cannot help thinking that on this occasion its passage was facilitated by the belief that those who had displayed the quality he most admired in such a remarkable manner were gentlemen of rank.

When the captain said "All's well!" Dick naturally enough turned his eyes in the direction whence he had seen the responsive light proceed.

The smuggler king observed it, and continued—

"You will understand all soon," he said. "That light which you saw just now over yonder in answer to mine came from the prow of the Snake, the name of the vessel which brings the articles half way across the channel!"

"I guessed as much!"

"They will make all sail now, for seeing the light was yellow they will know it is the second signal we have given."

"But look," said Dick, whose eyes were still directed towards the approaching sail. "Look, they are making signals to you now, are they not?"

The smuggler sprung to his feet, and again applied the telescope to his eye.

"They appear to me to have hung three lanterns in the shape of a triangle," said Dick, who also rose and stood at the smuggler's side. "Is is not so?"

"It is," said the chief, shutting up his glass with a sudden snap.

"I presume," said Turpin, "they mean that all is not well?"

"You are right! That is exactly what they do mean!"

"Danger?"

"Yes."

"Do they point out the precise form the danger is to take?"

"Yes!"

"Then it does not much matter, for, knowing that, you can take your steps accordingly!"

The smuggler king turned round and regarded Dick with a look of admiration.

"You are a brave man, apparently," he said, "and seem not to value peril in the least! We shall see presently whether you are really what you seem!"

Dick smiled.

"You have not told me the meaning of those signals."

"No, but I will do so! Three lights in that position signify that the coast-guard have some inkling that a run is about to be attempted to-night, and are on the look out for us!"

"Is that all?"

"All?" repeated the smuggler, and encore too, as you will find!"

"H—m! Perhaps so," said Dick, carelessly. "I am free to confess that I know very little about fighting on the sea!"

"It is by no means certain," said the smuggler king, "that we shall actually come in contact with them!"

"Oh!"

"I shall not court an encounter, for they are always in a position to do us much damage with their heavy guns!"

"I suppose so."

"But stay! I will take a sweep round again with my glass, and see if any other craft is in sight."

As he spoke, the smuggler chief took up his telescope and examined the whole of the horizon attentively.

"I can see nothing suspicious," he said. "It may turn out to be a false alarm. A man on the look-out is posted on the Snake, and should a vessel hove in sight a red lantern will be shown."

"Your arrangements seem very good."

"They are as perfect as we can make them."

Nothing further was now said, for the interval between the two cutters and the Snake lessened rapidly.

The smuggler king now had his mind fully occupied in giving directions to his men.

In ten minutes more the Snake reached them

Things were ordered with great skill.

Everything and everybody was in readiness.

One cutter was on one side of the Snake, and the other on the other.

A number of rather small packages were rapidly transferred from one to the other, and stowed away.

Our friends performed their part by receiving the packages from the deck of the Snake, and handing them to the crew of the cutter.

The amount of work got through in a short space of time was astounding.

The packages being made so small, enabled them to be handled with the greatest dexterity.

As for the smuggler king, so soon as his cutter came in contact with the Snake, he climbed with great agility on board, doubtless for the purpose of settling matters with the captain.

The Snake was a small vessel not much larger than a yacht, and in that dim light our friends could see that her sailing capabilities must be something extraordinary.

But suddenly there arose a report that was absolutely deafening.

A blinding sheet of flame shot before their eyes.

Groans—shrieks—ejaculations of rage arose from the smuggler's vessels, and mingled with the crashing of timber and the din of falling masts.

So utterly unexpected was this event, that our friends were completely overcome, and for a moment knew not whether they were alive or dead.

A dark bulky form dropped from the Snake into the cutter.

"Confusion!" he cried. "The revenue ship Osprey has stolen upon us, unawares! Quick! quick! To your oars like men! Row—row for your lives! Haste! haste! We shall escape them yet! Bend your backs, and strain your arms if ever you want to see dry land again! The goods are all landed! and, if we try, all may yet be well! Row, my men! Row! Row for your lives, or the coast-guard will overtake us!"

CHAPTER LXVI.

THE "OSPREY" KEEPS UP THE CHASE, AND DESTROYS THE CUTTER.

AGAIN at this moment did another broadside burst from the portholes of the revenue ship, and the bright glaring light revealed for a fleeting instant her dark hull, her decks, her cordage, all thronged with well-armed men.

That brief flash sufficed also to show the Snake, fearfully crippled about her spars and rigging, endeavouring, like some wounded animal, to crawl away.

It showed, also, the cutter in which our friends were, and revealed the form of the smuggler king as he stood up in the bows quivering with excitement.

The other cutter, too, was seen in the rear, endeavouring to reach its companion.

Then all became lost to sight.

A darkness that seemed ten times greater than it really was, seemed to enshroud all things.

The speed with which the foremost cutter dashed through the water was something fearful.

But the greater danger always submerges the lesser one, and so this was not heeded.

The anxiety of the smuggler king was extreme.

He shouted out his orders until his voice grew harsh and inarticulate.

Then again did the portholes of the Osprey open and vomit forth flame and death.

Once more was the scene momentarily illuminated.

But this time the guns appeared to have been specially aimed at the two retreating boats, for a perfect shower of missiles whistled through the darkness over the crew's heads.

The sail which they had put up suffered severely.

Indeed, it was thought they would have to cut it down.

But, so long as it preserved its perpendicularity, this they determined not to do.

The oarsmen worked nobly, and urged the little vessel through the waves with greater swiftness than it had ever gone before.

Three spare oars had been taken from the bottom of the boat.

One was handed to Turpin, with injunctions to make use of it.

One to Tom King.

The other the smuggler chief himself took.

The addition of the three oars made a perceptible difference in the rate of their progression.

They had, too, the tide in their favour, which was a very great matter indeed.

Our friends looked around.

No single object met their view.

Even the waves that were displaced by the boat were scarcely visible.

But it was towards the land that Dick and Tom looked.

They had no clear idea of how far they might be from it.

How they would have rejoiced could they have seen the roof tops of Durley Chine.

The second cutter was also hid from sight.

Their assailant, too, was not to be seen, nor would she be until another of those dreadful discharges took place.

But to some extent this darkness favoured our friends, for, of course, it prevented the crew of the Osprey taking such careful and deliberate aim at them as they would otherwise have done.

All was very silent now. Since the smuggler chief had taken an oar he had ceased to shout to his men, for he thought that perhaps was a means of directing the attention of the enemy towards them.

And now as the brief moments slipped away, and no token of aggression came from their foe, they began to indulge in the hope that she had lost them.

Fain would the crew of the first cutter, in which our friends were, have shouted out to their companions in the second to know whether they were all safe, but they felt they dared not.

It was too hazardous.

The friendly cry might reach the ears of their enemy, and so draw her down upon them.

Therefore they were silent, and bent all their energies to the task of propelling their vessel through the water.

But when those who had been less sanguine than the others about having eluded their antagonist, began indeed to think that such was the case, another volley came to show them the erroneousness of their supposition.

Nearer and deadlier—much deadlier—was this broadside than the preceding ones.

The report of the guns seemed to shake earth and ocean.

The sheet of flame that issued from the vessel's side revealed everything plainly.

The Osprey, with her crowded decks of well-armed men, and who, as yet, had not received a single shot in return, was rather less than a mile to the leeward.

They saw, for a period of time so short, that we have no word that expresses it, the outlines of the second cutter, which was quite half-a-mile in their wake.

They had not made such good speed as their comrades.

Then it was gone.

Utterly.

They saw it no more.

That broadside had caught the second cutter fairly between wind and water, and swamped her in a moment.

Never was there annihilation so sudden—so complete.

A deep and bitter curse came from the lips of the smuggler chief.

Then all again was darkness.

Of all the perilous and critical positions in which our friends had ever been placed, this was surely the most perilous and most critical.

What chance was there of escape?

[THE CONFLICT BETWEEN DICK TURPIN AND THE SMUGGLER KING.]

None, unless they should be fortunate enough to reach the shore within the space of a few minutes.

With an ever-increasing anxiety our friends looked behind them, but so dark was it that they could scarce see a dozen yards.

Both were uneasy because they could not correctly estimate their true position; if they had been able to do so they would have had no trepidation whatever.

The smuggler king, however, they could not but regard with admiration. As each new danger and difficulty arose he showed himself superior to it.

Without ceasing to use the oar, he gave, in a suppressed voice, orders to his crew, who obeyed them instantly, for they had implicit confidence in his ability to save them.

At a word from the smuggler king, Dick took up the ship's telescope, and applying it to his eye scanned closely the whole of the horizon.

For some time he could see nothing. Presently, however, some dark object made itself apparent.

It was small.

It was in motion.

"I can see the ship!" he said; "but it appears to be at some considerable distance."

"Is she keeping in our course, think you?"

"I cannot tell that," replied Turpin. "I am not yet used to it. I would advise you to take the glass yourself. I can point in the right direction."

"I will do so," said the smuggler king, throwing down his oar. "Ha!" he added, as he saw the chase. "She has lost us, I believe. She is tacking about, first here, then there. Hurrah! No, she sees us, by Jove, and is coming dead in our wake!"

"Never mind that," he continued, addressing his men. "We are close to the land now, and they are in the rear considerably. Pull again, as you have pulled before. It will be high tide then, and we shall escape them without difficulty.

Upon hearing the assurance that the distance to the shore was insignificant, the men plied their oars with right good will.

Then came another discharge from the revenue ship.

Assuredly this was for no other purpose than to show them the position of the vessel of which they were in chase.

But it served much better to show the smugglers the exact position of their enemy.

She was fearfully close.

The smugglers still rowed on. It would have been the height of impolicy for them to have made any demonstration in reply to this discharge, which certainly harmed them not in the least.

Five minutes of the most intense anxiety elapsed.

Then the smuggler chief spoke to his men in a tone of relief.

"Down with the sail, lads! We are ashore. Row slowly. Take care, helmsman, keep her clear."

Then the highwaymen became conscious that the little vessel drifted into a cavern.

Its sides grated against the rocks.

Then a shrill whistle came from the captain's lips, and the door in the rocks which we have before mentioned swung open.

When the smugglers took their departure it was low tide.

Then the door was dry, and they had to walk some little distance along the sand before they reached the sea.

Now it was high tide, and the water had risen until it was on a level with this curiously-contrived door.

To Dick and Tom's great surprise, the water was in the passage beyond also, and the boat shot through the opening of the rocks into it.

Then the door was closed.

Of course the darkness was most profound.

The voice of the smuggler king arose.

"Lights! lights here!" he said. "Be quick some of you. A torch here!"

In a minute or so half-a-dozen torches were lighted, and as they fairly burst into a flame, revealed all objects in the rocky passage.

The scene was picturesque in the extreme.

Our friends observed that the floor of the passage rose rapidly, so that the water did not reach more than twelve or fifteen feet into the passage.

The depth of the water in the last two or three feet was consequently insignificant, and the men at once leaped out of the boat.

Our friends did so likewise.

The water only rose just above their ankles, and in two or three steps they reached dry ground.

They would not have been human if they had not felt rejoiced at this miraculous escape, for if the smuggler's haunt had been less cleverly contrived than it was, they would, beyond a doubt, have been destroyed by the coast-guard.

As it was, they were quite safe.

To the crew on board the revenue ship their disappearance must have borne the appearance of magic.

As they all stood in the passage in a dense throng they heard distinctly the boom—boom of the guns, while, at frequent intervals, a loud report reached their ears.

But the smugglers were quite out of their reach now.

Slowly and silently—the smuggler king himself taking the lead, the little party made their way along the passage into the large cavern.

Here a huge fire was blazing.

It was most welcome, for the men were, one and all, cold, hungry, tired, and wet.

They hastened their steps.

Then reaching the fire, which was burning in the centre of the cavern, they threw themselves wearily upon the ground around it, their chief setting the example.

Turpin and King were glad enough to do the same. They felt what they had gone through much more severely than their companions, because they were so unused to it.

In fact they, as well as every one there present, were dreadfully fatigued.

CHAPTER LXVII.

THE HISTORY OF TOM KING, THE HIGHWAYMAN.

No one spoke.

A deep gloom seemed to overshadow the hearts and countenances of all present.

On the face of the smuggler chief this feeling was plainly perceptible, but there was mingled with it one of rage.

More than one-half of the men who had looked up to him as their master were now at the bottom of the sea.

One of his beautiful fast-sailing cutters, too, was destroyed.

Truly had that been a bad night's work for him. Never before in all their career had they met with such a terrible reverse, but yet they ought to have anticipated such a thing occurring.

In the morning that portion of the silk which was in the boat in the rocky passage was unloaded and stored away in a place designed for its reception until such time as it could be safely disposed of.

Turpin and King took their share of this work along with the crew.

When it was over they both repaired to a small chamber in the cavern side which had been fitted up for their use.

The apartment, if it could be dignified by such a name—was not much more than eight feet square.

It was, however, made very comfortable.

The rugged walls were covered with cloth, and on the floor was a thick matting.

Two large lamps illumined it.

In one corner was a rude bed.

Our friends threw themselves wearily upon it.

For a moment or so there was a silence, but then Tom King spoke.

His voice showed that he was in anything but an amiable frame of mind.

His face as well bore testimony to the same thing.

"I tell you what it is, Dick. This sort of thing may be all very well, but hang me if I like it."

"Why, what's the matter, Tom?"

"Matter—enoughs the matter, I rather think. Who would fancy the idea of living here in this style without seeing daylight? I can tell you I don't."

"Well, you needn't be so ill-tempered about it."

"But I am."

"So I see. Now, what is it you have got on your mind? Out with it, my friend!"

"Oh! nothing but what I say. I don't like the idea of being shut up here in this manner, and only going out at night in a boat to stand a chance of having your boat sunk without being able to do anything in your own defence."

"Nor I," said Dick; "but I have made no remark about it, because I didn't exactly see how it was to be helped."

"Surely, my friend, you don't think of staying here for ever," said Tom King, starting up.

"Lie down again, do, and don't excite yourself. I only intend to stay here until I see a chance of getting away."

"I am glad you have had enough of the smuggling business."

"I have, I can assure you. There is nothing daring about it."

"Daring, indeed, I should think not. It's quite contemptible!"

"And yet you must, I think, admit that the chief displayed both skill and courage in the managment of affairs last night. Our escape is entirely owing to him."

"It is, I admit, but still for all that I don't like the notion of being here or under the command of any one."

"Ha! ha! Tom. You've let the cat out of the bag! That's where the shoe pinches, is it?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that the chief reason you don't like being here is because you do not believe in having any other master than yourself."

"That has a great deal to do with it, I confess. I like my liberty, and be free to go where I like and do what I like."

"So does every one. But seriously speaking, Tom, I do assure you that if you had not broached this affair I should have done so."

"Should you?"

"Yes, and I have arranged at the first opportunity we could find to give our friends the smugglers the slip."

"You know I am willing now, then. But how is it to be done?"

"Ah! that's what puzzles me. To get back through the vaults into Durley Chine is out of the question, for I know part of the band are always there on the watch."

"I know that, but then the same thing applies to the other outlet—I mean the passage leading to the seashore; men are always stationed there on guard."

"That's true enough; but now you must recollect the smugglers have lost half their number, so they will not be able to post so many sentinels as they did."

"To be sure not."

"It remains then for us to find which is the weakest guarded, the passage or the vaults."

"Exactly."

"I have thought the matter over, and I came to the conclusion that it was only in one way we could hope with any reason to achieve our object."

"And how is that?"

"Wait until the smugglers set out on another expedition, and manage so as to be left behind. We will then contrive to overcome what sentries there are, and be off!"

"Just so," said Tom King, somewhat appeased; "just so; or it might happen that we were left sentries ourselves!"

"It might, but I think it scarcely likely. However, I think, having said what we have, we have said all we can, and nothing now remains for us to do but wait for the course of events."

"Evidently that will be the best, and the sooner we can get off the better I shall be pleased."

"And so shall I. What a delightful thing a gallop along a nice country lane would be, would it not?"

"Oh! hold your noise. Don't talk about such things without you want to drive a fellow wild."

"But after all, Tom, I am sure there can be no life to equal a life on the road."

"No, none. Hurrah for the road! a fine night, a good nag, and plenty of money!"

"Yes. Now, look here; while we are in this cavern it is quite evident we cannot enjoy the pleasure of being on the road; but I'll tell you what will be a good substitute."

"What?"

"Why, just tell me your adventures. Recollect, you are under a promise to do so, and we shan't have a much better chance than we have now."

"No, perhaps not."

"Begin then; I am all attention, I assure you.

"I have given my word," said Tom King, and his voice grew bitter and melancholy as he spoke, as though the past called up anything but pleasing thoughts in his mind; "I have given my word, but I do assure you I shrink from fulfilling it."

"No, no! Hang it all, you must not do that. Now, Tom, don't be so downhearted as you seem, but lead off in good spirits."

"That would be a sheer impossibility, Dick; I could not do it. The events of the past are too sad for me ever to be in good spirits when I think of or relate them."

"You interest me, Tom, very much. There is a tone of pathos in your words which moves me exceedingly. I am ten times more anxious to hear your story than before, so really you must not disappoint me. There is another thing that makes me very curious also."

"What is that?"

"Why, you are not, like me, a rough sort of chap. Your hands and feet and ears are small—sure signs, either in men or horses, of high breeding. Your skin, too, is soft and delicate. There is the air of a gentleman about you, though I give you credit for, in a general way, disguising it pretty well. but it is so, nevertheless."

"Oh! stop, stop."

But, heeding the interruption, Dick went on—

"You, besides, are a capital scholar. You can read and write, and you often have, when you speak, a mode of expressing yourself which can only have been acquired by long intercourse with people of highly-cultivated intellect and careful study of the works of our best writers."

Tom smiled when his comrade ceased, but it was in a sickly fashion.

"Really, Dick," he said, "you will make me out presently, I shouldn't wonder, to be what our friend the smuggler king thinks I am—namely, a nobleman in disguise. Ha! ha!"

"Now, it's no good your trying to get up a laugh with such a face as that on, so give up the attempt at once."

"But it is most amusing. I did not think, though, that you had studied me so closely as you appear to have done."

"Nor have I studied you, but it would be scarcely possible for anyone with powers of observation to be with you so constantly as I have without perceiving just what I have perceived."

"Indeed!" said Tom, "then I must have been very clumsy."

"Clumsy? What do you mean?"

"Well, Dick, my friend, I have promised to tell you the story of my life, and I will not go back from my word. Therefore, I may as well confess that I have acted a part, so your surmises are correct; but I have acted my part clumsily, or else you would not have seen what you have."

There was some chagrin in the tones in which Tom King pronounced these words, as though he was scarcely pleased to find his companion had observed so much.

Turpin noticed it, but made no remark.

He was too anxious to hear what might fall from Tom's lips, in the shape of a narrative, to jeopardize its relation by anything he might say or do.

Therefore he remained silent, and waited for his comrade to commence.

But King seemed to have fallen into a deep reverie.

The past, with all its joys, disappointed hopes, dark sorrows and regrets, was flooding back upon his soul.

His face grew pale and then assumed an expression of such pain and mournfulness, that Turpin, as he perceived it, half repented that he had touched a chord which had produced so powerful an effect upon his friend.

He said as much to him, and then added—

"But, Tom, do you not think that the mere narration of your troubles to me will ease your mind."

"It might do so. I cannot tell."

"You will be sure of meeting with true sympathy."

"I am aware of that, and therefore, if you will listen, I will commence, and when I have done I will ask you whether I have not been 'more sinned against than sinning?'"

Turpin changed his position to one that commanded a view of his friend's countenance.

Then, after a few moments' silent reflection, as though he were considering which was the best point at which to begin, Tom King began in a voice that was unsteady with emotion, to relate that which he had never before breathed to a human being—the story of his life.

As he proceeded, the tristful expression of his face communicated itself to his friend's, and Turpin listened to one of the most extraordinary narratives that he had ever heard.

It was full of interest.

In the succeeding chapter it is given in Tom King's own words.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

OUR FRIENDS ARE FAR FROM SATISFIED WITH THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SMUGGLERS—THE STORM.

"You will in a moment understand the reluctance which I feel to begin this history, when I tell you that it will involve the exposure of my own deep, great, and everlasting shame.

"The story shall be told in as few words as possible.

"Over many and many an acre of fertile English soil stretch the domains of the Marquis of Belgard. Large tracts in the counties of York, Durham, Cumberland, and Somerset are owned by him.

"It is not, however, of the present marquis that I am about to speak, but his father and mother.

"The latter was a woman who was loved by all who saw her. All those qualities which are precious in the female sex were hers in excess. Gentleness, devotion unselfishness, virtue and beauty are the names of a few of them.

"Her husband, the marquis, I do not remember save in a dreamy way, which is perhaps more owing to talking and thinking much about him than actual recollection.

"However, from my earliest years I can remember the marchioness. She was my mother!"

The voice of the highwaymen failed him. He tried to go on, but could not.

Turpin's astonishment was intense.

"The marchioness your mother?" he exclaimed. "Good heavens, is it possible? By what strange mutation of fortune did you become a highwayman? You, the son of a nobleman of one of the highest ranks?"

"You may well ask those questions," said Tom King, subduing his emotion. "It seems impossible, does it not? but it is true, and in the tale I have to tell you the whole will be explained.

"I was barely two years old when my father, the Marquis of Belgard, died. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that I retain only an indistinct and confused impression of what he was like. But my mother—my dear mother—whom I loved a thousand times more than mothers usually are loved, I can recollect always. It is not three years since she died. Sorrow and shame broke her gentle heart."

King again found it necessary to clear his throat.

"From my infancy until I reached my eighteenth year, I lived with her a most retired life at a mansion on the marquis's estates in Cumberland. We saw scarcely any visitors; the only ones, in fact, were the family of the Earl of Standon, who had some estates adjoining ours.

"But one thing occurred that at all disturbed the monotony of my life.

"I loved.

"It seems strange, no doubt, to you, Dick, to hear me say that I loved, as a young and ardent spirit deprived of all society can love, earnestly, fondly, truly.

"The object of this adoration was the eldest daughter of the Earl of Standon. Her name was Charlotte.

"You will not have patience to hear me describe her; nor have I the mind to do it. To a lover, his mistress is perfection. Such was Charlotte in my eyes.

"The love I had for her was returned. It was sanctioned, too, by our parents, who looked forward to our union with undissembled pleasure.

"She was little more than one year my junior—that is to say, eighteen—the age when the personal attractions of a woman are at their full.

"We had many and many times repeated those lines of Shakspere, to the effect that the 'course of true love never did run smooth;' and never did so without referring to our own case, which seemed to prove the falsity of the assertion.

"But soon a time came for us to feel its truth.

"And now I have to tell you that about my father which will brand him with infamy.

"My mother was not his wife.

"Do not misunderstand me. She was no leman. The ceremonies of the church united them; but he had another wife alive.

"She was far, far below him in station. A poor girl, in fact, with whom, when a young man, he had fallen desperately in love, and whom he secretly married.

"A son was born.

"His eldest son.

"You are beginning to see now what is coming.

"However, to return. In a little time my father tired of this first wife. He had seen my mother. She was lovely—she was rich. He loved her.

"Of his marriage with the village girl no one knew a syllable. He had kept it a profound secret.

"Now he thought he would put an end to it altogether.

"It would seem he laid a plot for her destruction, and actually lured her into the snare, but she with her child managed to escape.

"She disappeared.

"No one heard anything of her; no trace could be discovered.

"Then the marquis married my mother.

"I am the fruit of that union.

"At length, just as I was about to attain my twentieth year, the news came to us that my father had been married before, and that he had a son, the issue of that marriage, who was the heir to the whole of the estates.

"This tale at first my mother resolutely disbelieved, but it came out in evidence—for, of course the matter went to trial—that a woman who had for years lived among all the poverty and crime of London, had sworn upon her dying bed that she was Marchioness of Belgard.

"This story was at first not listened to, but she produced a marriage register, the authenticity of which was beyond dispute.

"In her last moments she swore that the love she had for her unworthy husband was the sole reason that she had not divulged the secret before, and that now she felt compelled to do it in justice to her son.

"Her son was found.

"He, so far as could be learned, was a most disreputable character, but that mattered nothing—he was the heir.

"Of course I need not tell you that the verdict was pronounced in his favour.

"The shock broke my mother's heart. She died as soon as the intelligence was brought to her.

"Thus suddenly—unexpectedly—I became an orphan and an outcast!

"Naturally enough I sped to pour out my troubles upon the breast of her I loved, and who had by the most solemn vows swore an undying love for me. I sought her; I found her.

"Fool! insensate fool I was! But I was young then, and believed woman what she seemed. I ought to have known that now she would find her affection for me suddenly cooled down, but I did not for a moment entertain the thought that she would prove false. I should have as soon believed the sun's rays were cold!

"It is not needful for me to relate the particulars of the interview I had with her. Let it suffice to say she found she loved me no longer; her friends would never consent to her union with me, she said.

"False, hollow-hearted woman! true type of her deceitful sex. It was the position I should have given her that she loved and longed to have—not me.

"I was foolish enough to upbraid her; I knew no better then.

"Already was I guilty of the greatest crime of which the titled and the rich are cognizant—I was poor!

"Completely crushed at thus beholding my dearest hopes foredone, I fled, fled I knew not, cared not whither. All I sought was oblivion from thought.

"Vain search—I found it not.

"But, as time elapsed, the violence of my anguish became less, and I was able to think a little of my position.

"I hated—hated with a fierce, bitter, burning hatred—all mankind!

"I ought to mention that the true heir to the estates offered to me a sum of money and a small estate, but my pride would not suffer me to come forward and be known. I fled—disappeared.

"The place to which I directed my steps was London.

"Day after day, in that mighty wilderness, did I wander about, having no aim, no object.

"By great good luck, I had a considerable sum in my possession, as well as valuables in the shape of jewelry, which represented as much more.

"On this I lived.

"It was in a dark, old-fashioned inn in Coldbath Fields that I took up my temporary abode. I lighted upon the place by accident.

"One wintry afternoon, as I was sitting in the dreary taproom, there came in two persons.

"Having nothing else to occupy me, I lifted up my eyes as they entered, and there was something so peculiar, or, more properly speaking, remarkable about them that I regarded them with the greatest interest.

"The one who entered first was in height, shape, feature, everything a man could be. He united, without incongruity, the grace and beauty of Apollo with the strength and frame of Hercules.

"His costume well befitted him. It had a dash about it that harmonized well with his bearing.

"His companion was very different.

"The style, too, in which they were dressed was similar, but there all likeness ceased between them.

"This second man was rather short and very slightly made.

"Both sat down.

"The first comer drew a chair up to the fire, and threw himself into it with a grace both rare and admirable.

"The other, in a quiet way, sat down upon the screen.

"The landlord seemed to know both well. They chatted and laughed together for some moments.

"Suddenly, however, I heard the rapid trampling of horses' feet in the street.

"The next moment at least a dozen men rushed into the room.

"'Hurrah!' they shouted. 'Here they are! On them, my men!'

"A most deadly struggle now ensued.

"The new comers, I saw, were police officers.

"But it was not possible for such an unequal contest to continue long.

"The first comer had drawn a sword, which he used with terrible effect.

"But, knowing victory was out of the question, he turned to fly, and called to his comrade to follow his example.

"Then was performed the most daring feat I ever saw or heard of.

"This man, hemmed in, surrounded as he was by foes, took one terrific leap, and, to my unutterable amazement, went clear through the window into the street.

"There was a struggle outside for a second, and then all was still.

"He had escaped.

"But his companion was not so fortunate.

"He was caught and securely handcuffed, and then led off.

"Those two men were Claude Duval and Sixteen-stringed Jack!

CHAPTER LXIX.

THE STORM—THE NIGHT EXCURSION—THE MINUTE GUN—THE WRECK OF THE MERCHANTMAN.

"CLAUDE DUVAL and Sixteen-stringed Jack?" repeated Dick Turpin, in the utmost surprise. "Can it be really possible? And egad! Yes, it must be, for jumping through the window in that fashion was just like Claude. Jack, you say, was captured?"

"He was."

"Now look here, Tom, I have let you tell your history so far without attempting to interrupt you. One surprise, in fact, follows so close upon another, that you fairly take away my breath; but when you mentioned two such celebrated individuals, I could not help breaking in."

King smiled.

"I did not notice it at the time, but now I do remember, you did not utter a word either in the way of question or comment."

"That I certainly did'nt, but it has all got to come."

"Do not let us recur to it! You know enough to make you aware that it cannot be a pleasant topic for me to discuss. I have been led away by my feelings to say, perhaps, more than I ought to have said, and my narrative is doubtless somewhat incoherent. Still, for all that, my friend, I think I have been sufficiently explicit to make you understand it, and, such being the case, say no more, for when I speak of it it always unmans me."

"Tom, my friend, I have a greater respect for you since I have heard your story than ever I had before. You have been hardly used by fate, and it is a thousand pities for a generous, noble nature like yours to be turned to gall!"

"When I reflect upon the past and think of what I might have been—what there appeared to be every human probability of my becoming, one of the proudest of England's peers, and then think what I am—a highwayman, a breaker of the public peace, and destined for an ignominious end—I feel as though I was going mad, and for that reason I strive, as much as possible, to banish thought and the remembrance of past, present, and future."

"And only natural that you should do so. I have not heard the sequel to your story, but I can easily enough imagine it. You found no other course open to you, so you took to the road, as many another gallant heart has done before you."

"Well, well, let us say no more about that."

"And there is one question I would fain ask on the score of curiosity."

"What is it?"

"May I ask it?"

"Certainly."

"It is, what became of Lady Charlotte?"

"Lady Charlotte?"

"Yes."

"Did I not tell you?"

"No."

"Ha! ha! I thought I did! I said it was the name and title that she loved, and, ha! ha! ha! she won them, too!"

"Now, pray, Tom, for the sake of my nerves, don't laugh in that horrible, discordant fashion again. You have positively set all my teeth on edge. Don't disguise your mind from me now you have told me so much. Be yourself, I beg; you were never born with the capabilities of acting that which you do not feel."

"I have long felt that, Dick. But, however, to answer your question. Lady Charlotte, who professed so much affection for me, cast me off, as I said, and married the true heir."

"Then, Tom, the thought that you have escaped from the clutches of such a heartless being ought to make you rejoice; for, depend upon it, she is one of those girls who will never make any man happy."

"I have struggled with all my might against my passion for her, and, unworthy as she has proved, believe me, Dick, so firm a hold has she taken of my affections, that I love her even now."

"It is infatuation."

"You may call it what you choose, the fact remains unaltered. I love her still."

"Then yours must, indeed, be strong affection."

"And yet I feel I hate her—hate her, and the whole of her accursed sex."

"Ah, then, there you are wrong. I will never consent to believe that all women have dispositions like her, and would act as she has done. Rather would I cling to the conviction that she is all that is pure, all that is good in human nature."

"Then is human nature most impure and bad if it is so? There is not one who knows of love and virtue, save by name, and who would not barter everything they possess for lucre."

"I see very plain," said Dick, "it is quite folly for us to speak upon that subject, so I say by all means let it drop. I have faith in woman's goodness, you have not. Time will show which of us is in the right."

"It will. But Dick, mark my words, and I speak in all solemn seriousness, so sure as ever you are fond enough of a woman to trust her, she will betray you. Mark me if she does not."

"Pho, pho, Tom. You are in a gloomy humour. I can see it will be best not to touch upon that portion of your history. How did you know who the two persons were who came into the public-house at Coldbath-fields?"

"The landlord."

"Oh!"

"And he it was who, after gathering some inkling of my history, persuaded me to try my fortune on the road."

"And the best thing for you, since it is the only thing you could have done and continued a gentleman."

"Well Dick, to go on, Claude Duval, as I told you, escaped; and not only that, he contrived to rescue his pal Jack before the officers were halfway to Newgate."

"Bravo, Claude! Well, go on, I like to hear about him. The ladies' highwayman, as they always called him."

"Well, to my great surprise, in less than half-an-hour both highwaymen came into the public-house again, looking just as though nothing at all had happened."

'Capital! Of course the officers would not think of coming straight back to where they started."

"They didn't. The landlord introduced me, and the result of it was that I joined them in their very next expedition."

"Did you though, by Jove! Ah! Tom, I would give something if I could only call Claude and Jack pals, but there's no chance of that now, is there?"

"Very little."

"What surprises me is that you should have known them and not me."

"It is rather singular, but I was only with them a short time. So many were on the look-out for them that they were compelled to run over on to the continent to avoid being taken, and since then I have not heard of them."

"Nor I."

"I lent them all the assistance in my power, and saw them safely aboard the vessel. They wanted me to go too, but somehow I have a most insurmountable dislike of leaving England, so I remained."

"And so have I," said Dick; "I was born in it, and I hope I shall die in it."

"Oh, don't talk about dying, I beg."

"I won't if it don't please you; but go on and finish my life."

"Ah! do."

"When I saw them safely off I was entirely thrown upon my own resources, but they had let me into the secrets of the profession, so I made no doubt about getting on all right. I was most prosperous, and had not long been acting for myself when I met you."

"Nor had I, as you know. I think we must have begun somewhere about the same time. If anything, you were first."

"Very likely."

"But in one respect I do envy you exceedingly."

"And what is that?"

"Why, having been a companion of Claude Duval's. I have the highest opinion of his gallantry and courage, and I only hope that I shall some day meet with him."

"It is likely enough you will have your wish. I should never be surprised to hear he had come back to England, for it is not in his nature, any more than it is in mine, to lead an inactive life, and one devoid of excitement."

"I only hope I may see them both, and, what is more, that all four of us may have many a startling and wild adventure between us."

"Well now, Dick, I do think you ought to confess yourself satisfied. You know my former history; you can account for what little peculiarities you may have observed. You see, too, to what I am reduced by a father's villainy."

"I do; but it is an unfortunate thing that in this world the innocent party in an affair of that sort gets the greatest share of the misfortunes and disagreeables to put up with, and in that case yours is only a case of many."

"You are right enough there."

"Then it ought to be some consolation for you to be aware that you are not singled out to be different to your fellows. The consolation is a poor one, I daresay."

"It is; and no one but those who have indulged in such hopes for future happiness with the one they love can form any idea how hard it is to be bereft of all."

"Yes, I can, Tom. I can easily imagine it."

"But, even if you do, imagination must fall far short of reality. But come, let us, before we separate, make up our minds what we are to do."

"You mean with respect to the smugglers?"

"Exactly."

"Then I do not think we can do better than to make the attempt to get left behind, under some pretext or other, when the rest go out on an excursion, and then do our best towards making an escape."

"I think that would be the best. As for this life, I am thoroughly sick of it, and the sooner a change occurs the better I shall be pleased."

"It will not do, however, to be too precipitate. They are much stronger in point of numbers than we are, and it would be the height of folly for us to throw away our lives unnecessarily."

"Of course it would, and I should not counsel such a thing for a moment: but what I mean to say, do not let a chance slip by."

"Oh, there is no fear of my doing that, for I can tell you I am most anxious to rejoin my mare Black Bess."

"Ah, yes, she is in the grounds above."

"She is, and, while there, is perfectly safe, for she will be able to find plenty in the shape of green-meat to live upon; but what I am afraid of is, that she may stray away, be seen, and captured."

"That would be a loss indeed."

"It would—a most irreparable loss; but still, I do not much fear this, only it might occur, and when I think of it I always get uneasy."

"Just so. I am glad there is something to tempt you to get away."

"You think I shall find an opportunity all the sooner?"

"I do. The first one will, I hope, be seized upon and made use of by you."

"Never fear but it will. No long time can elapse without our accomplishing our aim."

"Yes, after all, as Claude Duval used to say, 'there's no life like a life on the road.'"

"And he was quite right. How glad I should be if at this moment I could take him by the hand, as I do you, and call him friend."

"I should wonder if you don't one of these days. Many unlikelier things have happened."

CHAPTER LXX.

DICK TURPIN DEFEATS THE DESIGNS OF THE SMUGGLERS, AND TOM KING SAVES A LIFE.

A WEEK elapsed.

Seven entire days; and during that time nothing had occurred to at all disturb the monotony of our friends' existence, nor had a chance offered itself of putting their design into execution.

Tom King was vexed and impatient.

But it was no good for him to chafe. There he was, and there he was obliged to be.

And in this interval scarce one of the smugglers had left the cave, and no other run of goods had been attempted.

The Snake, the smuggler chief, by some inexplicable means, had learned, had with much difficulty managed to get back to port.

The week had been chiefly spent by our friends in taking their share of the work.

In groping about the cavern, Tom King had come across several articles which greatly called forth his surprise; so he pocketed them, and showed them to Dick, who was as much surprised as he.

From these articles but one inference could be drawn, and that was, the smuggler king was not a smuggler only, but something worse.

Our friends became much more circumspect.

And so a whole week glided away.

Towards midnight on the eighth day, a fearful storm arose which increased in fury and violence every moment.

The howling of the wind, the rumbling of the thunder, the hoarse dash of the waves against the coast, could be heard with great distinctness in the cavern.

Nearly all, Turpin and King included, were seated round the fire, chatting and laughing with each other.

While thus engaged, there came upon their ears a prolonged wailing cry.

All started to their feet.

The highwaymen, because they wondered what such a sound meant.

The smugglers, because they recognised it as a signal.

The chief drew one or two of his crew aside, and spoke to them in a whisper.

Their eyes turned towards our friends.

Evidently, then, they were the subject of that mysterious whispered conversation.

The remainder of the smugglers, however, moved quickly about the cavern, and began encasing themselves in the tarpaulins.

Tom King was overjoyed when he perceived this, and catching Turpin by the arm, he whispered:

"Hurrah! They are going out on an excursion to-night, and we shall have a chance of bidding them good-bye!"

"They are preparing to go certainly," replied Turpin; "but whether we shall have a chance of getting off is more than I can tell. Look, the chief has got a couple of men with him, and they are talking about us I am confident, for their eyes every moment turn this way."

"Is it likely, I wonder, that he suspects us of our design?"

"I cannot tell! If he does we shall have to look after ourselves."

"Can you hear the storm, Dick? It is most fearful! Does not their leaving the cavern on such a night as this seem confirmatory of our suspicions?"

"It does—it does, indeed; and yet I hope we are mistaken. I have always admired the chief as a brave man, but if what you hint at is true, I shall be unable to think so any longer."

"You would. It is the most abhorrent of all crimes."

At this moment the smuggler king called for our two friends to approach him.

They did so.

"We are going out on an excursion to-night in which none but old salts will be of service. We shall, therefore, be compelled to leave you here in charge of the caverns."

At this unexpected slice of good luck, our friends had to conceal their exultation.

Turpin spoke.

"That is just as you think fit," he said. "Of course you know in what way we shall be of the greatest service to you, and we will obey your instructions."

"Good," said the smuggler king. "We leave you in trust of the place, and you will be responsible for it and all that it contains."

"You won't have to complain of us," said Dick; "but shall we be left the sole guard of the place?"

"Yes, with the exception of Willis, who is in the cavern above with the casks, and Peters, who keeps guard at the door in the rock."

"Very good, then. What time do you leave?"

"Immediately. My men are nearly all ready. As soon as they are we are off."

The smuggler chief left our friends as he spoke.

Tom King with difficulty restrained himself from making some extravagant manifestations of delight.

Had they had the arranging of things themselves they could scarcely have made them better.

The smugglers, who were now reduced to eight men, exclusive of the two on guard and our friends, placed themselves in rank and followed their chief across the cavern.

Tramp, tramp, they could hear their feet along the rocky passage.

At last all was still.

The two highwaymen were alone.

"I think," said Tom King, "that the first thing we do shall be to take off these clothes we have on and don our own. What say you?"

"Oh, do so, by all means. If we are to go on the road again it won't do to have such things as these on."

"Certainly not. Come, then, I know where they are. Everything is ready—pistols and all."

"Bravo, Tom; I don't wonder at your anxiety to be off. Really this being shut up in the dark is quite dreadful."

"It is to me. But let us change our dresses without any more delay."

In a few minutes afterwards our friends returned to the outer cavern, and looking like themselves.

Still they paused and hesitated as to what they should do. They were, besides, desirous of not losing any chance they might have by precipitation.

They waited, therefore, for a considerable time, so that the smugglers would have time to get fairly off.

From his vest pocket Dick produced Captain Nidget's gold chronometer, and, looking at the dial, found the fingers pointed to twenty minutes to two.

"I think we may venture now, Tom," said Turpin; "but I have for the last few moments been thinking over the manner in which we are to leave this place, whether by the passage or the vaults above."

"Well——"

"I think, taking all things into consideration, it will be best for us to make our way out by the passage."

"Why?"

"Not only is it nearest, but I confess I am most curious to know whether those suspicions we have against the smuggler chief are well grounded."

"I should like to know, too, so we will go by the passage. At any rate, we shall be able to see what he is after. It is nothing very good, or he would not have left us here."

Something, doubtless, of which he guessed we should not approve. Now, my friend, are you ready?"

"Quite ready, and more than willing."

"Follow me then!"

So saying, Dick strode across the cave in the direction of the entrance to the passage, and, drawing aside the thick curtain which was hung over the opening, both entered it.

"Tread cautiously, Dick," whispered Tom King; "recollect there is the man Peters on guard at the door, and he might be able to raise an alarm."

"Fear nothing! Let your hand slide over the wall as you go on; we shall be all right then."

The passage was in the profoundest darkness, at least that portion of it in which they now were. The guard would, of course, be likely to have a light, but the place was so serpentine that they could see nothing of it.

With the greatest of care the highwaymen crept forward, but, in spite of all their efforts, they could not avoid making an occasional slight noise.

Presently Turpin stopped, and, turning round to Tom King, said—

"This man on guard! What shall we do with him?"

"Knock him on the head!"

"I hardly like doing that. I should prefer, if possible, taking him prisoner and not doing him any further injury, unless he should make so desperate a resistance as to make it unavoidable."

"Well—well, as you like. Only take care he don't give an alarm."

"I'll look out for that. Peters is a very decent fellow, and I daresay when he knows we are resolved, he will submit to being bound without making any resistance."

"Then, if such is the case, I say walk boldly forward and tell him so."

"We will, but I should like to make my appearance as suddenly as possible, so as not to give him time either for action or reflection."

"Then you must be silent, for I fancy we must be close to him. Cannot you hear his voice?"

"Yes, he is singing a song, poor fellow, I daresay he finds it very lonely sitting there by himself!"

Tom King made no reply, and both, with the utmost caution and silence, crept forward.

The horrible din of the tempest could be heard much plainer in the passage than in the cavern, and at every step they took the sound became more audible.

But hark! another sound mingles with the tempest's roar. It is one which causes the two highwaymen to suddenly come to a halt.

Boom! boom! boom!

That was the sound.

Dull—muffled.

Coming at short but regular intervals.

Boom! boom! boom!

"It's the minute gun!" said Dick; "some vessel in distress is off the coast."

"Yes; hark! there it comes again."

In the intervals of the storm they again heard the sullen report of the signal gun.

"God help them," said Turpin, "if the wind has blown them on the rocks! When we were out that night I thought, as I looked around, what a fearfully dangerous place it must be for vessels, and how little chance of escape they would have if a storm should overtake them in that spot."

"Quick, my friend, forward! Let us dispose of Peters, and make our way on to the beach. Who knows what service we may be to the crew and passengers?"

"Who, indeed? Certainly we shall be able to render them some assistance."

After taking about a dozen more steps, they paused again.

It was where the passage took an abrupt turn to the right.

Turpin being first, leaned forward, and peeped round the corner.

By the light of a torch which was stuck in the wall, he saw Peters, sitting upon a fragment of rock, and chaunting some snatches of an old sea ditty.

He had evidently not heard their approach.

Uttering a loud and fearful yell, which sounded with great effect in the vaulted passage, Dick Turpin sprang forward, and grasping Peters by the throat, bore him to the earth, and made him a prisoner before he could recover from his surprise at the sudden attack made upon him.

CHAPTER LXXI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN ENCOUNTER GREAT DANGER IN THEIR PHILANTHROPIC AND RETRIBUTIVE EXPEDITION.

"Don't struggle, Peters," said Turpin. "You have nothing to fear, only we are determined not to stay here any longer; so off we go, and to do that we must overpower you, my friend. If you don't resist, you will come to no harm. If you do, you will get a crack on the head."

There is sufficient prudence in Peters's disposition to make him see the force of this reasoning, so he gave in at once, and suffered Tom King to bind him securely with a rope.

"There can be no blame laid to you, because all will know two men are a match for one, especially when taken at unawares. Your comrades will release you when they come back."

Not waiting to listen to what Peters had to say, our friends hastened to the door in the rocks, and removing the iron bar that was across it, pulled it open.

When they did so, they were for a moment or two perfectly blinded and deafened by the tremendous violence of the storm, which now burst upon them in full fury.

They stepped from the door on to the beach, which was quite dry, it then being only just about half tide.

Fain, however, were they to shelter themselves behind the rocks. They could not stand against the wind.

In this way they crept along for a considerable distance.

By screening themselves thus, and shading their eyes, our friends were able to look around them.

In front the sea was hissing, boiling, dashing, against the rocks.

Above the sky was covered with a dense black cloud

Behind was the mass of rocks, which rose up irregularly to a height of more than two hundred feet.

But as they happened to look back, both were astonished to see a bright light burning on the summit of the highest piece of rock.

It looked like the lantern of a lighthouse.

A broad beam of light streamed forth, and which must have been visible at an enormous distance.

Boom! boom!

The vessel in the offing still continued her signals of distress.

Dick placed his mouth close to Tom's ear, and spoke—

"Our suspicions are certainties. Look at that light! It is a false beacon, placed there by fiends in human shape to lure an unsuspecting vessel on the treacherous rocks. The smugglers are wreckers also, and this is their accursed work."

There was a terrible energy in the way these words were uttered.

Turpin's excitement knew no bounds.

Open, daring, bold, doing what he did do in the face of all, he detested treachery as such a nature only can detest it, and the proceedings of the wreckers, of whom he had often heard, filled him with abhorrence.

As we have hinted at, some days before Tom King had found in the cavern numerous little objects which had evidently come from a wreck.

This raised the suspicion in their minds that the band which they had joined were not smugglers merely, but wreckers also.

Some words which had been incautiously dropped by the crew strengthened them in the idea.

When Dick, therefore, saw from the upper crags a bright light streaming forth, he knew in a moment that it was a false beacon, put there to entice ships to their destruction.

He had heard enough about the proceedings of the wreckers to know that such a thing formed a chief part of their plan.

In a storm, those on board a vessel, seeing a light burning steadily ahead, would, of course, come to the conclusion that it had been placed there in order to guide them to a safe anchorage, or else mistake it for some other beacon which was well known to be in the vicinity.

By this means, then, the labouring vessel, struggling manfully against the storm, is urged on by the crew to her own ruin.

Then, too late, it is found that, so far from reaching a harbour of refuge, they have got entangled among the sharp granite rocks that guard the shores of England

It seems scarcely credible that human beings ever could act so base a part; but that it is so unfortunately there exists abundant proof.

The vessel, thus drawn close to the beach, strikes.

Then goes to pieces.

Her crew and cargo are at the mercy of the wreckers.

Boom! boom! boom!

Horribly distinct, horribly mournful, came to our friends' ears the dull roar of the minute gun.

Alas! for that brave ship, help there was none.

She had dashed in between two rocks, about half a mile from the shore, that were shaped like the protuberances upon a camel's back, and there struck.

To move her in the least was impossible.

Crash! crash! With a terrible grating sound the sides of the vessel at each rise and fall of the sea chafed against the rugged sides of the two rocks, whose jagged points ground her woodwork to powder.

Thrice had the hapless crew endeavoured to launch a boat, but each time failed.

Then they resigned themselves to their fate.

Weary and wet they thronged upon the forcastle of the ship, which happened to be highest out of the water, and there, clinging together, as though that would protect them, they waited for their doom.

In the meantime our friends crawled slowly onward, compelled in their course to clutch tightly the slippery rocks.

Both rejoiced in their hearts, though neither spoke, that they had made their escape as they had, and resolved to do their utmost to save any of the crew of the unfortunate vessel.

But ignorant of the ground as they were, and on a night so pitchy dark, they ran the gauntlet of a thousand dangers.

On no side, however, could they see or hear aught of the wreckers.

Further, further along the line of rock, which seemed to stretch right out in the channel, went the highwaymen.

Presently, however, they found they could not go any further without actually walking into the sea, and that, of course, was out of the question.

As far as they could see, the rock stretched seaward apparently for miles.

But where they stood there was a part much lower than the rest, not ten feet high in fact, and where it was not quite so precipitous.

It was quite evident that, if they wished to be of any assistance to the crew of the sinking vessel, they must in some way or other surmount the barrier, for it was from the other side of it that the signals came.

So close as they now were to the tumbling ocean speech was almost out of the question, so it was by signs that Dick made Tom aware he was about to make the attempt, full of peril as it was, to scale the wall.

The place though, they found upon a closer examination, favoured them exceedingly.

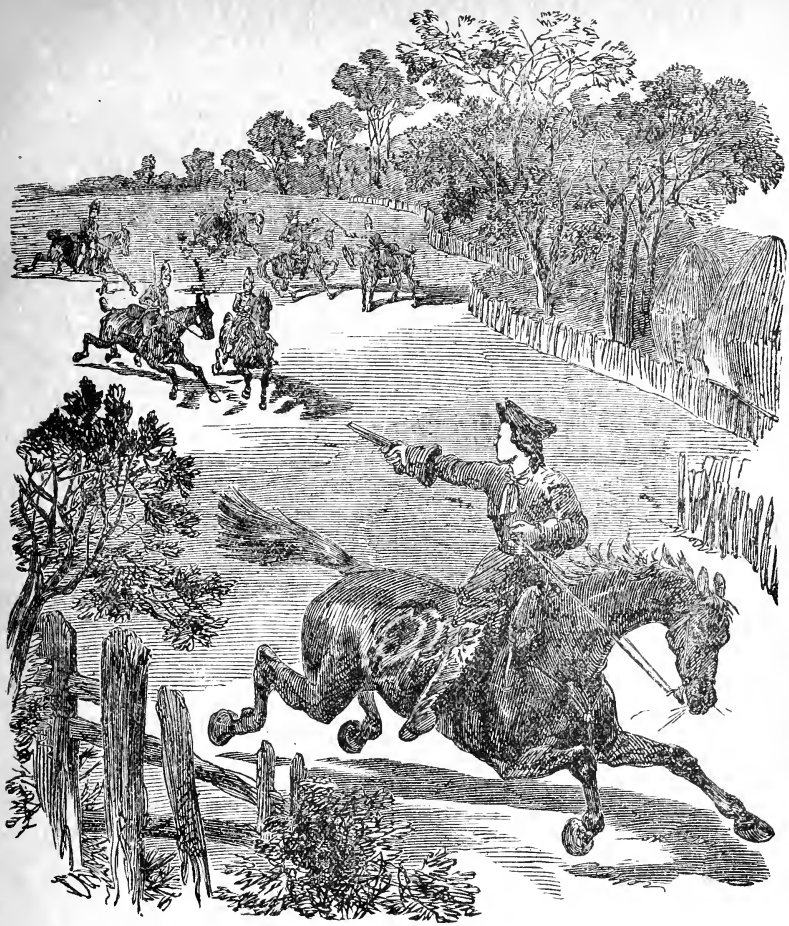
Several fragments were so disposed as to be almost like steps.

But they were wet with spray, and more slippery than ice.

Undismayed, however, by the seemingly insuperable obstacles which presented themselves, they resolutely struggled to obtain a footing upon the first of these fragments. After many and many a fall and futile effort they succeeded.

To get from this on to the next was a much easier task, and so on to the next, until at length they drew themselves up on to the wall of rocks.

But at the very moment they did so there came such a furious blast of wind from seaward that nothing could withstand, and Turpin and King suddenly felt themselves dashed from their feet and hold.



They gave themselves up for lost.

Fortunately, however, for them they were close to a ledge of rock, and it was against this they were thrown, instead of being swept off on to the beach.

But such was the force and suddenness of the shock that they were for some few minutes in a state of utter insensibility.

The sea spray very soon recovered them, though.

Their heads had gone with a dreadful thump against the rock, so their ideas were at first somewhat confused

[TOM KING IS CAPTURED BY THE DRAGOONS.]

Boom! boom! boom!

Those were the sounds that next came to their ears, and restored them to perfect consciousness.

Taking each other by the hand they crept forward on their hands and knees to the other side of the rocks, and having reached it, lay flat down upon their stomachs and peered over.

CHAPTER LXXII.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING FIND THAT MOST EFFECTIVE MEASURES HAVE BEEN TAKEN FOR THEIR CAPTURE.

A LOUD and fearfully startling cry of mortal agony greeted the ears of our two friends at this moment.

Above all the din of the contending elements it rose clearly, distinctly, and there was mingled with it a crashing sound of some strong body being torn asunder.

The vessel had gone to pieces on the rocks.

It was her parting timbers that made the sickening, crashing sound.

The highwaymen drew their breath short and thick.

Then they endeavoured to pierce the gloom before and below them.

Faintly—very faintly, they could see the sand.

But they were astonished to find that, though on the side upon which they had ascended the part of the rocky wall was not more than ten feet high, the other side where they so much wanted to be was as inaccessible to them as ever.

A sheer descent, not much under thirty feet in depth, was between them.

How they were to get down they knew not.

Suddenly, however, a bright light illumines the strand, and by its aid they can see things distinctly.

But fearing to be themselves seen, they crouch still closer to the rocks.

They saw the wreckers gliding about like spectres.

Compelled as they now were to remain simply spectators of what was about to take place, Turpin and King looked down with all-absorbing interest.

High and dry, beyond reach of the waves, was piled a heap of miscellaneous articles, which had been washed ashore already from the wreck.

Every time the waves broke upon the sands they brought with them some object, which was immediately seized and placed with the rest.

But to their unutterable horror they saw the smuggler chief himself with his drawn sword in his hand deliberately lying in wait for such of the crew as were washed ashore, and then dispatching them with his weapon.

Thus those who succeeded in escaping from the deep did so only to perish by the murderers' steel.

Then the body was dragged ashore.

Rifled of everything of the slightest value.

Afterwards consigned again to the deep.

It was a horrid sight, and the two highwaymen felt themselves grow fairly sick at heart and the blood stagnate in their veins.

The butchery continued.

Women, too, were served in the same ruthless manner.

But it was only while the first stunning sensation of horror was upon them that our friends could remain inactive while such deeds were perpetrated before their faces.

They raised themselves a little.

There was now a slight lull in the storm, which foretokened either a total cessation of its violence or a renewal of it.

Dick took the opportunity to speak.

"Tom—Tom!" he said, "I cannot stand this. Would you ever have believed the men with whom we have consorted were such fiends? Look, there is the chief. His sword is dripping with blood. By heavens, look again; there is a beautiful girl; see, he has struck her once, and the waves carry her away. Now they bring her back, and he strikes her a second blow. He drags her ashore. Monster, he shall rue this night and its unholy work."

"He shall, if we can but reach him," replied Tom King; "but I do not see how we are to do it. To jump down would be madness."

"It would; but if no other mode of reaching presents itself I shall risk it. I am determined to put an end to this butchery, and take such a vengeance on the actors in it as will be remembered long after we have both ceased to be."

"I think," said Tom, "now that the wind has gone down so much, we may manage to crawl along this wall, and find a place nearly inland, where we can drop with greater safety."

"Let us make the attempt, my friend; anything is preferable to remaining here. Would that I had been able to save the ship."

"It would have been a glorious deed, but it is no good thinking of what has taken place; let us see what good it now lies in our power to do!"

As he uttered this practical remark, Tom, who was nearest to the shore, began to creep slowly along the rocks.

It was an attempt full of danger.

Every part was wet with the sea-spray, and made it almost an impossibility to take a hold either by the hands or feet.

But, in a case of this sort, caution and perseverance will do wonders; and so, by slow degrees, our friends got further and further along the rock, without meeting with any other accident than bruising their flesh against the more rugged portions of it.

Ten minutes only served to carry them what, under ordinary circumstances, would be considered an insignificant distance.

To their joy, however, they reached a place where they thought they could with safety reach the beach.

Holding tight with their hands, they gradually lowered their bodies into the abyss, and then, letting go, dropped upon a flat place a few feet below them.

They repeated this process again, and reached a lower portion still.

From thence their descent to the sands was easy, and they made it in safety.

The storm had evidently reached its height, and was now rapidly subsiding. The wind came only in wayward gusts, and the waves became more tranquil. The clouds, too, dispersed, and a gentle, subdued light spread itself over the scene.

Drawing their swords, Turpin and King rushed forward.

The wreckers were still engaged in their frightful work.

But some portion, our friends found, had gone—most probably, they thought, back to the cavern, for they could see, besides the smuggler king himself, two of his men—that is, three in all.

The highwaymen, as our readers know, had fought against longer odds than these.

So, not attempting the least concealment, they called out to them to desist.

The smuggler recognized the voice, and he turned round with great suddenness.

Dick, who was thoroughly disgusted at his brutality, made a rush at him.

"Dastardly villain!" he cried, "I have discovered the full extent of your iniquity. Defend yourself, or, so sure as there is a heaven above us, I will cut you down!"

The smuggler king uttered a cry of rage, and his sword clashed against Dick Turpin's.

Tom, in the meantime, had attacked with great resolution the two men.

A most perfect master of the art of fence was Tom King. In happier times, when his position in life was far different to what it was now, he had made it a favourite study, and many a time since had he found it serve him in the hour of need.

On this occasion he was able to perform that most difficult of all feats with the sword—that is, to parry the cuts and thrusts of two antagonists, as well as deal them slashing cuts in return.

But still this was most dangerous, and he had great difficulty to prevent one getting behind him.

The feet of the fierce combatants sank deeply in the sand.

Backward and forward, round and round, now with their feet actually in the water, and anon far up the shore, they went, until at last, a favourable opportunity occurring, Tom caught one of his assailants such a blow upon the head that he fell down at once like a log of wood.

The other, furious at the fall of his comrade, fought with increased desperation, all the time crying loudly for his chief to come and aid.

But Turpin found that individual quite enough to do to defend himself without helping other people.

Single-handed, the other smuggler stood but a poor chance with Tom, who, in less than five minutes, stretched him on the ground, bleeding profusely from at least twenty wounds, every one of which looked sufficient to cause death.

Having done this, he turned his attention to his friend, who was still desperately combating with the chief. Neither appeared to have gained any advantage over the other, or to have received a wound.

In fact, in point of skill they were well matched, though not in other respects, for the chief was taller, heavier, and stronger than Dick Turpin.

Tom King hastened to assist him, but Dick, perceiving his intention, cried—

"No—no, Tom! Hold off! It is a fair fight, and shall continue so! Sheathe your sword, my friend, and leave us to it."

Thus commanded, Tom withdrew and watched the progress of the fight.

That Turpin would eventually prove the victor he felt certain, for he noticed that there was upon his face an expression of stern determination, which he had never observed there before.

Then day dawned.

The cold, gray light stole softly over the scene, and almost seemed to have the effect of calming the roughness of the water.

As Tom gazed towards the ocean, his eye lighted on some object which was left by a retiring wave upon the sand.

Ere, however, he could reach it, another wave carried it away again.

But he perceived that it was the form of a child, apparently not more than ten or twelve years of age.

The waves once more carried it towards the beach, and Tom, stooping dow" lifted it out of the water, and laid it on the sand.

It was either insensible or dead.

It was a beautiful and lovely girl, and lying there in that motionless attitude, with her golden hair streaming disorderly about her, and with fragments of sea-weed hanging to it, she looked perhaps more beauteous than under other circumstances she would appear.

Tom was charmed.

But hearing the clashing of the steel which had hitherto made the air ring again suddenly cease, he turned to see the issue of the conflict.

The smuggler chief was down, and Turpin was in the act of returning his sword to its scabbard.

Upon seeing Tom bending over something not far from the water's edge, Dick hastened towards him.

"The smuggler king," he said, anticipating his friend's question, "has gone to his last account. He had some courage in him, after all, and he would not yield until death positively compelled him. It is a sad pity he was such a villain. But what is that, Tom?"

"Cannot you see? A little girl which I picked out of the water while you were engaged in combat. Has she not a lovely face?"

"She has indeed, and it would have been a thousand pities if one so fair and angel-like had been swallowed up by waters. Is she dead?"

"I fear so!" said Tom. "She is as cold as ice, and I cannot detect the least flutter in her pulse."

"Well, well, poor thing—your assistance came, after all, too late! But is this the only creature we can find belonging to the unfortunate vessel's complement?"

"I fear so," was the reply, as Tom looked searchingly along the beach; "we have come too late to save any one."

It was as he had said. A few splinters from the wreck were floating idly about, and several human forms, which had been gashed by the smuggler chief's murderous blade! but that was all.

A silence, which was most impressive remained for a few moments between the two friends, broken only by the plash, plash of the waves.

Then the sun rose.

The first beams from

"The god of day,"

gilded with a marvellous beauty the crests of the still spumous waves, and shot up in long beams of ruddy light among the clouds.

One ray, that seemed almost brighter than the rest, fell upon the child Tom had taken from the water.

It is needless to say that it added fresh beauty to her lovely features.

Tom stooped down suddenly.

"By heavens! Dick," he said, "she is alive! I saw her eyelids move slightly as the brighter light fell upon them. She lives, and we have not had our labour in vain. I will take her in my arms and carry her, and do you, my friend, lead me to the nearest habitation."

Suiting the action to the word, he picked the child up in his arms.

An exclamation came from Dick's lips.

It was echoed by a shout of anger, and Tom King, looking up, saw the remainder of the smuggler crew, armed with weapons of every description, hurrying towards them, yelling and gesticulating with rage.

"We shall have another fight, I can see," he said, as he laid the child down on the sands, and drew his sword.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

A TREACHEROUS CALM—THE DAWNING OF DESPAIR.

THERE was every reason to suppose that these men, who now ran so eagerly forward to attack our friends, had been sent back to the cavern for some purpose, and having from the distance seen what was going on, had made as much haste as possible, but arrived too late to save their rascally leader from the fate he so richly deserved.

"Come on, you cowardly villains!" shouted Dick. "Come on! we are ready to serve you as we served the rest. Come on, I say!"

As he spoke he brandished his weapon, and, without waiting for them to come, he sped forward to meet them.

Tom King followed his example.

It was five or six men that they thus defied.

The dauntless bearing of our friends was not without its due effects.

The men slackened their speed, halted, and then, without waiting for a blow to be struck, turned and fled.

But Turpin and King were not disposed to let them off thus easily, and they pursued them as fast as the nature of the ground would allow.

The smugglers, though, knew the road much better than the highwaymen, and running among the rocks, disappeared.

Turpin came to a halt.

"What do you say, Tom? It is pretty clear those vermin have sought refuge in one of the many caves hereabout; shall we follow them?"

"I should like to make them feel the weight of my arm, I confess, but still I do not think it would be prudent to chase them any further. They might lure us into some place where we could not escape with life."

"That is very true. I think we may content ourselves with what we have done."

"So do I. You may depend we have put a stop to any more wrecking business being carried on in this quarter just yet a bit.

"The smuggler's band, large as it was, is now, you see, virtually destroyed, since those cowardly wretches are all that remain."

"Yes, the revenue vessel and us together have been the means of putting a few rascals out of the world."

"I cannot feel the slightest commisseration for their fate."

"Nor I. If anyone deserved to be punished with death, they did. To entice a vessel freighted with their fellow-countrymen to destruction by means of a false beacon, is diabolical in the extreme."

"No fate could expiate such an enormous crime, but I am afraid such things as we have witnessed to-night are not so uncommon as is supposed. I had frequently heard of such things, but until they were avouched by my own eyes, I never gave them credence.

"There is a point we ought to consider of at once, and that is, what we are to do in the next place. There is the little girl that I took out of the water, and who lies yonder on the beach. I cannot find it in my heart to leave her, especially as I am sure she is alive."

"You can only do as you said you should, namely, take her to some homestead close at hand, and give her in charge of the inmates."

"That must be it. A few sovereigns, which we can easily spare, will soon banish any scruples that may be felt about taking her in."

"Oh! rely upon that. Make haste across the beach, my friend, and fetch her. I will wait here for you in case any of the smugglers should show their noses."

"I think there is little fear of that," said Tom, as he set off at a run.

It did not take him long to reach the spot where he had deposited the young girl, and as he took her up in his arms he was overjoyed to find that she was growing warm, as well as evincing other signs of returning animation.

Such a light weight as she was was nothing to Tom King, so he made his way with great swiftness to where he had left Turpin.

"Is all well?" the latter asked, as he got within speaking distance.

"Yes, she lives, and I do not doubt, if we can only succeed in reaching a place of shelter, that she will quite recover herself."

"I am glad to hear that—very! It appears to me we shall be likeliest to attain our object by keeping along the coast, since it is hardly possible for us to proceed far without finding a fisherman's hut."

"Very well, then. Come on at once, though I must say I had thought of finding her a more comfortable abiding place—a farmhouse, for instance."

"That would undoubtedly be better, but the nearest one may be several miles from here, and I think it most imperatively necessary that you should take her to the first place we find."

"It is—it is. These wet clothes ought to be removed with as little delay as possible."

With such talk as this, which seemed to cheat the distance, our friends walked rapidly along the sands in the hope of finding a place for the child—the only living thing that remained to tell what ship it was that was wrecked, and to what port she was bound.

It was quite half-an-hour, though, before they came in sight of a habitation.

And then it could scarcely be called such, though it indicated the proximity of a dwelling.

It was a windmill, and at least a mile distant.

"That will be the place," said Turpin; "give me the child, and you can rest your arms a bit. That's it. Now on we go."

The little girl was handed into Dick's arms, and then the highwaymen, leaving the course they were taking for one at right angles on the left of it, continued their way with unabated speed.

Every moment they knew might be precious to the young thing's life.

The road was toilsome, for it rose very rapidly; in fact the windmill was upon the ridge of a hill.

By changing their burden frequently, however, they managed to get on pretty well.

As they fully expected, they found as they drew nearer that there was a neat little cottage adjoining the mill. It was surrounded by a large and well-cultivated garden.

From the exterior appearance of the place generally, the two highwaymen formed a favourable opinion of the inhabitants.

Numberless flowers, of every imaginable hue, were blooming everywhere.

Order and neatness were observable in all things.

Such signs as these would enable anyone to come to a pretty correct conclusion that the occupants were what the outside of the house showed they were.

It was a relief when they reached the pretty green palisade with which the garden was environed.

Tom King was carrying the child.

Dick pushed open the little gate.

It made a slight sound as it turned upon its hinges, upon hearing which, some one, who was within, came to the doorstep.

The door itself was wide open, and Dick, as he strode along the neatly kept gravel path, caught a glimpse of one of the cleanest and prettiest little rooms that ever he remembered meeting with.

It was a woman who came to the door.

The morning sun was now shining brightly, and she had to shade her eyes with her hands before she could precisely tell who was coming.

She was young and graceful-looking, with a countenance pleasing in the extreme.

Upon, however, perceiving our friends, she gave a shriek of alarm, and retreated hastily into the house.

Their appearance terrified her.

And well it might, for the proceedings of the night had made them look rather ferocious individuals.

Her cry, however, brought another person on the scene.

This was the miller, who emerged suddenly from a little door in the mill itself.

He, too, was young, with a frank-looking, good-tempered countenance.

Evidently he was the husband of the woman who had made such a brief appearance at the cottage door.

"Hilloa, there! Dang it all, who be ye, what do ye want, frightening my Fanny in that way, eh? Who be ye, I say? What dost thee want?"

"Your assistance," said Turpin, in a gentle voice. "Your assistance, to restore this little girl to life. We picked her up insensible on the beach."

"Eh? what?" said the miller, hastening towards them. "God bless my life! What a pretty little thing! How nation pale and death-like too she be! Here Fanny—Fanny, come hither! thee be'est wanted."

Reassured by her husband's voice, the woman again appeared.

Our friends were standing just inside the porch.

"Look here, Fanny, lass, these gemmen here were on the coast during the storm last night—and an awful storm it were—and they a' picked up this little girl here. They do say she's alive, but she looks more like death than life, a sight!"

"Nevertheless," said Tom King, "she is alive, or, at all events, was a little while back, and if you will only take off her wet clothes, and put her in a warm bath, I daresay she will come round. Will you do this? I will pay you well for your trouble."

The womanly sympathies of the honest miller's wife were immediately enlisted in favour of the little girl, but when Tom spoke of paying her for what she did, she drew back with an offended air.

"We don't want to be paid for acting like Christians; but if it is in our power, we will do what we can towards reviving the dear little thing."

"I am very glad to hear you make such a remark," said Tom, handing his burden to her, "very glad. It confirms me in the good opinion I had formed of you."

A pleased look came over the good woman's face as she heard these words, and so there did over her husband's too.

But, having once taken the child, she did not linger, but hurried into the house with her.

"Dang it!" said the miller, grasping Tom and Dick alternately by the hand, "you're the right sort. Come in, come in, and try a bit of breakfast."

Our friends determined to accept this offer, and entered and soon had a most substantial and appetising fare set before them.

When the meal was over, the miller's wife entered the room in which they were sitting, and gave them the glad intelligence that the little girl had come back to life, and was then in bed fast asleep.

Upon hearing this, our friends gave the miller and his wife some further particulars about the storm and the wreck, and then begged the favour of a bed, so that they could rest themselves for an hour or two, which request was readily granted to them.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

TURPIN AND KING ONCE MORE UPON THE ROAD—THE SEARCH FOR BLACK BESS.

THE sun was but a few degrees above the horizon when Turpin and King descended to the kitchen of the mill cottage.

Very weary and very much exhausted were they when they threw themselves upon the bed, in the room to which they had been shown, and the delicious silence, as well as, perhaps, some somniferous quality of the air, made them sleep long and heavily.

But they got up feeling wonderfully refreshed.

After plentifully swilling themselves in cold water they, as we have said, shortly before sunset made their way downstairs into the back room on the ground floor of the cottage.

They found upon the table a light and frugal repast, for the miller and his wife were just then about to partake of supper.

In tones of unfeigned welcome did the miller greet our friends, and request them to seat themselves at the table.

This they were nothing loth to do, besides which they did not want to leave until they had learned some additional particulars respecting the child King had saved, and this would give them an opportunity of doing so.

They were saved the trouble of asking the question, for the miller said—

"Dang it! but she be all right, tho' she did look so corpus like! Miseus ha' spoken to her. Tell the gemmen what she said, Fanny."

"It were not much, sirs," said the miller's wife, "except she told me her name was Susan, and cried very much for her uncle and her brother."

"Did you ask her the name of the ship?"

"I did, sir."

"And what did she say it was?"

"A very curious name, but she took the trouble to spell it to I."

"What was it?"

"I recollect quite well. She said R-a-n-e-d-e-e-r, Ranedeer."

"The Ranedeer," said Tom, "then we shall be able to find out all about her; for, though it is not an uncommon name for a ship, yet the mode of spelling it is peculiar, though I believe, correct. However, it will, I doubt not, enable us to identify the vessel."

"And did she say no more?"

"No; I would not let her, for even that little exertion quite knocked her over; so I told her to go to sleep, which she did, and is sleeping now."

"Thanks," said Tom, rising from the table. "It is necessary that myself and friend should leave here now at ence, as important business calls us away; but rest assured no long time will elapse before you see us here again. In the meantime do not be offended with me for offering you this purse of sovereigns. To me they are no object. I can spare them easily, and without being sensible of their loss."

The miller opened his mouth to remonstrate, but King waved his hand and went on.

"It will be impossible for you to have this little girl here without incurring numberless expenses, which, I am sure, I can better afford than you. Do not look upon it as being paid for your charitable conduct, but rather consider it is I who wish to have this chance of being charitable."

Nine sentences out of every ten the miller uttered commenced with two words, and the one in reply to Tom King's observations was no exception to the habit he had fallen into.

"Dang it!"

Those were the two words.

"Dang it!" he said. "What you say sounds fair enough, and may be if I was in your place I should want to do the same; so we'll say no more about it. The little thing shall want for nothing while she is under my roof, bless her pretty face and beautiful golden hair. I'll take good care of that. We've got no children of our own, though many's the time we've grieved over it. However, here we are with one, and, so long as she chooses, here she will find a home."

"You are a downright honest, good-hearted fellow," said Tom King, warmly pressing the miller's huge rough hand with undisguised admiration. "I wish there were more such in the world. However, no matter. It strikes me you will have a chance of keeping your word; for, to the best of my belief, every one else on board the ill-fated vessel perished."

Tom could not repress a shudder as he thought upon the means.

And, now," said Turpin, breaking the rather awkward pause which ensued, "we must be going. Look, the sun has quite set now, and soon darkness will close around us."

"It is even so," said Tom King. "Farewell for the present, my faithful friends. Rely upon it we shall not be long ere we return, for I am anxious to speak to the child I have saved, and look again at her beautiful face. While I am gone I shall make every inquiry about the vessel, the name of which I am not likely to forget. Farewell."

He wrung the hands of the miller and his wife as he spoke, and passed out of the door into the garden.

"Farewell," said Turpin, shaking hands with them likewise, "and accept our thanks for all you have this night done for us."

So saying, he rejoined his friend.

They passed together out of the little wooden gate, and turned towards Durley Chine, which was still distinctly visible.

Several times did they look back, and each time saw the miller and his wife wave their hands after them.

"There," said King, as they came to a bend in the road which hid the mill-cottage from their sight; "under that roof are two of the best natures that ever drew the breath of life."

"I firmly believe it, and we ought to think ourselves fortunate in the extreme in finding such an asylum for the girl, in whom I feel as warm an interest as you do yourself."

"I am not afraid to leave her in their care; and now, knowing she's safe what shall be our next plan of operations?"

"Before we can think of that, we must re-enter the deserted grounds surrounding Durley Chine, and find the mare Black Bess! You, too, will require a steed. You must look about for one."

"I must, and I only hope that I shall chance upon a good one."

At this moment they reached the summit of a little hill, and, ere they descended it, they paused a moment to regain their breath and look around them.

The twilight was only deep enough to render indistinct the more distant objects in the landscape, for many a mile all things were plainly visible.

Their gaze lingered longest on the cottage adjoining the mill.

The worthy couple were still outside the porch, and it seemed as they could still our friends were looking in that direction, for they again waved their hands.

"Forward!" said Turpin, "do not let us waste any more time. I am most anxious to reach Durley Chine before night closes in."

"We shall easily be able to do that, for twenty minutes walking will take us there. But, above all, let us be cautious that no one sees us enter."

"I do not think we need fear that. Really, the place seems almost uninhabited. With the exception of the miller and his wife, we have not met a creature."

"I am aware of it, but we have not come far. As for our not seeing anyone on our way to the mill, I think nothing of it. It was an hour when but few people are abroad. Even London would be deserted."

"But look, we are destined to see somebody, at all events. What a cloud of dust there is at the end of the road yonder to be sure. Whatever can it be coming?"

"I have no idea!"

"Nor I; what puzzles me though, is that the ground should have dried so soon after the storm!"

"Then there is nothing at all wonderful in that, if you take into consideration the nature of the soil; you see it is of a calcareous or chalky nature, like the caverns, and wet is greedily absorbed by it, so that when the rain has ceased the surface soon gets dry."

"Oh! that is it, Well, I always look to you for explanations of things of that sort. I am not such a scholar as you."

Tom laughed at this remark, and said—

"My pretensions to the title of scholar are very slight indeed. I am, though, puzzled beyond measure to know what can be approaching to raise such a cloud of dust."

The elevated position in which our friends were, enabled them to see for a long distance ahead.

Considerably more than a mile off was a dense cloud of dust, and what caused it they would have given no trifle to know.

That it approached them was evident.

Some minutes were spent in fruitless speculation, and then Turpin, struck with a sudden idea, flung himself down on the roadway, placing his ear to the earth.

It was a wonder he had not thought of this before.

He did not remain in this position a moment, but sprang again to his feet.

"What do you make of it now?" asked Tom King.

"I am almost as much puzzled as I was before," was the reply. "A large number of horses are approaching."

"I daresay, now," said Tom, with a laugh, "it is a drove of horses going to market."

"That's it! Yet no! Stop! It isn't!"

"Why not?"

"It's the wrong time in the day; people wouldn't be taking their horses to market at this hour in the evening."

"No more they would. That is a little circumstance which did not occur to me when I spoke."

Turpin again placed his ear to the ground.

"You are altogether wrong," he said, when he rose. "They are horsemen, and coming along at a sharp trot."

"Horsemen! I am more puzzled than before. What can they be doing?"

"Goodness knows! But anyhow I think the most prudent course for us to pursue would be to leave the road, and take to the meadows. We shall then be able to see without being seen."

"So we shall; and here, as if it was made on purpose, is a gap in the hedge, which will answer our purpose most admirably.

The two friends immediately crossed the ditch which interposed between them and the bank of sloping earth upon which the hedge was planted, and then got through the gap into a field beyond.

The grass in this field had been suffered to grow a prodigious height, and as they found they made a loud rustling noise in their progress, they stopped, and lying down full length, peeped through the interstices of the hedge row.

Nearer, nearer—plainer, plainer—tramp, tramp—came the sound of horses' hoofs.

Who can they be that are coming?

At last, and just as our friends found their patien exhausted, the foremost of the band of horsemen came in sight.

He was quickly followed by the remainder, who dashed past our friends at a sharp trot.

"Why, bless my heart alive!" ejaculated Turpin, when the last horseman had passed them, "I be hanged if it is not a troop of dragoons! What on earth can they want here, and trotting along at such a rate as that? Something's up somewhere beyond a doubt."

CHAPTER LXXV.

TURPIN AND KING ELUDE THE GUARD, AND ENTER DURLEY PARK.

SITUATED as our friends were, that is to say, at war with everybody, it became a necessity to take cognizance of everything that occurred, and it had grown into a habit with them to consider that when anything of an unusual character happened, it had a special reference to them.

So, on this occasion, the circumstance of a troop of dragoons passing along the highway filled them with speculation.

But not for one moment did they dream of the imminent danger in which they were.

Little did they think what a fortunate thing it was that they had been prompted by caution to hide behind the hedge while the cavalcade passed.

The fact of the matter was, that the body of soldiers which they had seen, was but one of several other companies who had been sent out with strict injunctions to scour the country in all directions for the notorious and audacious highwaymen, Richard Turpin and Thomas King.

Great, indeed, was their peril, but they knew it not.

Could it but have been whispered to them what alarming and effective measures had been taken for their apprehension, how they would have hastened to the sea-shore, from which they were at so short a distance, and, hiring a vessel of some kind, have crossed over to France.

But alas! there was nothing to warn them but their own perceptions.

The reader will remember what a series of daring deeds they had committed before taking refuge at Durley Chine, which certainly had the effect of baffling their foes, though not throwing them off the hunt.

Firstly, there was the robbery of the lord mayor's coup.

Secondly, the execution of Sir Theodore Houghton.

Thirdly, stopping the western coach.

Fourthly, the robbery of Captain Nidget, and

Finally, the defeat of the officers in the New Forest.

This was a deed which, as Dick had rightly conjectured, would make the country too hot to hold them.

But when he made this reflection, he little thought such vigorous steps would be taken to bring him and his comrade to justice.

The rewards were doubled.

Police-officers without number made inquiries in every possible direction.

They had been traced to the borders of the New Forest, but beyond that place there was nothing to serve them for a guide.

But what was looked upon as being quite certain to entail their capture was, that from sunset to sunrise, all the highroads were patrolled by companies of cavalry soldiers, whose orders were to keep a sharp look-out, and if they saw the highwaymen to make them prisoners—alive if possible, in order that they might suffer judicially for the crimes of which they had been guilty. But rather than allow them to escape on these grounds, they were to take their lives without hesitation.

For a full week had these measures been actively in operation, but without achieving the desired effect, for, as the reader knows full well, they were, during that period, either in the mansion at Durley Chine or the caverns beneath it, where it would have been well if they had remained.

But it was the opinion of both that they had secluded themselves quite long enough to allow the noise their exploits would occasion to blow over.

But in this they made a grand mistake

A very particular account of them had been given to all the men, who were told not to scruple to take any one prisoner who at all answered the description.

This was a glorious thing for the police, since it enabled them to have the appearance of doing a great deal.

But it was appearance only; for though on the average about fifty persons were had up daily on suspicion, yet it was in all cases satisfactorily proved that they had yet to get hold of the right men.

Still, for all that, it looked as though the police were in earnest, so, as usual, the people were pleased with, and deceived by, them.

From the fact of their having been traced to the vicinity of the deserted mansion, it naturally occurred to many that it must be there where they had taken refuge, and they asserted as much to the executors of Sir Ernest Dane, who were, however, inflexible, and would not permit any intrusion to be made, and the will of the deceased baronet disobeyed.

A close watch, however, was kept round the premises, and with this the executors could not interfere, nor indeed did they wish to do so.

This guard consisted of police-officers, all well armed, who were posted at short intervals all round the park palings.

But this, of course, produced no effect, or, at all events, had not done so as yet.

Still they did not suffer their vigilance to relax.

Thus, our friends were, in a manner of speaking, hemmed in in every direction, and let them turn whichever way they would, capture stared them in the face.

Of all this the highwaymen were completely ignorant. The only thing that called forth remark was the presence of the dragoons.

The thought was uppermost in the minds of all that it was just possible that troop had been sent out to apprehend them, and each waited for the other to make the supposition, neither liking to be the first to broach the subject, so the consequence was it was not spoken at all.

Besides, were such the case, they had passed them, and the distance was every moment increasing.

What is easier than for them to continue their course along the road?

Nothing apparently.

They were not, however, aware of the extent to which the officers had carried their machinations.

If the thought did occur to them that this one troop was in search of them, they certainly did not for a moment dream that it was one of many who had all the same object in view.

There is something terrible in the idea of two persons being environed with such deeply-laid schemes for their destruction.

But so it was.

Then, as the reader is well aware, that when he knew the full extent of his danger, Turpin's mind rose equal to it; but here, in the present case, he was utterly unconscious that he was in any peril at all—certainly no more than he was every day accustomed to.

What is his errand now?

To enter Durley Park, and lead out Black Bess.

Such a thing would be utter madness did he know that people were on the watch, and adopted cautious and strategic measures accordingly; but set out with such an object, not dreaming that it was necessary to take any particular precaution, would be nothing short of sheer suicide.

It is very strange, but it nevertheless often happens, when we are most happy then are we nearest to sorrow, and when most confident of being safe to be in the greatest danger.

Such was the case with both our friends.

They left the meadow, and returned to the high-road.

Not a soul, or even a living creature of any kind, was in sight.

The dragoons were completely out of sight and hearing.

The pace they were going at was one that, without appearing so to do, got over a great deal of ground in a short time.

Then the sun sank suddenly behind the black mass of clouds that was piled up on the horizon.

A sudden obscurity overspread the scene.

A cool wind arose, and whistled mournfully amongst the foliage.

But, unheeding this, our friends walked rapidly along the road in the direction of Durley Chine.

It was Tom King who spoke, after a rather long interval of silence, during which both had been occupying their thoughts with trying to account for the presence of the dragoons.

But although this subject was topmost in his thoughts, yet Tom did not allude to it in any way.

"I very much regret," he said, "that we did not serve the remainder of the smugglers, or rather wreckers, as we did the chief and the other two. Such wretches ought not to be allowed to exist."

"I think we may rest satisfied with what we have done. They will be some time, I think, before they renew their frightful business; if, indeed, they ever do."

"Pho! pho! We have not dealt them a severe enough blow for that. I, for my part, feel pretty sure that before many days are over, they will begin again."

"Well, well, perhaps so. I shall, however, most certainly in a day or two revisit the mill cottage. Not only shall I be glad to see again its worthy inmates, but I am anxiously impatient to speak to the little girl. What did they say her name was?"

"Susan."

"Ay, Susan. She will be able, I hope, to give me some particulars about the vessel that was wrecked. Poor thing! she is the only one saved. What is to become of her? What will be her future fate?"

"You won't know that if you puzzle your brains for an hour. The best thing that can happen to her will be for the miller to adopt her as his own daughter."

"It will, if he will adopt her."

"You may depend he will be only too glad. Both have loving hearts. It seems strange that such people should be denied children of their own, as they appear to be."

By this time the glorious twilight had deepened into night, which was at once dark and moonless.

The greatest part of the distance to Durley Chine had now been passed over. The mansion was certainly not a quarter of a mile off.

More picturesque than ever did it look in the darkness, for it was outlined with great distinctness upon the lighter coloured sky behind it.

But all between the two highwaymen and the house itself was very dark indeed. No object at a distance of more than a few yards could be discerned.

Suddenly Turpin caught Tom King by the arm, arresting his footsteps.

At the same instant he pointed with his arm down the lane.

"Lights!" exclaimed Tom King, as he saw the object to which his companion directed his attention. "Moving lights. What can they mean?"

"That is it!"

"I can count five of them. They are moving along in a straight line towards the coast."

"They are. I cannot tell what the meaning of it is," said Dick to his companion, "but I can tell what it is."

"I think I can, too."

"It appears to me quite clear that some half-dozen men carrying lanterns are making their way either along the hedgerow or else along the palings of the park at Durley Chine."

CHAPTER LXXIV.

TURPIN AND KING ARE CHASED BY THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS.

"ALONG the park palings," iterated Tom King; "that's where they are, that's clear. Who can they be, eh?"

"I am as much at a loss to know that as I am to know their object."

"For my own part, I cannot help connecting those lights with the troop of dragoons we saw gallop past us a little while ago."

"The deuce, you can't; but look, they have stopped, and now there is as many again of them."

It was with increasing interest that our friends now strained forward to watch what was taking place.

The light of at least a dozen lanterns could now be seen flashing through the darkness; but the lights no longer moved; they were stationary.

Presently, however, they formed out into a straight line, and then divided in the centre, half going one way and half the other.

Then they observed, further, that as they went on one light was left behind; so that in a few minutes the line extended in an irregular line for a considerable distance, each light being an equal distance from the other—that distance being thirty or forty yards.

No sooner was this done than, as if by magic, every light became extinct.

Not the faintest gleam remained to show where they had been.

It is needless to say that all this filled our two friends with the most intense surprise.

Turpin drew a long breath.

"This is something very extraordinary," he said; "I can't make it out at all; can you, Tom?"

"No further than this, that I think it pretty evident those men who carry the lanterns have been placed as sentinels somewhere, and, from what I can see, apparently along the park palings."

"That is it, of course. I have it now, sure enough. You may depend, Tom, that in some way or other we have been tracked to Durley Chine, and that those men have been placed there to nab us as we leave it."

"Of course," said Tom King; "however was it that it did not occur to us before! Now I can see all plainly enough?"

"All what?"

"Why, those dragoons we saw trot down this lane are on the look out for us, in case we should not be in the mansion; and the others are either soldiers or police-officers, who have surrounded the park, for the executors of Sir Ernest would not, I am certain, listen either to their entering the grounds or search the house."

"Just so! Those lights, then, we may safely conclude, were carried by the relief guard, as I may call it."

"There can be little doubt of it; and now, such being the case—the roads watched by dragoons and the park surrounded by men—I think it pretty clear you must give up all idea of getting Black Bess in safety out of the grounds."

Turpin was silent for a few moments.

"The risk will be great, Tom," he said; "very great indeed, and yet"——

"Yet you would say you do not like the idea of leaving your mare where she is."

"I do not. Without her I can do nothing. But, my friend, I do not want to draw you into this extra trouble on my account, so let me beg of you to secrete yourself somewhere close at hand."

"While you make the attempt alone? Never! I am your friend, and it is not in my disposition to desert you because there happens to be a little danger."

"But, Tom, listen. You could do no good by accompanying me. Two persons would not be required for the job, so let me again ask you as a favour to let me carry out this little affair single-handed."

"I shall allow you to do nothing of the sort. I know I can be of use to you. Two heads are always better than one. I shall be deeply offended with you if you do not let me have my own way in this."

"You are a true friend, Tom," said Dick Turpin, pressing his hand. "Believe me, I shall indeed be most glad to have you with me. I did not wish to appear selfish in the matter, and that was why I pressed you to let me go alone; but, if you mean what you say"——

"I always say what I mean."

"I know you do, and therefore it is settled that you accompany me."

"It is."

"Very well, then, I would ask your advice."

"Upon how we are to proceed?"

"Yes."

"Well, there you puzzle me, for, to tell the truth, I hardly know what to advise. I think the first and best thing we can do is to creep forward with all possible caution, and then, I doubt not, circumstances will arise which will materially assist us."

"Come on, then."

"Does the plan meet with your approbation?"

"Perfectly."

"Then let us make our way towards the palings as stealthily as we can."

Nothing further was now said, but both the highwaymen proceeded to put their determination into execution.

After going about a couple of hundred yards they deemed it advisable to leave the highway, and take to the fields. So happening to see a gate they clambered over it.

They then found themselves in a meadow of very large size. In fact, in the darkness, they could see no bounds to it.

Still keeping in sight the angular roofs and picturesque-looking chimney-tops of the mansion, they struck across the grass, upon which, of course, their tread was all but noiseless.

Yet, so intensely silent was the whole of the place, that even here they were obliged to tread carefully, lest the creaking of their boots, or the jingling of their spurs, should attract attention towards them.

They at length came to a hedge which was so dense and high, that it formed an effectual barrier against their proceeding further; so, after assuring themselves that this was the fact, they were compelled to go along it until they found either a gap or a gate.

At the further extremity of the field they came to a stile, which they got over at once.

"I think it will be the wisest plan not to stray far from the path in future. We shall lose less ground by doing so, I'll warrant."

"Very likely. But come, one more field I take it, and then we shall reach the palisades; so I think the less we say now the better."

There was so much wisdom in this, that Turpin at once acquiesced in it.

In a few more minutes they could see the boundary of the park.

We have in a former chapter described it.

It was in a stooping posture that our friends advanced.

The least sound would be fatal to them.

Dimly, very dimly, they could see the figure of a man.

He was standing quite motionless, and, as they fancied, in an attitude of listening.

What was to be done?

Both wished to speak, but dared not.

Turpin caught hold of his companion by the coat, and motioned to him to lie flat upon the earth.

As it was out of his power to remonstrate or ask a question even as to his motive, Tom King complied.

Then Dick slowly and cautiously drew his sword from its sheath.

Its bright blade glistened slightly, but in drawing it Dick made no sound.

He placed the blade in his mouth, and held it firmly with his teeth.

Sinking then upon the earth, he, in a tortuous, snake-like manner, crept forward.

Tom King begun to follow him, but Turpin made such an imperative gesture for him to remain, that he, perforce, obeyed.

Repugnant as it was to his mind, Dick had resolved upon the assassination of this man who stood so still at his post.

Unless he did he felt sure he must abandon all hope of regaining possession of his mare.

He considered that the end justified the means.

And yet, let us do him the justice to observe that, could he have hit upon any mode of accomplishing his purpose without taking this man's life, he would with the greatest alacrity have adopted it.

But there was none.

Therefore he, with all the subtlety of an Indian, crawled forward.

The officer was doomed.

But, as he stood there on guard, no thought of his imminent danger crossed his mind. Little did he dream that he was so near the end of his career—that the sands of his life were all but run out.

Then Dick adopted an expedient which completely answered his purpose.

He wished to distract the attention of the sentry from himself.

But, at the same time, he did not wish to arouse the attention of another.

Dick took a small pebble in his hand.

Taking a careful aim, he threw it so as to fall about a dozen yards from the officer.

The slight noise it made as it reached the earth caught the man

Had he not been listening intently he would never have heard it, but the fact was he already fancied he could hear something.

He turned immediately in the direction where the stone fell, and carried his rifle to his shoulder.

In another moment he would have cried in a loud voice, "Who goes there?" but ere the words could reach his lips, Turpin had glided forward as swiftly and noiselessly as a spectre.

He drew himself up to his full height behind the sentinel.

Then, with a strange sickening sensation about his heart, he plunged his sword into the body of the officer.

He fell without a groan.

CHAPTER LXXV.

THE DRAGOONS CAPTURE TOM KING, AND CONVEY HIM TO NEWGATE.

So far, then, our friends' perilous undertaking was crowned with success.

It was an anxious moment, while they waited, to learn whether the fall of the officer was heard by the next sentry.

But it did not appear that such was the case.

All was still.

Using the greatest caution, Tom King crept up to and rejoined his comrade.

Turpin held up his hand for him not to speak.

Then, turning round, he proceeded to examine the fence.

He was agreeably surprised to find that a huge chestnut tree, growing just inside the inclosure, projected a massive branch right over their heads.

It was some distance from the ground, it is true, but still not so high as to make it a sheer impossibility for them to reach it.

In fact, by the assistance of his comrade, Dick was enabled to grasp it with both hands.

After that the remainder was easy.

He drew himself up.

He found then that his weight so far bent the branch as to make it within reach of Tom's grasp.

In another moment he was beside him.

All this had been done with great celerity, and without the least alarm being given to the other sentries.

The highwaymen passed along the branch of the tree, and then dropped into the park.

They looked about them curiously.

Bess was nowhere in sight.

A peculiar whistle from Dick's lips would, however, be sufficient to bring her to his side; but this he did not dare give because of the dread of its reaching the officers' ears also.

They threaded their way through the park in silence, until at last they reached the shrubbery, where, it will be remembered, Dick tethered his mare.

When he did so he had taken pains to minutely observe the places, so he made his way to the particular tree without hesitation.

Bess was gone!

But as he was about to make some observation to his friend respecting her disappearance, there was a slight rustling among the trees.

He turned round suddenly, placing his hand upon his sword.

There was, however, no ground for alarm.

It was his mare, Black Bess.

She recognized Dick instantly, and exhibited her intense delight by caressing him much in the manner that a cat will do.

It would have been difficult to tell which was the most delighted of the two.

"Hilloa," said Tom King at this moment, but in a low tone of voice, "Hilloa, why, here is another!"

"Another what?"

"Another horse. Whose can it be? It is also saddled and bridled."

"I am astonished. However came it here?"

"I don't know at all," replied Tom, who had been attentively looking at the strange horse's trappings, "but it evidently belongs to a police-officer. I can tell that by the harness."

"This, then, is a suspicious circumstance."

[THE DRAGOONS ESCORTING TOM KING INTO NEWGATE].

"It is, for it certainly seems to point to the fact that officers are actually, in defiance of Sir Ernest's will, prowling about the grounds."

Tom looked anxiously around him as he spoke.

But no living thing was in sight.

"I can scarcely think, from all I know of the circumstances," said Turpin, after a few minutes' anxious thought, "that it could be as you suppose. A dead man's wishes would not be suffered to be thus disregarded. I should rather incline to the belief that it is a horse belonging to one of the officers whom we overcome in the forest."

"By Jove! Dick, you have hit it this time," said Tom King, with great animation. "Horses have strange instincts, and I would wager my life this one has followed Bess hither."

This was a most probable supposition, and both agreed that it must be a correct one.

I shall chance it, and appropriate him to my own use," said Tom, springing on to the strange horse's back, while Turpin mounted his mare, "and there is another little circumstance in connection with it, and that is, supposing our conjecture about this horse to be right, there must be, somewhere in the palings, a place which a horse can leap."

"Egad! yes, I was thinking how we were to overcome that difficulty, and it has disappeared. Let us ride forward, and try if we cannot find this place."

So saying, they made their way to the palisades, and continued along them, taking care not to make a sound.

Presently they came upon a spot where the vegetation was more scanty, and where it was possible for a horse to leap.

Dick placed himself in a line with this place.

He seated himself firmly in the saddle, and gathered the reins in his hand.

"Now, Bess," he said, as he patted her gently and encouragingly upon the neck. "Over, mare—over."

With a sudden rush, Black Bess dashed onwards, and cleared the palings at a bound.

PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

No. 18 will be Published next Thursday.

Tom King followed closely after him.

His horse, which was really an excellent one, inspired, doubtless, by the example of its companion, leaped over the fence in first-rate style.

But no sooner had they alighted than both highwaymen heard a loud shout, which was immediately succeeded by the discharge of a musket.

They had been seen and heard by one of the many sentinels posted round the park, who lost no time in giving the alarm to his comrades.

The gun was fired without any particular aim being taken, so neither of our friends were injured by it in the least.

Finding that they had alighted safely in the lane which skirted the park, they turned their horses' heads, and by every means in their power urged the animals onward.

The speed they made was prodigious.

But, nevertheless, they could tell by the flashing of lights here and there, and the sounds of many voices, that the alarm was spreading.

It was a lucky thing for Tom King, not only that he should have found a horse so opportunely, but that it should have turned out of so good a quality.

In fact, he succeeded in keeping up with Dick without having to use much exertion, and without the latter having to check the speed of his own mare.

And now, as they swept on at that fearful pace, the sentinels dashed forward to attempt to stay them, but they were only hurled to the earth for their pains.

We have said that one side of the lane was bordered by the park palisades. The other side was bounded by a hedge of holly-trees of most luxuriant growth.

A little further on the lane wound round to the right.

In a few moments both highwaymen reached this bend.

They galloped round it without slackening their pace, and then drew up with great abruptness.

Completely blocking up the lane and forming a most effectual barrier to their progress was the troop of dragoons they had seen about an hour before.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

THE DRAGOONS HAVE A GREAT DEAL OF TROUBLE WITH THEIR PRISONER.

So very suddenly and unexpectedly did this sight come upon them that, beyond having presence of mind sufficient to pull up their horses, they lost all self-possession.

They were, however, quickly restored to their senses by hearing a loud voice say—

"Here they are. Upon them! Charge! Take them prisoners—alive if possible, if not, dead."

These words were immediately followed by the trampling of horses' hoofs and the clashing of weapons and accoutrements, as the dragoons prepared to obey their officer's commands.

Dick Turpin was the first to recover himself, and, turning his mare round, he shouted—

"Fly, Tom," he said, "we must run for it. To attempt for a moment to make a stand against a troop of soldiers would be the extreme of madness. Spur your steed, my friend, your life depends upon his fleetness."

As he uttered these words, Turpin just grazed the flank of Black Bess with his spur, and she sped along with a swiftness which no other horse could hope to equal.

"Make ready! Present!" cried the officer in command of the dragoons, as he saw his prey turn round and set off at such a headlong speed. "Present! Fire!"

The rattling discharge of about twenty muskets succeeded his command.

But our friends, luckily, had just turned the bend in the lane, so the bullets expended themselves fruitlessly among the trees.

Had it not been for this circumstance the highwaymen must have been swept from the face of the earth.

As it was they were not injured in the least.

Perceiving that this volley had been without result, the officer gave the order to follow in pursuit.

The regular beat of their hoofs reached the ears of Dick Turpin and Tom King with greater plainness than was either pleasant or desirable.

Despite the efforts which Tom's steed made to keep up with Black Bess, he every moment fell further and further into the rear. As yet, however, the distance between the two was inconsiderable.

They did not look behind them, but they could tell by a wild disorderly sort of shout, that the dragoons had them once more in view.

So prompt had been their pursuit, and so great the rate at which they came, that Turpin and King were scarcely out of the range of their guns.

Again they heard the word given to fire.

Upon the impulse of the moment Dick plunged both his spurs into the sides of his mare.

Unused altogether to such treatment, she gave a snort of mingled rage and pain, and then set forward at a speed so tremendous, that Turpin had the greatest possible difficulty in keeping his seat.

Then came the loud report of the fire-arms.

So soon as he heard the sound, Dick felt sure he was unhurt, and he turned round to look to the safety of his comrade.

Then for the first time he noticed that he was not near him.

Unheeding the result he slackened speed, and, turning round in his saddle, took a brief but searching glance behind him.

A pang shot through his heart as he saw what had taken place.

Tom King's horse had been wounded by the last discharge, and had become maddened and ungovernable with pain.

Like some tortured insect he spun round for a moment or two, and then galloped forward in the opposite direction, so that a minute or two must inevitably bring Tom into collision with his foes.

He saw his frightful danger, and sought to avoid it, but in vain.

The dragoons were for a moment thrown into confusion at thus seeing one of the men they were chasing turn round and gallop recklessly towards them.

But it was only for a second.

They halted and formed in a line three deep across the lane.

On came Tom's horse, blind to all before it.

King set his teeth and drew his sword, determined not to surrender without making an effort for his liberty.

But it was quite useless.

His horse was suddenly brought to a stand still, and he himself, surrounded by the troop, was, by numerous hands, dragged from his saddle, and, with great rapidity and dexterity, securely bound.

Tom King was a prisoner.

Beyond all hope or prospect of escape or rescue.

This was what sent a pang through Dick's heart when he turned and looked behind him.

Naturally enough, his first impulse was to ride to the rescue of his friend.

But before he could put his resolve into execution, he saw in a moment the utter uselessness of such an attempt.

How could he hope, single-handed, to cope successfully with so large a body of well-armed men?

The idea was absurd.

Clearly, all that remained for him to do was to seek his own safety by instantaneous flight.

This course, however, he was most loath to adopt, for would it not look like deserting his friend?

But then again there shot across his mind the thought that, were he free, he could do much towards aiding his comrade to escape; but if he, too, out of a false feeling of generosity, was to suffer himself to be captured, what hope was their for either?

None.

With the rapidity of lightning did these thoughts pass through Turpin's mind, and without apparently having had time to reflect and decide upon the course he ought to take, he again urged Bess forward at the top of her speed.

Encumbered with their prisoner, Dick reasonably enough indulged in the hope that he should before long distance them.

He was startled at this moment by another discharge from the carbines of the dragoons, and he heard several bullets whistle by in most unpleasant proximity to his head.

Then a numb sensation in his left arm told him that one of the shots had taken effect.

"You shall have one in return for that," he said, drawing a pistol from his belt.

Without drawing rein he again looked behind him, and holding out the pistol at arm's length, took as good an aim as under the circumstances he possibly could, and fired.

Whether the shot was or was not effective he did not stay to see, but changing the reins from his left to his right hand, occupied himself entirely in seeking his escape.

On, on, like the very wind he went, but still the dragoons kept most perseveringly in the rear.

And now, to Dick's chagrin, he saw, as he looked before him, that night was going, and day about to dawn, for a faint, slate-coloured light began to fall upon the various objects around him, imparting in many instances a ghostly look to the tall trees.

This, however, was a thing over which he could have no possible control.

Most devoutly though did he wish that darkness would have continued an hour or so longer, it would have been of such material aid to him.

Very soon was the park of Durley Chine left behind him, and now, on both sides of the lane, were nothing but hedgerows, so high and so thick that he could see neither over or through them.

In this way another mile was passed over.

On—on, as far as he could see, the lane had precisely the same appearance.

Just within sight and hearing was the troop of dragoons.

"Confound them and the place, too," said Dick, in a tone of great vexation. "They are most excellently mounted, and come along at a surprising rate, and this road is like a tunnel, there is no means of leaving it."

Regrets could avail nothing.

To add to the inconvenience of the place, he found the ground rose rapidly, causing a great diminution in the speed, which, up to this moment, his mare had been making.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

SQUIRE EDELTON AND HIS DAUGHTER ANNIE MAKE A SLIGHT MISTAKE.

From the look of the sky, Dick could tell that he was proceeding in as nearly as possible an easterly direction.

His ignorance of the topography of the place destroyed his confidence, for he knew not how soon he might reach some large town.

But if the ascent he was now making did hinder him, it had the effect of hindering his pursuers in an equal degree, so that after all matters remained much about the same.

A little more than five minutes brought Dick in view of the top of the hill.

From the clearness with which it was defined, he came to the conclusion that on the other side the descent must be very abrupt indeed, much more so than the side he was upon.

But what is amiss?

Dick suddenly brings Black Bess to a stand.

He looks eagerly about him.

Can it be possible that the dragoons have relinquished the chase?

Or is it that he has distanced them?

In neither case would he have pulled up with so much abruptness.

Lower down the hill, too, can be seen the troop of dragoons pushing along with unabated speed.

What on earth, then, could be Dick's motive for behaving as though it was his desire to be taken prisoner?

It was this.

As he had looked before him at the top of the hill he saw suddenly arise as though from the ground another troop of dragoons, similar in appearance to those by whom he was chased, but in greater force.

They saw him, evidently, for they had been travelling only at a walking pace; but now they came on at a full gallop.

And so when he saw this Dick did the only thing he could do, and that was to come to a standstill.

To have kept in motion would only bring his enemies closer upon him.

Turpin gave himself up to anxious thought.

For the first time he became cognizant of the fact that there had been more than one troop sent out to capture him.

He glanced around him despairingly.

Escape there seemed to be none.

A troop of soldiers before him.

A troop of soldiers behind him.

On either side the tallest hedgerows he ever remembered to have seen.

He might just as well have been in a tube.

There was little or no time for deliberation, however. The officers neared him with great rapidity, and in a minute or so would be within musket range.

Truly was Turpin's position most desperate.

"I shall be taken now, that's quite certain," he said; "and then farewell to all hopes of rescuing Tom. We shall swing together next Monday, without a doubt. The only way there is of leaving the lane is by jumping the hedge, and that I am sure is too high, even for Bess.

The jangling of the weapons and ornaments which the soldiers carried, now mingled with the horses' measured tread.

"I won't give up unresistingly," said Dick. "I will try the hedge. If I miss it, I can't possibly be any worse off than I am now, while there is every chance of my being better."

As he uttered these words Dick backed his mare as far as he could to one side of the lane, and faced the hedge on the other.

It was apparent in a moment that the sagacious creature comprehended fully what was required of her, but she seemed by her way to show that she considered the hedge too high, even for her to leap.

But Turpin was rendered desperate at so immediate a prospect of capture and death, and, unheeding the remonstrance, as one might call it, of his mare, he took a firm hold, and then patting her encouragingly upon the back, made her essay the, to every appearance, impossible leap.

For the first time since he had had her in his possession did Black Bess refuse to obey him.

She went half way across the lane, and then swerved.

Dick forced her back to her former position. Every second thus lost was of the most inestimable importance to him.

Finding her master determined, Black Bess once more turned towards the edge.

Then, with a rush and a bound, she was over.

But not clearly.

Her hind legs caught in the hedge, and both horse and rider rolled over and over into a field.

For a minute or so, Turpin was entirely deprived of consciousness, so that he did not hear the cry that the dragoons set up.

It was one compounded of rage, mortification, disappointment, and admiration.

Happily for the safety of Dick's bones, the meadow into which he alighted was composed of soft and stoneless earth.

He recovered the use of his faculties very quickly, and sprang to his feet.

Bess was standing close behind him.

He sprang without delay into the saddle, and shaping his course across the field at right angles to the lane, was soon beyond the danger of immediate capture.

The dragoons, who had made up their minds that the capture of Turpin was inevitable, were enraged beyond measure at his unanticipated escape.

The hedge over which Black Bess had just managed to leap was of so extraordinary a height, and there was so little room for a run before leaping it, that not one of them made the smallest attempt at following him.

The other dragoons who had been pursuing Dick now made their appearance on the scene, looking tired and anxious.

From the bottom of his heart did Tom King rejoice that his old comrade had been so lucky as to get off, though he himself had not been similarly fortunate.

Some very earnest conversation now took place between the officers in command of the two troops.

At length it was determined that the one which had Tom King prisoner, was, without further delay, to make its way to London.

The others would retrace their steps to the top of the hill, at which place they thought they should be able to get into the meadows.

But before they could do this Dick had got such a start that it was quite futile to think of overtaking him.

His progress, however, across the fields was not quite so swift as he could have wished, for the ground was soppy from the recent rain.

Bess, too, could not but be exhausted after the efforts she had made, and the heaviness of the ground affected her more than it ordinarily would have done.

After crossing a couple of meadows he came to a large plot of ploughed land.

His first thought was to cross this, but on further consideration he concluded it would be better to take to the firm beaten path which skirted it.

It would, besides, be less fatiguing to his mare, and he knew that upon her depended his chance of safety.

It is very probable, too, that this, although much further, would not take near so long.

At the other side of the field Dick found a gate which led into one of the most charming and beautiful lanes he had ever, in the course of his varied experience, seen.

Perhaps, too, the fresh pure air of the early morning made it appear more beautiful than at other times.

The sky was cloudless, and the sun had got sufficiently high up in the heavens to shed upon all things a mellow, yet rosy light.

Numberless birds were singing sweetly in the tall trees on either side of the lane, while a lark that had just risen was mounting rapidly upwards, his clear and musical notes making themselves audible above all others.

Not the least charm about this place was the air of entire repose which pervaded it. To have been there one would have thought that no such things as war and strife could have existence.

So much charmed was Dick with the appearance of this lane, the melody of the birds, and the delicious silence, that he sat still on his mare for a minute or two, lost in admiration, without making the least attempt to open the gate.

CHAPTER LXXX.

DICK TURPIN FOR A TIME GETS INTO VERY COMFORTABLE QUARTERS.

Dick dismounted.

No sooner, however, did his feet touch the earth than such a sudden feeling of faintness came over him that he reeled, staggered, and would have fallen had it not been for the fact that he clutched tight hold of the top bar of the gate.

He was at a loss for a little while to account for this, when, on moving his arm, he recollected the wound he had received, but which in the whirl of exciting events which had since succeeded he had forgotten.

By a great effort he shook off the weakness he felt, and then bandaged his arm.

This now, however, was scarcely requisite, for the hemorrhage had ceased in consequence of the blood having coagulated over the orifice of the wound. Still it could do it no harm.

Before leaving the smuggler's cave he had taken the precaution to stow into the pocket of his coat a small bottle of brandy.

Recollecting having done this he produced it, and pulling out the cork with his teeth took a long draught.

The fiery, unadulterated spirit seemed to fill him with new life so soon as the first uncomfortable sensation of having drank so much at one time had passed away.

Then he bethought himself of the object for which he had dismounted, which was to try if he could open the gate.

He was well pleased to find it was only secured by a piece of wood being stuck through the staple instead of a lock, so withdrawing this the gate swung open at once.

Taking Bess by the bridle he led her through it, and fastened it in the way he had found it, for he did not wish so glaring an index as an open gate to show the route he had taken.

He listened then very intently for nearly two minutes, but he could hear nothing whatever of his pursuers the dragoons.

Nor was he likely to do so, for they would have to make a considerable circuit to reach the very pretty verdant lane in which he now stood.

But of this fact Turpin was ignorant.

Apparently the lane was one but little travelled, for there were not ruts in it, and except in the very middle it was completely overgrown with short crisp grass.

Dick looked both up and down this lane, but it was so sinuous that he could see only a little way.

"I must mount and be off," he said, "though this place is charming enough to make anyone linger in it. My foes are too close at hand for it to be at all safe. In fact, how it is I hear nothing of them I can't very well make out."

As he pronounced these words, Dick, with a good deal of trouble mounted his mare, for his left arm being quite useless, rendered such a thing rather difficult.

At length he succeeded.

Again he paused to listen, but still he could hear no sounds indicative of the proximity of his foes.

It then became rather a nice question with him as to which direction he should take.

"I must find shelter somewhere," he said. "I cannot tell how much my arm may be injured, and neglect may make what would otherwise be but a trifling wound a dangerous one. Bess, too, I can tell will be the better for a rest.

"And yet," he added, "I hardly know whether, under the circumstances, it will be safe. However, I will try this way, let it be how it may."

So saying he turned to the right.

At a gentle trot, Bess made her way along this lane, her footsteps being all but inaudible upon the short grass in the road.

He turned the corner of the lane, and as he did so he happened to get into such a position that the sun's rays fell upon him.

They were warm and refreshing, and he felt grateful for them.

Nevertheless, he did not halt, but turned round another bend in the lane, which then for more than half-a-mile stretched out before him in a straight line.

Then he noticed that over the palings on the left hand side of the lane were some very tastefully and beautifully laid out grounds evidently belonging to a gentleman's mansion.

Then some little distance further on he saw what he took to be the entrance gates, and just over the tree-tops peeped the roofs and chimneys of a lodge.

The mansion itself however was not visible.

Dick rode on rather leisurely, for where he now stood he could see for a long way in the direction from whence his pursuers would have to come

None of them were in sight.

Just then Dick, having nearly reached the lodge gates, turned his gaze from the meadows on his right to the road before him.

Then he noticed that which he had certainly not seen before.

This was a young and beautiful girl.

Her age could not certainly have been more than eighteen, yet her form had arrived at full maturity. She was very fair, with eyes of a grayish blue, transparent, rosy cheeks, full lips, and a profusion of bright golden hair, which hung in tiny rippling curls over her shoulders.

She wore no covering upon her head, and had only a thin shawl to shield her from the keen morning air.

For full half a minute did Dick continue, like one spell-bound, gazing upon this vision of beauty.

Unconsciously he checked the speed of his mare, who now proceeded at a walking pace only.

The young girl was standing with her head bent towards him, and there was upon her pretty countenance such a lovely expression of mingled hope and fear, that Dick was completely charmed.

No one would have needed a second glance at her amiable countenance, and thoughtful, earnest-looking eyes to have been assured that none but the kindest sentiments had a home in her bosom.

It was evident she was looking narrowly at Dick, though why he should be the special object of her attention he could form no idea.

He determined, however, so prepossessed was he by her appearance, to implore her to grant him a few hours' shelter, in order that his wound should be attended to

"She is not the one to refuse me, I am sure," he muttered, "and so here goes to try."

So saying he dismounted from his mare, and taking her by the bridle, led her over the few yards that intervened between him and the fair young girl.

But, to his intense astonishment, before he had well made one step towards her she uttered a faint cry, which admitted of but one interpretation.

Joy.

Then, with this cry upon her lips, she sprang forward, and, extending her arms, clasped Dick round the neck; then kissing him lightly on the cheek, laid her head upon his shoulder.

To say Dick was astounded would be to convey to the mind of the reader a very faint and imperfect idea of his feelings just at that moment.

It was most mysterious.

Most incomprehensible.

But in the event of such an occurrence as the one we have just described, it would not have been in human nature not to in some way respond to such a welcome.

It certainly was not in Dick's.

In the most natural manner imaginable he encircled the form of the young girl with one arm, and, bending down his head, kissed the sweet, ripe lips which were turned quite lovingly towards him.

And as he did this, Turpin noticed what perfect happiness overspread her countenance.

Decidedly there was a mystery here.

But the first words the girl uttered dissipated it.

Gently disengaging herself from Dick's embrace, she looked up with a smile of ineffable sweetness into his face.

"Oh! Percy, dear," she said, "I am so glad you have come. We received your letter to say that you should reach home last night, and when night came without bringing you with it we grew so anxious and alarmed. Father has not been to bed all night, nor has mother, nor have I. It was some strange feeling or other which prompted me to run down to the lodge gates, and then to my joy I saw you in the distance. Oh! Percy, I am so—so happy."

The young girl again let her hand fall upon Dick's breast, but this time she burst into a flood of tears.

"Oh! the deuce!" thought Turpin, as he at once divined the mystery of the whole affair. "The deuce! She takes me for somebody else, that's quite clear. How in the world am I to get out of this scrape, I should like to know?"

CHAPTER LXXXI.

THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS BY NO MEANS RELAX IN THEIR ENDEAVOURS TO CAPTURE DICK TURPIN.

THE tears which the young girl now so freely shed were clearly tears of joy, so Dick suffered them to flow on unchecked, while he took the opportunity to make up his mind to some particular plan of action.

Although what the girl had said was rather vague as concerned details, yet Dick saw plainly enough that he had been mistaken for some one, but whether that some one was a lover or a brother he could not for the life of him determine.

That it was one or the other there was not much room to doubt.

Then the young girl brushed away her tears, and said, with a laugh—

"How foolish of me to cry, to be sure! But don't be angry with me and chide me, as you used to before you went to India! But what makes you so strange, Percy? You don't seem at all glad to see me. I judged you by myself, and thought you would be overjoyed."

Dick was sorely puzzled what to say or do.

Should he at once dispel the girl's illusion, or should he endeavour to continue it.

He had scarcely any time to decide, for the girl was looking closely at him and wondering at his silence.

Dick felt somehow that it would be most conducive to his own safety to encourage the girl in her mistake.

But then he thought again what many difficulties he would have to contend with when he reached the mansion, and might there not be some one there with keen enough eyes to discover the cheat, and then would not his position be a dangerous one?

But his thoughts and speculations were instantly put to flight by the next words which came from his companion's lips.

"How very much you have altered, Percy. Not only in your manners and voice, but in your very features. Why if I did not know it was you I should hardly recognize you."

"That's not very remarkable," said Dick, who felt it imperative to make a remark of some kind. "In fact it's not remarkable at all."

In this remark Dick was quite right, as he said to himself—

"It would have been very remarkable if she had."

"I suppose not," said the young girl; "a seven years' absence makes a great difference in any one, doesn't it, Percy? and especially when that seven years has been spent in the army in India."

"Why yes, as you say," said Dick, who, as the reader will perceive, had made up his mind to keep up the delusion as long and as well as he could, "why yes, there is a great change in yourself even from what there was when I went away. You were quite a child then, and now you are a woman."

"Ah! yes, so I am. But you, Percy, have grown so much older."

"All I want to know," thought Dick, to himself, "is what relation I stand in to her, or supposed to stand in, rather. I can't be her brother, she is a great deal too affectionate for that. I can't be her lover, I think, or else she would be more reserved. How puzzling, to be sure. No! I have it; I ought to have thought of that before—I must be her cousin!"

The moment this thought found a place in Dick's mind, everything that had passed tended to confirm it, and he felt quite sure that he was right. All could be explained by supposing that the person whose arrival was so anxiously expected was her cousin.

In fact, Dick felt so certain that he ventured to assert as much.

He would have been glad to have learned her name, but that there was at present no means of knowing.

"And have you thought much about your cousin?" he inquired.

"What made you ask that question?" she said, in great surprise.

"I felt anxious to know," said Dick.

"My cousin! Who do you mean? Walter?"

"Walter, no!" said Dick, with the feeling that he had committed some blunder strong upon him. "Walter, no! I mean me!"

"You?" said the girl, with a bewildered look. "You?"

"Yes, me! Your cousin Percy, you know!"

The young girl's astonishment visibly increased, and she stared at Dick with the greatest possible amazement.

"Oh! lor," said Dick, mentally, "I'll be hanged if I havn't made a mistake and spoilt the whole affair. How uncommonly awkward! What in the world shall I do?"

While these thoughts swept through his mind, the young girl recovered herself.

She clapped her hands together, and she burst into a merry laugh.

Dick's perplexity increased, but in spite of himself a smile stole over his face.

The girl hit him playfully upon the cheek.

"Oh! Percy," she said, "that is like you, indeed. You were always fond of playing jokes, and I see you have not altered in the least. If anything, you have got worse. The idea, now, of your thinking of trying to persuade me you were my cousin! Whatever's put such an idea into your head?"

"I am sure I don't know," said Dick, who, with great presence of mind availed himself of this loophole of escape. "Strange things do come into your head sometimes."

"So they do, Percy."

But although Dick had so narrowly escaped discovery this time, yet he was more at a loss than before to know what he was taken to be. Another mistake on the subject would be fatal.

He hastened to turn the conversation.

'You don't ask me how it is I am so much behind my time."

"Nor more I did! How neglectful of you! Oh! all the night before last during the storm we were in such fright, and when we found you didn't come to time we were dreadfully alarmed. If you had not come as you have, father would have sent Thompson this morning to Southampton to know whether the Ranedeer had arrived."

When he heard this speech, Dick was in such a state of mental distress that, without exaggeration, he might literally have been knocked down with a feather, as the saying is.

It conveyed so much intelligence, and that of such a very startling character.

In the first place, it was clear the young girl had taken him for her brother, who had been in India during the past seven years.

That she should fall into such a mistake was nothing but natural.

Dick's costume was, as we have more than once stated, a half-military one, in addition to which he had all the comportment of a soldier in his attitude and bearing.

Some resemblance, too, might exist between the highwayman and the anxiously-expected brother.

The fact of his coming along the lane had not a little to do with it, for it was rarely travelled by any save visitors to the mansion.

Dick's heart smote him for the deception he had practised as soon as he knew it was her brother who was expected by the Ranedeer. Too well he knew the cause of his delay. The ship he had seen go to pieces, and the wreckers had dispatched the gallant soldier without a doubt.

The strong feeling of indignation that arose in his mind was, however, somewhat appeased by the reflection that their misdeeds had not gone altogether unpunished.

"Come, Percy," said the young girl again, "how dreadfully gloomy you are! What has happened? Is anything amiss?"

"No, no—nothing. But I have been set upon by robbers, who have wounded but not plundered me."

Dick pointed to his left arm as he spoke.

The girl gave a little scream of terror, as she said—

"How thoughtless of me, to be sure! No wonder you are different if you are in pain. And I actually to keep you standing here in the lane! Come in, come in at once."

So saying, she took hold of Dick's arm, and led him towards the lodge-gates.

Dick had now gone so far that he did not know how to retract; but the thought of the grief of the girl and her parents when they learned the cheat he had played upon them fairly made them tremble.

"You are badly hurt, I am sure. I can feel you trembling like a leaf. Oh! do make haste—do make haste."

For the last minute or two, Dick had felt his arm burn and ache dreadfully, and unquestionably if it did not receive immediate care it would turn out an ugly affair for him.

This, and the wish to elude the dragoons, made Dick hesitate to speak those words which he felt sure would fill her with affliction, and he determined to postpone doing so as long as possible.

According to her wont, Bess followed her master with the greatest docility to the lodge-gate, one half of which was open.

At the door of the lodge itself Dick saw an old man. His bald pate glistened in the sunlight as, with a pleased smile upon his face, he bent low in respectful obeisance.

"He has fallen into the same mistake as the girl has," muttered Dick. "Never mind; so much the better."

"I be very glad to see you Master Percy," said the old man at the lodge. "Very glad indeed. We got sadly frightened about you."

"I daresay you did," said Turpin, with as careless an air as he could assume. "But never mind all that now. Here I am, you see, safe and sound with the exception of a scratch I got from some rascals who attacked me."

"Oh, master Percy," said the old domestic, in tones of genuine alarm, "are you indeed hurt?"

"Only a little. It will be nothing if it is attended to."

"I will run off at once for Doctor Congreve. Make haste up to the hall with him, Miss Annie. I shan't be long gone."

So saying, the old man donned his hat and set off with greater alacrity than could have been expected from one of his years.

"Thanks," muttered Turpin. "Not only for the haste with which you have set off to fetch the surgeon, but for telling me the name of my companion here."

"Come, Percy," said Annie, as we may as well at once call her, since such was her name, "we have already wasted too much time. Think how anxious father and mother are, for of course as yet they know nothing of your arrival."

"Of course not, Annie, as you say," said Turpin. "Take hold of my arm again, and we will soon set their hearts at rest."

"Oh yes. But do you know, Percy, I don't feel half so glad as I did a little while ago. You will laugh at me, I am sure, but I feel a presentiment of coming misfortune, though what shape it is going to take I know not. My heart is so heavy, Percy."

A gasping kind of sob came from her lips, and she leaned with increasing heaviness upon her supposititious brother's arm.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

TOM KING MAKES A DESPERATE ATTEMPT TO GET FREE FROM THE DRAGOONS.

THE certainty that the worst forebodings of the fair Annie would be confirmed pressed heavily upon Turpin's heart when he reflected that it was almost certain every one on board the ill-fated ship Ranedeer, with the exception of the child, had perished.

In silence then the strangely-assorted couple made their way along the well-kept carriage-drive. Neither had sufficient command over their emotions to speak a word.

But, nevertheless, Turpin could not help looking about him with the greatest delight. Never before had he seen a place one-half so beautiful, and when he emerged on to a spacious lawn and saw, about a hundred yards off, a fine stone mansion his pleasure almost vented itself in words of admiration, but he had sufficient self-control not to betray the fact that it was the first time he had seen the house.

Long before they could reach the front door it was thrown open, and a venerable couple descended the stone steps leading from it to the lawn.

They then, as well as their aged limbs would permit them, hurried across it towards Annie and Dick.

"Surely, thought the latter, there must be some strong likeness existing between myself and this lost son of theirs, or they would not all fall into the same mistake."

But the fact of his identity did not for a moment enter their minds.

The welcome he received at the hands of the old couple was of the warmest description, and they both were guilty of some very extraordinary manifestations of delight.

But they were interrupted by the gentle voice of Annie.

"Father—mother!" she said, "you do not notice poor Percy is wounded."

"Wounded?" they iterated, with a sudden sensation of dread.

"Oh! believe me," said Dick, "it is nothing. Besides—besides—"

Turpin wanted to say the old man at the gate had gone for a surgeon, but he could not think of his name.

Suddenly, however, he remembered that something had been said about Thompson going to Southampton to see if the Ranedeer had arrived, and he jumped to the conclusion that it was that individual he saw at the gate; so he added, hastily—

"Besides, Thompson has gone to fetch Doctor Congreve."

"Thompson!" exclaimed Annie, in a manner that made Dick instantly cognizant he had made another blunder. "Thompson! why that was not Thompson we saw at the gate."

"Oh, wasn't it?" said Dick, scarcely able to conceal his confusion. "I thought it was; but when you come to lose much blood it generally has a bewildering effect."

"To be sure it does, my boy," said the old man, kindly. "Let me assist you to the house. I hope, as you say, the wound is not a dangerous one; but I know you often speak lightly of a serious wound."

The old man took hold of Dick by the arm, while Annie held the other; so between them he got on pretty well.

And, to tell the truth, the wound was more painful, and he was more feeble than he cared to admit even to himself, which made their assistance very acceptable.

And thus, after a series of extraordinary events, did Dick Turpin, the highwayman, find himself the recipient of more genuine kindness than he had ever received before.

If Dick's heart was rough it was a very tender one, and the attention he was so unworthily having at their hands almost overcame him.

He could not help making with some bitterness the reflection that, under his true character, there was not one person who would succour him, and those very people by whom he was surrounded would have turned from him in loathing and contempt could they but have been made aware of who he was, and the cruel imposition he had practised upon them.

As for Dick's behaviour on this occasion, we cannot sufficiently condemn its disingenuousness, though, to be sure, there was every allowance to be made for him.

In the first place there was his wound.

This not only disabled him, but clouded his perceptions of what was exactly right and wrong.

Then there was the immediate danger in which he stood of being captured by the dragoons.

So, after all, some excuse is to be made for his conduct.

But that he would be long able to maintain the deception he had so successfully commenced, was a matter that admitted of the gravest doubt.

That the real brother would turn up there was, unfortunately, but little prospect. We say unfortunately, because we allude to the worthy family at the Hall, and not to Turpin.

To him such an occurrence would be fortunate.

With many cautions as to his footing, Dick was assisted up to the stone steps in front of the mansion.

Black Bess, who had followed him so far, much after the fashion of a dog, gave now the most unequivocal symptoms of mounting the steps after him.

"Why, God bless my life," said the squire, for such was the title by which the father of the fair Annie was designated, "what an extraordinary horse you have got. Why he is actually following you up the steps."

Dick smiled faintly as he said—

"I am much attached to the creature, and I believe she is to me. Let some one take her to the stables and look after her."

"It shall be done. It is a splendid animal, surely. Here, William—William, look after Percy's horse."

In answer to this call a neatly-dressed groom made his appearance from that portion of the hall devoted to the use of the servants, and taking Black Bess by the bridle led her off towards the stables.

On entering the hall Dick was ushered into a well but plainly-furnished room.

Between them the highwayman was gently forced into a seat.

The beautiful repose that pervaded this room had a languid effect upon Dick, and as he leaned back in the arm chair his eyes half closed.

At this moment there came the sound of wheels grating upon the fine gravel of which the carriage-drive was composed.

It was Doctor Congreve.

Entering hastily, and with the privileged freedom of a medical man, he walked straight up to Dick, and took him warmly by the hand.

"Glad to see you, Percy, my boy, after so long an absence, very glad. Sorry you have met with a hurt. Soon put that all right, though."

As he spoke he quickly but skilfully removed the bandage which Dick had tied on, and then, with a pair of small-sized scissors, completely cut away the sleeve of his coat.

With a few thoughts which elicited from the old doctor the warmest encomiums, Annie had left the room, and now returned, carrying a basin of warm water, with a piece of sponge in it, and two or three linen cloths.

Of these the doctor made immediate use.

Before the congealed blood was washed away, Dick's wound certainly did have a ghastly and terrifying appearance, but the performance of that operation made a world of difference.

"Thank goodness," said the doctor, examining the wound, "there are no bones broken or veins severed; I will bind it up for you, and then all that you will require will be a day or two's rest. I think I can safely say that at present there are no alarming symptoms."

To no one there present was this assurance more welcome than it was to Dick himself.

"Scarcely, however, had the doctor finished tying his bandage than the old man who had stood at the gate came running, breathless with excitement, into the room.

"Squire Edelton—sir!" he gasped, "there's a troop of mounted dragoons at the gate!"

This intelligence caused Dick to bound to his feet.

"Dragoons?" said the squire, "what do they want here?"

"They have a warrant to search all places they think proper."

"Yes—yes!"

"For Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

FOLLOWS THE FORTUNES OF TOM KING.

We feel it to be a duty incumbent upon us to relate to the reader, without further delay, how Tom King fared at the hands of the dragoons.

It will be remembered that when we saw him last, he, as well as the soldiers with him, had just witnessed Bess take the terrific leap over the hedge.

His heart, which before was heavily oppressed, now grew light, for his companion had every chance of ultimate escape, and he felt assured that he would leave no stone unturned to effect his rescue.

Such being his convictions, he very complacently suffered himself to be led along by his captors.

Still, the anticipation of being rescued by his friend did not prevent him from keeping a sharp look out to be ready to seize upon any chance accident which might be favourable to his freeing himself.

There was, as the reader has not failed to perceive, a certain independency of disposition about Tom King, which would make him much prefer owing his freedom to his own individual exertions than to those of another person, how great soever a friend he might be.

But surrounded by so many armed men as he was, the hopes of his being able to effect his own release were few indeed.

His hands were tightly tied in front of him.

The troopers on his left hand had hold of his horse's bridle.

And just as the little cavalcade put itself in motion, the officer in command cried out in a loud voice—

"Guard your prisoner well, my boys. If he makes the least attempt to escape bring him down with your guns, without waiting for me to give you the word to fire. We will lodge him in Newgate in less than twenty-four hours, alive or dead!"

There was something so vindictive and cold-blooded about this speech that Tom fairly shuddered as he heard it.

The horses were to some extent knocked up by the long chase they had had after Dick, so that their rate of progression for the next few miles was rather slow.

As they were so close to Southampton they determined to push on there and get a fresh supply of horses, when they would be able to reach London easily enough.

The warrant for the apprehension of the two highwaymen, a true copy of which had been given to the commanding officer of each troop of dragoons, although giving them ample authority to lodge Turpin and King in any of his majesty's prisons, yet expressly stipulated they should be taken as soon as possible to Newgate.

In pursuance of this Tom King, when Southampton was reached, which was a few minutes before eight, was put in the prison there, while the dragoons proceeded to the town authorities to give a report of their proceedings and also to receive a fresh relay of horses.

Altogether not an hour was spent in the town, which then was far from being the important place it is now, and during that hour Tom was so closely and constantly watched that he had not the smallest opportunity afforded him of achieving his desires.

The intelligence of the captivation of the notorious highwayman, whose deeds had produced throughout England what is now termed a "sensation," spread with great rapidity through the town, and when Tom King was led out of prison and mounted, a dense crowd had collected.

Tom's pale and thoughtful face, as well as his youthfulness and aristocratic bearing, elicited a feeling of commiseration from the mob, who, while looking at him forgot the deeds of violence of which he had been guilty.

Indeed, so far did this feeling extend that the dragoons began to entertain serious fear that a rescue would be attempted.

And, indeed, had there been some one to direct them, or had anything occurred to turn their thoughts in that direction, there would have been serious grounds for entertaining such a fear.

As it was, however, the crowd contented themselves with the exhibition simply of their good feeling towards the prisoner.

Tom King was too acute an observer of human nature not to be well aware that a mob is about the least dependable thing in the world.

Therefore, he did not seek to incite them to do aught on his account.

As the little troop, with their prisoner, passed at a trot through the bar they shouted and huzzaed with that vehemency characteristic of English mobs.

It was by no means a pleasant journey which Tom King had in prospective, yet he would not suffer his spirit to be cast down, though he did not affect an exuberancy of feeling which he did not possess.

On the contrary, he occupied his mind with but one thought, and that was, how should he escape?

He could find no satisfactory answer to the question.

Midday came before they came to another halt, and then it was more in consideration of the cattle than the soldiers or their prisoner.

It was at a very retired road-side public-house at which they stopped.

The clatter of the horses' feet upon the road-way had the effect of bringing the landlord and all his domestics to the front door, and they looked at the approaching troop with the greatest curiosity and interest.

Probably such a sight had not greeted their eyes for many a year.

In a gruff voice, the officer called out to the landlord to prepare a meal for his men without delay, and also groom and feed their horses.

The landlord, who had never before had so many visitors at once at the "Crown and Cushion," was in so great a flustration that he hardly knew which way to turn.

Then, for the first time, he noticed that they had a prisoner amongst them.

The military appearance of Tom's costume made him think it was a deserter they had captured.

At any rate, it was easy to see that Tom had the sympathy of the landlord and the landlady as well.

So closely hemmed in as he was by foes, and with so many keen eyes fixed upon him, made their sympathy of not the least avail.

But Tom King did not despair. Although a considerable portion of the distance which intervened between London and Southampton had been passed over without his having done anything, yet he had the sanguine hope that something would happen to his advantage before he actually reached the metropolis.

In this, however, he was doomed to be most bitterly disappointed. The meal at the "Crown and Cushion" was finished, the horses were led out, they again mounted, and Tom was further from his object than ever.

The night set in dismal and dark, but this circumstance, far from favouring Tom, only caused the soldiers to take additional precautions. A long rope was provided with a noose at one end of it, which was passed over Tom's head and shoulders, and then drawn tight, while one of the soldiers held the end of it in his hand, and to make still more secure, he twisted it many times round his arm.

The soldiers had evidently determined to keep him safely until they reached a prison, when the onus of keeping him in security would devolve upon some one else.

King ground his teeth with rage, but seeing how impossible it was to hold any longer to the hope of making his escape, he resigned himself sullenly to his fate.

He felt now that his life and liberty depended solely upon the exertions of his comrade, Dick Turpin, and might not he find it as impossible to aid him as it had been for him to attempt his own escape?

Surely yes, and even then he was by no means certain that he had escaped his foes. There was an extreme probability that he was at that very moment in a predicament closely resembling his.

They halted not all night, and just as a faint light in the east showed that another day was coming, they trotted up Whitehall to the Horse-guards, where they dismounted.

The remainder of the distance to Newgate they passed on foot.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

THE DRAGOONS GIVE TOM KING INTO THE CUSTODY OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE.

JUST as the sun had risen to a sufficient height to gild with his first beams the cross upon the summit of the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, a procession, which arrested the immediate attention of all who were abroad at that early hour, came down Fleet-street, and, crossing Fleet-market, ascended Ludgate-hill.

This procession consisted of the twenty dragoons who had taken Tom King prisoner, which individual walked in their midst, looking by no means cheerful under the circumstances.

As at the present time, so at the period of our tale, it was an impossibility for anything at all out of the common way to pass along the street without its attracting a large number of people.

On the present occasion they thronged before, they thronged behind, they thronged all round—pushing, shouting, swearing, laughing.

Every moment, too, added to their number, so that by the time the procession reached the corner of the Old Bailey, the street was almost blocked up with people, and the dragoons were put to some trouble to force a passage.

In a very short time, however, the gate leading into one of the lobbies where prisoners were received, was reached.

The soldiers ranked themselves on either side of it, after the fashion of a guard of honour.

Then the officer himself seized the ponderous knocker, and banged away at the door at a furious rate, which would, he judged, have the effect of informing the authorities within that a prisoner of unusual distinction was brought to the gates.

It would seem, by the way the man who opened the little wicket in the door rubbed his eyes and yawned, that he had only just been aroused from a comfortable sleep.

This man, too, was evidently about to make some passionate remark, but when he saw the stern countenance of the commanding officer, he, with great suddenness, altered his mind.

"Open the door, and send for the governor at once, fellow, and don't stand there like that, or I'll have you dismissed for neglect of duty!"

"Cuss you!" said the turnkey, for such he was.

"Eh?"

"I said, noble sir," replied the man, in a fawning tone, "I hoped you would not be too hard upon a poor fellow. You see, what with one thing and what with another"——

"There, there. Never mind all that, but open the door."

"Yes, sir. The door is open, if you please. Walk in!"

This man, who was one of the most ruffianly bullies in all Newgate, was submission himself to this officer who had bullied him first.

It may be safely taken as a rule that all bullies are cowards, and the easiest way to manage them is to put on and maintain a more blustering air than they themselves assume.

It cowes them at once.

This janitor then flung open the door to its full extent to allow the troop to enter.

Now it so happened that the governor and ordinary of the prison had been very early that morning engaged in a little private business on their own account, and as the soldiers entered the yard at one door, these worthies entered it at another.

"Mr. Tapner! Mr. Tapner!" said the man who had charge of the gate, "here is a prisoner, escorted by a troop of dragoons!"

[DICK TURPIN DISGUISED AS A FARMER VISITS TOM KING IN HIS CELL.]

"What prisoner, stupid!" growled Mr. Tapner, who was not possessed of the mildest of natures.

"I don't know, Mr. Tapner; leastways for certain it's either Dick Turpin or Tom King."

"Ha!" said Tapner, the governor, looking interested. Then, stepping forward, he said, to the officer:

"Which of these notorious depredators have you brought me, sir?"

"Tom King, I believe. Take charge of him at once, and let me have your receipt. I don't want him any longer on my hands."

"No, sir, of course not," said Mr. Tapner, rubbing one hand over the other in a disagreeable fashion peculiar to him, while a hideous grin distorted his countenance.

"Yea," said the ordinary, whose name was Colley, "he is an ungodly fleshpot, and the devil strong within him."

Having uttered this speech, Mr. Colley—we beg his pardon, we should have said the Reverend Mr. Colley—uttered a groan, drew down the corners of his mouth, and turned the whites of his eyes piously upward.

While this was going forward Tom had been brought safely into the yard, and the great gate closed behind him. As he heard it shut with a clanging sound a shudder crept over him, despite the effort which he made to subdue it, and at the same moment he involuntarily found himself wondering whether he should ever again pass out in freedom.

His face had a very dejected look, for his mind was filled with a presentiment of coming evil.

But the black and frowning walls of Newgate are sufficient to appal the stoutest breast.

The governor left the yard for a moment or two, and when he returned he carried in his hand a slip of paper, which he handed to the officer.

It was a receipt for the body of the highwayman, and for whose safe keeping he was thenceforth responsible.

"Thank the fates, that job's over," said the officer, in tones that admitted no doubts of their sincerity. "It goes against the grain, I can tell you, to have to do the work of police-officers."

No. 19 will be Published next Monday.

Mr. Tapner grinned and rubbed his hands, but otherwise made no reply to this speech.

The intelligence that Tom King had been captured very quickly spread among the prison officials, and there was soon a goodly collection of turnkeys and other people employed in Newgate.

No sooner did the omcer receive the paper from the governor than he hastily consigned it to his pocket, and then, seeing that two turnkeys had taken Tom in hand, he gave his men the order to form into rank, and as soon as this was done the gates were opened to allow them egress, and off they went.

The governor and ordinary watched the soldiers march down the street.

Then turning back, the former walked up to where King was standing, and said in his coarsest tones—

"Well, villain!"

He evidently had indulged in the hope that Tom would utter some angry remonstrance, but he was disappointed. The prisoner said nothing—in fact, he took not the slightest notice whatever.

Now this aggravated Mr. Tapner exceedingly. He wanted to have some opportunity of venting his natural spite upon him, but of course while Tom choose to be indifferent, he could not.

But he made one more attempt.

"What do you mean, you unhung villain?" he asked, thrusting his face close to Tom's. "Where's your manners?"

"There," said Tom, who was greatly incensed; "there, and I hope you like it!"

As he spoke, Tom lifted up his feet, and, with the very heavy riding boots which he wore, gave the malignant governor two or three such terrific kicks upon the shins that he (the governor) fairly danced about with pain, while he bellowed like a bull.

The turnkeys who had hold of Tom drew back a little at this exhibition of spirit which, from the previous demeanour of the prisoner, they did not expect.

They had, too, to screw up their faces dreadfully, in order to control the impulse which they felt to indulge in a hearty laugh.

"In a general way," said Tom, "I'm not much given to kicking, but when a chap's hands are tied and his feet ain't, what else is he to do?"

"Curse you!" said Mr. Tapner, recovering so far as to be able to stoop and rub his shins. "You shall pay dearly for this. I'll make you repent it!"

"It's your own doings," replied Tom. "If you had been content with simply doing your duty, you would have escaped it."

"Young man," said the chaplain, with a hypocritical whine, "young man, the evil one is strong within thee, and yet the Lord willing I will cast him out."

"Am I to understand," said Tom, "that you uphold him in insulting defenceless prisoners? and he has insulted me."

"Oh! young man—young man. Banish, I beseech you, the evil spirit from your heart, and repentant enter the paths of grace."

"Dixon!" roared the governor. "Dixon!"

"Yes, Mr. Tapner, I am here, sir, at your commands."

A brutal and repulsive-looking man pushed his way forward.

"Get ready the heaviest irons in the jail, and rivet them on that scoundrel yonder. Clarke!" he added, turning to one of the men who held King by the collar. "Off with him to No. 26!"

"No. 26?"

"Yes; do you want to palter with me? I said No. 26."

"But"——

"I will have no buts nor barrels in the case!"

Now this, it should be said, was one of the governor's standing jokes; so all his subordinates laughed, as some one has it, "consumedly."

But only for a moment did the rascal, governor give way to his mirth. The pain in his shins was rather too acute.

"Come along," said the man who had been called Clarke. "Take my advice and don't make a rumpus. It will be all the better for you."

"Away with him," said Mr. Tapner. "And mind you make all secure. I shall visit the cell in an hour to see if my instructions are properly carried out."

With this the turnkeys hurried Tom King down a passage, who, however, resisted not in the least. In fact, the feeling of apathy from which the governor's insolence had roused him was quickly returning

"You should not be quite so violent, my dear friend," said the chaplain to the governor, to which piece of advice Mr. Tapner responded by telling the reverend gentleman to betake himself to a place which in these refined days is never mentioned to ears polite. Certainly it was not to heaven that he consigned him.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

TOM KING FINDS NEWGATE A MOST UNCOMFORTABLE ABIDING-PLACE.

THE cell in Newgate which was known as No. 26 was, without exception, the dirtiest, dampest, darkest, and worst-ventilated one in all the building, and very rarely indeed was it made use of for any but refractory prisoners.

To well-balanced minds it seems an impossibility for anyone to behave towards a helpless prisoner in the way that Mr. Tapner did, but, for the discredit of humanity, there are many men who would have acted as badly, or even worse.

We do not mean to imply that the governors of all prisons are ruffians, because—and especially at the present day—such is not the case, but we do say that Mr. Tapner was a ruffian, and that he was governor of a prison.

The reader will have the pleasure or the pain—whichever of the two it may happen to be—of hearing a great deal more about the governor and his friend the Rev. Mr. Colley, but it will be nothing to their credit.

In fact, we are not afraid to go the length of saying that scarcely ever have existed two such infernal villains as they were, and as succeeding events will prove them to be.

Tom King grew fairly weary before he reached the door of the cell in which he was to be placed, so many passages did they have to traverse and flights of steps to descend.

At last one of the turnkeys, who walked in advance carrying a light, came to a stand and said—

"Here you are!"

Then followed the grating of rusty bolts, as they were withdrawn from their rusty sockets, and the rattle of a key in the lock.

Then the door swung open.

The man with the light entered first.

Then Clarke and Tom King followed.

Dixon, who was the smith, and whose duty it was to rivet and unrivet the prisoners' fetters, brought up the rear.

A minute or two's delay then took place in consequence of the non-arrival of the man with the fetters.

Tom King, with an air of utter weariness, seated himself upon the stone settle, which was all there was to serve him for bed, chair, and table.

He roused himself a little upon hearing a heavy footstep in the passage outside, and then a man, carrying a mass of iron upon his back, entered.

With professional dexterity the smith secured the fetters to Tom King.

"Now then, you'll do!" he said. "You wont get out of that, I take it."

"Oh! he's sulky, Dixon," said one of the others, observing that Tom King made no reply. "Come away, and let him alone, he will be glad enough to have some one say a word to him when he's been here a little while. Come on. It's time we were off."

"All right. Good bye, old boy. We shall find you here when we want you."

And with a laugh at, as he conceived his own wit, the smith took up his bag of tools, and, along with the turnkeys, left the dungeon.

The hideous noise which was made in fastening the door jarred sadly upon Tom's nerves.

He was in darkness.

At least he thought so for some minutes, and then he became aware that a very faint kind of twilight was diffused around him.

By its aid, as he grew accustomed to it, he could see the dimensions of his dungeon.

It was between six and eight feet square.

The walls were smooth, and all but black.

The door appeared to be cased with iron.

It was listlessness and mere want of occupation that made Tom notice these things. In fact, he was scarcely conscious that he had done so.

When the door had been fastened, and the echo of the men's footsteps had died away, Tom found himself in the deepest silence.

He threw himself at full length upon the seat and gave himself up to thought.

It was, we fancy, want of proper food and rest that had reduced Tom to such a state of prostration, although chagrin at the precautions taken by the officers, and which had prevented his making even an attempt to escape, had undoubtedly a great deal to do with it.

As he laid there and thought, he naturally reverted to his comrade, and wondered whether he had been successful in escaping, and if he had, what chances he had of assisting him.

Of course Tom had not the advantage which the reader has, since he knew nothing of Dick's very ticklish position at the residence of Squire Edelton.

The last he saw of him was when Bess leaped over the hedgerow into the meadow.

Tom's ruminations ended by his falling into an uneasy slumber. How long he slept he knew not, but he was suddenly awakened by feeling a heavy hand on his arm, and when he opened his eyes he was obliged to close them again because of the light which filled the place.

The disagreeable tones of the governor's voice were the first sounds that fell upon Tom's ear.

But he no longer spoke in the way he did.

"Yes, Mr. Blandy, as you say, sir, it is a gloomy sort of place; but it's safe, sir, and so I thought I had better put him in, so as to make sure, you see, sir. I have accommodated him with a little jewelry as well."

Tom opened his eyes again, while Mr. Tapner was making this very facetious speech, and he saw him, with a smile upon his lips, rub his greasy hands one over the other.

At first our old friend was rather surprised to account for this visit, and at a loss to know who Mr. Blandy was, but in another minute he remembered he was one of the sheriffs.

Now this gentleman was about as different to the Governor of Newgate as any two human beings well could be, so of course they did not agree at all.

Mr. Blandy had a tolerably correct idea of what Mr. Governor really was, and so, being a retired city tradesman and having nothing to do, he occupied his time in paying frequent visits to the prison, and correcting any of Mr. Tapner's abuses.

This was a very laudable plan of his, though it made the governor and the ordinary bitter enemies. But Mr. Blandy did not care for that, and took no pains to conceal his contempt for his malignity.

Of course the governor was polite enough not to come to any open rupture with the sheriff, but hugged the hope that when his year of office had expired he would be troubled with him no longer.

Hence it was that he spoke in the deferential, gnathonical way he did.

To tell the truth, although he did not show it, he was very ill at ease about this visit, and if there had been time he most unquestionably would have had Tom removed to some other cell, for he exceeded his duty in putting him in the horrible place he did.

But Mr. Blandy had heard that Tom King had been lodged in Newgate; so he made all speed there, and insisted upon being taken to his cell at once.

The governor felt that to hesitate in any way would be to imply that he was aware he had acted wrongly, so he determined to put a good face on the matter.

The sheriff had expressed his surprise at his having consigned Tom to No. 26 before he had been even taken before a magistrate, and hence the words which Tom King had heard uttered when the governor and the sheriff entered his cell.

It did not need a second glance to show that Mr. Blandy had that rare possession—a feeling heart, and Tom felt sure he had found a friend, and one who not only had the will but also the power to be of service to him and a check upon the ill usage of the governor.

On the other hand, Tom's youth, personal appearance, and inoffensive, gentlemanly demeanour made a deep impression upon the sheriff, who became prepossessed in his favour instantly.

Poor Tom. His was no enviable lot, doomed to be the bone of contention between two of the civic authorities. He was like the man in the fable who had two wives, one old like himself and one young. The former liked to see his gray hairs and pulled out the black ones; the latter was of a contrary opinion, so ere long the poor man found himself without a hair at all.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN HAS A NARROW ESCAPE FROM THE DRAGOONS, BUT IS SAVED BY THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER, FAIR ANNIE.

MR. BLANDY turned round, and looked the governor sternly in the face.

"Mr. Tapner," he said, "I am sorry to have to say it in the presence of the prisoner and your subordinates, but nevertheless I shan't shrink from it on that account. The manner in which you have treated your prisoner is perfectly unjustifiable. Have him removed at once to another cell."

"Thank you, sir," said Tom King, rising and bowing as well as his heavy fetters would allow him. "I shall always be beholden to you, for no one is so susceptible of kindness as myself; I suppose, because I receive so little of it."

The sheriff was fairly taken aback when he heard this speech from the lips of a highwayman, and still more was he surprised at the gentlemanly air with which Tom spoke.

"You amaze me," he said. "Who are you?"

"What you see!" replied Tom, gloomily, for at that moment he reflected what he was.

"He—he!" laughed the governor. "Well done! Very well done, indeed."

"What do you mean?" said Mr. Blandy. "Give me your reason for treating this man, who in the eyes of the law is innocent, since he has not been convicted. I ask what is your reason for treating him with such rigour?"

"I—I told you, sir," stammered the governor. "He was violent, sir—very violent, so I had him put here for safety."

"He doesn't look much like a violent man. What did he do?"

"Assaulted me."

"Assaulted you! and he a prisoner. Impossible!"

"It is true for all that—he"——

"But what was his motive—what provoked him?"

"N-nothing!" stammered the governor, who discovered too late that it would have been best policy to have kept silent, and have said nothing in his extenuation.

"Will you excuse me?" said Tom King, interrupting the governor. "I should like you to be made acquainted with the facts of the case."

"Oh! certainly. Speak freely, my young friend."

"I have nothing to say," responded Tom King, "than that I was brought here strongly bound, and while incapable of lifting up my hand in my own defence, was grossly insulted by the governor here in the presence of his men.

"Indeed," said the sheriff, "is this so?"

"It is indeed, and can you wonder that I resented the insult in the only way that was left for me?"

"Certainly not. Mr. Tapner, I shall report this to the Secretary of State. It is not the first of these kind of offences that I have been made cognizant of. Call your man, and have these fetters taken off. He must then proceed at once to Bow Street, in order that the magistrate may duly commit him for trial."

"Very well, Mr. Blandy," said the governor, in a humble tone, "I am sorry I have displeased you, but all I sought was to make the prisoner quite secure. If you think I have overstepped my duty I cannot help it. Everybody, however, will do me the justice to say it was a mistake on the right side."

"That depends upon what you call the right side."

"Of his behaviour to me," said the governor, assuming a magnanimous air, "I shall say nothing."

"Very well, very well," said Mr. Blandy; "come along. It strikes me, after all, it is a case of six of one and half-a-dozen of the other."

Dixon, the smith, then came forward, and very soon freed Tom from the irons.

Short as was the time he had worn them, yet it was sufficiently long for them to cramp his limbs, and he stretched himself with a sensation of great relief.

A pair of handcuffs were placed upon his wrists, and then, escorted by the turnkeys, the governor, and Mr. Blandy, he was led out into the lobby of Newgate.

The man at the door opened it to allow them to pass out.

A hackney-coach, which happened to be passing, was called, and the sheriff, Tom King, and two officers, entered.

The governor they left standing on the threshold of the prison muttering inaudible curses on the head of Mr. Blandy.

It took the crazy vehicle a good quarter-of-an-hour to reach Bow-street, and when they drew up at the door of the court the day's business had already commenced.

Had Tom been an ordinary offender he would have had to have waited until the last, but as he was an extraordinary one, he was allowed the precedence.

The examination before the magistrates was more a matter of form than anything else, still it had to be gone through.

The justice on the occasion was one whose name was well known then, and is even at the present day.

It was Justice Fielding.

The daring depredations in which Tom had been mixed up had reached his ears, and after hearing a short statement of the capture from the officer of dragoons who was in attendance, he made out a warrant committing him to the sessions.

These would come off in exactly ten days from that time, so that Tom had at least an opportunity of doing something in his own behalf.

On the subject of the fetters and the dark cell at No. 26, not a word was said until the sheriff spoke to the officers as they were about to drive back to Newgate.

"Tell Mr. Tapner," he said, "that I shall look in again in the course of the day."

"Very well, Mr. Blandy. All right, sir."

The coach was driven off again to Newgate.

"And werry much obliged Mr. Tapner will be to you for your trouble," added the officer, as soon as they were out of the sheriff's hearing,—"werry much obliged to you indeed."

As the hackney-coach turned the corner of Bow-street into Long-acre a hope of escape sprang up in Tom's mind.

He was in a coach, and had two men only to contend against.

Yet, in that circumscribed space one man, let his courage and resolution be what they might, would be scarcely a match for two, and so after a minute or two's consideration, Tom thought himself, especially when he reflected, that a cry from one of his foes would bring scores of people to their assistance.

It was evident if anything was done in the way of escape it would be by stratagem, not force.

These thoughts quickly passed through Tom's mind, and before the coach got half-a-dozen yards further he had made up his mind what he was going to do.

The officers were sitting on the back seat with Tom between them.

King noticed that the one on his left hand had a rather more prepossessing physiognomy than the other, and therefore to him Tom addressed himself.

"I say, my friend," he said, "just listen to me."

"Well, what's the row now?"

"I suppose it's pretty certain what my fate will be at the Old Bailey next week?"

"Rather, I should say. Should you, Jacks?"

The officer who had been called Jacks gave a grunt by way of assent.

"Now, look here, my friends, you will excuse my calling you such?"

"Oh! stow your gammon.

"If you only feel inclined, I can make it well worth your while to look out at one side of the carriage while I get out at the other."

Both the officers shook their heads.

"No, no," they said. "It won't do. Oh! no, not at all."

"But I tell you it will. You won't get the reward if you do take me back, but on the contrary, if you let me go, you shall have a hundred pounds a piece."

The offer of this sum of money staggered the officers a little, and they hesitated.

Tom saw his advantage and hastened to follow it up.

"Take my advice and my offer. You must not hesitate much longer, or we shall get to Newgate, and then it will be too late."

"Well, then," said the officer named Jacks, "just hand us over the blunt."

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

TOM GETS UP AN ELABORATE PLAN OF ESCAPE, AND MEETS WITH A MISHAP.

"Ahem!"

"Eh?"

"Well, you see, dear Mr. Jacks——"

"Oh, stow that. Hand over the blunt."

"I would with all the pleasure in life, only you see there's a little obstacle in the way."

"Ha, ha!" said Jacks.

"He, he!" echoed his companion.

"Knowed how the case stood, didn't you?"

"In course."

Whereupon the two officers indulged in some more laughter.

"You're a bit too fast," said Tom. "Why don't you wait and hear what the obstacle is, when you know how precious time is."

"Oh! we knowed what the obstacle was afore you spoke."

"Oh! did you? Come now, what was it?"

"You ain't got the money."

"Not about me, I haven't."

"Well, what did I tell you?"

"But——"

"Oh! hold your row."

"Very well. It will be as good a thing for you as for me. I haven't got the money, as you say, but if you like you can order the man to drive where it is."

"Do you mean what you say?"

"Of course I do."

"Well, then, where is the money?"

"I'll tell you as soon as I have your consent. Do you agree?"

"Yes, provided it ain't far off."

"It isn't. You can understand, I daresay, without much trouble, that one way or another a good bit of money must come into my hands."

"Yes, I knows that."

"Well, I don't spend it all, and in various places I have hidden, in small portions, a very large sum of money. Now, not very far from here, I can take you to a place where you will find exactly the amount named."

"Two hundred pounds?"

"Just so."

"Go on then."

"But you must take your oath beforehand to keep your word with me."

"Oh! we takes the oath, that's understood."

"Then tell the man to drive to Theobald's-road, the end nearest Red Lion-square."

"Theobald's-road?"

"Yes, the end nearest Red Lion-square."

"You ain't up to no gammon?"

"Certainly not."

"We'll try you then. And I tell you for your own good, you had best not play us false."

"Nor you me," said Tom.

Mr. Jacks, who happened to be behind Tom, winked his eye at his comrade, who at once understood what was meant.

This was simply to take the money from Tom and then, so far from letting him free, keep him a prisoner.

But in this instance they were destined to overreach themselves in their cunning treachery, for Tom had no intention of giving them money at all, nor had, as the reader is aware, any money hidden anywhere.

The truth was, Tom was in such a desperate position that he could not by any means make things worse than they were, while there was just the bare prospect of making them better.

But it was a bare prospect.

The coachman, however, agreeable to the instructions of the officers, directed his vehicle to Theobald's-road.

Now Tom had fixed upon this place as being about the nearest solitary spot there was; for at the period of our story there were but few buildings in that direction.

The officers tried to get out of Tom whereabouts the treasure was, but he turned a deaf ear to the subject.

In a little while, however, the coach stopped.

Mr. Jacks alighted first.

Then he assisted out his prisoner, who was closely followed by the other officer.

"Tell the man to drive round the corner," said King. "I don't want him to know where it is."

There was nothing unreasonable in this, so the order was given at once.

"Now, Tom, no humbug," said Mr. Jacks, "Where is it?"

Tom assumed an air of great secresy and mystery.

His wrists were still confined by the handcuffs, but he did not think it would be over-wise to ask to have them taken off just at present.

On reaching a grating that was over a drain he stooped and tried to lift it from its position.

The officers looked at him with surprise, but Tom seemed so in earnest that their suspicions were allayed.

The iron grating or trap resisted, however, Tom's utmost efforts to lift it, so he was obliged to give up the attempt.

"You don't mean to tell us you have hidden your treasure in the sewer, do you?"

"I do."

"Nonsense!"

"It is all sense. A capital hiding-place, is it not?"

"I should never have thought of looking there."

"Nor any one else, that's the best of it. You must know that in the wall there is a brick out, and in the space is a little packet. That packet contains two hundred and fifty sovereigns."

"The deuce it does! but you said two hundred just now."

"Oh! did I? Then that was a mistake."

"And so you mean to say if we lift the trap, that we shall find the money in a hole in the side of the wall?"

"Exactly."

"Very well. Now, Jacks."

"But stop," said Tom, "take off my handcuffs, and then I will get it up for you. I have tried, but I can't with them on."

Mr. Jacks put his finger by the side of his nose.

"Oh! wouldn't you like it?" he said. "No, no, we'll lift the trap, and not trouble you about it."

"Oh! thank you for nothing; but it strikes me you have all the advantage on your side. I have trusted you, and you ought to trust me."

"Ha! ha! Now then, up with it."

By their joint exertions, the two officers strove to raise the grating.

They had, of course, to bend down to their task.

This was the opportunity for which Tom was watching, only he hoped that when it occurred his hands would be at liberty.

This was not the case, but he did the best he could under the circumstances.

That was, with great rapidity to push the two officers over into the roadway, and then dart off at full speed.

The position the officers were compelled to assume in order to lift up the grating favoured the execution of this feat to an enormous extent, and there is no question that if Tom's hands had been unfettered he would have got away entirely, but as it was it made ultimate escape a very doubtful affair.

Nevertheless the officers measured their full length in the road.

But they were rather used to surprises, so they were upon their feet again, and yelling at the tops of their voices, before Tom was fairly round the corner.

"Stop him!" they cried. "An escape! Stop him! A highwayman! A highwayman!"

But our friend, now that he knew speed was all that was required of him, got over the ground with extraordinary fleetness.

His foes, though, were very close upon his track, and being as it was middle day he was almost certain to meet a great many people, though then it was a neighbourhood little frequented.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN PAYS A VISIT TO THE COSTUMIER'S IN BOW-STREET, COVENT-GARDEN.

The cries of the officers in a very few minutes attracted those who were at a distance.

No one can have walked much in London and not been surprised at the rapidity with which a dense crowd collects. A few minutes is all that is required.

The wonder is where they all come from so quickly.

On this occasion, therefore, the officers were not long in getting a crowd about them, which increased every moment.

Tom King had taken that direction of the open country, and had every hope, could he but reach the green lanes and meadows which then lay north of King's-cross, that he should be able to baffle them completely.

The rage of Mr. Jacks and his brother officer can very easily be imagined. They had made sure of securing the money and retaining their prisoner all the same.

As it turned out, however, they got neither.

Tom certainly deserves a good deal of credit for evading them as he did. It is no easy thing to get up a plan on the spur of the moment.

Certainly the fiction about the money under the sewer grating was a good one.

He ran on unheeding his pursuers.

Ran as a man only can run when he is running for his life.

He made in his progress many a desperate tug at his handcuffs, but all to no purpose. He bruised his hands and rubbed the skin off, but he accomplished nothing more.

A very few attempts showed him the futility of trying to get free by such means, and so he turned the whole of his attention to running as quickly as his legs would carry him.

His pursuers kept up a terrible noise.

Tom turned his head over his shoulder and looked back.

He had certainly gained very little upon them.

But some yards in advance of all the rest he could see the two officers.

They were almost frantic.

In the first place they were wrong to have listened to the offer that was made to them, and then consenting to turn out of the way was a serious dereliction of duty, and for which they would be liable to a heavy and severe punishment.

Their exertions were something terrific, and they incited on the crowd who followed them by the most extravagant offers of reward.

Still they could do no more than keep the highwayman in sight, and they had considerable difficulty in doing that.

On went Tom with the speed of a hunted hare.

But, alas! his efforts to escape were destined to be of no avail.

At a sharp trot round a bend in the lane he is pursuing comes a troop of dragoons.

Tom could not control a cry of despair.

Those in the rear uttered a triumphant shout.

Of course Tom pulled up. Every step he took now would only have the effect of bringing him nearer to his foes.

We stated in a former number that all the roads about London were patrolled by different bodies of dragoon guards.

This was one of them.

From the elevated position they occupied on the backs of their horses, they were able to see at a glance the true state of affairs.

Tom was at bay.

He glared panting and breathless about him.

There was no escape.

With the instinct of despair, he made a dash at the hedge, and strove to scramble through, but the effort was a vain one.

He found it too closely planted for a cat even to have squeezed through.

Then in another moment his foes were upon him: those who were in advance—those who were in the rear.

Resistance was impossible. He was borne to the ground, and overpowered instantly.

Many ropes were cast about him, and he was pinioned most securely.

By some strange fatality, the troop of soldiers who had intercepted him were the self-same ones that had before captured him and brought him to Newgate.

The surprise of the commanding officer was excessive, but from neither of the two officers could he get the least information as to the manner in which Tom had got at liberty.

Poor Tom! surely his evil star is in the ascendant, and the good fortune which has hitherto so unvaryingly been his deserted him.

This time he was tied safely behind one of the dragoons, and so marshalled to Newgate.

At the prison the long absence of the highwayman and the officers had produced the utmost consternation, which, when the sheriff came to make some inquiries about him, rose to its full height.

Immediate search was made, but no trace could be found.

At last they encountered the troop having him a prisoner.

And so once again on that eventful day, was Tom King escorted by the soldiers into the vestibule of Newgate.

The joy that the governor felt at his having been captured was somewhat kept in check by Mr. Blandy.

To this gentleman Tom King was indebted for compelling the governor to put him in a clean and wholesome cell.

He did not, however, say a word against his being fettered. Perhaps he thought that only a measure of common prudence, considering the desperate and almost successful attempt at escape he had made

The cell door was closed, and Tom was left to his own reflections.

And gloomy enough they were, goodness knows.

There was, however, one comfort: he was not deprived of daylight. There was a barred window near the roof of the cell, and this admitted a tolerable quantity of light.

Tom was very much exhausted by the efforts he had made, and by all the varied incidents which had happened on that eventful day, and this seemed to have a corresponding depressing influence on his mind.

Such is very often the case.

The hours seemed to pass away very, very slowly. He was visited twice by a turnkey, who came for the double purpose of seeing that all was right, and bringing food to the prisoner.

Of the latter, though very coarse, Tom partook plentifully. He knew the importance of properly sustaining himself in case there should be a necessity for his making use of his bodily powers.

No further incident occurred during the remainder of the day; and when night and darkness came, Tom threw himself upon the miserable bed, and fell into a slumber, disturbed by extraordinary visions of dragoons, police-officers, and governors.

As for Jacks and his companion they were called upon to give an account of what had taken place after they left Bow-street, but this was done in such a rambling, contradictory, impossible way, that Mr. Tapner had them confined at once, in order to be taken before a magistrate to answer the charge of aiding and abetting the escape of a notorious criminal.

In vain they protested that such was not the case—that they had acted for the public good. Mr. Tapner was furious, and would listen to nothing, so Jacks and his friend were locked up in a cell until morning.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

DICK TURPIN ASSUMES QUITE A NEW CHARACTER, AND SUSTAINS HIS PART TO ADMIRATION.

Squire Edelton, the fair Annie, and Doctor Congreve looked at Dick with the utmost surprise. His consternation was apparent to everyone.

"But," said the squire to the lodge-keeper, "why did you refuse them admittance?"

"I—I didn't exactly refuse them, sir; but I didn't like to let them in without getting your sanction."

"Very well, then, let them in at once. They are quite welcome to search my house for the rascal. I only hope they'll catch him, that's all. But, Percy, my dear boy, what in the world is it that alarms you so?"

In good truth Turpin was in a state of terrible agitation.

He tried to move, but he was so weak, he found it to be an impossibility, and he sank back into his chair with a groan.

"Come—come," said the doctor, "it will never do for you to excite yourself in this way. You will make your wound positively dangerous."

The lodge-keeper was so anxious about his young master that he did not move to obey the orders which had been given him.

Dick raised his hand, and beckoning for the squire to approach him, with a great effort spoke.

The arm of fair Annie was thrown supportingly round his neck.

"My dear, kind sir," he said, "and you, my beautiful girl, I have that to say which will fill you with pain and sorrow, and turn your kindness into detestation."

Both looked as bewildered as they felt when they heard this speech, and anxiously waited to hear what more was to follow.

"Let me be alone with you both," continued Dick, "and I will explain all. I dare not hope that you will forgive me."

The squire made a sign for the doctor to retire, and perceiving that the lodge-keeper still stood upon the threshold of the door, he said:

"Admit the dragoons! Quick, why do you keep them at the gate?"

"Stay," cried Turpin, excitedly. "Do not, I pray you, send to them until you have heard what I have got to say. I will promise not to detain you many minutes."

"As you wish, my dear boy; but I do hope you will explain this extraordinary behaviour of yours."

"I will."

The greatest curiosity was now depicted upon the countenances of the squire and his daughter, and they bent eagerly forward to hear the next words which should fall from his lips.

It will be seen that they both still clung to the idea that Turpin was really what they had at first taken him to be.

But the first words Dick uttered dispelled the illusion.

"I am now," he said, in a solemn voice, "going to place my life in your hands. I have come here under false pretences. I am not your son, though I have passed myself off as such. I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman, of whom the soldiers at your gates are in chase."

At this revelation the squire fairly staggered back, while Annie withdrew her arm and clasped her hands together.

But Dick not giving them time to sufficiently recover from their surprise to speak, went on rapidly, though the effort was almost beyond him.

"Do not blame me too much for my impositions. I have been hunted and wounded by my foes for many hours. I eluded them, and, coming along the lane, was greeted by your daughter, who accosted me as her brother, whose arrival she had been all night expecting."

"Good heavens! Then my son——"

"One moment, sir, if you please," said Dick. "At first I was amazed, but, quickly recovering myself, can you wonder that under the circumstances I was prompted to do all in my power to favour the deception, since I knew that it was the best chance I should have of escaping from my foes. The rest you know already. The officers are at your gates thirsting for my blood. It rests with you whether you choose to surrender me wounded and helpless into their hands, or save me."

"No—no!" said Annie, "no—no! We cannot do that! It would be base indeed."

A faint smile came to Dick's lips as he heard the assurance of his safety.

"I knew you would save me! I was sure of it."

"But," said the squire, nervously, "I don't see!"

"You have nothing more to do," said Dick, "than to assure the dragoons, when they search the place, that I am your son. There is time to remove me to a bedchamber, and then suspicion will not be excited."

It is hard to say in what way the squire would have acted had he been left to himself. But his daughter spoke, and with him her will was law.

"Oh, yes, father! We must save him, indeed we must! Quick—quick! Run down to the gate and tell the dragoons they are free to search the place; and you, sir," she added, addressing Dick, "come with me!"

She took him by the arm as she spoke, and raised him to his feet.

Then, by her aid, he managed to stagger across the room.

The brain of the squire himself was in a perfect whirl. He was a simple-minded man, unused to excitement of any kind, and the startling character of the events which had just occurred was sufficient to utterly bewilder him.

"Heaven bless you!" said Dick, as with great difficulty he ascended the staircase. "Your disposition must be a gentle one indeed, or you would have resented the cruel cheat which I put upon you. But the love of life and liberty is a dominant feeling in the breasts of all, and to preserve those treasures a man will do what he would not think of doing under ordinary circumstances."

"I can understand that," said Annie, quietly. "But it grieves me to the soul to think that one so capable of better things, as I am sure you are, should have adopted such a course of life."

"Don't reproach me now," said Turpin. "Wait until you know all. When I am better, and this present danger has passed away, I will tell you everything, and I have, I fear, some intelligence to give you respecting Percy."

"My brother. Oh! speak—speak!"

"Not now—not now. And, hark! I can hear even now my pursuers are close at hand."

"In here—in here," said Annie, opening a door. "This is Percy's own room. I must leave you to shift for yourself."

"A thousand, thousand thanks for your kindness to me," said Dick, kissing the hand that had supported him. "Never shall I forget this day, or cease to feel grateful for the service you have done me."

Dick's words were uttered in such a plaintive and grateful tone of voice that the tears rose up into the eyes of the beautiful and generous girl who we see could feel pity for an outcast like Dick was.

Ashamed of her emotion she turned away, and Dick closed the door of the room in which he had been ushered.

It is wonderful what a power the mind has over the body. Although so weak that he could scarcely crawl, yet Dick was able, by an exertion of his will, to call up enough strength to undress himself, secrete his clothes under the mattress of the bed, and then get into bed himself.

When he laid down, such a sensation of deadly sickness came over him, that it seemed as though the world was slipping away from him.

The truth was he was upon the point of swooning, and so soon as this thought occurred to him, he was able to recall his scattered energies, and successfully repel the feeling.

He knew that should they enter and find him insensible, they would imagine him to be dead, and under that impression do or say something that would lead to his apprehension.

And so, although only semi-conscious, he lay there straining his sense of hearing to the utmost to know what was going on.

CHAPTER XC.

DICK TURPIN DISGUISES HIMSELF AS A FARMER, AND VISITS TOM KING IN HIS CELL AT NEWGATE.

As may naturally be supposed, the suspicions of the dragoons were excited by the long absence of the lodge-keeper, who had simply requested them to wait there, and not enter until he had informed his master.

But when they saw the old gentleman himself walking down to meet them with a face of sorrow, those suspicions were almost dissipated.

At his approach the officer dismounted from his steed, and, bowing respectfully to the squire, said—

"I regret the errand we have come upon, but the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin, has been traced to the immediate vicinity of your mansion, and there the traces end. We are empowered by law to search whatever places we may think proper, and it will be our duty to search your house and grounds."

"You are perfectly at liberty to do so," said the squire, "and I am sure from your behaviour hitherto that you will act with all possible consideration, especially when I tell you that my only son, just returned after a military service in India, is lying dangerously ill in the house, and any bustle or excitement might be productive of fatal results."

"You shall have nothing to fear on that head. We will take your word that the highwayman is not secreted in your house, and merely search through the grounds."

"Do so; I shall be obliged. And you, sir, can accompany me to the house yourself, while your men do the duty. It will be, I suppose, more satisfactory for you to go all over the house?"

"It would certainly, since then I should be able to speak with confidence; but, however, I cannot under the circumstances think of doing so."

"But you must, as a particular favour to myself, come with me, I beg. The pair of us can walk over the whole of the building without creating the least disturbance."

"I cannot refuse you," said the officer, and then turning to his men, he gave them instructions relative to searching the grounds.

The squire then put his hand on the officer's arm.

"You will excuse me," he said, "but my son's profession is the same as yours, and so you see I look upon you as a friend."

"You are very good," said the officer. "I can quite understand the feeling."

In this way, as though they had been friends from boyhood, they made their way along the avenue, across the lawn, and up the steps in front of the mansion.

On the threshold they met the squire's daughter, Annie.

It was evident that her great beauty made a deep impression upon the heart of the officer.

On her side, Annie could not fail to be struck with the handsome appearance of the soldier.

As may be expected, the officer did not walk over the house. He could not think of disturbing them so much, he said, and so he sat down in the drawing-room to drink a glass of wine.

He remained contentedly enough until one of his men presented himself with the report that, though they had searched the whole of the grounds, they could find no traces of the man they sought.

Upon receipt of this intelligence, the officer was obliged to take his leave, which he did with manifest reluctance.

And so the danger which had so menaced our hero passed away.

As the day advanced he got much better, and just at nightfall, to the surprise of the squire and his family, their strange guest came downstairs.

It was in vain they remonstrated with him, and entreated him to return to his bed. Dick would listen to nothing of the sort.

In fact, as he suffered only from loss of blood, his vigorous constitution quickly recovered, and though still weak, yet he was able to walk with firmness.

He insisted, then, upon the squire and his wife and daughter accompanying him into the drawing-room, and while there, he made the worthy family acquainted with those facts of which the reader is already cognizant.

The intelligence which Turpin gave them concerning the wreck of the Ranedeer filled their breasts with grief.

"And now," said Dick, "while heartily thanking you for the inestimable service you have conferred upon me, I am not without a hope, as you are in possession of the facts of the case, that you will forgive me for the imposition I have practised."

"We do," said Annie; "but oh! make now a promise to cease to be obnoxious to the laws."

"I cannot," said Dick. "Do not think me ungrateful. Through me my old comrade has been made a prisoner, and I conceive it to be my duty, as I caused his arrest, to set him free again, and I will do it."

There was so much firmness in the way Dick pronounced these words that they forebore to urge him further.

"To-night," he continued, "I set out for London. If you will direct me to the stable, I will saddle my mare and depart. May you forget there is in existence such a one as I am."

The warm sympathies of Annie's nature were all on the side of the highwayman, in whom she felt the greatest interest, and, therefore, she said—

"We shall never do that, but always be on the look-out to hear that you have done better."

"Farewell," said Dick, as he walked towards the door of the room, "farewell. Beneath this roof I have met with more kindness than I have done in the whole of my previous career."

Then hastily leaving the apartment, and not allowing the squire or his daughter to make any further remark, he directed his steps towards the servant's offices.

In a few minutes afterwards the squire heard the clatter of horse's hoofs, and he knew the famous highwayman had gone.

Then, being left alone, all three gave way to their grief for the untimely fate of the much-loved Percy.

CHAPTER XCI.

DICK TURPIN MAKES EVERY EFFORT TO RESCUE HIS FRIEND TOM KING.

TWENTY-FOUR hours after the event we have just related a man, whose clothes were dragged with mud, walked with a slow and unsteady footstep along that part of Russell-street, Covent-garden, which leads from Drury-lane to Bow-street.

Upon reaching Crown-court he turned up it, and then passing into Martlett's-court emerged into Bow-street, just opposite where the Floral-hall now stands.

He leaned for a moment against the corner of the court and looked up and down the street.

At that hour few people were abroad, and the street itself was almost in utter darkness.

A little lower down on the left of where he stood was the Bow-street police-station.

It could be recognized by the lamp which was burning over the door.

This man, who thus stood at the corner, was our old friend Turpin.

He had accomplished in safety the journey between Squire Edelton's and London.

He had taken up his quarters with Matthew Gale, the landlord of the "White Horse," in Drury-lane,

His present errand was to a costumier's at the corner of Hart-street, from whom he wished to purchase a disguise, and he had chosen that silent hour of the night to steal out of White Horse-yard and reach it unobserved.

Feeling satisfied that no enemies were lurking about, Dick crossed the road, and in another instant was standing at the door of the shop he sought.

It was closed, but of that circumstance Turpin took no notice. Old Matthew had given him full instructions, and he rang a bell, the handle of which was placed almost out of sight in the carving of the door-post.

After a minute or so's delay the door was opened, and a little decrepit old man appeared upon the threshold.

He carried in his hand a candle, which he shielded from the draught with his hand.

A few words sufficed to let him know what Dick wanted and with many obeisances he ushered him into his shop.

"I can suit you exactly, sir," he said, "and I am very glad to have the opportunity of doing a favour for my friend, Mr. Gale. Anyone that he sends here must be welcome."

"I want," said Dick, "a first-rate disguise. Do not trouble about payment, I can assure you that it will be enough to satisfy you."

"Just so, sir. What kind of costume would you like, sir?"

"That is a matter I have scarcely considered. I shall leave it to you to make me look as different as you can. That is the chief object."

"You mean, sir, I take it, disguise you so effectually that your most intimate friend would fail to recognize you?"

"Just so. Do that and you shall have such a reward as you have never hoped for."

"Come into my room, if you please, sir. You see I am a lonely man, with neither kith nor kin, so the place is not so tidy as it might be."

The room into which the old costumier ushered Dick certainly was not so tidy as it might be, as the old man had it. In fact, it was littered with articles of every description.

The costume which this singular being chose for Dick, was one such as was worn by north-country farmers at the period.

When Dick simply put on the clothes it made a wonderful difference to him, but the costumier did not stop there. He cut Dick's hair close to his head, and fitted on a wig of long silvery-looking hair.

"I have done a great deal in this way, sir. When I was younger I used to dress the characters before they went on the stage, and there was no one could make up like me. Just hold up your face to the light, sir, if you please."

Dick did so, and then the old man proceeded to cover it with a very thin solution of some kind which in a minute gave his skin the appearance of extreme old age.

Next he very skilfully with a fine brush drew some lines and then shaded them, and with so much art that no one would have thought they were other than actual wrinkles unless by means of his touch he had satisfied himself upon the point.

The old man seemed to take the greatest possible delight in his work, and he paused every now and then to admire his own skill.

Nearly three hours were consumed before he pronounced Dick ready.

He then led him into the shop, and made him stand before a large mirror that was there.

When Turpin saw his reflected image he uttered a cry of disbelief, so utterly changed was he.

It was a strange feeling that, but there was nothing about him to assure him of his identity.

When, however, after rummaging in a corner the costumier found an old cross-handled walking-stick and Dick by his instructions bent his back and leaned totteringly upon it, the disguise was indeed perfect.

"I shall fear nothing now," he muttered. "I shall run not the slightest risk! Thanks, old man!" he added aloud, "this will be a good night's work for you."

As he spoke, he pressed into his skinny hands twenty guineas.

"I am glad you are satisfied, munificent sir," said the costumier. "I shall be glad always, for the sake my old friend, to do what I can for you."

"Say no more! What time is it?"

"Close upon four, sir."

"No later?"

"No earlier, sir," said the old man, with a smile. It will be daylight soon. All you will have to do will be to recollect you are an aged man, and walk accordingly."

"Fear nothing! and now, if you will allow me, I will go! Good night!"

"Good morning! noble sir!" said the old man, as he held open the door of the shop. "Good morning!"

Taking care, as the old man had directed him, to keep up the appearance of the character he had assumed, Dick walked slowly in the direction of the "White Horse."

"It will be a good test of the efficacy of this disguise if old Matthew is unable to penetrate it," he muttered. "I will try."

The "White Horse" was one of those public-houses where the greatest business is done during the night, so that when Dick arrived, he found it much the same as he had left it.

He tottered up to the bar, and said, in a capitally assumed voice—

"Can you let me have a bed to-night, guv'ner?"

"Matthew was as usual standing at the counter, and though he looked curiously at Dick, yet he did not recognize him.

"No," he said, "we don't let beds."

"Oh! gammon!" said Turpin, in his natural voice, "open the door and let me in!"

"Good gracious!" gasped Matthew. "It's actually the Squire. Well, I will say this, my old friend hasn't forgotten his art, that's quite clear!"

"Be cautious," said Turpin, looking warily about him.

"Oh! it's all right. Come in."

Matthew held open the little half-glass door leading into the bar and Dick entered.

The worthy landlord's admiration at the excellence of Dick's disguise knew no bounds.

"Oh! it's first-rate," he said. "You run hardly any risk if you'll only be careful."

"Risk or no risk," said Turpin, "I mean to pay Tom King a visit, and if I don't get him out of the prison it's very odd to me. It's my duty, and I'll do it."

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL ARE ATTACKED BY THE BOAT'S CREW.

"Then, if that's the case, he's safe enough,"

"I hope so."

"Dick, my boy, I like you more than ever. It is no often we find anyone as will stand by a friend at a pinch."

"Perhaps not, but there are few, I think, who can boast of having such a friend as Tom King."

"Oh! he's one of the right sort, I know," said old Matthew, "though I haven't seen much of him myself."

"That pleasure has yet to come."

"But, now, tell me this. I haven't mentioned it before, but what is the plan of operations you have sketched out?"

"To tell you the truth I don't know. I was going to consult with you upon the subject."

"Very good. I think it will be in my power to be of more assistance to you than you think for."

"I am glad to hear it. And now tell me what you should advise?"

The worthy landlord reflected for a moment.

"Just come in this back-room a little while in case anyone should happen to come in."

"It will only be prudent."

"That's true enough, and I never know when a robin might pop in. But as for this little room, it's quite private, and we can talk there without fear of being interrupted or overheard."

While speaking, old Matthew ushered Dick into a small parlour, which was consecrated to the use of himself and his very special friends.

"Charlotte! Charlotte!" he said, "look to the bar."

Then he closed the door of communication, and going to the sideboard, took from it two decanters of wine and some glasses, which he placed on the table near his friend.

This done, he took a seat nearly opposite to him.

"Pour out a glass, Dick, lad," he said. "It ain't possible to talk business with a dry mouth."

Turpin poured out a glass for himself, and one also for the landlord, and then he said—

"Now, Matthew, my friend, there is no time to lose. Let us begin."

"With all my heart. The first thing I want to ascertain is your motive for going to Newgate?"

"My motive?"

"Yes, is it simply a visit of condolence, or do you intend to give him some assistance towards making his escape?"

"Why the latter, most certainly."

"Very well, then. Now do you suppose you will be able to walk off with him under your arm?"

Dick laughed.

"Not exactly; but I know very well what you mean."

"Of course you do. It is no good your running such a frightful risk as venturing into Newgate without you accomplish some good by it."

"True. Now, Matthew, pray speak out. I know, from your way, as well as if you told me, that you have some capital plan in your head."

"No. I can't exactly say I have; but I think, if we put our heads together, we shall easily enough be able to concert one."

"That's sense."

"Now, the first thing is the going into Newgate. Have you justly calculated the amount of danger you will be likely to encounter?"

"Not I," said Dick, carelessly. "It is time enough to think about danger when danger comes."

Old Matthew shook his head.

"You are too reckless by half."

"And all the better," replied Dick, for I do believe if I had stopped to be cautious, and such like, I should have been nabbed long ago."

"Perhaps you are right. However, let us confine ourselves to the subject we have in hand. In the first place, are you known by any of the officials at Newgate?"

"Not that I am aware of."

"That is a point in your favour, then. You may rest assured that every visitor Tom King has will be very closely scrutinized indeed, and you must take care that they do not penetrate your disguise."

"Trust me for that."

"You will observe, Dick, that all along I have avoided saying anything to dissuade you from going on your perilous errand, because I believe it to be useless. Your mind seemed to be quite made up."

"And not only that," said Turpin, "I consider it a point of honour to visit him, and run every risk in the endeavour to accomplish his escape. It was through me he got into the hands of the grabs, and it shall be through me that he gets out of them."

"That's a proper enough feeling, I do not pretend to deny," said the landlord, "but it's carrying it to an excess, I rather think."

"Pho! pho!"

"Ah! you may pho! pho! as much as you like; but look here."

"Well."

"You said just now I had some plan in my head."

"I know I did."

"Well, I hadn't, but, what was pretty much the same thing, I had something to propose."

"What was it? Quick! tell me!"

"Oh! don't be impatient. All I wanted to do was to suggest a little improvement in your plan."

"I shall be thankful to you for it."

"Shall you. That's all right then. Now look here, I am an older man than you."

"I don't dispute that for a moment."

"I could play the part of Tom's father first-rate, better than you could, I conceit myself."

"No, no, Matthew, that won't do."

"What won't?"

"Why, you want to persuade me into letting you go instead of me, but it won't do, I tell you."

"But I tell you it will. They won't suspect me for a moment, for I should go in my natural character."

"You won't go at all. I am quite resolved upon this point, Matthew, so let us waste no more words about it. My determination is, despite the peril, to see Tom King myself, and to tell him that I will free him if I have to pull Newgate down, stone by stone, to do it."

"I suppose you will have your own way," said Matthew, as he coolly poured out another glass of wine.

"You are right. I have every confidence in my disguise, and in my own capabilities to sustain the action of the part I have assumed. You now know my irrevocable determination. There is yet some time before the prison gates will be open, and let us occupy that interval in reducing to shape and method some plan for Tom's escape."

CHAPTER XCII.

OLD MATTHEW, THE LANDLORD, DISPLAYS INVENTIVE POWERS OF NO MEAN ORDER.

"NOTHING will please me better," replied Matthew Gale. "Let us try to think of something good."

"My rude idea was," said Turpin, "to convey to Tom some tools that would enable him to free himself from his fetters, for that they will iron him heavily I have not the smallest doubt."

"You may depend they will."

"A file or two would at any rate be useful to him; but I must confess I was rather puzzled to know how to convey them to him. I suppose when I enter the lobby I shall be searched."

"You will, and not only that, a turnkey will be present during your interview with him, whose special duty it will be to see that nothing passes from you to the prisoner."

"Ah! that makes it awkward, does it not?"

"It does."

"Now, I'll tell you how I thought of managing to overcome the difficulty. Let me hear whether you think it feasible."

"I am all attention."

"I thought of secreting a couple of spring files in the lining of my hat. You see it is stiffened with wire, and so they would be most likely passed over unnoticed. What do you think?"

"I think so, too, but there is a chance they might be discovered. They are sharp chaps there, and down to every move."

"I suppose so."

"And then, supposing you got in with the files all right, how should you manage to convey them to Tom?"

"Well that would entirely depend upon circumstances. I should contrive to let him know what I had brought, and where they were, and drop my hat carelessly somewhere: then he might either abstract them while I was talking or pick my hat up and give it me, and take them out at the same time, as opportunity offered."

"It's a very good scheme, but"—

"Ah! is there a but in it?"

"There is."

"What is it?"

"I think a better could be found."

"Do you? then that's as good as saying you have thought of one. What is it?"

"You have divined the fact, Dick, I confess; I have thought of a plan, but whether you will think the same about it as I do is more than I can tell you. However, you shall hear it."

"I'd wager my head it's something uncommonly good."

"Don't be too sanguine about it, for fear it should fall short of your expectations."

"Pray tell it me, and do not keep me in suspense any longer."

"You know the Old Bailey, of course?"

"You mean the street?"

"Yes."

"I know it very well."

"Then did you ever notice on the side opposite to the prison a shop where they sell meat pies?"

"I can't say I did."

"Well never mind, that don't matter. There is a meat pie shop there, and it is kept by a man named Elisha Coles."

"But I don't see"—

"What that has got to do with it, you were going to say."

"I was."

"Stop a moment, and you shall hear. Mr. Coles is a very old and very particular friend of mine."

"Oh!"

"His shop is very much frequented by the prison officials. In fact, his principal customers."

"So I suppose."

"And not only do a great many come in there and eat a small pie while they stand at the counter, but those who are on duty are in the habit of sending over for one of the large pies that he makes, and which is enough for dinner for three men."

"But what on earth"—

"Hold your noise, and don't interrupt. Now, Mr. Coles, as I said before, is a very great friend of mine."

"Hang it, I know you did; make haste."

"And what is more, I am a great friend of Mr. Coles."

The landlord was amusing himself a little at the expense of Dick's impatience.

"Now what are you trying to say?"

"Simply this; when you go to visit Tom, stay some time, and then send over for one of my friend Coles's pies."

"And how on earth would that benefit me?"

"Can't you see?"

"No, I'll be shot if I can."

"Then you're not so discerning as I took you to be, that's all. I shall take advantage of my friend Coles's friendship."

"In what manner?"

"I'll tell you. I'll go to him, and get him to bide a couple of files in the crust of one of his pies."

"Ha! I see now."

"You do?"

"Yes."

"What do you think of the scheme?"

"Oh! it's capital; but"—

"Is there a but in my plan as well as in yours?"

"There is, and a good-sized but, too."

"Tell me what it is."

"Why, supposing your friend put the saws in the pie-crust, how is he to know which one to give?"

"Oh! you leave that to him; he'll manage that without any trouble at all. You have only got to send out for a pie, and when it comes, you may rely upon there being a couple of the best steel saws in London in the crust of it."

"Then, of course," said Turpin, as the excellence of the stratagem became more and more patent to him, "it will be easy to sit down to eat this pie, but how shall I know in what part of the crust the saws are?"

"You will easily be able to tell that; I will get him to put some little ornament on it—you know what I mean—and just above where the saws are there shall be two of these dough ornaments stuck together."

"Very good, Matthew," said Turpin, in a tone of exultation, "it is really wonderful how you get over the difficulties. I don't know whether it's an original idea, but whether it is or not it is the best I ever heard of. Why there will be no trouble in the affair at all now, if you can only insure the right pie being sent to the right persons."

"You let Coles alone for that."

"I will."

"Then you think it better than taking them in the hat?"

"A thousand times better, Matthew, a hundred thousand times! It is the cleverest thing I ever heard of."

Old Matthew's eyes sparkled, for he was no exception to human nature generally, and it is always sweet to be commended.

"And yet it is so simple."

"That, in my opinion, is the best part of it. And now, to make your mind quite easy upon the whole affair, I will tell you how Coles will arrange about the pie."

"Ah! do tell me that. As you say, it will be an additional satisfaction."

"Besides which I have thought of a means by which you can assist him."

"Let us hear, then, by all means."

"You must remember the part you are to personate is that of a north country farmer. Now they have a peculiar way of speaking which I daresay you can imitate pretty well."

"Pretty well."

"As you must be aware, too, they have peculiar ways of expressing themselves."

"I know they have."

"Very well then you order the pie, tell the man to [illegible] baked."

"Slack baked?"

"Yes. Don't forget. It means one that is only slightly or partially baked. Not browned, you understand?"

"Oh! I see."

The expression is not altogether uncommon in London here, owing to the many country people that are constantly visiting it. Now, when the turnkey asks for a pie slack baked, Coles will at once comprehend it is for you."

"Just so."

"You won't forget, or make any mistake?"

"Oh! no, it is a common enough expression where I come from."

"Where is that?"

"Essex."

"Oh! indeed. Then so much the better. Then to make quite certain, Coles will make some remark to the turnkey as to who wants a slack baked pie, and then ten to one if the man don't tell him it is for Tom King's father, who has come to visit him."

"And then, of course, Coles will have no hesitation in handing him the pie that has the saws concealed in the crust."

"None, as you say."

"Matthew, I should never have given you credit for managing an affair with so much skill. It's really first-rate, and does you infinite credit."

"Oh! don't say any more about it. Fill up your glass, and let us drink success to the scheme."

"With all the pleasure in life. And now, having arranged all this so very satisfactorily, what had we better do?"

"Lie down and get an hour or two's rest. It is only a little after six now, and they won't admit you to the prison until ten."

"Be it so, then. My mind now is quite at rest, and I shall be none the worse for three hours' sleep, and I know I can take it in safety under your roof."

"You can. Depend upon it, I will give you timely notice of the approach of any danger."

"I do not anticipate any," said Turpin.

"No, nor I; but still it is best to be prepared."

"It is, for when it does come it comes most unexpectedly."

"You will be able to find your way to your old chamber, I suppose?"

"You mean the one I slept in last night."

"Yes, and that night when you came here half scared and badly wounded."

"Oh! I can find my way there easily enough. Good morning, and many thanks."

"Don't mention it, I beg."

"I can trust to you to see about the pie."

"You can. Depend upon me."

"I know I can with safety do so. Good morning."

Turpin made his way upstairs, and entering the room which had been set aside for his own use, he threw himself upon the bed, dressed as he was, and in five minutes was sound asleep.

CHAPTER XCIII.

INFORMS THE READER TO WHAT EXTENT OLD MATTHEW'S SCHEME WAS SUCCESSFUL.

Few are there, we imagine, who have not noticed how great an influence the mind has over sleep. To go to bed with a resolution to rise at a certain hour is sufficient to cause one to wake about that time. How this is it is impossible to say, but it is a fact nevertheless.

Such was the case with Dick in the present instance. When he laid down on the bed the last thing about which he thought was that he must wake up at nine in order to pay his promised visit to Newgate.

Exactly to the minute he opened his eyes, but he could tell he had not had a sufficient quantity of sleep to thoroughly refresh him. Nevertheless, his intention was uppermost in his mind, and he sprang to his feet.

It took him but a few minutes to adjust his attire, and then, having every appearance of a venerable country farmer, he descended the stairs, and entered the bar.

As he fully expected, he found Matthew had already gone out. His errand would, of course, be to his friend the pie-maker in the Old Bailey.

Dick Turpin's heart was light when he turned away from the "White Horse."

Already he saw in his mind's eye Tom King once more in freedom, for that he would manage to make an escape he did not entertain the smallest doubt.

But, notwithstanding his elation of spirits, he was not oblivious of the fact that he was to personate a feeble old man, and he walked along with a slow and staggering gait accordingly, supporting himself upon the strong cross-handled stick with which the costumier in Covent-garden had supplied him.

More than one person turned a curious and inquisitive glance upon him, which made Dick apprehensive to a degree.

And yet his fears were groundless.

It was not any inconsistency or imperfection of his disguise that caused the people to look. It was his old-fashioned attire.

But these gazers had the natural effect of making Dick less reliant upon his disguise than he was, which was a pity, as his over-caution might be provocative of suspicion.

Just as he passed under Temple Bar a thought struck him, and he immediately proceeded to act upon it.

At the very next public-house he came to, which was at the corner of Chancery-lane, he stopped.

He walked slowly up to the bar, and called for gin.

As he was served with it he put down the money, and at the same time inquired whether they would put half-a-pint in a bottle for him.

He said this in such a mysterious way that a smile came over the face of the young woman at the bar, besides which, she was tickled at the idea of anyone asking such a question, and she set him down for a rokel at once.

The half-pint bottle of spirit was produced, and Dick paid for it, and left the house.

"Ha! ha! This will throw those stupid Newgate fellows off the scent, I rather think."

What Dick meant will be quickly enough seen.

He walked gently down Fleet-street, and up Ludgate-hill.

Then round the corner into the Old Bailey.

As he reached the door at which prisoners were admitted, he glanced at St. Sepulchre's clock, and saw that it was nearly twenty minutes past ten.

He tapped timorously at the wicket.

Little did Dick ever think that he should voluntarily seek an entrance into Newgate; and if anyone had told him the day would come when he would walk up to the very portal, and knock at it with the broad light of day looking at him he would have ridiculed the idea as most improbably absurd.

And yet there he was.

Strange things do come to pass.

The surly door-keeper dashed aside the little sliding panel that covered a small aperture in the door defended by twisted iron bars.

"What's the row now, eh?" he growled.

Dick set up a capital imitation of an old man's voice.

"Alas! alas!"

He shook his head tremulously, and forced some moisture into his eyes."

Bang went the little panel.

Turpin repeated the summons.

It was disregarded.

He knocked again, but somewhat louder.

The janitor appeared again.

"Be off with you," he said, "or I will give you in charge. There's no vagrants allowed about this place."

"Kind, good sir," said Dick, submissively. "Thomas, Thomas! my son Thomas!"

"Eh?"

"My son Thomas—my poor weak, misguided son, good sir."

"Oh! you want to see some one, eh? Why didn't you say so at first. I thought you came begging."

"That was a little mistake, noble sir."

"Bah! Who do you want?"

"Thomas!"

"Go to the deuce. Who's Thomas?"

"My poor son."

"Thomas who, idiot?" roared the jailer.

"King, good sir. Thomas King."

"Eh, what? Do you mean to say Tom King the high toby-man is your son?"

"Alas! yes," replied Dick, in a still more lachrymose voice.

"And you want to see him?"

"Even so. That is with your permission, kind sir."

"Oh! bother. Come in."

The ponderous door was opened to the extent of a few inches, and Dick, with many sighs and groans and shakes of the head, made his way into the lobby.

"Here, Winch," cried the jailer to one of his companions, who was sitting on a bench at a few yards' distance. "Here's this old fogy come to see Tom King."

The man who had been named Winch, and who, for a wonder, possessed what few Newgate officials did, an unforbidding countenance, gave a grunt and rose to his feet.

"This way," he said. "But stop a minute, what have you got about you?"

"About me?"

"Yes. Have you got anything hidden in your clothes? I must search you."

"No—no—good sir—very good sir—no—no—don't, I beg."

"Ah! you're frightened, are you? That shows you've got something hidden about you."

"No—indeed, no."

Dick acted being in a state of nervous trepidation to perfection.

Winch, however, with a look of great sagacity on his face, walked up to the suppositious old man, and in a very experienced way felt all over his clothing.

At last he came to a pocket that was in the breast of the coat, and where Dick had placed the bottle of gin.

The feel at once told him what it was.

"Ha! ha!" he said, as he drew it forth despite the feeble resistance Dick made to his doing so. "Gin, eh? We never allows no spirits to be taken in."

"Oh! think of my poor son, good sir, in his cold cell, and let his wretched father take him a little comfort. Do, good, kind sir—do!"

"No, its against the rules. I'll put it here, and you can have it when you go away."

"Thanks, good sir. But is it against the rules for you to have it?"

"Well, I don't know as it is," said Winch.

"Then," replied Dick, "if my poor boy can't have it do you. I could not bear the idea of no one having it. Its the very best old Hollands."

"Schiedam?"

"That's it. I always drink it myself, and I know my poor boy likes it. Alack! alack! that ever I should live to see this day. Alack! alack!"

"Come, come, old chap, don't take on so," said Winch, who was considerably mollified by the present of the half-pint of gin. "He may get off all right. This way, sir. You can take hold of my arm, if you like."

"Many thanks, sir, many thanks; I am getting old now, very old."

"You'll outlive many of the young ones yet," said Winch, with a peculiar smile, as he, with Dick leaning on his arm, entered those gloomy corridors leading to Tom's dungeon.

CHAPTER XCIV.

DICK FINDS THE VERY ATMOSPHERE OF NEWGATE IS FULL OF PERIL TO HIM.

Could but some unseen power have whispered to Winch, the turnkey, that it was no other than the famous highwayman, Dick Turpin, who was leaning on his arm, how utterly astounded he would have been, and what an entire change would have taken place in his demeanour.

But it so happened that not the faintest breath of suspicion dimmed his mind, which may be attributed not only to the excellency of the disguise, but to the admirable manner in which Dick had played his part.

His imitation of a timid, humble decrepit old man was really wonderful.

A few minutes brought them to the door of the cell in which Tom King was confined, and Winch undid the complicated fastenings, and pushed it open.

One keen glance was sufficient to enable Dick to take in a distinct idea of the position of the locks and bolts.

Then he stepped into the cell.

Winch followed close at his heels, but still stood only on the threshold.

He amused himself by swinging his monster bunch of keys to and fro.

The cell, of which Tom was so unwilling an occupant, though not what could with propriety be called comfortable, yet was so when compared with some of the others in the prison.

The floor, which was composed of large flag stones, was dry and clean and so, too, were the walls, while a grated window near the roof permitted entrance to a moderate amount of light.

But although Dick noted all these things, the principal portion of his attention was riveted upon his comrade.

Tom was sitting in a dejected-looking attitude upon his bed. His head was bent, and his eyes rested on the floor beneath his feet.

Heavy irons hampered his limbs, and made motion of any kind a matter of great difficulty.

And now Dick ran the principal danger.

It was in the highest degree probable that Tom, from his intimate acquaintance with Turpin, would penetrate his disguise, and, under the impulse of the moment, either say or do something that would rouse the suspicions of the turnkey.

The risk had to be run.

So immersed was Tom King in his meditations, that he did not appear cognizant of the fact that any one had entered his dungeon, nor did he lift his head until Winch said, in loud tones—

"A visitor!"

Tom looked up.

He gave a sudden start as his glance fell upon Turpin.

He knew him instantly.

His very lips turned pale.

But ere he could any further commit himself, Dick spoke—

"Tom! Tom! Alas! alas! my poor son—that ever I should have lived to see you like this. My poor, poor boy."

Brief as was the time it took for Turpin to utter these words, yet it was long enough to allow Tom to recover from the first shock of his surprise, and make him aware under what title it was that Turpin had paid him this visit.

He did not trust himself to rise and speak though, but merely assumed his former cast-down attitude.

Dick seated himself by his side on the rude pallet, and, taking his hand in his own, he said, in the same well-assumed tones—

"Ah! Thomas, Thomas! I knowed this would be the end; I was sure of it. I shall die a miserable old man and it will be all your fault. But I won't reproach thee, lad. I see you're down-hearted now, so I won't say another word. I won't, Thomas, I won't."

Winch was pretty well used to this kind of thing in reality, and yet he did not perceive in this instance that it was spurious.

He lingered a minute just inside the door of the cell, and then went out into the passage, where he solaced himself with an instalment of the bottle of gin.

The strict letter of his duty was to remain present during the interviews between prisoners and their visitors. But this was merely to see that nothing was handed to them in the shape of tools or spirits.

Winch in this instance felt sure he had nothing to fear on either of these grounds, his search had been so very systematic; and as he was quite tired of hearing reproaches and sorrowful replies, he gladly enough betook himself to the corridor.

No sooner had he gone than Tom opened his mouth to speak, but Turpin, by an expressive gesture, stopped him.

"I know what you are going to say," he whispered, "but never mind it. Listen to me, there is no time to lose."

"The risk" ——

"I know all that. Silence! I have come here in order that you may effect your escape."

"How—how!"

"Be patient. What could you do if you had two steel spring saws?"

"Two steel spring saws? Anything. With a crowbar get out of Newgate."

"Speak lower, the turnkey may be listening. As yet he has no suspicions."

"Your disguise is certainly an excellent one."

"But it did not deceive you."

"Oh! no."

"You knew me at the first glance."

"I did."

"But that is nothing. Listen to my plan."

"I am all attention."

"I shall send out for a pie."

"A pie?"

"Yes, a meat pie. In the crust of which will be hidden the two saws of which I spoke."

"I see."

"I will cut the pie, and manage to give you the right portion. I must leave it to your own legerity to take them out, and secrete them somewhere."

"You may safely do so. Oh! Dick, my friend, I was beginning to despair, but now you have filled me with new hope."

"That is well."

"With two such tools much I am certain can be done, and it will go hard if I do not work my way to freedom."

"That is the way to speak. Resolve upon accomplishing your aim, and you have more than half succeeded."

"I know it."

"And now for the pie."

"Be careful, Dick."

"You can trust me."

"Yes, but recollect for the last few minutes you have been speaking to me with your own voice—in a whisper, it is true, but still with your own voice. I merely asked you to be careful lest you should forget yourself."

"Thanks, my friend; your caution is welcome. Now I am on my guard."

"That is well."

Dick rose from his sea .

He made his way towards the door.

The turnkey was leaning with his back against the wall of the corridor at a few paces from the door of the cell.

He was taking another sip at the bottle of gin.

Dick Turpin walked close up to him, and then said in the humble clinging tones he had at first adopted—

"My kind, good sir——"

Winch was so intent upon what he was about that he did not notice Dick's approach, and when he heard a voice at his elbow he gave a great start, and, as a natural consequence, spilt ever so much of the gin.

"Confound you," he said, in a great rage. "What do you want now?"

"A thousand pardons, good, kind sir, a thousand pardons. I made sure you heard my footstep. Oh! how sorry I am to see such good liquor wasted!"

"Not half so sorry as I am."

"But sir—good sir. My poor son is hungry."

"Oh! he be d—d!"

"If you please, good sir. But when he said he was hungry, he put two or three things in my head."

"Yes, curse it, and one of them was to come out in the passage, and speak to me and make me lose half the bottle of gin."

"Believe me, kind sir, I am very sorry. But there are worse losses in the world than that, because it is one that can be repaired."

"Well, yes, I suppose it can," said Winch. "But will you repair it, that's the point?"

CHAPTER XCV.

IN WHICH TWO NEW AND VERY IMPORTANT CHARACTERS ARE INTRODUCED TO THE READER OF THIS HISTORY.

"Kind sir."

"Oh! don't be so infernally polite, but say at once."

"I will."

"You will?"

"I certainly will."

"Replace the bottle of gin."

"With pleasure, good sir."

"No, not with pleasure, but with another bottle."

"That's what I mean."

"Then it don't so much signify, does it?"

"It does not, as you say, kind sir. But to go back to the remark I was about to make."

"Yes, yes."

"When you interrupted me."

"Confound it, yes!"

"My poor son Tom said he was hungry."

"You said that before."

"I know I did; but what a dreadful thing it is to be hungry and have nothing to eat!"

"I don't doubt it, but he can have plenty of bread and water at dinner-time, so that isn't his case."

"True, kind sir, but that is as good as nothing. Besides, it is a long time to wait."

"Well, what do you want?"

"I am telling you, my very good sir."

"Then why don't you make haste?"

"I am, good sir, but I am getting old, you see, and infirm, and if"——

"I tell you what it is, old cock, if you don't say what you want at once, I'm"——

"When he said—that is, my poor unhappy, deluded son Tom—said he was hungry, it brought to mind that, as I passed down the street on the opposite side of the way, I saw there a shop where they sold the most luscious-looking pies."

"Coles'?"

"That may be his name, kind sir. I don't say it isn't."

"Then you know the shop I mean?"

"In course I do; everybody in the prison knows it. Why, we have a matter of thirty or forty pies from there every day."

"Indeed. How singular. Why you must be first-rate customers of his."

"I rather believe it, we are; but have you gone all this long way round to say you wanted one of his pies?"

"That is what I wanted to say, kind sir; but I wished to make so bold as to make a suggestion or two."

"Out with them, then."

"Why, I thought, that though my poor boy was hungry, yet you might not be, and still——"

"Still what?"

"That if I send for a large pie you would not mind helping us eat it."

"I should have no objection in the world; and if so be you want a pie fetched, why just fork over the chink, and you shall have one in five minutes."

"The chink? What do you mean by chink, good sir?"

"Why, how jolly green you must be. Chink means money, and money means chink."

"Oh I see," said Dick, with that vacant kind of smile, which one often notices upon the faces of the aged.

As he spoke he took from his pocket a small leather bag.

He undid the string with which it was fastened, and pulled out half-a-guinea.

"Take this, kind sir, and buy a pie. A large one, and you can buy yourself another drop of gin with the change, if you will be good enough to do so, kind sir."

"Oh, won't I, that's all."

"You will?"

"Rather. Do you know I looks upon you as one of the right John Bull sort."

"I am glad," said Dick, in his humblest tones, "that I have found favour with you, good sir."

"All right. Here, Hilton! Hilton!"

"Who's Hilton, excellent sir?"

"A man that runs of errands. Oh, here he comes."

An old, white-haired man, in a threadbare suit of rusty black, came at a shuffling trot along the passages.

"Here, Hilton," said Winch, as he approached. "Go over to Coles, and fetch a large meat pie. Would you like mutton or pork?" he added, turning to Dick.

This was an unlooked for chance of saying what he wished, so Dick availed himself of it instantly.

"I should, if it is agreeable to you, like to have a mutton pie, and slack baked."

"Slack what?"

"Oh! I know what he means," said Hilton.

"What?"

"Not baked too brown."

"That's just it."

"Very well, then, you shall have just what you like, old file. A large mutton pie and slack baked from Coles, and a pint of the best Old Tom from Allen's, at the corner."

"All right," said Hilton. "I'll be back in a jiffy."

Rejoiced beyond measure at the success of his stratagem, and not doubting for a moment that Coles would send the pie with the saws in it, Dick entered his old friend's cell.

By the expression on Tom's face, he could tell he had overheard every word of the dialogue between himself and Winch, as he contented himself with simply smiling and nodding his head.

As before, he took his seat at Tom's side.

In a few moments Winch came into the cell, carrying a monstrous pie, sufficient for half-a-dozen people to dine off.

The turnkey little thought how anxious a glance the seeming old farmer bestowed upon the pie, nor the delight which tumulted in his breast when he saw the top was quite pale, and that two of the little spiral ornaments on the top were placed so as to touch each other.

Winch deposited the gigantic pie upon the bed, since that was the only thing in the place that would at all serve for a table.

Then he ran back to the door and returned with three plates, knives and forks, and the pint bottle of gin.

"How very good of you, sir," said Dick "to have so much consideration for my misguided son. Surely you will have some recompense for your generous action."

As he spoke, Dick took up his knife and fork.

"Will you allow me to cut the pie, or will you, my dear sir?"

"Please yourself."

"Then I think I will," said Dick with the same silly smile. "They always expect me to do so at home."

"I daresay."

Dick cut a large piece out of the pie and placed it on the turnkey's plate.

His hand shook a little when he made the next cut, and handed Tom the piece of crust on which was the two ornaments.

Then he placed some on his own plate, and all three fell to eating as though they had fasted for a month.

Winch managed to get through his lot first, and while he was holding up for a second supply, he noticed Tom upset his plate.

Winch just noticed the circumstance, but all he did was to laugh.

He did not notice that Tom had left a tidy-size piece of crust on the bed, and that he immediately covered it up with the skirt of his coat.

Their aim was at last safely and successfully accomplished.

The hearty meal they made was washed down with gin, and all three were on the best of terms with themselves and each other.

At last Dick rose to go.

"Good-bye, my poor boy," he said. "I hope if you are spared you will see the error of your ways."

"And so do I," said Winch, "for you are both jolly good sorts."

Dick shook hands warmly with Tom King, and then followed Winch out of the dungeon.

The ponderous door was closed and locked.

Then, talking together like old friends, Turpin still preserving his deferential manner, they reached the lobby.

Here a rather unexpected sight met Dick's gaze.

There were four persons present.

One was the man "on the lock."

Mr. Tapner, the governor.

The Reverend Mr. Colley, the ordinary.

The fourth was a shrewd, sharp featured man, who was a perfect stranger to Dick, though rather a celebrated character.

Somehow, as Dick's glance fell upon these persons, a conviction sprang up in his mind that something was wrong—that the assemblage boded no good to him.

The eager, earnest gaze which all four fixed upon him served to confirm him in this idea.

He had much ado to maintain his composure.

But he did so with a great effort.

Assuming as unconcerned an air as he possibly could, Dick, still continuing his conversation with Winch, made his way towards the gate.

But when he was about in the centre of the lobby the man with the shrewd face stepped forward.

"One moment, sir, if you please; I have a word to say to you."

Dick had no resource but to come to a stand, which he did with a knowledge that he was discovered.

"Sorry to trouble you," said Tapner, the governor, advancing a step or two, "but as we heard it rumoured that it was very probable that Dick Turpin would seek to obtain an interview with his accomplice, I sent for Mr. Townshend, the Bow-street runner, to examine anyone who visited the prisoner, with a view to ascertaining whether they were really what they seemed.

There was so much meaning in the way this speech was uttered that Turpin felt sure his identity was more than half suspected.

The name of the celebrated police-officer was well-known to Turpin, though his person was not, and he was confident that anything like an observatio" would show that he was disguised.

As for Winch, he positively stared aghast.

"Come, sir," said Townshend, as he put his hand upon Dick's shoulder, "you have heard what Mr. Tapner has said, and of course you cannot make any objection to our ascertaining that you are really the father of the notorious highwayman, Tom King!"

CHAPTER XCVI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE A COWARDLY ATTACK MADE UPON THEM BY THE BOAT'S CREW.

MOST reluctantly indeed do we leave Dick Turpin in a situation of so much peril, but it becomes absolutely necessary to the proper development of our story that we should do so, and introduce to the reader two fresh characters, in whom we hope they will feel as great an interest as they do in those with whom they are already acquainted.

The names of these two characters are well known, and familiar to the eyes and ears of all.

Jack Rann, otherwise known as Sixteen-String Jack.

Claude Duval.

These are the two characters.

The Claude Duval of whom we are about to speak was not the one who came to an ignominious end in the reign of the second Charles, but his nephew.

The two have often been ignorantly confounded.

It will be recollected that when Tom King related his history he, towards the latter portion of it, imformed Dick Turpin of the very singular way in which he made the acquaintance of Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, and how, after committing several depredations in their society, he had assisted them both to leave England.

They had managed to carry off with them a rather large amount of money, so that when they got over to Paris they were able to live in the first of style.

For a considerable period the total change in their mode of life had a pleasant and delightful effect, but after the lapse of a few months they began to long to revisit England.

This feeling, when it once took root in their breasts, grew rapidly, and the desire increased until they could go no longer without gratifying it.

Accordingly, on the evening of the very day on which Tom King was taken to Newgate, the two ex-highwaymen, having converted everything valuable which they possessed into money, set out from Paris to Boulogne-sur-Mer.

This place they reached in safety, and without the occurrence of any incident worthy of recordation.

It was, however, close upon sunset when they arrived, for in those days the rapid mode of transit we now enjoy did not exist.

Had it not been for their treasure, which amounted to several thousands of pounds in gold, and which they had bestowed in a shabby-looking leather portmanteau, they would have performed the journey on horseback. As it was it necessitated the hiring of some kind of wheeled conveyance.

They selected a post-chaise.

In a vehicle of this description, for all the world knows what post-stages were in France a hundred and fifty years ago, they traversed the terribly dull, barren, and uninteresting piece of ground between Paris and Boulogne.

"Thank goodness," said Jack, as he opened the door and stepped out, "that that's over, and I sincerely hope that I may never have to sit inside another infernal machine like this."

"And so say I," said Claude. "Here, take hold of the portmantle."

As he spoke, he handed the article named to Sixteen-String Jack, and then alighed.

"I suppose," said Jack, "that the best thing we can do will be to stop here a little while, and make a good meal."

"Oh! by all means."

"We shall then be ready to cross over about dark, as we had arranged."

"Just so. The only thing is shall we be able to hire a boat?"

"That is just the question."

"I should think we ought."

"Oh! decidedly."

"It would never do for us to go by the ordinary packet."

"It would not be over safe, for while on board we might be recognised by somebody or other, which would be exceedingly disagreeable."

"You're right, it would. No, it won't do to go by the packet, Jack."

"That's my opinion. Now I think for money we shall be easily enough able to hire a boat that will take us over in double quick time."

By this time the waiters from the hotel before which they had drawn up, came swarming round them, and made desperate efforts to carry off, not only the portmantle, but themselves as well.

"Hands off! Hands off!" said Claude and Jack together. "Hands off! We will carry it ourselves."

"Non—non—non," they replied.

"Lead the way, and we will follow," cried Jack, and he saluted one of the waiters with his foot in the hinder portion of his anatomy.

This had the desired effect, and in a minute or two more our friends were seated at table with the portmantle between them.

A wretched repast, to their English notions, was set before them, and then Claude took an opportunity to speak to the waiter who placed it on the table relative to the possibility of their obtaining a vessel that evening that would take them across the Channel to Dover."

"Impossible, messieurs," replied the waiter. "You have here the very best of accommodation."

"I know that," said Jack, "but go we must; and if you can find a boat you shall have five francs for your pains."

"Five francs! Oh, milord, I am your very humble servitor."

"Then it is no longer impossible?"

"Non, milord. This is the grand nation where everything is possible."

"If you pay for it."

"Precisely, milord. I go away to make the enquiries, messieurs."

"That's the style," said Claude. "I'll warrant he finds a boat for five francs. I'll be hanged, though, if I care about this fare. Thank goodness, this is the last time we shall have to put up with it."

"And the wine," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he put down the glass which he had just carried to his lips, and making a wry face as he did so, "is most damnable."

"Then I won't try it," said Claude, laughing.

In a few moments more the waiter returned.

"Have you found a boat?" queried Sixteen-String Jack, eagerly.

"I have, milord."

"That will take us across?"

'Oh! yes."

"What sort of a craft is it?" asked Claude Duval, dubiously.

"Oh! magnifique. When you are ready, milords, we will go down to the beach."

"We are quite ready and waiting," exclaimed the two friends in one voice. "Lead on."

"The bill, milord."

"Oh! yes; I had forgotten. How much is it?"

"Ten francs, milord."

"The devil it is, never mind! here is a Louis, you can keep the change for finding a boat."

"A million thanks, milord. This is the way. Shall I carry your portmanteau?"

"No, thank you," said Claude, who lifted it on to his shoulders without difficulty. "We prefer carrying it ourselves."

"As you will, messieurs. Follow me."

This they were not long in doing.

As they expected, it was quite dark.

The distance between the hotel and the sea beach was inconsiderable, so it was soon passed over.

Short as it was, however, it enabled the two friends to get accustomed to the obscurity, and when they reached the shore they saw in the distance a fair-sized lugger, while just at their feet was a boat to carry them on board.

"This is the captain of the ship," said the waiter, as a man stepped out of the boat and came towards them.

"Servant, sir," he said. "You want to cross the channel, I believe?"

"We do," said Jack, "what shall you charge to take us across?"

"It is a rough night, messieurs, and will be rougher."

CHAPTER XCVII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE A GREAT DEAL OF DIFFICULTY IN GETTING TO ENGLAND.

At this intimation from the captain of the lugger the two friends instantly gave a keen look about them.

A large number of small dark clouds dotted the sky.

A fresh breeze came every now and then in short and fitful gusts, which caused the clouds to send across the heavens at a prodigious rate.

"I am afraid so," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he observed these signs of squally weather, "but nevertheless we must cross over to-night."

"I am ready, messieurs. My boat is strong, and the men good sailors."

"Then there is not much to fear. What shall you charge?"

"I cannot do it for less than one hundred francs (£4), messieurs."

"I suppose not," said Jack; "take us over safely, and you shall have a hundred and fifty."

"It shall be done, messieurs. Will it please you to step on board?"

"Yes, for we want as little delay as possible."

As they spoke the two highwaymen walked quite down to the water's edge, and stepped into the boat.

Jack entered first, and then held out his hands to Claude for the portmantle.

"Allow me, messieurs," said the captain, quickly.

"Don't trouble, thank you," replied Claude, drawing back, "I will give it him."

The captain looked rather surprised, and well he might, but he came to a tolerably correct conclusion on the subject.

And that was, that the old leather concern carried some very valuable article indeed; something too valuable to be trusted out of the owners' hands.

However, he made no remark, but entered the boat after them, and then gave the word for the men to push off.

The order was obeyed with true nautical alacrity, and the little skiff—for it was nothing more—was soon along side the lugger.

The two friends observed the same caution with their precious burden, and reached the deck of the vessel with it in perfect safety.

For a few moments a scene of great bustle and apparent confusion ensued, consequent upon getting the vessel under weigh, but when this was done all appearance of disorder vanished.

The highwaymen declined to go below, but, observing a pile of cordage and canvas on the deck, sat down upon it with the portmantle behind them.

Some ship's lanterns, which were hung to different portions of the rigging, shed a dim and crepuscular kind of light upon the deck.

By their aid Jack and Claude saw for the first time the countenance of the captain, and it did not prepossess them in his favour.

Both were, in consequence of their wide experience, capital physiognomists, and in all probability, had they seen the captain's face before they came on board, they would have declined his services, so sinister and treacherous was it.

A family likeness could be traced in the features of the rest of the crew.

It was in rather an anxious tone of voice that Sixteen-String Jack addressed his comrade Claude Duval.

"Claude," he said, in a whisper, for he was fearful of being overheard, "Claude."

"Yes, Jack."

"Speak low. Did you notice the captain's face?"

"I did."

"And what do you think of him?"

"Well, I may be mistaken, but I think he looks more like a wolf than a lamb."

"You may depend he is no good."

"Was that your idea when you looked at him?"

"It was."

"So it was mine."

"That is rather strange, but still it only serves to confirm me in the idea that I am right."

"What do you suspect?"

"Oh! not anything in particular. But have you noticed the rest of the crew?"

"No, they appear like shadows in this faint light."

"Well, don't seem to do so, but just take a good look at that chap there standing near the bulwarks."

"I see him."

"And what do you think?"

"Why, that he looks one of the greatest villains unhung."

"And you may depend he is, too. Such a man as that would be capable of any atrocity."

"Look, Jack, there is another of them about half a-dozen steps further aft. The lantern is shining on his face. I'll be hanged if he don't look a more diabolical character than the other."

"He does. You may make up your mind we have got into nice company."

"That's pretty clear."

"And the sooner we get out of it the better."

"So say I, but unfortunately it can't be done until we reach our journey's end."

"Unfortunately, yes."

"All we can do is to keep a sharp look out about us."

"That's it. But I say, Claude."

"What, Jack."

"It strikes me very forcibly that if they had any idea of what we carry in that portmantle behind us, they would try their best to get possession of it."

"Oh! don't suggest such a thing. We should be in a nice fix if they were."

"We just should."

"Why, how many of them are there?"

"I can hardly tell. I have seen half-a-dozen at least."

"Have you, by Jove."

"I have indeed, and the probability is that there are half-a-dozen more in different parts of the ship that we have not seen."

"Likely enough."

"So that twelve to two would be rather long odds."

"A little too long, I should think, but let us hope that our suspicions are groundless."

"I sincerely trust they are. Confound the sea, and all in it, I say. Give me the road."

"And me. Do you remember that young chap that was with us, and helped us off?"

"What, Tom King?"

"Yes."

"What made you think of him?"

"I can hardly tell. Happening to speak about the road, I suppose."

"What about him?"

[TURPIN TELLING ELLEN AND DAVIS THAT TOM KING IS A PRISONER IN NEWGATE.]

"Oh! I was just wondering whether he was still at the business, and how he got on, and such like."

"We shall know pretty soon, I hope. He was a brave chap."

"You are right enough there. It will be a sad pity if ever he comes to grief."

"It will indeed."

"Perhaps we shall meet him when we land."

"Likely enough."

Poor Tom! The speakers little thought that at that very hour he was an inmate of the prison of Newgate.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN ACHIEVE A BARREN VICTORY.

THE state of affairs on board the little vessel was rather peculiar, and especially dangerous to our friends.

As the last words passed their lips, a dark, lithesome figure crawled away from the bulk of cordage on which they were sitting, and in a strange, gliding, ophidious sort of fashion, made its way to where the captain was standing.

This dark and half-defined figure now rose to its full height, and showed that it was a boy of about fifteen years of age.

An aspect of low, ferocious cunning was on his face.

"Well, Jacob," said the captain, in a low voice, as soon as he approached, "have you heard anything?"

"Lots, but not much of any importance."

"Ha! they are cautious."

"They are, and something more."

"What?"

"Suspicious.'"

"Indeed. We must be cautious."

"You must indeed, for, from what I have heard, they are not men to be easily overcome or taken by surprise."

"But the portmantle?"

"It is behind them as they sit, and so placed that it would be impossible to remove it without their knowledge."

"Confound them! But the contents, Jacob—the contents!"

"They are of great value. But whether gold or jewels is more than I can tell."

The captain's eyes glistened with cupidity.

"Gold or jewels?"

"Yes, I am almost sure it contains either one or the other."

"Very good, then they shall be ours. Jacob!"

"Yes, sir."

"Go round to every one of the crew, and tell them to be armed in readiness for the signal."

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"And when it is given, to pounce on the two men and either slay them or make them prisoners according as things turn out."

The boy Jacob, in the same snake-like fashion which had formerly characterised him, glided away, and one after another made the crew acquainted with the captain's orders.

It was well for our friends that they were so far prepared as they were.

They still continued their conversation, which turned chiefly upon old exploits.

They were somewhere about mid-channel.

As the reader suspects, the crew of this vessel were pirates: not bold, hardy men who contested bravely and fearlessly for what they got, but mean, sneaking hounds, who were ever ready to take an advantage of those who happened to fall into their hands.

Little did Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack think that they owed their lives so far to the position which they had taken up.

But so it was.

As they sat it was a matter of impossibility for any one to get behind them.

Had not such been the case, the assassin's dagger would long before have drank their hearts' blood.

But presently something came under Jack's notice that made him stop short in what he was saying.

"Be on your guard," he said, in a low tone. "Look before you."

In obedience to his friend's hurried command, Claude carried his hands to the butts of his pistols, so that they could be brought into immediate requisition, and looked before him.

Just separable from the rigging and the shadows which it cast he could see several dark forms.

They were the crew of the boat crawling stealthily to attack them.

Claude in a moment comprehended the danger, and cried, in startling tones—

"Up, and defend yourself, Jack, or you are a dead man!"

As he spoke, he himself sprung to his feet, and holding a pistol in his left hand, drew his heavy sword from its scabbard, and waved it with great swiftness around him.

"Confusion!" cried a voice, which the highwaymen immediately recognized as the captain's. "Confusion! We are discovered. Upon them, my brave hearts!"

A gutteral kind of yell burst from the throats of the men, and they precipitated themselves upon Jack and Claude.

But they quickly found they had got no children to contend with, and after the first onslaught they drew back from the terrific sweeps Claude made with his sword with something like panic and dismay stamped upon their faces.

Two of their number already lay bleeding on the deck, while several were severely wounded.

In repelling the attack, Claude and Jack placed themselves in a position best suited to the purpose.

Back to back.

That was the position.

Only for a space of time of a second's duration did the ship's crew retreat; then, animated by the words of the captain, they rushed forward with redoubled fury.

It was almost more than our friends could do to keep off so many foes, but what they managed with infinite skill to do so.

The sharp reports of the pistols, the clashing of swords, the cries of the combatants, and the groans of the wounded and dying, made up a chorus of sounds that would have befitted Pandemonium.

It was with a feeling of the greatest rage that both the highwaymen fought, but yet they were careful not to let it blind their caution.

From the first they had gained a slight advantage, and both knew to the full the importance of maintaining it, and that, if once lost, it could never be regained.

A combat, such as the one we describe, must of necessity endure but a few moments.

More than one-half of the crew lay helpless or dead upon the deck, and then the remainder cast away their weapons, fell upon their knees, and sued for quarter.

This was granted them on the condition that they moved not an inch from where they then were, until it was decided what should be done with them.

This they, with one voice, promised to do, but our friends nevertheless kept a sharp eye upon them.

Jack and Claude had both received several severe wounds during the contest, and to these they gave their first and immediate attention.

"It was a close touch for both of us," said the former, as he tied a bandage round his comrade's arm, "but we have got out of it pretty well."

"Yes, but what are we to do with these prisoners?"

"There, I confess, you puzzle me."

"Are they to be trusted, think you?"

"Not so far as you can see them."

"That is decisive, then."

"What are you going to do?"

"I propose that we make them all get into the boat that brought us on board, and then cut it adrift."

"Agreed; it shall be done."

"Then, raising his voice, Sixteen-String Jack said—

"Your lives are spared on condition that you at once betake yourselves to the boat, and cast off."

"Mercy, mercy! good sirs, we shall be lost."

"And a good loss, too. Which will you do; you can take your choice. Get into the boat, or stay here and be shot?"

"The boat—the boat," they cried.

"Be still. Rise one of you at a time and do so."

Muttering inaudible maledictions, the fellows rose and did their bidding.

They were rank cowards, or they would have made another attempt to conquer their foes.

It was, perhaps, as well that they got into the boat as quietly as they did.

As soon as the last had entered the frail bark, Claude cut the rope, and they drifted away in the darkness in a moment.

The sea, our friends found, and very much to their consternation, was in a state of great agitation, as though a storm was at hand.

The crests of the billows were quite white, and a thick foam floated on the surface of the water.

They strained their eyes after the boat, but it was invisible.

"We have done a foolish thing," said Jack.

"That was precisely my thought when we spoke.

"We are going to have a storm, and we should have kept some of those men on board to manage the boat. As for myself I am, as I may say, quite a novice in nautical matters."

"Never mind, we must do the best we can, and trust to providence for the result."

"Ha! ha!" said a voice.

The laugh was screeching and unearthly.

The suddenness with which it came, and the abruptness with which it ceased, made the blood rush with a sickening sensation round their hearts.

"Ha! ha!" said the voice again.

Quick as lightning Jack turned in the direction whence the hideous sound proceeded, and there saw, standing on the bulwarks, the figure of a man.

"Ha! ha!" said the man, on perceiving he was observed. "Ha! ha!"

"Who can it be?" asked Duval, anxiously.

"The captain."

CHAPTER XCIX.

THE CAPTAIN COMES TO A BAD END. AND SO DOES HIS BOAT.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK'S assertion was perfectly correct.

It was the captain who stood upon the bulwarks.

It was the captain who had articulated that discordant laugh.

But what was his object for behaving thus they could not conceive.

Almost at the commencement of the encounter Jack had given him a frightful wound with his sword, which he fully believed was a mortal one.

But in this, it would seem, he had made a mistake.

"Come down," said Jack, "and on condition of your steering the vessel safely, we will not only spare your life, but give you a reward as well."

"Ha! ha!"

"What in the world does he find to laugh at."

"That's just what I should like to know," replied Claude. "Perhaps this will aid us a little."

As he spoke, he stooped and picked off the deck one of the ship's lanterns, which during the affray had been disengaged from its position.

It was, however, uninjured, and the light within burning steadily, so that when Claude held it above his head he was able to diffuse a tolerable amount of illumination about him.

The figure of the captain became more plainly revealed.

"Ha! ha!" he said.

"Look, look!" cried Claude, "what is it he holds in his arms?"

Jack strained his vision to the utmost.

"It is the treasure," he said. "He has got the treasure."

"Ha! ha!" screamed the captain, in a yet louder tone of voice, "I am even with you now, and shall die revenged."

As he uttered the word revenged he, in spite of its great weight, swung the portmanteau in the air.

It was evident he had so far recovered from the blow he had received as to be able to make his way to where the portmanteau containing the whole worldly wealth of the two friends was deposited, and then feeling that his hours, nay, minutes, were numbered, had determined to die revenged.

"Drop that," said Jack, sharply, and running forward.

But he only precipitated matters.

Uttering a loud and fearful yell, which sounded dismally above the moaning of the wind, the captain clutched the portmanteau to his breast, and sprang over the ship's side into the sea.

Claude and Jack rushed to the bulwark and peered over, but though the former waved the lantern in every direction, not a trace of the captain could be seen, and of necessity of their treasure also.

They looked rather blankly at each other.

"Gone," said Jack, at length.

"Clean," added his comrade.

Then they looked once more over the ship's side.

"Curse the captain and ship, crew and all! That rascally waiter to put us into such hands. But I'll be even with him, if I have to make a journey to France on purpose."

"What's done can't be helped," said Claude, who was of a more philosophic turn of mind. "Altogether I think we have made a nice mess of it. Just look at the waves and the ship—what do you call it—yaws about everywhere. It's very odd to me if we don't rejoin our treasure now."

These words recalled Jack to a contemplation of the state of things around him, and of a surety what he saw was anything but assuring.

"We're in for it this time, that's certain. There'll be a terrific storm, and—good heavens! what's that?"

A tremendous report like the discharge of a cannon saluted their ears, and forced this ejaculation from his lips, and then the next moment a mass of something fell bodily upon the deck and partly into the water, causing the vessel to lean frightfully on one side, so much that one part of the deck was quite under water.

By a great effort the two friends managed to keep their feet.

"The topmast," cried Claude. "The topmast has gone. We must cut the ship clear, or she will sink at once."

He sprang forward as he spoke, and with his sword commenced cutting through the complicated mass of sails and ropes.

It was a tedious job, but Jack assisted him, and, as their weapons were keen, they soon managed to cut it through, and then with a great splash the whole fell into the sea.

The ship, as a natural result, quickly righted herself, but by this time the threatening tempest fairly commenced.

The wind howled and shrieked, and every now and then the waves would splash on to the deck.

The darkness rapidly increased, so that in a few minutes our friends were unable to see each other, and as for hearing that was quite out of the question, unless he happened to have his mouth in his ear.

Their position was about as perilous a one as could well be imagined.

Totally ignorant of nautical matters.

Totally ignorant of their whereabouts.

What hope of surviving the fury of the elements could they have?

Very little, if any at all.

It so happened that the vessel belonging to the rascally captain was well and strongly built, and no doubt, under proper management, would have come out of such a storm unscathed, but left entirely to the mercy of the winds and waves, it seemed little short of an impossibility that she would escape.

On the contrary, there was every reason to think that she would drift upon some rock and then go to pieces.

A sudden lull came.

It is by no means an unusual thing for such to be the case, but when it does it is a sure prognostic that it is only the tempest collecting its scattered energies for a stronger and more furious effort.

But it gave Jack an opportunity to speak.

"Claude, Claude!" he said. "Are you safe?"

"Quite. And you?"

"All right at present. Surely this is our last escape. The tempest will burst forth again with ten-fold fury, and then, I fear, down we shall go."

"How far are we from land?"

"I have not the remotest idea. But, Claude!"

"Yes, Jack."

"Find a piece of rope and lash yourself tightly to a spar now you have a chance."

"I will. You, of course, will do the same?"

"Assuredly."

"Have you a rope, my friend?"

"Yes."

"So have I."

"Make haste, then, and lash yourself, or you will be too late. I expect the return every instant."

"Leave me to myself. There, all is right now."

"You are sure you are secure?"

"Yes."

"Then we have done all that is in our power to do to save our lives. The rest we must leave in the hands of Providence."

"I fear there is no help for it?"

"There is not."

"Confound the captain, then, and all the whole lot."

"I cry amen, with all my heart."

"It certainly is not just the death I should have chosen, but I suppose we must put up with it. Ha! here it comes again. Good bye, old fellow."

"Oh, don't despair. I shan't say good bye. We—"

A gust of wind, of most tremendous force, came at this moment, and cut him short in what he was about to say.

Well was it they had taken the precaution they had, or without a doubt they would have been swept into the boiling sea, the froth upon the surface of which, glistened faintly through the darkness.

And then to add to their discomfiture a gigantic wave broke over the vessel, drenching them in a moment from head to foot.

CHAPTER C.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN REACH THE LAND IN SAFETY.

The rudderless ship plunged madly onwards.

Sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other, scudding swiftly along, sometimes in a straight line sometimes to the east, sometimes to the west.

But so pitch dark was it that the two highwaymen were not aware of these vagaries in her course.

An anxious hour passed.

Sixty minutes, every one of which they fully expected to be their last in life.

And all this time the storm continued with unabating violence.

The two friends had secured themselves to a large balk of wood, which they knew, in the event of the vessel going down under their feet, would float easily.

About six feet apart, one being at one end and one at the other, so that they should not, come what would, be separated.

They felt a consciousness that they had done all in their power for their own preservation, and calmly awaited the result.

Although the space between them was so inconsiderable, yet they were unable, even by shouting at the top of their voices, to make themselves heard.

But when that hour had passed the hurricane began to diminish.

A faint gray light appeared in the sky to the right of them.

It was the dawn of the coming day.

Right glad were they to see this sign, not only because it foretold the cessation of the storm, but because it enabled them to form some idea of their precise position.

The spume upon the seething waves gradually disappeared.

They no longer tossed and tumbled as they did.

In fact, it seemed that as the light in the eastern sky increased in brightness so did the storm decrease.

At last land came in sight.

Dim, shadowy, and indistinct it looked, but still land it was.

It was dead ahead.

"Can you swim, Claude?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, at length, when he found his voice could be heard.

"A little."

"I can swim well, though I have not practised lately. I think the best thing we can do now there is no fear of our being washed overboard will be to cut ourselves loose again, and so be prepared for any emergency that may arise."

"I think so too, and I shall be very glad to do as you suggest, for my limbs are so cramped with the cold and wet, and being so long in the same position, that I have scarcely any use left."

"That you will soon get the better of my friend," said Jack, as with his sword he severed his bonds; "you will only have to move about a little."

Claude quickly followed his example, and though at first he kept his feet with difficulty, yet in a little while he found himself all right.

Their first and most natural impulse was to go forward, and endeavour to make out their position.

"Have you any idea whereabouts we are?" asked Claude of Jack, who had taken a long and careful look around him.

"Not the least, and yet"—

"Yet what?"

"It seems impossible that we can have come so far; but still that place yonder looks like the North Foreland."

"It does," said Claude, looking in the direction Jack indicated. "And it is the North Foreland too," he added, after a few minutes observation.

"If it is, then all will be well."

"It is very fortunate the storm abated when it did, or otherwise we should have been dashed to pieces upon those rocks,"

"It was what I expected every moment. Still, I do not think we are in any great danger now. Plenty of fishermen live upon the beach, and as soon as they see a vessel so dismantled as this is, and going entirely at the discretion of the winds and waves, they will put off in their boats and take us ashore."

"Let us hope so."

"I think we may reasonably indulge in such a hope, and then a day's rest, and we are ready for the road."

"Not quite," said Claude.

"Why not?"

"Don't you forget that the confounded captair carried off our wealth. How are we to buy horses and new clothes too, for when these have been dried which we have on they will not be good for much."

"That's true," said Jack, as he stroked his chin, "uncommonly true."

"We can't go upon the road without equipments."

"No."

"What shall we do then?"

"I'll tell you."

"What?"

"Pad it!"

"No. That won't do. I don't like the idea."

"How vexatious it is, though probably we ourselves are most to blame."

"How so?"

"By being over-solicitious about the portmantle. You may depend it was that circumstance alone that raised the captain's suspicions."

"Like enough. But then it is only natural one should be careful in such a case."

"True! But, however, its no good grumbling about what's done and can't be helped. I only hope we shall soon see some of the fishermen's boats you spoke of."

"Then you have your wish, for look, I can see no less than three putting off."

"So they are. Wave your hat or your handkerchief, or something of that sort, to let them know we are in distress."

The fishermen quickly perceived these signals of our friends, and rowed forward with still greater speed.

The distance to the shore seemed insignificant, but it took the boats a long time to reach them.

At last, however, they came alongside.

A few words served to make them aware of the state of affairs, and they resolved to tow the lugger into the harbour.

In pursuance of this determination, a rope was attached and the vessel drawn as far towards the land as it would come.

By the time this was done it was broad daylight, and the sun shed his warm beams upon the now placid sea, which gave not the slightest token of the storm.

The whole of the crew of the boat who had been left upon the deck had been washed overboard, except one, who only escaped his companions' fate by having been jammed into a corner.

He was quite dead, of course.

Still this was sufficient confirmation of the truth of their story.

The fishermen all offered to find the two highwaymen with a shelter, and they gladly enough accepted the offer of one of them.

Our friends were not entirely penniless, in fact, between them they had somewhere about twelve pounds, and with some of this money they were able to get a tolerable meal.

After this they resolved to seek that repose of which they stood so much in need.

The bed upon which they were to rest was a hard one, but, despite of that, it was inviting enough to them, and it was not long after they threw themselves upon it before they were sound and fast asleep.

It was not possible for human beings to undergo what they had undergone without being thoroughly exhausted; indeed, it is questionable whether many could have been found who would have held out so long as they did.

But they were rather exceptional beings. The peculiar kind of life they had for so long led hardened their constitutions, and made them almost insensible of fatigue.

CHAPTER CI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE A RATHER EXTRAORDINARY ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY.

THE day was almost gone when Sixteen-String Jack, after several uneasy movements, awoke.

He started up at once, and hastening to the little window in the apartment, looked out.

Remote objects—for the window looked landward—were indistinct, and those, at even a short distance only, imperfectly defined.

Night was coming rapidly. In half an-hour it would be quite dark.

Claude was still sleeping soundly, but Jack, thinking that the time for action had arrived, placed his hand upon him, and awoke him.

"Up, Claude," he said. "Up, and be stirring. It will soon be night."

"What shall we do?"

"That, when you are thoroughly aroused, is a question we must carefully discuss."

"Begin at once," said Claude, springing up, thoroughly awake, "begin at once."

"About these fishermen."

"Well, what about them?"

"You see, people are so cursedly officious. Now this boat too, you'll see, they won't let rest as they might, but make no end of inquiries and bother about it."

"They will, you may rest assured of that."

"Very well, I don't want any more than you do to be mixed up in anything of that sort directly we set our feet on the shore. It wouldn't be at all pleasant."

"And certainly not at all safe. I tell you what it is, we must give them the slip."

"So I think."

"This window is not far from the ground; now I think we might easily be able to drop it."

"Oh! of course; and then off we go, and they can settle their affairs in the best way they can."

"Exactly."

"Let us set about it at once, for who knows how soon they may be coming upstairs after us?"

"It is plenty dark enough, I think, to make our departure unobserved."

"Plenty; and besides, they are likely enough busy about their daily avocations, and would not notice us."

"They would not expect we were going to elope, and they will be rather astonished when they find the place empty."

"Ha! ha! They will. Now, how are we to get down?"

As he spoke, Jack unfastened the little latticed casement, and opened it.

"The place is little better than a hut," replied Claude. We ought only to require our hands and arms to aid us in our descent."

"You are right, that is all we shall require," said Sixteen-String Jack, who had estimated the depth to the ground with his eye.

"Come on, then. Let me drop first."

But Jack had already lowered himself from the window.

He hung for a moment by his hands, in order to steady himself, and then let go.

He alighted upon the little patch of garden at the back of the cottage, so that he made no sound that would be sufficient to give an alarm.

He was very quickly joined by Claude, who said—

"Now, Jack, I think the best thing we can do is to push on towards London, as we at first arranged."

"Hang it, yes. We thought of having cash enough to lead a merry life there for some time to come, but that confounded captain baulked us out of that intention."

"Ah! well! it is never worth while to grieve over spilt milk. We must set to work and get some more."

"I suppose we must; but come, climb over these palings, and let us betake ourselves to the high road, or we shall be discovered."

"Right!" was the reply, and then they scrambled hastily over the palisades that bounded the little garden, and, after crossing a field or two, they came to the high road.

To all appearance nothing was in sight or hearing, so they opened a gate, and passed through it without hesitation.

"Now, Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack. "There is clearly no resource but to begin business afresh."

"So I think; but we are very ill provided with the necessaries."

"We are; but we must do the best we can. Our safest course just at present will be to place as great a distance as we can between the place we have just left and ourselves."

"Indubitably."

"Forward, then."

For some time nothing further was said, but both set forward at a walk that was almost a trot.

It was a pace, however, which they could not keep up for any length of time without resting in order to recover breath.

They were a good two miles on their road, though, before they did come to a halt.

"Hark," said Jack, suddenly, as a faint sound reached his ears. "Hark!"

"Horses," said Claude.

"Yes, I can hear two. They are coming along at an easy rate, are they not?"

"They are."

"Shall we"—

"Try our hands?"

"Yes."

"With all my heart; it's a long time since we had any practice."

"It is. But what have you in the shape of weapons?"

"My sword."

"No pistols?"

"No."

"I have two, but they are discnaged and I have no means of reloading them."

"We must get the horses," said Jack; "those are what we stand in the greatest need of."

"I am afraid we shall have some trouble if they are determined men."

"Pho—pho! the more danger the better! Stand on one side here in the shadow of the hedge along with me, and when they come up let us jump suddenly upon them."

"Agreed."

The two highwaymen now took up their position, and waited with some impatience the coming of their prey.

The two approaching horsemen came along with great deliberation.

They were evidently in no great hurry.

As they drew nearer the sound of voices rose upon the air.

In the silence there was round about that place any little noise could be heard at a great distance.

"Don't mention such a thing, brother Zebedee," they heard a voice say, in oleaginous accents, "pray don't mention such a thing; you put me quite in a shiver."

"I am in a shiver myself," said a voice in reply, "and have been ever since I mounted."

"You are not accustomed to horseback riding, brother, I know, but then the steed only proceeds at a walk."

"Yes, but he don't walk steady, and he goes from side to side as though he was drunk. I never knew such a stupid beast."

"We haven't much much further to go, brother."

"Thank goodness for that, then, for I was afraid to ask the question."

"Not three miles, certainly."

"But when I think of the chapel-money we carry with us, and remember that there are ungodly men called highwaymen roaming about at night, seeking whom they may devour—I mean plunder, my blood flows chill in my veins, for we, the chosen of the people, are men of peace; and besides, we are not able to defend ourselves."

"Don't talk of such things, brother Zebedee, I say. The Lord be praised I heard to-day that one of the men of Belial, of whom you spoke, has even been captured and lodged in jail."

"Then let us rejoice. Is it that roaming lion, Turpin, they have taken in the toils?"

"No; but it is comrade, as he calls himself, Tom King, by name."

"Stand!" said Jack, at this moment, in authoritative tones, and catching the speaker's horse by the bridle, as he spoke. "Stand! Your money or your life."

CHAPTER CII.

WHICH TURNS TO MR. TOWNSHEND AND DICK TURPIN IN THE LOBBY OF NEWGATE.

"OH, Lord!" groaned Brother Zebedee, as Claude followed the actions of Sixteen-String Jack, "we are undone."

"Quick," cried Jack. "Hand over everything valuable you possess, and your lives are spared. Refuse, and I take your head off at a single blow."

"Mercy!"

"There is no occasion to be merciful. The money, you pious rogues."

The threat or taking away them never became the reluctance they felt to disgorging the money, and a tolerable-sized bag was placed in Jack's hands.

It was very weighty.

The two clergymen—for such they were, dissenting clergymen, evidently—expected that having given up the money they would be suffered to depart in peace, but in this expectation they were lamentably deceived.

"Alight!" cried Claude and Jack at the same moment. "Dismount at once."

"But"——

"Do you hesitate? We shall be obliged to send you to fill your destined place with the blessed."

"No, no!" they both cried, as they rolled off their horses with the greatest precipitation.

"Why?" said Claude, with a laugh, "you ought, according to what you preach, to be most anxious to quit this wicked world."

"That's never the case with a parson, though," said Jack, as he sprang upon the back of one of the horses.

"But what are we to do?" said Zebedee, ruefully, "what are we to do?"

"Go to the devil," said Claude, who had also mounted.

Then digging their spurs into the horses' sides, they sped away with great swiftness in the direction of London, leaving the two men—the chosen of the people—disconsolate in the middle of the road.

"These are capital horses," cried Claude, a few minutes afterwards, as they slackened speed to ascend a rather steep hill, "capital horses."

"I think, altogether, the adventure was most opportune; certainly one never gave us less trouble to carry out."

"But there was a bag," said Claude; "what does it contain?"

"Money, of course."

"I suppose it does from what we overheard them say. But what kind of money is it? How much is there?"

"It's a deuce of a weight," replied Jack, as he took it from his pocket.

"So much the better."

"They must be half-crowns, I think."

"I wish they were sovereigns."

"Never mind, we ought to be content."

"But suppose you just open the bag to see what kind of coin it really does contain."

"With all the pleasure in life."

The mouth of the bag was very securely fastened with a thin slip of leather, and Jack was sometime before he could undo it.

By the time he had done so they had reached the summit of the hill.

The country before them was visible for many miles, and just a few degrees above the horizon was the rising moon.

The light it shed was small, yet still it was a light and served to illuminate objects.

Claude looked rather anxiously towards his friend as he dived his hand into the mouth of the bag.

"What are they?" he asked.

"Half-crowns, I think."

"Guineas, I hope."

"Coppers, by jingo!" exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, as he pulled out his hand, and looked at the coins he had brought forth.

"Never! That would be too bad."

"It's fact, Claude, those smooth-tongued rascals have sold us—sold us dead as hammers."

Both looked rather blank.

A faint ray of hope sprang up in Jack's mind.

"Perhaps," he said, and he threw the handful of coppers into the road as he spoke, "perhaps they are mixed silver and copper together."

There was just a possibility that this might be the case, so he set about verifying it at once.

But no, "the chosen" had been me too many for them.

The bag contained nothing but coppers.

"Confound them!" said Jack, as soon as he had assured himself beyond all possibility of doubt that this was the case. "They have bilked us. What shall we do?"

"Ride back, of course. They can't have gone far, and you may depend they have two other bags somewhere in their possession."

"What makes you think that?"

"Why, it is evidently the proceeds of a subscription, or something of that sort."

"Yes—yes."

The gold would be sorted into one bag, the silver into another, the copper into another."

"Of course it would," said Jack, turning his horse's head round. "Come on, I'll serve them out for cheating me in that way. I thought they gave up monstrous quiet."

"So did I, but I attributed that to their cowardice."

"Especially from what they had said just before."

"Yes."

"But you may depend, Jack, the reason they gave in as they did was to get off, and so make sure of the large sum which I feel convinced they carry about with them."

"I give them credit for their cunning. It was hearing them talk that misled me."

"How so?"

"Why, when they spoke of the chapel money, I made sure when he put that heavy bag in my hand that I had got it, and so did not think it worth while to search further."

"I fell into just the same mistake."

"We ought not to grumble altogether. We have got hold of two first-rate horses."

"That's true enough. But come, after them! They are only on foot, so we shall be sure to overtake them."

"The quicker we are after them the better, then; but just reflect, we are going back to the very place we were so anxious to leave."

"Reflection be hanged! Come on. I should never know what it was to rest again if I was bilked by two parsons in this way. Come on."

The highwaymen put spurs to their steeds, and descending the hill with great rapidity, reached the spot in a few moments where they had left "the chosen."

But now not a trace of them was to be seen anywhere about the spot.

On this side the hill all was darkness, so that they could see only imperfectly about them.

Yet they were quite certain they were not where they had been left.

"Go on gently, Claude. Perhaps they have walked along the road. If so, we shall very soon overtake them."

At a more moderate speed they now continued their course, but nothing of the reverend gentlemen could they see.

This circumstance had the natural effect of whetting their desire to find them out.

"They are more cunning than I could have believed," said Jack. "Doubtless, expecting we should discover we have been put off with coppers, and that we should ride back after them they have taken the opportunity of hiding themselves somewhere."

"I wish I could find them," he replied; "but I am afraid we shall be compelled to give up the attempt. We have no idea where to look."

"No, that's the worst of it. Likely enough, they are hiding close at hand, and listening to every word we say."

"I am very loath to confess myself beaten, but this time I am afraid I must. Hark! what is that?"

The highwaymen bent forward in their saddles in an attitude of intense listening.

A strange sound came to their ears.

CHAPTER CIII.

DICK HAS A NARROW ESCAPE FROM A MAD BULL IN SMITHFIELD.

THE expression upon the face of Mr. Townshend when he put his hand upon Dick's shoulder, and spoke in the manner we have recorded, was really something to see.

The governor was scarcely, if any, less pleased, and he rubbed his huge hands together with the briskness of satisfaction.

The ordinary looked on with elevated hands.

Dick Turpin well enough knew that the moment Mr. Townshend, the experienced Bow-street runner began to examine him, his disguise would be detected, and feeling this was inevitable, he adopted a bold course of action.

He was able to take in at a glance all the features of his position.

Mr. Townshend would be his most formidable opponent.

Him therefore disposed of he might stand a chance.

He acted upon this idea instantaneously.

Doubling his fist, he struck the officer full in the face with it, who certainly was quite unprepared for such an assault.

He measured his full length upon the stones in the lobby.

No one could have withstood such a crushing blow as that was.

Dick did not wait for the surprise which this sudden attack had elicited to dissipate, but, plunging his hands into the skirts of his coat, drew out a pair of pistols

He pointed one at the governor and the chaplain.

The other to the man on the lock, who stood looking on in something like bewilderment, for he had not been told of the suspicions which his superiors entertained.

"Move, and you are dead men!" said Turpin. "I cover you both with this pistol. It is loaded with two bullets. Stand where you are, and be silent if you wish to preserve your lives."

This was said in a tone that admitted of no doubt as to its earnestness.

Then pointing the other pistol at the man on the lock, he cried—

"Open the door, or as surely as I am a living man I will blow out your brains, and open it myself,"

When the man on the lock heard these words he did not hesitate a moment, but began with a haste that defeated itself to undo the fastenings of the gate.

"Quick!" roared Dick, who did not know how soon some more officials of the prison might arrive upon the scene, and render his escape impossible, "quick, I say!"

When he spoke there was only a chain to unhook from the staple, but the man was in such a state of fright that he could not do it.

Dick saw this was the case, and he sprung forward, and flung the door open himself.

Then, without taking any particular aim, or even looking behind him, he fired his pistol and dashed into the street.

It was then just one o'clock in the day, and the Old Bailey was unusually full of people—workers, for the most part, who were hastening to their mid-day meal.

When those who were nearest the prison saw a man rush out so suddenly they at once concluded it must be an escape, and uttering a loud shout they ran forward and attempted to hold him.

But one sweep of the arm that held the discharged pistol sent the foremost sprawling to the ground.

The governor appeared at the doorway, and was immediately joined by Townshend, who had sufficiently recovered from his blow to rise, though his face presented a terribly crushed and bruised appearance.

"Dick Turpin!" they yelled. "Stop him! stop him! A hundred pounds reward! Stop him! An escape! An escape! The man there in the farmer's dress! A hundred pounds reward! Dick Turpin! Stop him! stop him!"

Such cries as these of course quickly brought a crowd about Dick's heels, who started off at a run that none were able to keep up with.

Along the Old Bailey and up into Newgate-street he sped, the mob of people yelling behind him, and gaining every instant a fresh accession to their numbers.

Dick looked up Newgate-street and down Snow-hill, but both thoroughfares were so crowded with vehicles and pedestrians that he saw it would be madness to take either of those routes.

Giltspur-street was before him.

It was pretty clear from obstructions.

Without having slackened his pace a moment he dashed along it.

He was not long in reaching Smithfield Market.

Then he found it was market-day, and the place crowded to suffocation.

Had he only had a few minutes' start of his pursuers, this circumstance would have advantaged him exceedingly, but they were too close behind him to make it possible to mingle with the crowd, and so elude their observation.

Besides, the drovers and buyers who were there heard the shouts of the people who were chasing Turpin, and they turned round and saw the flying man running towards them.

They immediately formed into line, and the drovers took up their goads just as they would have stood to stop some run-away animal.

Dick's heart sunk when he perceived himself thus hemmed in by his foes.

He decreased his speed, uncertain how to act.

By chance, on his right hand, he saw a narrow winding turning.

He rushed down it at once.

Where it led or whether it had any outlet he knew not, but it was the only hope of escape there was for him, and that was faint enough, goodness knows.

Should it prove, like many narrow London streets, to have an entrance but no outlet, he would be caught like a rat in a trap.

He heard the people in chase give a roar as he vanished down the opening.

But they were after him instantly.

The street down which he was now running wound round about in a most tortuous and perplexing manner.

At occasional intervals in his headlong course he saw other narrow turnings leading from it.

But into neither of these would he venture.

And now a greater peril than any that had yet menaced him presented itself.

He was besides getting exhausted and winded by the violent exertion he had been compelled to make.

The street took a turn to the right, and then after that for some two or three hundred yards went quite straight, until it terminated in the market again.

Yes, there were the old stalls, the cattle, and the throngs of people.

The lane or street, whichever it was called, for Dick had no time to look and see, led from old Smithfield Market, and after all its turnings brought you out on the opposite side.

But it was not this circumstance particularly that filled Dick's breast with dismay and despair.

Coming along the street at headlong speed was a mad bull.

Such a thing as chasing one of these infuriated animals through London streets was at that time far from an unusual occurrence, to the great danger of those passengers who might be abroad at the time.

On came this bull, which was of extraordinary size.

His head was held down close to the earth.

Fire flashed from his eyes.

Clouds of vapour from his nostrils.

He uttered a low, fierce bellowing sound, and lashed his sides furiously with his tail.

On he came at a frightful rate.

Well might Dick's heart stand still when he found himself face to face with so ferocious an animal, behind whom came just such a rabble as there did after him.

What to do Dick knew not.

But he had no time for deliberation.

The frantic animal came thundering on.

He had evidently seen Dick, and blinded by fury, looked upon him as one of his enemies.

The bellowing sound increased in loudness.

Dick's pursuers came round the corner, but when they saw the state of affairs stood still.

The street had two openings.

Both of these were now filled up by an excited crowd.

Near the centre were the two creatures chased.

One a bull.

The other a man.

Dick looked despairingly at both sides of him, but no friendly turning presented itself.

How was he to escape.

To turn and flee would but take him into the arms of his pursuers.

Was he fated to be gored to death by the mad bull?

CHAPTER CIV.

DICK FINDS A TEMPORARY REFUGE FROM HIS ASSAILANTS.

THE reader must bear in mind that from the time Dick came in sight of the bull scarce thirty seconds had elapsed, and the different things that had happened occurred simultaneously.

It is wonderful how many things can take place in a few seconds, but it requires time to relate them.

The reflections that passed through Dick's mind, though seemingly many and complex, were presented to his mind almost at the same time.

Sudden peril seems to have the effect of endowing the mind with greater powers, enabling it to trace the operations of many events at the same instant, and quite independently of each other.

There was but one way in which Dick could escape, and that presented so faint a prospect that it was scarcely deserving of the name.

The houses in this street were old-fashioned ones, with deep projecting doorways and overhanging stories.

By springing into one of these doorways, and pressing himself closely against the door itself, there was just a faint hope that he would escape the bull.

But if he succeeded in this, he would be captured by the men.

However, with the instinct of preservation from immediate danger, Dick made a dash at the nearest of these doorways, and squeezed himself in in the manner we have described.

He turned aside only just in time.

The maddened bull was bearing full down upon him.

The rapid movement which Dick made was an event for which the creature did not look, and it continued to run some yards past where he stood before it could recover the impetus it had given to itself, and came to a stand.

This it did about half-a-dozen houses off, and then, giving vent to a terrible roar of rage, he turned back again.

Upon this, the people who had been chasing Turpin advanced.

Those at the other end of the street who had been chasing the bull retreated.

Some kind of instinct seemed to tell the creature whereabouts Dick was, by whom its whole attention appeared to be occupied.

He galloped direct to the doorway.

But Dick Turpin had taken advantage of the brief space of time which it took the bull to stop himself and turn round.

He observed on the old door a massive knocker.

He used it vigorously.

The door was almost immediately opened, and panting and exhausted Dick stepped in and closed the door behind him.

It was the maid-of-all-work, apparently, who had answered the knock, and she was not a little astonished at Dick's behaviour.

But her astonishment merged into terror when she saw him, with great rapidity, turn the key in the lock, and shoot the bolts at the top and bottom of the door into their sockets.

So quickly was this done, that she had not time to cry out, run away, or give any alarm, before Dick caught her by the arm.

"Make but the least sound, raise but the least alarm, and you are a corpse!"

There was a fanlight over the door which served to light up the passage, and by its aid Turpin saw the girl open and shut her mouth, very much in the way some great fish might be supposed to do on being suddenly transported from its native element into the air.

"Silence," whispered Dick, in resolute tones. "Strive not to recover your voice, or"——

A dull thump at this moment came against the door.

"The bull!" said Turpin.

The thump was followed by the trampling of many footsteps, and then a hoarse cry arose.

Something of an unusual character was going on in the street.

"Wha-at's tha at?" gasped the servant, faintly.

"Satan and his imps after a sinning soul."

"Oh! heaven have mercy on me," said the servant, faintly.

"Show me the way to the top of the house," cried Turpin, as he heard a furious hammering at the door. Quick—quick for your life!"

But the events which had just occurred were too startling for the servant's mind to bear, and she fell backwards in a fainting fit.

"Confound her!" said Turpin, rushing along the passage.

A flight of stairs, leading to the upper part of the house, was before him.

He heard a voice crying out from the lower regions.

It was a feminine one.

"Sally! Sally! What is it? Shut the door, and come down stairs. Sally! Sally! I say!"

But Sally was deaf to all such calls.

Dick sprang up the staircase.

It was a very dark one, and he more than once in his headlong ascent missed his footing.

"What's the matter?" cried another voice, which proceeded from the front room on the second floor.

The door of this room was opened a little way, and a head projected from it.

It was a man's head.

"Who is it, I say? Is it thieves, or fire, or murder? Who is it, I say?"

"The devil!" said Turpin, and darting forward he caught hold of the knob of the door before the man could withdraw his head, and pulled it towards him.

The man made two or three inarticulate sounds.

Then Turpin let go of the handle of the door.

Down fell the man like a log of wood.

"I've done for him, that's pretty clear," said Dick, as he hurried up a third flight of stairs.

This storey appeared to be untenanted.

He opened one of the doors, of which there were two before him.

It led into a garret.

A glance told him no one was there, and he shut the door behind him at once, just as he heard a tremendous disturbance in the lower part of the house.

"They have found their way in," he gasped, as he fastened the frail door behind him. "What shall I do now?"

In fact, Turpin had ascended the stairs without a thought as to what he was to do when he reached the top. He had merely acted upon the impulse which prompted him to place as great a distance as he could between himself and his foes.

He looked round the attic in which he stood.

It was scantily furnished.

Two chairs.

A table.

In one corner a stump bedstead.

Against the wall a lilliputian looking-glass.

These were all the room contained.

The fastening upon the door, which was very old and frail, were merely a couple of bolts.

This, he felt, would be no obstacle to his foes, whom he could now hear rushing up the staircase.

He cast his eyes upon the bed.

He might, perhaps, he thought, by dragging that from its present position, and placing it against the door, hinder for a little while their entrance.

This he determined to do, and caught hold of the foot of the bed for that purpose.

But, alas! for the insecurity of things in this world. No sooner did he attempt to drag it forward than the lower part came away in his hands, and the whole reached the floor in one grand smash.

This was vexatious in the extreme.

Not only had he wasted moments when every moment was of inestimable value, but he had raised such a sound as could not fail to indicate his exact position.

He ran to the window, and flung it open.

It looked on to the roof, in which, indeed, it was made.

About six feet off was a gutter filled with black, oozy mud, and on the other side of that gutter a crumbling stone parapet, some eighteen inches in height.

'I must make my way over the roofs, I suppose," said Dick, "and trust to fate for the result."

As he spoke he clambered through the window and lowered himself into the gutter.

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL LISTEN TO THE MYSTERIOUS SOUNDS.]

He did not stay to close it after him; he was well aware his foes already knew his exact location, and that when they entered and found the room empty they would, of course, run to the window.

Dick scratched his hands and broke his nails in his progress down the slanting roof, but otherwise he sustained no injury.

His feet sank deeply into the mud in the gutter.

It was not without some misgiving that he stood where he did. He could not tell how secure it was, or how soon he might be precipitated into the street below.

CHAPTER CV.

DICK TURPIN'S POSITION DOES NOT GET ANY BETTER; IN FACT PERILS INCREASE.

Every moment now, however, only served to give him confidence, and with the feeling pressing upon him that there was no time for delay, he crawled as quickly as he could along the gutter.

After proceeding about a dozen yards, however, he came to a house that was some three feet higher than its neighbours.

Hitherto he had been careful not to let his head be seen over the top of the parapet by those who were doubtless watching for him below, but now he would be obliged to run the risk of being seen unless he chose to remain where he was, and that would be to ensure his capture.

He hesitated a little.

The accomplishment merely of the feat of climbing from one roof to the other was full of peril.

But if he was to escape it must be tried, and although he was almost powerless from the fatigue he had hitherto experienced, he summoned all his fortitude to his aid, and resolved to make the attempt.

He stood up in the gutter, and placed his hands on the roof of the adjoining house, in order to draw himself up.

The moment he did so a loud shout arose.

H uld not resist turning hi head and looking in the direction whence it proceeded.

This was from the street below.

Dick looked down.

It was crowded with an excited mass of persons.

Upon observing that h face was turned towards them they set up another shout.

Dick only gave one glance, and then he turned his whole attention to the task he had set himself.

Slowly and carefully he drew himself up.

And all the time he was in full sight of the people.

A woman who was amongst them, and who carried on her head a basket of suspicious-looking fish, exclaimed in shrill, shrewish tones,—

"Fetch him down—fetch him down, or he will escape. Hurl a stone at him, and fetch him down."

There was something so enchanting to the minds of the persons composing the crowd in fetching a man off the roof of a house with throwing stones, that, uttering a cry of delight, they at once set about putting her suggestion into execution.

A shower of missiles of all descriptions were aimed at Turpin.

But, luckily for him, when the first were thrown he had just succeeded in reaching the roof of the house, and he crouched down close to the parapet, which on that one happened to be a good two feet in height.

By this means he escaped the greater part of them.

Then Dick heard a loud hurrah in his rear, and he turned round, although he knew well enough from whence it proceeded.

Those who had violently broken into the house had reached the attic window.

"Surrender, Dick Turpin," cried a voice, "surrender, or you are a dead man!"

The only notice Dick took of this speech was to crawl still further, and with increased speed, along the parapet.

It is wonderful what danger people will run for money. Under ordinary circumstances there was not one of the men who were chasing Turpin that would have attempted that which they now performed.

They scrambled recklessly out of the window, and rolled down the roof until their further progress was stayed by the parapet, which vibrated before the shocks that were given to it.

But regaining their feet in an incredibly short space of time, they crept along the gutter in the direction of their prey.

As soon as Dick Turpin saw this movement on the part of his foes, he felt more than ever the necessity there was for him to use all his endeavours to escape them.

His position was a most perplexing one.

So far from having bettered his condition, he, as he glanced about him, felt pretty well convinced that he had made it worse.

He had crawled for some distance along the housetops, when a very serious obstacle presented itself.

He had reached a point where a narrow street diverged from the main one.

"Too wide," muttered Dick, as he peered over cautiously, and saw that, narrow as the street was, the space between the houses was too great to make a jump practicable. "Too wide. Which way shall I turn?"

That, however, was most essentially a moment for action—not hesitation.

There was but one resource, and that was to crawl along the roofs of the houses abutting upon the narrow street even as he had done the others.

Dick was agile, and he got along at a much swifter rate than his pursuers, besides which he had a good start, and the distance between them, instead of diminishing, increased.

The mob who choked up the front street, as we may call it, did not observe the highwayman turn the corner. The stone coping effectually shrouded him from their observation.

Their whole attention was absorbed in watching the progress of the officers who were full in view, for not having the motive for concealing themselves that Dick had, they made their way in an erect posture, which they found was easiest for them.

Of course Dick was now, owing to having turned the corner, out of sight of his pursuers

This was an event which might not occur again, and, after having with some difficulty got round a stack of chimneys, which in themselves would serve in no small degree to shield him, Dick began to look about him for a hiding place.

To have continued along the housetops would have been madness, for the officers would have nothing to do but take up such positions as would make his interception certain.

His only chance, and that was a faint one indeed was this.

To enter unperceived one of the houses in the street and find some place of concealment there until such time as he could emerge with safety.

But the difficulty of doing this was, one would think, insuperable or nearly so.

The whole neighbourhood appeared to be aroused.

The inhabitants of the houses would not fail to be on the alert.

Besides, if he did enter, although the officers might not know the exact spot, yet they would be able to tell where he had disappeared to a trifle, and then all they would have to do would be to post sentinels, and make a perquisition of the suspected houses.

Imminency of danger has the effect of enhancing the power of the mind, and all these deliberations presented themselves simultaneously to Turpin.

To remain where he was, however, was but to entail inevitable capture, so, as he knew he could not make his position much worse than it was, he resolved to make an entrance into one of the houses, and chance it.

One which seemed likely to answer his purpose was about half-a-dozen yards off, and he made his way towards it at full speed.

"Thank heaven!" he said, as he reached a small attic window in the tiles, one-half of which swung invitingly open. "Thank heaven, they have not seen me yet. Let me hope there is no one in the place to interfere with me."

As he spoke Dick raised his head, so that his eyes were just above the level of the window-sill.

"Empty!" he said, with a gush of grateful feeling at his heart. "Empty! There is hope yet—all may be well."

With the greatest eagerness, now, he drew himself up, and, taking care not to raise his body any higher than he could help, crawled head-foremost into the room.

Scarcely, however, had his feet touched the floor, than he heard a shout, and a mighty rush of many footsteps.

He closed the window with great rapidity. It was less likely to excite suspicion than if he had allowed it to remain open.

"They have turned the corner," he said. "Heaven help me! This street is now choked up with people making escape a matter of impossibility."

A loud hurrah from the mob reached his ears at this juncture, but what it signified he could form no notion.

"They think it fine fun," I daresay, he said, "to hunt a fellow-creature, like some wild animal, to death. But they have not caught me yet."

Having fastened the window, he turned round to examine the room.

But nowhere in it could he see an at all practicable hiding-place.

The door was just opposite the window, and he hastened towards it.

He placed his hand upon the latch, and lifted it stealthily then, holding the door open about a quarter of an inch, he listened.

All was still.

Having in this way assured himself that there was no one on the other side, he opened the door and stepped out upon the landing.

This place was profoundly dark; indeed, the only illumination it ever had was what reached it when the attic door was open.

Now it was close shut.

The fastenings of this attic door were all on the inner side, or Dick would have secured the door in some way.

He had, however, noticed the position of the stairs, and, placing his hand upon the balustrade, he began to descend them cautiously.

As he proceeded he found he was able to see a little about him, which showed some rays of light found their way there, though he could not perceive their source

At length he reached the landing on the floor beneath him.

He paused.

There was no sound in his rear indicative that the officers had traced him, but how long that would be the case was more than he could tell.

"What kind of house is this, I wonder?" he asked himself. "If I knew, it would be of material aid to me, since then I should know better what to do; now I am all abroad. Ha! what is that?"

A lumbering noise, which clearly came from the attic above, reached his ears.

At the same moment a door, within a few inches of which he had been standing, was flung open.

A flood of light, for such, by the contrast, it seemed to be, lighted up the landing.

"What is it?" said a voice, in accents of alarm. "What is it?"

CHAPTER CVI.

THE CUPBOARD PROVES A DANGEROUS HIDING-PLACE FOR DICK.

Dick saw that it was a young woman, carrying a child in her arms, who had asked the question.

Before she had time to give any alarm or notice that he was there even, Turpin rushed into the room, and closing the door, put his back against it.

"Silence!" he said, in a low, but fierce whisper. "Silence! If you so much as raise your voice above a whisper, even to pronounce one word, that moment is your last."

"Oh, heaven have mercy upon me, and save me," said the woman, sinking upon her knees in an agony of fright. "Spare me and my little one."

"Rise," said Dick. "I intend no harm against you or your child either, so long as you do not, by making an outcry, provoke me to it. Will you be silent?"

"Oh, yes. Have mercy, good sir. I will be very silent indeed. What is it you want?"

Dick looked earnestly into the woman's face in order to judge, by its expression, how far he might trust her.

The day was fading fast, and evening creeping on, but still there came into that room sufficient light to serve his purpose.

She was young—not twenty at the most, but already had care and want and grief marred the beauty of her countenance. Her eyes and cheeks were sunken and hollow, her lips thin and bloodless, and her whole body as much emaciated as one in the last stage of marasmus.

But despite of this, Dick saw at a glance that in her girlhood she must have been very beautiful. Her hair was dark and fine in texture, and there was about her that nameless something, which, under all circumstances, clings to those who are gently born and delicately nurtured.

The child which she held in her arms, and clasped to her bosom with maternal tenderness, was a diminutive, puny thing, devoid, apparently, of all animation save that which existed in its preternaturally large eyes.

Famine and misery had already set their stamp upon the poor little creature, and Dick felt a strange feeling at his heart as he gazed upon it.

All around, too, could be seen traces of poverty the most abject. The bare walls—the bare floor—the fireless grate—the miserable heap of rags in one corner which served as a bed—the broken window—the absence of all the necessaries of life, bespoke the fact that gaunt and hungry want there held dominion.

All this Dick saw at one brief glance.

There was something in this woman's countenance, notwithstanding the havoc which misery and sorrow had made upon it, that told Dick she possessed a kindly heart. He did not therefore hesitate to inform her who and what he was.

"Again," he said, "again I tell you, you have nought to fear! All I ask is that you will conceal me somewhere, and should my enemies, who are now thirsting for my blood, inquire whether you have seen me, that you will tell them no, and by that means save my life."

"I cannot—I cannot."

"You cannot?"

"No. There is no place here where you could hide. And I am so terrified and nervous that they would be sure to suspect your presence here from my manner."

"Madam," said Dick, "let me not appeal to you in vain. My life is wholly in your hands. You can save me or you can destroy me. Surely you would not willingly be the means of bringing anyone to death, even though he was your enemy, which heaven knows I am not."

"No—no! Oh! what is that? what is that?"

"My enemies!" said Dick. "I am unarmed, and cannot defend myself. Will you deliver me into their hands, or will you hide me from them?"

The poor woman, who was almost distraught with fear, began to weep.

Turpin got desperate.

"Hark!" he said, "they are on the stairs; can you hear them? Others are trampling overhead. In another moment they will be here. Hide me somewhere, and I will reward you well."

"Look round," said the woman. "Where can you secrete yourself?"

"Here," said Dick, as with a bound he reached a cupboard door. "In here."

"But they will find you there."

"Not if you tell them you have not seen me."

"Be it so, then. I will try."

The cupboard towards which Dick had hastened was in a kind of recess.

It was divided into two portions.

He chose the lower, because there was but one shelf in it.

With great speed he crawled in, and then he said—

"Bring some of those bed-things and stuff them in. Then, if they should be suspicious enough to look in, they will not see me."

With trembling limbs the poor woman did his bidding, and scarcely had she crammed the last article in, and turned the little button which served as a fastening to the cupboard, than a loud authoritative knock was given to the door.

Truly was Dick Turpin in an unenviable predicament. He was a prisoner, without the least power to release himself, and not only had he to trust to the woman keeping good faith with him, but to her having sufficient command over her words and actions not to generate suspicion in the minds of the officers that he was there.

There was only this one circumstance in Dick's favour, and that was that he had left no clue by which the officers could trace him to the house in which he was, which made a vast difference indeed; for, of course, they could not tell precisely in which one he had taken refuge.

The poor woman, who all this time had never put the child out of her arms, opened the door in answer to the summons.

Her surprise at seeing there several police-officers was real, for Dick had merely told her that his enemies were seeking him, and the idea that he was a criminal never once entered her imagination.

The officers rushed at once into the room and glared about them.

"What is it you want, gentlemen? What is it you want? We have done nothing wrong, I can assure you."

"We don't say as how you have, but we're after some one we suspects has got into this 'ere house. How long have you been here?"

"Six months, next quarter-day, sir!"

"Pho pho! I don't mean that. How long have you been in this room to-day? When were you out last?"

"At dinner-time, sir."

"Oh! very good! That will do. Now, while you have been here have you seen a stranger in the house? A man dressed like a farmer?"

"No, sir."

"Are you sure he has not been here?"

"Quite sure, sir; for how could he come in without my knowing?"

"True; but have you heard no one?"

"Oh! yes. This house, you see, is let out to poor folks, and some one or other is continually going up and down stairs."

"Oh! and it is so often the case that, if you heard anyone on the stairs, you would not open the door to see who it was?"

"Not unless I thought it was my husband, sir."

"Ah! you have a husband, have you? And where is he, pray?"

"Here!" said a voice; and a young man, pale, thin, and wretched-looking as his wife, sprang into the room.

"Seize him," roared the officer in command. "Seize him!"

"No, no. Have mercy: Why do you seek him?"

"Let him go," said the officer. "That is not him."

"What is all this, Mary?" said the young man, with a bewildered air. "What does it mean?"

"We are officers," said the one who had ordered him to be seized, taking a constable's staff of authority from his pocket; "we are officers in search of a notorious criminal, who we suspects is hid somewheres in this house."

"But why did you seize me?"

"Just to make sure you wasn't him, to be sure."

"But he is not here, Mary, is he? Why don't you tell them so?"

It was the first time Mary had ever deceived her husband, and she hesitated a moment before she replied:

"I have told them," she said, "but they don't seem to believe me."

"Why, sir, you see," said the officer, who had previously spoken, "he is so full of all sorts of tricks, that a fox is quite a fool to him, and not no mistake, and so you see we is a kind of doubtful like."

"Just so. But who is he?"

"Well, we don't mind telling you, because you don't seem very well off."

"God help us! No. We—we are starving!"

"Just so, and that makes us think you will be glad of a chance of earning a part of the reward which is offered for the apprehension of Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

"Dick Turpin?"

"Yes."

"And do you mean to say he is in this house?"

"Why, not exactly that, but we have traced him to somewhere close at hand. Help us, and if we catch him you shall have ten pounds for your share."

"Ten pounds!" said the young man, who made a rapid mental calculation of how much food such a sum would buy for his wife and children. "Ten pounds?"

"Yes, and now perhaps you wouldn't mind us making a search here?"

"By no means," said the young man. "It can't take you long."

The wife sank down in an agony of tears.

"There seems to be but one place in the room where he could hide," continued the officer, "and that is the cupboard yonder. If he's there we'll soon have him out."

The poor woman gave a shriek as she saw the officer draw his cutlass, and walk up to the cupboard door.

CHAPTER CVII.

OLD MATTHEW IS RATHER UNEASY IN HIS MIND ABOUT TOM KING.

"DON'T be afraid, mum," he said, on hearing the cry, and attributing it to a widely different cause to that which in reality called it into existence; "don't be afraid, mum, we won't hurt you. We would not search at all, only it will be a sort of satisfaction; you see he is so uncommon cunning."

Poor Dick!

We have seen him in many perilous situations in the course of this eventful narrative, but never in so perilous a one as the present.

Discovery, one would think, upon the officer opening the door, would immediately ensue.

The woman who had befriended him made sure that all was over, and hid her face in her hands.

The top portion of the cupboard was first thrown open.

There were five shelves, but every one of them was quite bare.

"He isn't there, at all events," said the officer; "I say, my friend, you haven't much of a larder."

The others laughed.

"I have already told you," said the young man, "that we are starving."

"Come on, then, and I only hope we capture him, and you will have enough to live on for I don't know how long. Now what shall we find here?"

While thus speaking he turned the button, and opened the door of the lower cupboard.

"Hallo!" he said, "why here's a lot of rags here."

The husband looked rather surprised to see the bedclothes bundled up into the cupboard in that fashion.

"Oh! he ain't there, that's very clear! However, just to make certain."

And he plunged his cutlass three times into the mass of rags.

It is very certain Dick Turpin owed his life, or at all events his escape, on that occasion, to the merest chance circumstance in the world.

On entering the cupboard he had laid himself down as flat as he could; but when he did so it was without having any motive for so doing.

The consequence of this apparently simple action was, that he escaped contact with the cutlass when the officer made the three fierce and random stabs at it.

"No! he isn't there," said the officer, "and now for the rest of the house. I've got some one at the door below, and on the roof above, and so they have over all the other houses on this side of the street, so he can't escape."

With this sentence, the officer and the men he had with him, hastened from the room.

The poor woman's husband accompanied them,

As soon as she was sure she was quite alone, for Mary—we may as well call her by that name, since her husband did—Mary, we say, went to the room-door, and watched them descend the flight of stairs.

To accompany them in what the reader knows was such a perfectly useless search, would be anything but interesting. It is with Turpin and the wife that we have now to do.

Having watched them enter the room on the floor below, she very carefully closed her own door, and going up to the cupboard, she said,—

"Oh, sir—speak—speak. Speak at once, and relieve my heart by telling me you are not much hurt. Speak. Oh, speak at once."

She waited a moment, and then finding no reply came, she said,—

"Oh, he is dead—dead. What shall I do now? Oh, what shall I do?"

Tears streamed from her eyes.

Of a truth was Turpin right when he divined she had a tender heart.

To her, guilty though he was, there seemed something terrible and unnatural in thus seeking to drag a fellow-creature to death.

But Dick was very far indeed from dead, and he hesitated to reply solely because he was in doubt whether it would be safe for him to do so.

Her evident distress made him resolve to run the risk of being heard by his foes.

"Fear nothing, Mary," he said. "I'm safe and unhurt. I will, however, stay here until I am assured that my pursuers have left the place. As for your husband, you must let him know I am here. They have promised him ten pounds to aid in my capture or my death. I will give him thrice ten if he will aid me to escape."

"Oh! sir, do not think us so mercenary as that, or suspect my husband of such a fault. We are starving, sir, or he would not have done as he has."

"Say no more about that. Be silent, I pray. Your words may be overheard. Suffer me to remain here where I am until the officers have left the house."

"I will, sir—I will. But are you sure you are unhurt?"

"Quite, quite."

Mary withdrew, and seated herself near the empty grate.

She shivered, but it was more from fright than cold.

Night was coming on now with rapid strides.

The gloom in that miserable chamber deepened.

But the poor woman made no attempt to dissipate it.

Their last candle had been burned, and she had not a fraction wherewith to buy another.

The preceding day the pawnbroker in the next street had taken the last article they had that was of the slightest value, and with the few pence thus provided they purchased a loaf of bread.

It grew darker and darker.

And as the obscurity increased, so did the multitudinous noises which are ever heard in a great city subside.

Cramped up in that narrow cupboard, breathing with difficulty, and not able to stir hand or foot, Turpin listened with an intensity which can only be conceived for some sounds which would indicate the position of his foes.

But none came.

At length, when positive silence had prevailed for a long period, and when he felt almost certain that the officers had left the house, he tapped gently with his fingers against the panel of the cupboard.

Mary rose instantly and went towards it.

"What is it?" she asked. "Oh! what is it?"

"Find out, if you can do so without exciting suspicion, whether the officers have left the house. I trust to you not to betray me."

"Oh! sir. Do not think of that. I would not be guilty of such a thing for worlds! Besides, you ought to trust me. If I had wished to do so, what would have prevented me disclosing your hiding-place when the officers were here in the room?"

"Nothing," said Turpin. "I can trust you, I am sure. But above all things, excite no suspicion."

Without another word the poor woman made her way across the dark room, and down the still darker stairs.

It was an anxious time for Dick while she was absent, not that he had any doubts of her good faith, but what he feared most was that, if the officers should still be lurking about, they would suspect her.

But this dread had no foundation. In a very few minutes he heard her footsteps on the stairs.

"All is well!" she said.

"The officers have left the house?"

"Yes, some time ago."

"Very good!" said Turpin. "Then just open the door, and I'll come out."

The little button which fastened the cupboard was turned, and Dick scrambled out.

He was glad enough to stretch his legs.

"How confoundedly dark the place is!" he said.

"Yes; but you are not afraid of the darkness surely; and besides, it will be much safer for you to be in the dark."

"You are right!"

"I am sorry I have no better accommodation to offer you, but you see here all that we have."

"Thank goodness!" said Dick, "I am in a position to recompense you amply for having saved my life, and I will take care to do so."

"But I should be very much hurt indeed, sir, although we are so bad off, if you thought that I have only acted as I have in the hopes of getting money."

"I would not do you that injustice for a moment, and there is no reason why I should not display my gratitude for the service you have rendered me in the best way I can."

"Alas! sir. You cannot think how such a life as we are leading now grieves me. It is so different to the future I pictured for myself on my wedding-day! I am almost heart-broken."

"Do not weep," said Turpin, as the poor woman burst into a flood of tears. "Do not weep! Hope for better times!"

"I have hoped on many a weary month. Hoped against hope! and every succeeding day only served to show our position to be worse than it was on the preceding one."

"It is so."

"Those who have not experienced it cannot know what it is. What we are to do, I know not."

"We must talk about that. When do you expect your husband back?"

"Every moment. Hark! I can hear him now coming up the stairs."

"Indeed! Are you sure?"

"Yes!"

"Then I shall leave you to tell him who I am."

CHAPTER CVIII.

DICK TURPIN, NOT FOR THE FIRST TIME IN HIS LIFE, DOES A GOOD ACTION.

"STAND back into the darkness yonder near the cupboard," said the woman; "he will not see you there. I am going to open the door."

Dick felt his way as cautiously and silently across the room as he could, until he reached the cupboard, where he paused.

Mary opened the door of the room, and stepped out upon the landing.

"Robert," she said, "Robert, is that you?"

"Yes, Mary, I am here."

The voice was one saddened with disappointment.

"I am so glad you have come back, Robert."

"Glad! You ought instead to curse the hour when first you saw me, for it is I alone that have brought all this want and misery upon you."

"No, do not say that, Robert," said Mary; and Dick, whose eyes were accustomed to the darkness of the room, could see that she had laid her head upon her husband's shoulder. "Don't say that, Robert, because it is not true. You could not avoid misfortune."

"No, dearest. Heaven knows if I could have avoided all the evils that have come upon us I would have done so gladly! But it has been through no fault of mine."

"I know that, Robert, and therefore you were wrong to blame yourself as you did. I could not bear to hear that."

"Heaven bless you!" said Robert, in a husky voice. "You are an angel, Mary. How wretched I should have been without you!"

There was a silence of some few minutes' duration.

Dick, whose heart was full of kindly sympathies, was deeply affected at this scene, and he rejoiced at the chance which had put him in the way of affording them at any rate a temporary respite from their misery.

Still he held back. He felt how impolitic it would have been to have disclosed his presence before Mary had warned her husband of it.

Mary was sobbing.

"Cheer up, Mary, darling!" said Robert, with an effort. "Cheer up, dear one! Surely we have now known the worst that can befall us, and such being the case, things must take a turn for the better."

"I hope so, Robert. But you went out with those officers. Did they capture the man they sought?"

"No, Mary, or I should have let you know it before this. We searched everywhere, but we could find no trace of him."

"But, Robert, suppose you had found him, and that you had received the money, do you think it would ever have done us any good? No, Robert, I am sure it would not, because it would have been the price of blood."

"Well, well, it is not worth while to talk about that now. He has escaped, and so I did not get the money."

"You speak angrily—regretfully."

"Do I? Then forgive me for it."

"I know you have had enough to try your temper and make you repine. Let us still hope that better times are coming."

"I begin to fear that is a hope which will never be realized, and I am sure to-night it seems further off than ever."

"No."

"No, do you say, Mary? What has happened, then? Tell me, oh! tell me."

"You promise you will not act rashly, but wait until you have heard all?"

"All what?"

"You shall know in good time. Do you promise, Robert?"

"I do, I do."

"I take you at your word. Now, sir, come forward and speak for yourself!"

The room was too dark for the expression of wonderment upon Robert's face to be seen, but he gave a great start when he heard some one walk across the room towards him.

"Who—what is this, Mary? Speak, tell me!"

"Make no alarm," said Dick, in those peculiar quiet tones which are more effective in arresting anyone's attention than loud ones, "make no alarm all will be explained."

"But who is this, Mary? what does he here?"

"That you shall learn in good time. I am here because I sought shelter from my enemies, and because your wife, whom heaven bless for being a true and noble-hearted woman, succoured and shielded me from them."

"Then, then"——

"What, my friend?"

You are the man of whom they came in search?"

"I am. I fear not to disclose myself to you. I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

Robert was so overcome by this revelation that he was full a minute before he could recover himself sufficiently to speak:

"Do not blame me, Robert, for what I have done," said his wife; "I could not have borne the thought of handing him over to his foes."

"But he is a criminal?"

"I have no proof of that. He has done me no harm; nor you either, to my knowledge."

"I am here," said Dick again. "You can betray me if you choose!"

"No, no. That would be base."

"I am glad to hear you say as much. As you must know, you have no special feeling against me, for to the best of my belief we have never met until this moment."

"I cannot see your face, Mr.—a—a—"

"Turpin."

"I cannot see your face, but there is nothing in your voice familiar to me. Its tones, too, are those of one who would not deceive."

"I am glad you have so good an opinion of me. Had it not been for your wife, of whom, indeed, you should be proud, for she has an angel's spirit"——

"God bless her! Yes," interrupted the husband, as he kissed her on the cheek.

"Had it not been for her, I say, I should have been in the hands of my enemies and a prisoner, but I appealed to her to save me, and she did so."

"I know she would. But where did you hide? I myself searched this place thoroughly."

"The cupboard."

"But you were not there?"

"I was, in the lower half of it."

"Then you are wounded?"

"No."

"By what means, then, did you escape the officer's sword? He plunged it three times through the clothes."

"Fortunately I lay in such a position that they did not reach me. He would have hit in a moment if he had, and then I should have been dragged forth."

"Good gracious!" said Robert, drawing a long breath, "what a narrow escape!"

"Narrow indeed! But do not let us talk about that. I escaped, and am free."

Dick paused a moment. He hardly knew in what way to mould his speech.

"Do not be offended with me if I make a remark, but you are poor?"

The husband and the wife were silent.

"The evidences of it are too palpable to be overlooked. But from the words and manner of both of you I can tell it is not your natural state. I can tell you have occupied a very different position. Do not think, however, that I wish to pry into your past life. You have been unfortunate."

"We have, indeed," said Robert, in a broken voice, "most unfortunate. But we could not help it. The circumstances were entirely beyond our own control."

"I can readily enough believe that."

"I have borne up against them as well as could—tried every means to keep the wolf from the door, but in vain—always in vain. I have walked London from end to end in search of employment, but found none, except, indeed, when I have had some casual job."

"Labour is abundant in London, and ever will be. To the end there will always be more hands than there is work for them to do."

"I knew all that, sir, but still I came, hoping to do better. It is that which grieves me to the soul."

Mary crept yet closer to him.

"Were it not for my wife here, I know not what I should have done. But she has proved an angel. The home from which I took her was, if not a luxurious, yet a comfortable one—and now—now look at this."

Turpin was deeply moved at this scene; and he rejoiced within himself to think he had the power to alleviating some portion of their distress.

"But Mary, heaven bless her," continued Robert, speaking from his heart, "has never uttered one word of complaint, but borne all in silence. I speak to you thus, although I cannot see your face, but yet your voice tells me you are one that can sympathize with us, and understand how dear such conduct must make her to me. She has been a true wife indeed."

Closer—yet closer Mary clung to her husband. Every word of eulogy he uttered was a reward to her, for she loved him as few women have the power of loving.

It seems hard that two fond hearts should ever know so much suffering, and yet it is only too frequently the case. Still, when they have weathered through the storm, they are happier for the contrast; but in London how many there are who perish for every one that is saved.

The silence that ensued was an embarrassing one for Dick. He could tell both Mary and Robert were much moved, and with a natural delicacy, he shrunk from intruding any remark upon them.

"Oh! Robert," whispered Mary, "I am so very—very happy."

And then Dick could tell a gush of tears had come to her relief.

CHAPTER CIX.

DICK TURPIN PAYS A FLYING VISIT TO THE "WHITE HORSE" INN IN DRURY-LANE.

"Pardon me, my friends," said Dick, after allowing time for the pent-up feelings of the wife to have full vent. "Pardon me, but"——

"Nay, sir," replied Robert, with an effort to speak cheerfully. "It is we who ought to ask pardon of you for having been so selfish as to forget you, and the danger you are in."

"Will you listen to me, and promise not be offended at what I say?"

"I think I can safely do that, for, unless I am indeed very much mistaken, you are not one who would say anything unpleasant."

"I am glad you think so! And, in the first place, you—or your wife rather, has rendered me the greatest service which you possibly could—you saved my life! Now, I am not one who expresses his gratitude by words alone, and therefore I desire that you will accept at my hands some more substantial token of it. Let no false pride be suffered to intervene between us. It so happens that I am in a situation to render you a service, though not commensurate with the one you rendered me; and, believe me, I shall be more hurt than words can express, if you refuse to allow me this opportunity of testifying my gratitude."

"Say on, sir—say on!"

"Then what I wish to offer you is a sum of money sufficiently large to give you a fresh start in life."

"Oh! sir, you are too good! Ought we, Mary, to accept of this?"

"Let me answer for her," said Dick. "Just now you were willing, for the sake of the reward, to assist those who came to capture me! In the event, I presume, of their having done so, you would not have scrupled to accept the money! If this is so, surely it ought to be more satisfactory to receive it for having saved a life!"

"I have listened to you," said Robert, "and have not been offended at what you have said. Now it is my turn to ask the same of you."

"I cannot do otherwise than assent, but"——

"Nay, hear me! You know our position, or at all events sufficient to comprehend it. We are starving—yes, starving is the word—but, for all that, we are happy. Every article of the slightest value which we possessed, with the exception of what you see, has been made away with. I knew the end must come at last, and so it has. We have reached it to-day. Now, sir, you will understand what I am about to say. For the service I have rendered you I feel that I cannot and ought not to receive money as compensation, badly as I need it."

But this is carrying it too far," interrupted Dick.

"Nay, do not speak, sir, until you have heard me out. With a small sum of money my wife and myself could take some business. We are willing, we should work—we should succeed; I feel convinced of that."

"And so do I," said Dick; "you are a worthy fellow, and if you don't succeed no one ought to; therefore I beg you will ac"——

"I have not yet finished, sir, but I shall in a few moments. It would be against and contrary to my nature to accept such a sum from any one—as a gift."

"But it is not a gift," replied Turpin; "it is payment merely for service rendered or work done."

"I cannot look upon it in that light, but I feel that if I refused all help at your hands I should not only be unjust to my wife and children, but ungrateful to you. Therefore if you will lend me for the space of twelve months the sum of twenty pounds you will be rendering a service the extent of which we can neither of us estimate."

"And is that all?" said Dick, "then you shall have your wish. Not twenty, however, but forty, and I shall tie you to no time for repayment."

"Forty pounds!" said Robert; "that is a large sum to anyone, and I have no security to offer you."

"No security? you have the best—an honest invention to repay me."

"If that is security, I have it."

"Here, Mary," said Dick, as he slipped some money in her hand; go and buy a light, and we will settle this little business."

Mary was gone but a moment. In fact, the basement of the house was a huckster's shop where such things as candles were sold.

The light which it gave when it was placed upon the chimney-piece, for there was no table in the room, was but ghastly and feeble, but yet sufficed to light up three happy faces.

Never in his life probably had Dick had such a sensation of satisfaction at his heart. He was conscious of having done a good action.

The forty pounds were counted out, which was, in truth, nearly all the money Dick possessed, and Robert would insist upon writing out a proper acknowledgment of the debt.

"And now that is settled," said Dick, "let us turn to other subjects."

"Excuse me a moment."

"Willingly, my friend."

"But where shall we find you a twelvemonth hence?"

"Do you think you will be able to repay me then?"

"I hope the whole of it, but at all events a portion of it."

Dick mused for a moment, and then he said—

"It is very hard indeed to say where I may be a twelvemonth hence, but if you will take it to the "White Horse" public-house in Drury-lane, and give it to the landlord, Old Matthew, as he is called, it will be all right."

"I shall not forget, sir, and in twelve months' time from this very day I will be there."

"I will endeavour to be there, too, for I shall be anxious to know how far you have been successful. It is likely enough we may meet before that time."

"And now, sir, you were going to say something else."

"I was, and that is, I wish to leave here as quickly now as possible. It is getting late. The officers doubtless have given up all hopes of my capture; still I do not wish to risk anything by being foolishly incautious."

"Of course not."

"I wish you, then, as a favour, to go to some second-hand clothes shop in the neighbourhood and buy a large horseman's cloak, with which I can disguise myself, as my dress, doubtless, has been accurately described."

"I will do it, sir."

"Here is the money. Be as quick as you can, yet above all things do not excite suspicion. You will also be able to tell whether there are any officers lurking about."

Robert was only too glad to be of assistance to his benefactor, and he started off at once.

At this moment there was a faint, wailing cry.

The child, which during the preceding scene had been sleeping in its little apology for a bed, awoke.

The mother's tones were very different now from what they had been. Her heart was light. At the last hour, when fate seemed most unpropitious, fortune had smiled upon her.

She held the child up to the light, which the little creature contemplated with evident delight.

"And now, Mary," said Dick, "for I hope you will look upon me quite as an old friend, and allow me to call you by that title, you will not refuse me permission, I am certain, to make your child some little present in remembrance of me."

"You are too good, sir."

"Nay."

"You have already done enough—and more than enough."

"Here is a guinea. Take it, and understand it is for the child. Use it to no other purpose. It will enable you to buy it warm and comfortable apparel."

Poor Mary. She had borne up through all the time of trouble, but now that good fortune had come upon her she was weak and wept like a child.

"Your heart is a good one, sir, I am sure," she said.

"I can appreciate a kindness," said Dick, deprecatingly, "but that probably is because it is a thing I so rarely meet with, and I feel a pleasure in conferring happiness when I can. There is so little of it in the world, that no one, if he has it in his power, ought to hesitate to bestow it to the full extent of his ability."

At this moment Robert returned.

"Here is, I fancy, just the thing you want, sir," he said, holding open a horseman's cloak of thick blue cloth, and exaggerated size. It will cover you up completely."

"And was the coast clear?"

"Quite."

"Farewell, then, my kind friends, and accept of my best wishes. May you prosper in the world as you deserve to do; and when you hear anything in disfavour of Dick Turpin, the highwayman, put the good action he has done this night in the opposite scale, and weigh it against it."

"You will be always remembered by us as a saviour, said Mary, taking Dick's hand between both hers. "Had it not been for your chance presence here what would have become of us?"

"Good-bye, Mary, do not think of that. You have only your own kind heart to thank. Had you not extended a helping hand to me, I should not have had this opportunity of saving you."

"Good-bye, sir," said Mary, tearfully. "I—I—"

She would have said, she hoped to hear he had ceased to become amenable to the laws, but as she thought it would sound like a reproach, she checked herself, and said instead,—

"I wish I could find words to thank you."

"And now, sir, will you permit me to go a little way with you. I am known, and it would, perhaps, be the means of warding off suspicion from you."

CHAPTER CX.

DICK TURPIN STOPS A BAGMAN ON HIGHGATE-RISE.

"THANKS, my friend, I accept your offer gladly. I have no very clear idea of my locality, except that I am near Smithfield Market."

"Come then, sir, let us start at once."

And after one more farewell to Mary, who stood at the top of the stairs with the candle in her hand, Dick followed his new friend into the street.

Turpin cast an anxious glance about him.

The street was dark, narrow, and winding, but so far as he could see there was no one in view.

"I really think they have left the spot," said Robert.

"Hush! do not speak. We may be overheard."

"In which direction did you wish to go, sir?"

"To Drury-lane."

"Shall you walk?"

"No; not only would it be tiring, but hazardous. I will take a hackney-coach."

"Very good, sir, then come this way; the second turning to the right will take us out on to Snow-hill, and on the other side of Holborn-bridge you will be almost sure to get one."

The distance to this place was short.

They halted for a minute at the corner, and then they heard one come lumbering along Fleet Market.

Robert hailed it, and the driver drew up to the curb-stone.

"Where to, your honour," said the jarvey, for the cloak Dick had on gave him quite an aristocratic look.

"To the corner of Princes-street in Drury-lane."

The driver touched up his cattle, and Dick shook hands with Robert for the last time.

"Well," said Dick to himself, as he settled himself in the carriage, "this has been a day of adventures, and no mistake. However, this is one I shall never have to care back to with regret. I should like to know whether it was really all genuine. I shall know, though, if they return the money at the twelve months' end; but I'll not take it, not I."

He was silent for a minute, for the thought of where he was likely to be at the end of the time specified intruded itself rather unpleasantly upon his mind.

Naturally enough, this brought him to think of the condition of his friend.

"Poor Tom!" he said, "I wonder now how he is getting on? working away at his fetters, I know. But Mr. Townshend, despite your cleverness, I will free him yet! I have said it, and I will do it!"

At this moment the vehicle stopped, and looking out, he saw he had reached his destination.

He alighted, and having given the man a little more than double his fare, that worthy thought fit to say "thank you in a dissatisfied tone of voice.

Dick stood by the post, and watched him drive along Russell-street.

Then turning to the left, he directed his steps to the "White Horse."

Dick did not enter by the front door, because if he had he would have been obliged to run the gauntlet of many prying eyes, so he turned down White Horse-yard, and stopped before the same side-door as he did when he reached the old inn, wounded and faint, on the night he stopped the Lord Mayor's carriage.

As upon that occasion, he pressed his thumb upon the doorpost, and waited.

The door was opened almost immediately by old Matthew.

His delight at seeing Dick back safe and sound was very visibly depicted upon his countenance.

"Come in, Dick, and let me shut the door," he said. "I am right down glad to see thee back, and no mistake. I saw you chased up the Old Bailey into Smithfield, for I was in Coles's shop at the time, and I have been in a terrible fidget ever since."

"Well, here I am, you see, safe and sound. Let me come and sit down a minute, and then I'm off."

Old Matthew introduced Dick into the secret room, and then he related all those particulars with which the reader has already been made familiar.

But above all was old Matthew interested in the episode of Robert and his wife Mary.

"And now, Matthew, my friend, it is time I was off. I have business I want to do to-night, but if Tom is brought to trial I shall want to provide a counsel for him."

"Oh! I'll see to all that."

"No, you won't, and no disrespect to you either. I told you before I was going to get Tom King out of Newgate myself, and I'll do it!"

"Oh! very well, very well, have your own way."

"Don't be offended, Matthew."

"Are you off, then?"

"At once."

"Ain't you going to change your clothes?"

"Oh! hang it, yes. I forgot I was dressed in this style."

"Take this candle, then. You know the way. Your clothes are just on the foot of the bed. I sent over to the costumier's for them."

"All right; and while I am gone, do you saddle Black Bess, and have her ready for me.

Dick sprang up the stairs, and into what may be called his room.

It did not take him very long to resume his ordinary appearance, and then he went down again, and left the little private parlour by a door that led into the yard.

He found Bess there waiting for him.

"Are there any suspicious characters about, Matthew?" he asked, as he sprang into the saddle.

"I haven't seen none, Dick; but I should advise you to be careful; and let me tell you, besides that all the roads leading out of London are guarded by a troop of dragoons."

"That, for the troop of dragoons," said Dick, as he snapped his fingers contemptuously.

"Ah, it's all very fine to carry things off with a high hand like that, Dick, old boy, but if you'll take a piece of friendly advice you'll be careful."

"Don't be afraid of me. I shall be back again safe and sound."

"I hope so.

"And what is more, the next time I come he shall come to bring Tom with me."

As he thus spoke, Dick trotted Bess out into the court near its junction with Stanhope-street.

When he reached this place his thoughts involuntarily turned to the last time he stood there, and when he carried off the young girl Ellen.

"Ah, that reminds me," he said, as he changed Bess's trot into a canter, "I have not seen either her or Tom Davis for a long time, but I will try if I cannot do so to-night. Now I come to think of it, he would be just the very person I want to assist me."

Having these thoughts in his mind, he, as soon as he got clear of the houses, gave Bess the rein.

She had had a long rest, and was therefore quite fresh, and the speed with which she shot past the different objects in her route was really prodigious.

There are few things more invigorating than a few miles' gallop on horseback, and Dick became particularly conscious of it on this occasion.

He, however, reined her in to a walk upon reaching the rather steep ascent known as Highgate-rise.

The night had up to this moment been rather dark, in consequence of the heavy masses of clouds which filled the sky, but now, through a long straggling rift about half-way between the horizon and the zenith, an almost full moon peeped forth.

Her brilliancy was, however, dimmed by the vapours which floated before her disk, and the light which she sent forth was misty and uncertain.

Dick paused altogether on the top of the hill and listened.

Now, that identical spot is pretty well surrounded by buildings, and indeed forms a portion of London, but then it was quite a rustic place, with only a cottage here and there.

An intense stillness prevailed about this place at that hour, which was most delicious to the senses, but Dick, ere he had occupied this place two minutes, heard faintly the grinding of carriage wheels.

"Come!" he said; "it is a long time since I cried 'Stand, and deliver!' on the highway, and if I go much longer, I shall quite get out of practice! This, too, is a chance I cannot let go by."

So saying, he carefully examined the pistols in his holsters, which he found in excellent order.

"Who comes along the road so late, I wonder?" he said. "I shall be disappointed if it does not turn out a good booty, and one well worth the trouble. Whoever it is though, he is a long way off."

This was true, for none but the most attentive ear could have distinguished the slight noise which the revolving wheels produced.

Dick took Bess at a brisk walk down the hill, and having reached its base, where the trees grew thickly and cast a deep shadow on the roadway, he drew up as close to the hedgerow as he could, and waited.

The sound now rapidly increased.

"It is some light two-wheeled vehicle drawn by one horse," said Dick, and, just as he uttered the words, he saw two little star-like lights approaching him.

"They have the lanterns lighted! Well, never mind."

Dick suffered the gig, for such it was, to get just on a level with him, and then he darted out with the suddenness of an apparition.

A man, who was driving, was the sole occupant of the gig, and Turpin putting one of his pistols just before his face, cried—

"Pull up! Your money, or your life!"

CHAPTER CXI.

TOM DAVIS AND ELLEN GIVE TURPIN A HEARTY WELCOME AT THE "HAND AND KEYS."

NINE out of every ten persons would have done under the circumstances just what the man in the gig did, and that was to pull up at once.

"A—a highwayman!" he gasped.

"Yes," cried Turpin: "hand over whatever you may have of any value about you."

"What if I refuse?"

Dick held the pistol significantly.

"You would shoot me?"

[DICK TURPIN, SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, AND CLAUDE DUVAL PLANNING TOM KING'S ESCAPE.]

"Precisely. Be quick."

"Then take that."

Bang went a pistol, and Dick felt something inflict a stinging sensation on his cheek.

For a moment, so sudden was the attack, he was overcome with surprise, but quickly recovering himself, he said—

"Ha! you have had your fire, so now you can't rumble if I have mine."

"No, no! Mercy, mercy! have mercy! Spare my life, and take all I have got. Mercy, mercy!"

The man in the gig was in an agony of fright, for he fully expected nothing but death as the result of his rash action.

"Your carcass is quite safe," said Dick, "provided you hand over all that you have about you in the shape of cash. Quick! and don't abuse my clemency, for if you make another attempt, I will certainly blow out your brains!"

"In a minute, sir, in a minute. It's in a valise under the seat along with my samples. "You see I'm a bagman, sir."

"A what? Make haste."

"A bagman."

"And what on earth is a bagman?"

"A commercial traveller, sir. I represent the highly-respectable firm of Slink and Friar, No. 42, Abchurch-lane, in the City, sir."

"Oh! confound you. If you don't make haste I'll take valise and all."

"No—no, sir. Here is the bag, sir. It's not my money—not one penny of it!"

"Then you ought not to grieve so much about losing it."

"But I do. I shall lose my place."

"Oh! nonsense," said Dick, as he pocketed a largish leather bag, which the "bagman," as he called himself, handed to him. "You must tell your employers you were robbed of it by Dick Turpin."

"Dick Turpin?"

"Yes. Now for once I will take your word, only I caution you beforehand against deceiving me."

"What is it this bag contains?"

"Money."

"I can tell that, but to how much does it amount?"

"Seventy-three pounds odd," was the reply. "I shall lose my place, I know I shall."

"Pho—pho! I know better. Good night."

Dick rode off.

The commercial traveller evidently thought it was his best policy to succumb to the force of circumstances, and he let Dick go without any aggressive act, which was more than the highwayman expected.

"Not so bad," he said, as he took his way down a narrow lane that would bring him out somewhere near his destination. "It will do to fee the counsel with in case Tom is brought to trial; but it is very odd to me if I don't get him out before the sessions come on."

Whether he did so or not remains to be seen.

The sessions came on on the Wednesday following, so at any rate he had not much time to lose.

He reached the "Cross Keys" without having encountered a soul.

Jabez, as usual, came to the front of the inn on hearing a horse's footsteps.

His joy when he saw who it was may be imagined.

Dick followed him into the stable before he attempted to enter the house.

"How are they all?" he asked; "quite well, I suppose, Jabez, eh?"

"Quite well, squire."

"I will go in and see them directly."

"You will have to look sharp, for he always closes the old crib at ten o'clock, and it's close upon that now, I'm thinking."

"It is. I can trust you to see that my mare is safe?"

"Never fear, squire; I'll fettle her as well as though you stood by and watched me."

"It won't be anything out of your way, Jabez," said Dick, as he walked towards the door of the inn.

He lifted the latch and entered.

The first person he met was Ellen.

She knew him instantly, and uttered a faint cry of recognition.

"Hullo!" said a voice, which evidently belonged to Tom Davis. "Hullo there! who is it?"

"Won't you know me, Tom? It's a long while since I was here, but I hope you have not forgotten me."

"Forgotten you! The idea of such a thing. Come in, come in, do. Why, whatever brings you here to-night?"

"I will tell you presently," replied Turpin, as, taking Ellen by the hand, he followed the landlord into the kitchen.

There was a flush of pleasure upon the young girl's face—indeed, she did not attempt to conceal her gratification.

"The house is quite empty, Dick," said Tom Davis, picking up his pipe off the table where he had deposited it, "so you needn't fear being overheard."

"Where's the missus?"

"Well, she's summut poorly, thankye, and has gone up to bed. It ain't nothing serious, you know."

"That's all right then. And now, Tom, what have you got to drink?"

"Anything you like."

"Then I'll take some brandy."

"Very good. So will I. Ellen, my dear, just go to the bar."

"Yes, rather."

"Father!" repeated Dick, with some surprise. "How long has she given you that title?"

"Why, you see, Dick, it wasn't her doings at all, but mine, bless her heart!"

"Oh! indeed."

"Ah! she's a good girl, she is, and having no children of our own, and she being an orphan, and"——

"There, I don't want so many reasons. You found it more convenient, eh?"

"And a great deal more pleasant. Ah! Dick, you don't know what a treasure she is."

"And she appreciates your kindness?"

"She does. How anybody could be other than kind to her beats me. Here she comes."

Ellen at this moment entered.

Dick looked at her with more attention, and he felt no surprise that Tom Davis, with his huge heart overflowing with love as it was, should be fond of her. She was indeed a lovely creature.

Tom Davis bestowed upon her a look of prideful admiration as she approached, and looked up into his face with a glad smile.

"Upon my word," said Dick, "I am glad to see you looking so well and happy! I wonder at it, too."

"Why?" she asked, wonderingly,

"Why?" repeated Dick. "because I know what a domestic tyrant he is."

"Me?" said Davis, aghast. "Me a domestic tyrant? Well, that is good."

"You are joking," said Ellen. "There is nothing of the tyrant about him, I am sure."

"Not a bit of it! But come, Dick, what brings you here? This is something more than a chance call, I know."

"It is," said Dick. "I had a motive in coming here, I confess."

"What is it?"

"You shall hear. My comrade Tom King is a prisoner."

"God bless me! You don't say so?"

"Is it possible you have not heard of it?"

"This is the first news I have had."

"You remember him, don't you?"

"Oh! yes!" replied Ellen and Tom Davis, in a breath.

"Well, it was chiefly my fault that he got taken prisoner," said Dick, who thereupon related all that had taken place from the time Tom was captured by the dragoons, to his own narrow escape of capture in the vestibule of the old city prison.

"And is he still there?" asked Ellen.

Both listened with the utmost eagerness to the startling narrative which Dick related in simple yet forcible words.

"He is," said Dick, "but he won't be for long. I have sworn to set him free, and I will keep my oath in spite of every obstacle!"

There was a silence for a moment, for Dick had spoken in rather an emphatic tone of voice.

Tom Davis, who was standing with his back leaning against the mantelpiece smoking his pipe, poured out another glass.

"Well," he said, as he held it to his lips, "I've heard you say you'd do a good many things that I should have thought impossible, but nevertheless you've done 'em, which makes me think you'll do this."

"I shall!"

"It won't be an easy job."

"I know that," said Dick, "and I know as well that I cannot do it unaided, so I have ridden over here to-night to know whether you will give me your assistance?"

CHAPTER CXII.

DICK TURPIN IS ALARMED BY THE ARRIVAL OF THE HORSEMEN AT THE INN.

"WILL I?" asked Tom Davis, with a sudden animation in his voice. "You know I will! Only just say the word, and it's done!"

"Thanks, Tommy, my friend! I knew I could rely upon you."

"And now what is it you want me to do? We may as well talk it over before we go to bed."

"Certainly. I will not keep you long. Do you wish to stay, Ellen?"

"May I?" she asked, timidly.

"Nay, that is not it. Which would you rather do?"

"Stay here, unless you have an objection."

"No, I have none. You may be able to assist us, and I know you are to be trusted."

"Trusted?" said Tom Davis. "Of course she is to be trusted, and I should like to hear anyone say that she wasn't!"

"Really," said Dick, "if you go on in that way you'll spoil her altogether."

"Not a bit of it! She's too good to spoil, she is."

Dick could not help smiling at the enthusiasm the worthy old landlord displayed.

"Well, let us to business. You will see at once that after the very narrow escape I had, it would be something akin to madness for me to attempt to have another interview with Tom."

"It would."

"But there is a great necessity that we should be in communication with each other, so that I should be able to assist him."

"Just so."

"In fact, without it, I don't see how it is to be done."

"Nor I. But I suppose the upshot of the affair is just this, you want me to go and see him."

"Exactly, my friend, exactly. Mind you, I don't want to compromise you in any way by asking you to attempt to smuggle tools into him; that has been done already. All I want you to do is to visit him occasionally, and carry messages between us."

"Then, if that's all, Dick, I'll do it with all the pleasure in life."

"Hurrah!"

"You are pleased."

"I believe you! I am glad indeed I have got your consent. More glad than I could easily express!"

"Well, all I can say is, you are heartily welcome."

"I knew there would be no harm in asking you such a thing."

"Not a bit!"

"There are so many advantages."

"As how?"

"I will explain."

"I am all attention. Fill up your glass, Dick! You don't drink!"

"No, I am too much interested in the matter that is going forward."

"I daresay."

"However, old Matthew—you know old Matthew?"

"Rather, I should think, seeing he is some kin to my wife!"

"Oh! indeed, I was not aware."

"Yes; but go on. What were you going to say about old Matthew?"

"Why, that he would only have been too glad of the chance to go, only, you see, he is so well known to the prison authorities."

"I suppose he is."

"Some or other of them are sure to be at his house. They suspect a great deal, but they can't fix nothing on him."

"Nor never will, I think! Old Matthew is one too many for them."

"He has been hitherto."

"Why, the old place, which they say was once a gentleman's mansion, is full of odd nooks and corners that no one knows anything about, except the landlord himself."

"So I have heard. Well, as I say, he would go gladly enough to see Tom, but"——

"But you'd rather someone else."

"I would, and that's the truth."

"And so you asked me?"

"As being the only person I could rely upon. You are known to few, if any, of the Newgate officials, and for that reason you would be able to go in your own proper character. You need not disguise yourself, I mean."

"Just so."

"That will be the great thing. After what has happened, I have no doubt someone will always be stationed in the lobby to examine everyone that comes to see him, but if you go as you are their search can result in nothing."

"That's uncommonly true."

"And you still have no objection?"

"None at all, Dick, if delivering messages is all you want me to do, though I am free to confess that if you had asked me to take him anything I should not have been quite so willing, though I don't know that I should have refused.

Still, you would rather things be as they are.

"Most certainly! Now what do you want me to do?"

"I will tell you."

"And when do you want me to go?"

"To-morrow morning."

"Very good, go on."

"You know I told you I managed, or rather old Matthew did, to convey Tom a couple of spring files."

"Yes."

"These, then, I hope he has been able to make good use of ere this. It is, however, a point I wish to be ascertained."

"Very good."

"Then I want you to learn what hopes he has of making his escape, and when he will be likely to accomplish it."

"Yes."

"As I knew that, I would take care to be in waiting close at hand, with a good horse for him to mount."

"I see."

"If, however, things should go adversely, and his escape cannot be effected before the sessions, tell him that I will take care to engage first-rate counsel in his defence. If he is acquitted, which is rather doubtful."—

"Very doubtful, I should say."

"Well, very doubtful be it. Nevertheless, we will not omit that chance in our calculations. A clever man before now has got a prisoner acquitted when the case looked very black against him indeed."

"That's true enough."

"And I see no reason why such a thing should not be done again."

"No—no."

"If he is acquitted, then, of course, all trouble will be at an end."

"And if they release him?"

"That would follow, as a matter of course."

"Oh! dear, no. They might have several counts in the indictment, and they would be almost sure to get him convicted on one of them."

"I did not think of that."

"Or, if they don't, the judge may refuse to set him at liberty."

"Surely he would not have the power to do that?"

"I don't know. He might give orders for him to be detained until another case could be brought against him."

"Oh! no; surely, no."

"You had best take it into your calculations, I can tell you."

"I will."

"Or they might manage things in another way."

"How?"

"Set him at liberty, and then take him prisoner again. But you may make up your mind that the judge and jury will bring him in guilty."

"Then he must be set free, that's all."

"Which is much easier said than done."

"Granted. But an unflinching determination can accomplish a great deal."

"I don't dispute it. I have seen too many instances of it."

"I have never failed yet. And now I think I have told you pretty nearly everything. Do you understand?"

"I think so. In the first place, you want me to set out for Newgate to-morrow morning, and get an interview with Tom?"

"Yes."

"Learn from him what hopes he has of making his escape with the tools you have given him?"

"Quite right. Go on."

"And if he does not get free before the trial, that you will take care and employ a good counsel in his behalf?"

"Exactly. Be sure you tell him of the narrow escape I had, and what madness it would be on my part to attempt to see him."

"He won't be so unreasonable as to expect you, I should think."

"Tell him not to be down-hearted, but that all will go well."

"I hope it will."

"So do I."

"You have grown much attached to him."

"I have. He is a brave, noble-hearted fellow, and such a one as you very rarely meet."

"Well, Dick, let me tell you this. You carry things off very well, and make light of danger, and all that sort of thing; but, nevertheless, there is no disguising the fact that he is in a very ticklish position, indeed. The authorities have been rather energetic lately, and you may depend they will do all in their power to hang him."

"They shall be balked, Tom; they shall be balked, that is, if I can help it."

There was a sudden trampling of horses' hoofs outside the door, and then an imperious summons for admission was given at the door.

"Danger!" said Tom Davis.

Dick coolly reloaded and primed his pistols.

CHAPTER CXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE AN UNPARALLELED ADVENTURE.

It is sorely against our inclination to interrupt the course of events, but, as the old proverb, says, "Necessity knows no law."

We then repair to that pleasant leafy lane where we left Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval.

Their search for the persons who had played such a trick upon them had been arrested.

A strange sound came to their ears.

What it was, neither of them could divine.

Naturally enough they connected it with the two persons of whom they were in quest.

Whether they were right in doing this can only be discovered by succeeding events.

"That is a very peculiar sound, Jack," said Claude. "What can it be, think you?"

"That is beyond my comprehension. Hark! there it comes again!"

The horses, too, evidently heard it, and moved uneasily.

"This is very extraordinary. What sound can it be? I can liken it to nothing."

"It is nothing human, I am confident," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but let it be what it may, I will not leave this place without making the attempt at least to find out what it is."

"That is a bold resolution after such an assertion as the one you have just made."

"Do you think so?"

"You say it is not human."

"That is my belief."

"Then do you insinuate that it is something supernatural?"

"By no means, Claude—by no means. Good heavens! how horrible!"

It was the sudden repetition of the mysterious sound which had caused this ejaculation.

This time it came to their ears with greater loudness and distinctness.

"That is a cry of some one in some mortal agony or grief," said Claude, "though what lips could give utterance to it, I am at a loss to conceive."

"There is but one way to resolve our doubts, and that is to direct our steps in the direction whence it comes."

"But can you tell where that is?"

"Not precisely, but it comes from somewhere on our right."

"So I fancy, and it is scarcely likely we should be both mistaken in its locality."

"What is it over the hedge?"

"A wood or copse or something of that sort, I take it. The trees grow very thickly together."

"Stop, then. This makes it likely that we are right. Now, Claude, my friend, just turn all your attention to listening, and I will do the same. Being in expectation of the sound we shall not be surprised when we hear it, which will better enable us to fix on the precise spot from whence it comes."

"What would you do then?"

"Having ascertained it, go as straight in that direction as we can."

"Agreed. I am quite silent. Let us listen."

They did so.

But for a long time without result.

Still, from the periodic manner in which the cry had hitherto reached them, they felt almost certain if they waited long enough they would hear it repeated.

In this expectation they were not deceived.

Moanfully—wailingly—it rose again on the night air.

"That is conclusive," said Jack, as it completely died away. "Come! I think I can take you direct to the spot."

"I think I could do the same," said Duval; "so between us I hope we shall be successful in our search."

"Over the palings then we must get in the first place."

"I know it, but it will be awkward. There seems no safe place for a horse to alight, and, not only that, we do not yet know what capabilities they may have for taking such a leap."

"You think the best course, then, will be to follow the palisade until we reach either a gate or some place where it would be easier to effect an entrance?"

"Exactly."

"The only misfortune is, that we shall not be so well able to go where we desire."

"Oh! I don't know. Perhaps, too, we shall hear the sound once more."

"That is extremely likely," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he trotted gently forward. "Come along."

"We ought not to waste time, that is certain."

The boundary of the little wood was very closely scrutinized by our friends, and, at a little more than a hundred yards further down the lane, they found a gap which was quite practicable.

They dismounted and led their horses over the obstruction.

On the other side they found such a thick undergrowth of brake and gorse, and the trees themselves with so little space between them, that they were compelled to continue this mode of progression, for to have mounted would have been to incur a thousand perils which on foot they would escape.

The darkness was most intense, for the branches of the trees shut out almost every ray of light.

They, however, continued for a considerable distance to force their way.

At length they stopped.

"I don't like this place at all," said Claude Duval. "It might serve very well to elude one's foes, but"——

He was silent, for the strange cry again arose.

This time it was evidently in their vicinity.

"That is what I wanted to hear," said Jack. "Now I can shape my course to a certainty."

He plunged through the dense vegetation as he spoke.

"How very mournful it was," replied Claude. "I am more than ever at a loss to think what it can be? Can you hazard any conjecture?"

"None! Never in all my experience of the cries produced by different animals have I heard anything at all approaching that."

"Do you think it comes from a living thing at all?"

"Well—yes. I can hardly conceive it emanating from a thing devoid of life."

"I am completely puzzled."

"There is one thing, and that is, I think, before we are many minutes older we shall learn what it is."

In silence now they continued their route.

The further they advanced the more impervious the wood became.

Presently they came to a dead stop.

A barrier of some prickly kind of shrubs was before them.

In height it was nothing under six feet and how far it extended laterally they had no means of judging.

But just at this moment, and as Jack was about to make some remark to Claude, the sound which had before so much alarmed them again arose, and this time it appeared to be within a few paces of where they stood.

Upon the impulse of the moment, they both drew back.

Overcoming, however, almost instantaneously this very natural action, Jack said—

"Fasten your horse to the branch of a tree, and let us break through these bushes. I am certain it was from just on the other side of them that the sound came."

As he spoke, he securely fastened his own horse by the bridle to the trunk of a young sapling.

"I am ready," said Claude. "Here goes!"

They then made a sudden dash at the compact mass of vegetation, but in vain. They could not force their way through.

"Why, it's as bad as a brick wall.

"It is a great deal worse, my friend. A brick wall we should have very little difficulty in surmounting, but this, I take it, will be a bar to our further progress."

"No," said Jack, who had withdrawn himself from the hedge. "I think we shall be able to manage it yet."

"How?"

"You see this tree here?"

"Yes, yes."

"Its branches are wide spreading, and I think if we climb up into it, we shall be able to let ourselves down on the other side."

"Oh! yes, of course we can."

The two highwaymen then set about in good earnest to ascend the tree.

One of the horses was placed so as to stand just beneath its branches, close to the trunk.

Jack took the lead, and getting first in the stirrup, then stood upright on the saddle.

By this means he attained sufficient elevation to enable him to put his head among the foliage.

To seize one of the huge arms above him, and draw himself fairly up into the tree, was the work of a moment and a matter of the greatest ease.

Claude, of course, lost no time in following him; and, having crawled along one of the branches which stretched out laterally for many feet in the direction wished for, was about to drop to the ground, when Jack put his hand upon his shoulder, and spoke in a whisper.

CHAPTER CXIV.

THE PROSECUTION OF THE ADVENTURE IN THE WOOD BRINGS DANGER TO THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN.

"Stop!" he said.

"Why?"

"Before you descend it will only be prudent to reconnoitre. If there be danger, you will fall headlong into it."

"Good," said Claude, in the same tone in which his comrade had spoken, and which could not possibly have been heard half-a-dozen feet off.

There was, however, to all appearance, nothing to call for caution.

All seemed as still as the grave.

Nevertheless, they both leaned down close to the branch, and strove to pierce the gloom beneath them.

The short time that they had been in the wood had sufficed to make them familiar with the aspect of the various objects, and though when they first entered it had seemed perfectly dark, yet now a faint sort of twilight was diffused around.

At least such there was apparently, but it arose simply from the fact that their eyes had dilated.

They were, therefore, able to see that the hedge through which they had vainly attempted to force a passage was the kind of natural boundary to a large open space, the full extent of which they could not see.

Beyond this, however, nothing met their gaze. Beneath them was some turf of a very smooth character, and unbroken by the presence of a shrub.

"All seems very quiet," said Claude, at length, "and I can see nothing unusual. Shall we drop it?"

"Yes, I think we may do so safely."

Carefully lowering themselves until they hung quite straight down from the tree, having hold of the branch with their hands only, they waited a second to steady themselves, and then let go.

The space between their feet and the ground was only about eighteen inches, so they alighted upon the soft turf without making scarcely a sound.

But they were greeted with another repetition of the sound which had excited their curiosity if not alarm.

Although in a measure prepared for such an event, the cry this time was so horrible, so unearthly, and apparently so close to them, that they could not prevent a slight ejaculation escaping them.

"Forward," said Jack, who was the first to recover himself. "Forward. Claude, and let us see what this really is."

"It is hideous."

"Speculations are of no avail. On—on."

"Be cautious—oh! be cautious."

"I will."

"You know not what hidden danger to us may lurk beneath all this."

"That is true, and caution is by no means derogatory to courage."

"On the contrary, it is an attribute of it."

While uttering these words they had both crept forward in a stooping posture.

Of course, the nearer to the centre of this singular open space in the wood they got, the lighter it became, and in a few minutes they had the inexpressible pleasure of seeing the moon just rise above the tree-tops.

The few white, fleecy clouds that speckled the heavens, in no appreciable degree diminished the brilliancy of her light.

But it was only in a subdued fashion that her beams reached that spot in the recesses of the wood, for it was almost covered with the huge shadows of the trees.

Suddenly, however, Claude, who happened to look to his left, clutched his companion by the arm with nervous eagerness.

He did not speak; but when Jack turned round, simply pointed with his finger.

Lying upon a piece of ground, that rose almost into a hillock, was a strange-shaped, misty form.

Its proportions appeared gigantic.

There was not, however, a sufficient amount of light for them to trace its configuration with anything like accuracy.

That there was something, was a point beyond dispute.

Coupling this with the precise location from which the startling cry had come, they assumed that what they then only partially saw, was what had produced it.

Even while they gazed, a slight movement was visible about the shapeless bulk, and then they once more heard that sound which was so hideous and mournful, that it caused a strange, cold sensation about their hearts.

"Wh-at—wh-at—is it?" gasped Claude, whose eyes, as well as those of his companion, were riveted upon the object before them.

"I am no better able to form an idea than you are," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but I'll very soon find out."

"Nay, pause! Don't rush into unknown danger!"

But Jack, who was bold even to recklessness, did not allow himself to be detained, but at once moved in the direction of the object, whatever it might be, which had already produced so much alarm.

As a precaution against sudden attack, Jack drew his sword, and, grasping it firmly by the hilt, held it in an attitude of defence.

Claude Duval was, as a rule, very cautious—in that respect the very opposite to Jack, but this constitutional difference fitted them all the more for being the associates of each other.

Between them they preserved a balance which was highly conducive to their safety.

Any hidden unknown danger was always looked upon by Claude with distrust, but not so Jack, and in the present instance he did what few men would have found nerve enough to do, and that was to walk straight up to the little hillock.

It was not more than fifty feet from where he stood, so he was quickly close to it.

Claude no longer hesitated or drew back, but accompanied him.

When, however, within about half-a-dozen paces the dim shadowy-looking object began to take a distinct and palpable outline.

With eyes strained to the utmost, and neck stretched forward, the two highwaymen endeavoured to trace its configuration in order to form some idea of what it was.

But in this they were in a great measure baffled.

They could tell it was an animal of some kind, but that was all.

Its size was gigantic.

Its colour one uniform dusky tint.

But the head of this extraordinary creature, the like of which they had never before seen or heard, owing to its being raised higher than the rest of the body, was what they saw with most distinctness.

It was enough, and more than enough, to appal them.

Vulpine in shape, with large bright eyes, and glistening white teeth, or rather tusks, the head was terrible in the extreme.

The mouth was half open.

Flakes of white foam speckled the shaggy hair upon its breast and paws.

The tongue lolled forth.

Its glowing eyes were fixed upon our two friends, whose position was now, beyond a doubt, one of the greatest peril.

Then, lifting up its head in the fashion a huge dog does when he is about to bark, this strange animal again gave vent to the hideous moaning cry, half-animal and half-human, which had first reached the ears of Jack and Claude.

But then they were at a distance.

Now, however, when the throat of the creature was almost within reach of their hands, had they felt inclined to stretch them out, its horror was a thousand times increased.

For nearly a minute was the extraordinary sound prolonged, and then it died away in a faint whine.

CHAPTER CXV.

JACK AND CLAUDE ARE ALARMED AT THE APPEARANCE OF THE WILD ANIMAL.

"BACK, Jack, back!" exclaimed Claude Duval. "Back, for the love of heaven! You cannot tell what powers of mischief such a creature may have. Back. Oh! back."

As he spoke he clutched his comrade by the arm, and forcibly dragged him a few paces away.

But then Jack recovered himself.

"No," he said. "Let us stand and face the danger, whatever it may be; besides, to retreat might only be to hasten our own destruction, for I have ever heard that few wild animals will venture to attack a man if he stands and faces them.

"But this is England," said Claude, "where no ferocious creatures exist."

"All the better reason, then, for standing our ground. Let us remain where we are a few minutes. Look to your right. In a few minutes the moon will be high enough in the heavens to shed her beams upon the bit of rising ground, and then we shall be better able to see what is there."

It was as Jack had said.

They waited where they stood with great anxiety.

"Look," continued Jack; "it is, I think, pretty evident the creature, be it what it may, means us no harm, for it has not moved in the least."

"It is very strange."

"Of that there cannot be a doubt; and then, besides, the cry it has just uttered was certainly not one of rage, or anger, but rather one of pain or grief."

"You make me feel ashamed of myself," said Claude, who was instantly struck by the truth of his friend's remarks.

"I should be sorry to do that. The case is an exceptional one, that is certain."

The animal remained profoundly still, but yet they could see its glittering eyes were turned full towards them.

"I am at a loss to think what it can be," said Claude, after a brief pause.

"Another minute and the moon's rays will fall upon it. We shall be able then to form a more correct estimate."

An anxious minute passed, which seemed to those who were waiting a good half-hour, and then the chastened light crept over the little hillock.

Gradually all was revealed.

An exclamation of what he saw came from the lips of Sixteen-String Jack.

It was echoed by another of a similar character from his companion.

And truly well they might.

They had supposed that the wild animal was the only thing there was upon the knoll.

But in this they were deceived.

We will relate what they did see, and we feel sure that then the reader will to the full participate in their astonishment.

Motionless, and extended on its back, was a human form.

By the dress it would seem to be a man.

The upturned face was ghastly white.

One arm was stretched out upon the grass.

Clenched tightly in the hand was a sword, upon the lower part of which the moonbeams glimmered, but the upper part was of a dark colour, and reflected none of her rays.

Crouching down over the form, with its paws placed upon its breast, was the strange creature whose cries had first led them to the spot.

They were now able to see this animal plainly.

In shape it resembled a wolf; it had the same shaggy hair—the same long fangs—the same strong, wiry legs.

But that it was not a wolf was quite apparent, as if it was, it was of a size and colour such as they had never before heard of.

Well might such an extraordinary spectacle as this enchain the faculties of both our friends, and is it to be wondered at that they stood gazing for some moments, uncertain whether what they saw was real?

Then, and very naturally, the idea rushed into their minds, that the man who lay so still upon the grass had been worsted in an encounter with the ferocious brute.

But only for a second did this hold a place in their minds. There was nothing blood-thirsty or aggressive in the animal's appearance. On the contrary, it was mournful, and it gazed upon our friends without making the least movement either of fear or anger.

The attitude of the beast was such as might have been assumed by some faithful dog who had found his master grievously wounded or dead.

Another howl came from its lips, and both the highwaymen noted with astonishment, the melancholy tone it bore.

It served to arouse them from their distraction.

Jack turned round towards Claude.

"What are we to make of this?" he said. "I confess I am fairly puzzled. Of all the extraordinary adventures I have had there has never been one in the remotest degree resembling this."

"I, too, am bewildered beyond all expression. What conclusion to come to I know not."

"The demeanour of the animal seems peaceable enough."

"It does. What can it be?"

"I have no idea."

"The resemblance to a dog is very strong."

"Yes; and yet it is most unlike. Most of all, however, do I wonder who it is that lies so stark beneath its paws."

"What shall we do? Would it be prudent, think you, to approach such a creature?"

"Certainly not prudent; for if it should take it into its head to attack us, we should stand no more chance than we should with a tiger."

"A tiger—a tiger!"

"Why do you repeat the words?"

"Because," said Claude, "of the resemblance it has to a tiger. Until you said the word, I did not think of it."

"Ha!" said Jack, "there is a wondrous likeness. Look at the coat—the suppleness of the body—and the tail!"

"Those are the points in which it resembles it, but beyond that all likeness ceases. The head and legs, if I saw them separately, I should declare to be those of a wolf."

"It is no good to speculate upon it. We shall never know what it is if we stay at once. My advice is to go close up to it. It seems harmless and peaceful enough."

"Just now, but, like the tiger, it may be treacherous."

"We must be on our guard to resist it. Surely if we are wary we can between us conquer it, if it comes to a contest, and somehow I don't much think it will."

"Let us go then. My curiosity urges me forward. I could never leave the place until I knew something further."

"Whether the man beneath its paws, and whom it seems more inclined to defend than attack, is alive or not, is the point I am most anxious to ascertain."

With slow but firm steps the two highwaymen now advanced.

They could not but be fully sensible of the immense risk they ran.

There was a probability that one, or perhaps both, of them was marching to death.

Further than fixing his gaze steadfastly upon the two approaching forms, the animal took no notice of them.

Then, when they got nearer, they found that, though its fore-paws were resting on the breast of the man, yet they were placed in such a manner as to produce no inconvenience from their weight.

This circumstance pointed pretty clearly to the fact that it was friendly, and not inimical.

At this moment the man gave a faint groan.

"He is not dead," said Jack, "but how we are to serve him I cannot exactly see."

But the creature, with a sagacity that was quite canine in its character, raised itself up, and, removing its fore-feet, from their position, came submissively to where our friends stood.

It wagged its tail slowly, and looked with a beseeching glance into their features, and then, as if to still further enlist their sympthies, uttered a faint whining cry, very different in its character to the previous one.

It was impossible for anyone to be actually alarmed at the creature, despite its looks. Its manner and attitude were inoffensive and humble in the extreme.

Then, having done this, it turned away again, and walked with a stealthy, cat-like motion towards the prostrate figure.

What it meant was clearly deducible from its actions.

At least the interpretation Jack and Claude put upon them was that it required them to follow it, and if possible render assistance to the man.

"There is some deep mystery here, Claude," said Jack. "And I should be very loath, indeed, to go away until I had unravelled it."

So saying, he, having reached the wounded man, stooped down in order to ascertain the nature of the hurts he had received.

CHAPTER CXVI.

ANOTHER AND YET MORE HORRIBLE DISCOVERY IS MADE IN THE WOOD BY CLAUDE DUVAL.

So much odd intelligence was observable in the manner in which the creature regarded Jack's motions, that all idea of danger from it was completely dispersed.

It sat itself down upon its hind legs, after the fashion of a dog, and watched everything with the closest attention.

"Speak," said Jack, for he observed the wounded man give some signs of life. "Speak, if you have strength enough to do so, and tell us who you are."

There was a convulsive twitching about the lips in response to this, but nothing more. Although partially conscious, he was too far gone to use his voice.

"Water, Claude. I must have some water. He has been wounded with a sword, or some such instrument."

"I have no idea where to find such a thing as water here, but, however, I will try."

"Do so, do so. It will be absolutely necessary to bathe the coagulated blood away, and also, by sprinkling it upon his face, restore him to consciousness."

"You are sure he is alive."

"Oh! quite."

"Then, if there is any water to be had, I will bring some, and I do not expect I shall have to go far without finding what I seek."

Claude crossed the open space, and disappeared among the trees.

Then to the surprise of both, the animal, after casting a wistful glance at Jack, followed him.

"Look out, Claude! He may mean mischief."

But nothing in the creature's manner warranted such a supposition as this. It was as docile as ever.

Claude Duval, however, took the precaution of standing on one side until it passed him.

"Who knows?" he said, as he followed it among the trees. "It may be possessed of some instinct that will enable it to go to where the nearest water is to be found."

This idea was probable enough.

But scarcely had it gone ten yards, than it paused and uttered an angry snarl.

There could be no mistaking the signification of the sound.

Claude drew back a step or two.

Then, on looking closely on the ground, he saw some object upon which the animal had pounced.

He heard the gnashing of teeth and the laceration of flesh.

The shock he gave had the effect of very quickly bringing Jack to his side.

"What is amiss?" he said, in great alarm. "Oh! you are safe?"

"Quite! But look at this wild animal here. It has got something making a meal of."

But it had stopped that operation on the approach of Jack.

"Can you see what it is?"

"No! Do not go too close."

"I don't think, my friend, that it means us any harm. If it did, it would have demonstrated itself before this."

"Well, I must say, throughout it has behaved more like a dog than a wild animal."

"Good heavens!" said Jack, who had, while Claude spoke, stooped down to see what it was. "This is"——

"What?—oh! what?"

"Another man."

"Impossible."

"It is true, nevertheless. Look, Duval. He is shockingly mangled, and, of course, quite dead."

In obedience to these words Claude looked down, and there he saw what was clearly a man's body, but so frightfully disfigured, that it presented little more than the appearance of a mass of flesh.

"How horrible!" he said.

"The mystery thickens," remarked Jack. "What we have seen to-night is the result of some strange events of more than common interest."

"I would give the world to know them."

"I confess myself full of curiosity about it. You may, however, rely upon one thing."

"What is it?"

"That the strange creature we have seen is the preserver of one, and the destroyer of the other."

"What I cannot understand is its behaviour towards us."

"It evidently is possessed of sufficient intelligence to be aware that we are friends—not enemies."

"It looks like it."

"Rely upon it, that is the correct solution of one part of the affair. But come, we can do no good here. Let us return to the other."

"But the water."

"Oh, yes. I had forgotten. Listen. Can you hear the sound of a water-course? I fancy I did just then."

They listened intently, and then there came faintly to their ears, that rushing sound produced by running water.

They had little difficulty in determining its locality, and they made direct towards it.

The wolfish-looking animal growled, and then turning away, retraced its steps towards the open space.

"He has gone back to his master, for I suppose such he is. Indeed, the only reasonable conclusion I can come to is, that it is some foreign animal which has been partially tamed."

On reaching the water, which was but a little stream, the two highwaymen filled their hats with the pure fluid, and then returned.

The dismal cry which they had first heard in the lane again saluted their ears.

"That is his way of asking for assistance, I suppose, Jack."

"No doubt; and it has proved effectual."

"So it has—so it has."

Two minutes afterwards they reached the open space. The moon now fully lighted it up, and they were able to see its extent, which probably was little more than a couple of acres.

Simultaneously they directed their gaze to the little hillock, and there, occupying precisely the same position as he had at first, was the animal for which our friends had been unable to find a name.

On their approach it came towards them with every manifestation of pleasure of which it seemed capable.

"He's uncommonly sensible, Jack, to be sure."

"He is. Now for his master."

Sixteen-String Jack dipped his hand into one of the hats, and sprinkled a few drops of water upon the man's face.

A gasping sob was the result.

A repetition of this treatment caused him to open his eyes and start convulsively, while a faint groan came from his lips.

The animal did not seem to approve of this, and he looked threateningly at Jack, who, however, was too much occupied to notice it.

"Speak" he said. "What has happened? I am a friend."

"Friend—friend?"

"Give him a little more water," said Duval.

The hat now was nearly empty, so Jack threw what there was in it into his face.

The effect was rather unlooked for.

Uttering a dreadful shriek, that echoed and re-echoed among the trees, the wounded man sprang to a sitting posture.

It was followed by a howl from the creature, but, as it saw Jack evidently had no sinister designs, he made no further display of his dissatisfaction.

But it made Jack alive to his danger.

Then the resuscitated man, after passing his hand over his face, spoke.

It was only one word, twice repeated.

"Koolah! Koolah!"

His voice was faint, but the words reached the animal's ears, and it crouched down near him and licked his hand.

From this it would appear, "Koolah" was the name of the strange creature.

"Who are you?" asked Jack again. "I tell you we are friends, who have found you here desperately wounded."

"Ah!" said the owner of Koolah, as his memory suddenly came back to him. "I recollect all now."

He still retained his sword in his grasp, and using it as a support, strove to raise himself to his feet.

Jack perceiving this, assisted him.

When he thus assumed an upright position, the two highwaymen were better able to observe his general appearance.

He was a tall and well-proportioned man, with dark brown curly hair.

His costume was that of a naval officer, and the epaulettes upon his shoulders shone faintly in the moonlight.

He had received a wound from some sharp instrument in his back, and in consequence of the change of position hæmorrhage recommenced.

He leaned heavily upon his sword.

"I have had an atrocious attempt made upon my life," he said, "but the villain who stabbed me did not escape without a slight punishment at my hands."

He lifted his sword as though to examine its blade, but as soon as he deprived himself of this support he staggered, and would have fallen, had not Jack and Claude seized him by his arms.

CHAPTER CXVII.

THE LIEUTENANT GIVES SOME EXPLANATION OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE TO THOSE WHO HAVE SUCCOURED HIM.

"THANKS—thanks!" he gasped faintly. "It was a close touch. I must have bled a great deal, which I suppose has caused this unaccustomed weakness. Let me sit a little while."

"If you will allow me," said Sixteen-String Jack, "I have a knowledge of surgery so far as it relates to wounds, and I can dress and bind up your wounds, which will make you feel much better."

"You will be doing me a real service," he said, patting Koolah's neck, "perhaps saving my life."

There still remained sufficient water in Claude's hat to enable him to wash the blood from the wound, which was a ghastly one; and then he extemporized some bandages, and bound it up.

"I can feel you have done that skilfully," said the stranger. "You must have had long practice."

"I have had some experience, it is true; but to return to yourself."

"What would you say?"

"I am glad you speak so much better."

"I already feel the benefit of your treatment, and am, no doubt, rapidly recovering. All that ailed me was the loss of blood, I think, and now that is stopped, I shall soon be better."

"Just so. You must know that myself and my friend, while passing along a lane, at some little distance from here, heard a most unearthly sound, which so excited our curiosity, that, in spite of all obstacles, we made our way hither."

"Then it is to Koolah that I owe your presence, and, consequently, my life?"

"Yes, if that is the name of the strange creature you have with you. You may judge of our astonishment when we saw so formidable a looking animal crouching over an insensible human form. Pray what is it? We are quite at a loss upon the point."

"As you see by my dress, I am a lieutenant in the navy, and, during a stay which I made in the Persian Gulf, I bought this creature, then a newly-born cub, from one of the natives, who assured me it was the offspring of one he had had for some time in his possession, and that it would, when it grew up, resemble, in most respects, a dog of unusual size. In its wild state the animal is a most ferocious brute, and as much dreaded as the tiger."

"Indeed, but what is it? It resembles the tiger in some respects, and in others the dog or wolf."

"You are right. That is just what it is. I forget the hideous name the Persians have for them, but I know the corresponding words in English are tiger-wolf."

"Indeed. How singular."

"The name no doubt is derived from the circumstance of its partaking of the nature of both those animals. I call him Koolah, because that is the name of the man of whom I bought him."

At the pronunciation of the word, the tiger-wolf again caressed his master.

"You see he is quite tamed."

"I am astonished," said Jack.

"And I too," added Claude Duval.

"He is, indeed, an invaluable defender."

"How comes it, then, that you were wounded? And it seems strange for you to be in this place at all, so far removed as it is from all human habitations."

A troubled look crossed the features of the lieutenant.

"You are discomposed," said Jack; "but I naturally feel curious to know this strange affair, more especially as"——

Jack was going to speak of the frightful sight he had seen among the trees, but he checked himself.

"It is only natural that you should. I am strangely perplexed. Help me to rise, sir, if you will; I fancy I shall be better when erect."

Sixteen-String Jack assisted him to his feet.

"It is only fitting that I should give you an account of these peculiar circumstances; besides which, you will perhaps assist me in coming to a correct conclusion upon the points which baffle me."

"We shall be glad," replied Jack "if we are able to achieve such a result."

"I will then tell you briefly that I landed at Portsmouth three days ago, and made my way here. I arrived a little before sunset. You must also know that this is a trysting place, where I had an assignation to meet one who—who—no matter—no matter!"

Jack bowed.

The young seaman was much agitated, but, recovering himself, he resumed—

"You will understand it was a lady I came to meet. Anticipating no evil, and fearing to terrify her by the appearance of my companion, I tied him to a tree close by, and then repaired to the hillock. I stood there waiting for her to make her appearance, when I suddenly became conscious that there was some one behind me. It was not that I heard or saw anything, but a strange, shuddering sensation made me aware of the fact.

"Before, however, I had time to turn, I felt a cold substance penetrate my back. I knew I had been stabbed—assassinated—and I turned with the quickness of lightning. I saw a man, and with my last strength I wounded him with my sword, and had the satisfaction of seeing him fall beside me. After that I remember nothing until you restored me to life."

It was with the most breathless interest that our friends listened to this narrative.

"But there was no one beside you when we came except Koolah."

"He must have broken from the cord with which I bound him to the tree, and my assassinator, who, perhaps, after all, was only slightly wounded, has crawled away."

"Not far, though!"

"What do you mean? Have you found him?"

"That is more than I can precisely take upon my

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, CLAUDE, AND THE LIEUTENANT VIEWING THE BODY OF STEPHEN MURRAY.]

say; but guided by Koolah, as you call him, we found among the trees the horribly mutilated body of a man."

"It is he, then; and I am avenged! Lead me to where he lies, in order that I may look at him, and, if possible, recognise my assailant!"

"Do you not know him, then?"

"Alas! no. What am I to think of all this? Why—oh! why does she not come?"

These words were spoken to himself more than to our friends, but they nevertheless heard them.

"If you are strong enough," said Jack, "follow me, and I will take you to where we found the horrible sight."

"Lead on, I will follow! My wound, although at first I feared it was a fatal one, cannot be so. I get stronger and better every instant."

Koolah, when he saw they were about to move, rose from his crouching posture, and with a slow, cat-like walk, preceded them.

They had only to follow him to find the object which they sought.

As before, he sprang upon the body with a growl of anger, and commenced tearing it afresh.

But a word from his master was sufficient to withdraw him from the object of his hatred; and then the young sailor looked closely at it in order to recognise, if possible, his dastard foe.

From the exclamation he uttered he seemed to do so.

"Good heavens!" he cried, "it is Katherine's guardian! What am I to think of this? My brain is in a whirl!"

"And well it may be, sir. But you have not told us all."

"But I will do so, and that at once. Perhaps you will be able to assist me to arrive at some conclusion, for I feel as if I was going mad!"

"You must curb your agitation as much as possible, or in the state you are now in, it may be productive of the worst results."

"You are right! I will strive to do so."

"I confess I feel no ordinary amount of curiosity in this matter, and therefore naturally look for it being gratified;

but independently of myself, I think a calm recital of all the circumstances will do much to soothe your min.

"It may be. I do not know you to whom I am going to make this confidence; but you have saved my life: that is sufficient. Besides which, I consider you entitled to an explanation—in which, though I say it, there is nothing of which I have cause to be ashamed."

"You would not be the true sailor I take you to be if such proved the case."

"You flatter! However, I am a lieutenant on board His Majesty's ship Endeavour man-of-war, which vessel now lies at anchor in Plymouth Sound. My name is Rupert Thrustans."

"On leaving the ship, I made my way direct to this place. I ought to have told you that this wood, or hurst, as they always call it, forms a part of the possessions of a young girl—an orphan—to whom, in fine, as you surmise, I am betrothed. As she was a mere child when her father died, he appointed an intimate and dear friend of his as guardian. His name was Stephen Murray."

CHAPTER CXVIII.

LIEUTENANT THRUSTANS RELATES A STARTLING NARRATIVE TO OUR FRIENDS.

DECIDEDLY the interest attaching itself to the narrative of the young sailor, Lieutenant Thrustans, was on the increase, and when he spoke of the guardian, they both involuntarily turned their gaze upon the mangled corpse at their feet.

"Yes," continued the lieutenant, as he observed the action, "he is there; that is what puzzles me! I will continue.

"From boyhood had the friendship between Stephen Murray and the father of my betrothed subsisted, and the feeling appeared to intensify itself as years passed by; so when he died there was nothing surprising in the fact that he should constitute him guardian of his daughter and her estates."

"But," interrupted Jack, "have you and this guardian been enemies?"

"No; on the contrary, friends."

"Then why did he make so cowardly an attempt upon your life?"

"Heaven only knows! I am unable to find a motive. It is surely he, and yet I can scarcely credit the avouch of my own eyes."

"Can he have mistaken you for some one else?"

"Hardly, I should think, for the hurst is but little frequented, and avoided after dark. But stay! How could he know I should be here, and why has Katharine not come?"

"You are now asking questions to which we are unable to reply."

"Pardon me, my friends, I am confused, dizzy, and the more I think over this night's occurrences the more does my bewilderment increase."

"I can easily understand that. But will you excuse me if I ask you a question?"

"Certainly! speak freely, and without reserve."

"Perhaps I shall be able to assist you in unravelling the affair. Believe me, it is from no objectless curiosity that I ask."

"I believe it. Pray speak."

"The question I was going to ask was this—What means did you adopt to make Katharine—if such is her name—aware of your intention to meet her to-night at this place?"

The young lieutenant was silent.

"If," said Jack, "the question I have just asked involves something which you would rather keep in your own breast, think no more of it, or, rather that it had never been asked."

"No—no! I have told you all so far, and I will tell you the rest. The hesitation which I displayed you will find to be a natural enough feeling."

Jack merely bowed assent.

"The easiest plan," said Lieutenant Thrustans, "if not the shortest, will be to begin with the beginning. I am inclined to do so, because I think it probable you will be able to show me out of my present horrible perplexity, and for you to have a fair chance of doing this I should assuredly tell you all."

"You are yet weak," said Jack; "before you begin this narration, suppose we return to the little hillock where we found you; there you will be able to find a seat and rest yourself."

"I will. Come, Koolah."

He turned as he spoke, accompanied by our two friends, who were positively burning with curiosity to get at the termination of this strange adventure.

The fierce animal to which he undoubtedly on the present occasion was indebted for his life, after giving an angry glance at the bleeding body of Stephen Murray, followed in his footsteps.

Upon reaching the little grassy knoll, all three sat down. In the pale moonlight they looked picturesque in the extreme.

Lieutenant Thrustans was seated with our friends one on either side of him.

He began his story rather abruptly.

"When her father died, Katharine had only just passed her sixteenth birthday. I was then nineteen.

"An attachment sprung up between us,—a fervent and unchanging one on my part.

"Although not her equal in point of wealth, for her father was the richest man in the county, yet I was so in birth and position. The property we had once possessed had dwindled down, and I, an only son, found it necessary to seek some avocation.

"In doing this I followed the bent of my own inclination. I was always passionately fond of the sea, and the desire to visit other countries was one of the earliest I can remember having.

"My father possessed sufficient interest to purchase me a commission on board one of the best ships in the service.

"It was just as these arrangements were completed that Mr. Hayward died.

"I ought to tell you that he knew nothing of the attachment existing between his daughter and myself, nor did he in any way show that he had the least suspicion of it.

"As I said, Stephen Murray, Mr. Hayward's stanchest and oldest friend, who has to-night met with so terrible a fate, was appointed Katharine's guardian, who, by her father's death, became the greatest heiress in the county, though of course she would not come into actual possession of her wealth until the attainment of her majority.

"Grief for her father's death, which was sudden and unexpected, drove for some time all other considerations from her mind.

"Luckily there was yet a month before the Endeavour sailed, or it is probable we should have separated without having the explanation I intended.

"I deferred it until the night before my departure.

"We met here upon this very hillock, in the hurst upon which we are now sitting. The interview was a long and painful one for both.

"She had become to a great extent reconciled to her loss, and so was able to speak with some degree of calmness and dispassion.

"What I urged upon her was this.

"She was young—very young. There was a brilliant future in prospective for her.

"My own was most uncertain, though, of course, I looked forward with every confidence to promotion.

"That she loved me then passionately, truly, with all the fervour of a first devotion, I had no doubt; but then, as I have said, she was young. Circumstances might arise which would induce a change in her affections.

"I did not say that such would prove the case; and although she might not then believe that a change in her sentiments could take place, yet there was a probability of it, judging from what had happened before to others.

"The avowal of a reciprocation of the love I bore for her filled me with happiness; and however much I might have desired it in my heart, I would not suffer her to bind herself to me by any vows, though that circumstance did not prevent my pledging my love to her.

"I don't know whether I have succeeded in making you comprehend me, but I did with her. I wished to leave her free, unfettered, and at liberty to use her own discretion, but to believe that I should ever be faithful to her through all mutations of chance and change, and if, when I returned from my first cruise, which would be at the very least two years, she then found her love for altered, I would consent to the formation of an engagement between us.

"In brief, it was with the following understanding that we parted. On my return I was to forward a letter to her, naming the day I should be here, and that at moonrise on that night or evening I should be here and wait. If she was true, she would come and meet me; if she had altered, I should understand her absence. Is all this quite clear to you?"

"Perfectly," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and I can only say that your conduct in the affair cannot be sufficiently commended."

The young lieutenant bowed.

"I merely acted in the manner my conscience dictated and approved."

"Say, rather, in a manner which the high sense of honour prompted. Is not that your opinion, Claude?"

"It is," said Duval; "few, I think, would have been noble-minded enough to have carried out such a resolve, and I rejoice at the strange and unparalleled succession of events which has placed me in a position to render so true a gentleman a service."

The lieutenant bowed again, and though his heart told him that these encomiums were merited, yet with that sensitiveness which is ever the accompaniment of a disposition such as his was, he shrank from hearing them.

"Enough! enough!" he said; "though I should be guilty of a rudeness were I not to express my pleasure at finding you entertain so good an opinion of me. And now to conclude my story, for I have little more to tell. My presence here is sufficient proof of my sincerity. Never during the three years I have been absent from England have I ceased to think of her—to cherish her image in my heart. The hope that I should find her constant, and the portrayal of a happy future, has served to cheat many a long watch on the lonely ocean of its tediousness. I was full of impatience from the moment we commenced our return voyage, and though we were favoured to an unprecedented extent with fair weather, and consequently making great speed, yet to me our progress seemed snail-like in the extreme.

"As soon as I landed, my first act was to write, and then, with as little loss of time as possible, repair hither. The rest you know. I came hither at the appointed time and waited. While so doing, I was dastardly stabbed by some one who stole behind me unawares. That it was Katharine's guardian, Stephen Murray, who has been overtaken by a retribution, which I think just, who thus acted the bravo's part, there cannot be a reasonable doubt. The only thing that puzzles me is to find his motive. There I am quite at a loss."

Lieutenant Thrustans, as he thus concluded his strange story, let his head fall between his hands, and appeared to give himself up, either to thought or to grief, but which of the two it was, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval were unable to determine.

CHAPTER CXIX.

THE BLOOD-STAINED LETTER BEARS WITNESS TO THE VILLAINY OF KATHARINE'S GUARDIAN.

RESPECT for the young and noble-minded seaman kept the two highwaymen silent, and, during the pause which now ensued, they occupied themselves with the reflections which such a narrative could not fail to call forth.

There was room enough for conjecture and surmise in all that they had heard.

The silence continued for full ten minutes, and, probably, would have continued much longer, had not Koolah, by uttering a faint whine, and licking his hands, aroused Lieutenant Thrustans from his abstraction.

He had become quite unconscious of the presence of our two friends.

"Pardon me," he said. "I—I— was thinking, you see—or striving to think—and so"——

"No apologies are needed, sir," replied Jack. "I can understand your silence. There is much to perplex, and much matter for speculation in what you have told us."

"There is—there is. Surely she cannot have so changed as to—but no—I will not do her that injustice. Such a thought ought never to have entered my mind. It was unworthy of me."

"To me the affair seems very simple," said Claude Duval, who had listened to the whole with the utmost attention.

"How so, sir?" said the lieutenant. "If you have anything plausible, in the shape of an explanation, I pray you let me hear it."

"I do not for a moment pretend I am right; but I have my own idea of the matter."

"Speak then, sir. If you can pilot me out of all the doubts that harass me, I shall be for ever grateful to you."

"Then tell me, did I understand you to say, that you had every reason to believe that Mr. Hayward was ignorant of the love existing between you and his daughter?"

"Yes. Such is my belief."

"Was Mr. Murray, the guardian, also ignorant of it?"

"That is more than I can answer. I can only say that I never breathed a word to him upon the subject, nor do I think he ever saw anything to cause him to suspect it."

"Indeed. Then, sir, you are inclined to the opinion that he knew nothing of it previous to or at the time of your departure?"

"I am."

"You may depend, then, this is the state of the case. By some means or other he has become acquainted with the fact. It may be, that the lady herself has avowed it to him."

"It is quite possible. But then, why should he have acted as he has?"

"That is quite another matter. One thing I think is very evident, and that is, you have been very much mistaken in the character of Mr. Murray. Could you have ever deemed him base enough to stoop to assassination?"

"Never."

"But there is every proof that he did."

"There is, and yet I can scarce believe it. No one bore a better name than he did. All who knew him looked up to and respected him."

"It is strange, but it is not the first time that a person has succeeded in blinding others as to his real character."

"True, true."

"However, I think we may feel sure that if you are only willing we can set at rest all doubts whether it really was Mr. Murray who made the attack upon your life."

"I have already identified the mangled corpse among the trees yonder as being his."

"I know you have, but that is not it. You said that you were in time to turn round and wound your assailant? Now, if the assailant was Mr. Murray, we shall, despite the rough treatment he has received from Koolah, find the marks of a wound upon him?"

"We shall."

"This point, then, once set at rest," said Claude, "I think the rest of the affair as plain as daylight."

"Let us go," said the lieutenant, rising to his feet. "Let us go. We can soon ascertain if it is so."

"We can, we can."

All three then again repaired to the spot where the corpse lay. Koolah, as before, closely following in his master's footsteps.

As before, too, he uttered the ominous growl, and was about to spring upon his victim; but a word from the gallant sailor was sufficient to restrain him, and he shrank submissively to the earth.

Claude Duval, as he had proposed the measure, now thought it his duty to carry it out. So, overcoming a natural repugnance, he stooped down to examine the body.

The altitude which the moon had by this time attained permitted her beams to dissipate the darkness that hung about that umbrageous spot.

Claude was able to see what he was about.

The sight was a sickening and revolting one.

The man's apparel was torn in many places, and soaked in blood.

As well as he could he removed it, or rather such portions of it as were rendered necessary by his purpose.

But even that was not enough, as Jack saw, so simply saying he would be back in a moment, he ran to the little stream and filled his hat with water.

By the time he returned, Claude had finished his disagreeable task of baring the body of the dead.

"Thanks," he said, as his comrade handed him the water; "the very thing of which I stood in need, for until the clots of blood are washed away from the wounds, it will be impossible to tell which have been inflicted by the teeth of Koolah."

Lieutenant Thrustans looked on with the greatest interest and curiosity.

By the aid of the water, Claude soon removed the blood.

"Sir," he said, "there is no doubt now. Mr. Murray who lies here was your would-be assassinator. Look, here is the mark where the sword entered his right side."

Jack and the lieutenant stooped down to satisfy themselves of the truth of what Claude said, and there they saw what was palpably a sword, and not a tooth-wound, just under the short ribs.

"It is enough," said the young officer. "I am satisfied. All lingerings of doubt are now dispelled."

"They are unquestionably, I think," said Claude Duval. "We need not have taken so much trouble, though, if we had only given it a thought. He could not have reached the place without leaving a trail of blood, and if we had followed that from the hillock it would have been conclusive."

"It would, but yet after all not so satisfactory. Doubt is now impossible. It would, however, have saved you a disagreeable job."

"That does not signify at all. The main thing was to be perfectly satisfied, and I may say we are now."

"Yes, yes. Let us leave this place."

"I am willing," said Claude, "but I have not yet done. You say you wrote a letter to Miss Hayward?"

"I did."

"Is this it?"

Claude held up a crumpled, blood-stained sheet of paper.

"Oh, heavens!" said the lieutenant, as he snatched the paper, and looked at it. The moon's light was sufficiently powerful for him to assure himself that it was the letter he had sent. "What can be the meaning of this? Where did you find it?"

"I took it from the breast-pocket of the guardian. This is more positive proof."

"I see it all now," said the officer; "I see it all."

"Yes. Your letter, you may depend, never reached the hands for which it was intended. I know not what his motives may have been, but that Mr. Murray intercepted it is certain. Why he should not wish you to meet his ward, or why he should make the attempt he did upon your life, we have yet to learn; but, having ascertained this much, it will be easy to arrive at the remainder."

"There is a little circumstance," said Sixteen-String Jack, "deserving, I think, of consideration."

"What is it?"

"Supposing that Miss Hayward had not kept her appointment with you, what should you have done?"

"I cannot say—I know not."

"You would have gone?"

"Assuredly."

"Then, such being the case, why did Mr. Murray attempt your life? All he could want, one would think, would be to ensure your absence. It appears to me this could have been done without staining his hands with blood, and running the risk of being ultimately charged with the murder."

There was a silence.

This little circumstance had the effect of destroying Claude's hypothesis.

But it was only for a moment.

"No, stop," he said, "that all depends upon the amount of information contained in the letter. Did you say anything of the terms upon which you had agreed to meet."

"No. I would read you the letter, but it is not light enough. However, I will tell you its contents. I merely asked her, if her love was unchanged, to meet me to-night at moonrise, according to agreement, upon Gnome-hillock, in the hurst."

"And that was all?"

"All."

"Then he could have known nothing of your intention to depart. Rely upon it, circumstances have so fallen out as to tempt him to commit the crime he so nearly succeeded in. The spot is a lone one, little frequented?"

"Yes; superstition has cast her shadow upon the place, and it is scarcely if ever visited."

"Precisely: and so he thought you might remain there undiscovered, until decay had made such progress as to have obliterated not only your features, but the crime."

"It is awful. I can scarcely bring myself to credit the existence of so much guilt."

"I confess it is hard to do so, but there is no length to which a man will not go when under the domination of a powerful passion. But from all these dreadful circumstances I think it will be easy for you to derive hope and joy. I mean that she whom you love with so rare a devotion is true to you, or her guardian would never have attempted to put you out of the way."

CHAPTER CXX.

OLD STEVENS, THE STEWARD, MAKES A TERRIBLE REVELATION TO LIEUTENANT THRUSTANS.

THERE was so much truth in this remark, that Lieutenant Thrustans became at once impressed with the belief that that was indeed the true solution of the events which had taken place.

"Katharine," he said. "I will go to her at once. It is from her that I shall learn more of this mysterious and terrible affair."

"I should have proposed that as the next step for you to take," said Claude Duval. "We may reasonably presume that the letter now in your hands was never seen by her, and, therefore, she could know nothing of the appointment."

"Certainly not. Gentlemen, you are perfect strangers to me, as I am to you, but you have acted as friends only could. My brain was confused. I could not separate events. You having clearer minds have enabled me to come to a correct conclusion. You have rekindled hope. For all this I can never be sufficiently grateful. I feel that I cannot further trespass upon your kindness."

"If there is anything further that we can do to serve you," replied Sixteen-String Jack, "I can assure you it will be done with the greatest readiness. We are honoured by your acquaintance—should be proud to be considered your friends. Our time is our own, we have no particular engagement; and, therefore, I hope you will not be afraid to speak freely to us."

"I was then," said the young lieutenant, "about to ask you if you would finish what you have begun by accompanying me to 'The Home,' for that is the name of the house in which Miss Hayward dwells. It is but a short distance from here."

"We shall only be too glad. You will excuse me for saying, that all you have said, and all that has taken place, has filled us with interest and curiosity. I should, above all things, like to learn the sequel."

"Come with me, then. Your presence is the thing I most desire. Your intellects are more logical than my own. I confess I am about the worst in the world to find my way out a difficulty. Your friend, there, seems particularly gifted in that way."

He pointed to Claude as he spoke, who made a very low bow in reply.

"I ought before this to have told you our names," said Jack, with a glance at Claude, which he fully understood, "but the fact is, the things that have happened drove all ceremony out of my head. However, it is not too late to repair the omission. My friend's name is Engleheart—my own, Campbell. We have just returned from France, and are on our way to London."

The lieutenant bowed courteously in acknowledgment, and then he said,—

"They are two names which will be always remembered by me with the greatest pleasure; and now, gentlemen, are you ready to accompany me?"

"Quite. Yet stay. We have left our horses in the thicket yonder, for we could not force a passage through it. Doubtless you, by your knowledge of the spot, will be able to show us a path by which we can lead them hither."

"Certainly I can, if you will show me where they are."

Both our friends had been very careful to note the exact place where they had left the horses, and they pointed it out to their companion, who, turning to the left, led the way by a rather circuitous route to the tree to which they had been tethered.

With their bridles over their arms, for they would not mount while the officer was on foot, they followed along a narrow pathway, until at last they emerged from the park on the side opposite to that on which our friends entered it.

At some distance, and upon the top of a slight eminence, was one of those picturesque old Elizabethan mansions, which always lend so much beauty to an English landscape.

It was surrounded by spacious grounds, in the highest state of cultivation, which were by the pale moonlight seen to the greatest perfection.

"That, my friends," said Rupert Thrustans, "is 'The Home,' the residence of her whose life and happiness I value far more than my own."

It was in tones of deep and heartfelt emotion that the young sailor spoke.

He led the way through the garden, and across a well trimmed lawn, with a slow footstep—at times an unsteady one. The highwaymen attributed it to the blood he had lost, and this, perhaps, was what made him feel so heavy-hearted, and so oppressed with the shadow of coming evil.

Not a single light beamed forth from any one window of the mansion. It seemed as though its inmates had one and all given themselves up to slumber.

Lieutenant Thrustans noticed the circumstance; as he did so, the reflection crossed his mind that it was a most unreasonable hour at which to pay a visit.

But Claude and Jack overruled his scruples, and urged upon him the importance of seeing the young girl as soon as possible.

A hint that she might even then be in danger, and in need of his succour, was enough to fix his determination.

He ascended the stone steps in front of the hall door, at which he knocked loudly.

No notice was taken of the summons.

He knocked again, but without result. All within the house was as still as though it was uninhabited.

A cold sensation was about the young sailor's heart. It was a presage that there was ill in store.

But he endeavoured to shake off the feeling.

"They sleep soundly," he said; "but never mind. Come with me to the servants' offices. I know where to find the steward."

Our friends, whatever may have been their thoughts, gave them no utterance, but silently followed the lieutenant round to the back of the premises.

The whole of the place was perfectly familiar to Rupert Thrustans, and he was able to go without hesitation to that portion of the building in which the steward's sleeping chamber was situate.

"That is his window," he said. "I shall be easily able to wake him by throwing some of the gravel against it."

So saying, he stooped and picked up a handful of the fine gravel of which the pathway was composed, and flung it against the window, not, however, with sufficient force to break the glass.

The means succeeded; for, after the lapse of a moment, the one-half of the latticed casement was thrown open, and a night-capped head appeared.

"Who's there? What do you want? Speak—"

"Stevens," said Lieutenant Thrustans, stepping forward, so that the moon's rays fell full upon him. "Stevens, dress yourself and come down, I want to speak to you."

"The lord be good to us," said the voice which had before spoken, and which belonged to Stevens, the steward. "It's Master Rupert come back at last. Wait a moment, I will soon slip my clothes on. I am glad you have come back. I have watched for you for many a weary month past, and now you have come, I have sad news to tell you—sad news."

"Good heavens!" cried Thrustans, in a voice of anguish. "A dull foreboding has sat heavy at my heart ever since I came in sight of the house. I felt sure something was amiss. Tell me, oh! tell me. Katharine"——

"Wait till I come down, Master Rupert, wait till I come down. I will tell you all then."

"Calm yourself," said Sixteen-String Jack. "believe me when things go wrong there is every necessity for it. Remember, you may have much to do. Your wound may, in consequence of undue excitement, turn to inflammation, and then you would be powerless. Be guided by me, sir, and be calm."

"I will, I will. That is, I will try to be; but when the heart is racked with contending emotions, when one anticipates the worst, it is not possible to subdue the throbbings of the heart."

"But you can make the attempt to subdue them. Listen to what the old man has to say. Look, here he comes."

It was even so. In his anxiety, the steward had hurried on his clothing with greater celerity than he had thought of for many a year.

He was rather surprised when he saw our two friends, for, having stood in the shadow, he had not noticed them when he looked out of window.

"These are friends of mine, Stevens," said Thrustans, hastily. "They know all, so do not hesitate to speak before them. Do not either keep me in suspense."

"What a strange, ugly dog you have got with you, Master Rupert," said the old man, doubtfully.

"Do not be afraid, Stevens. He will not harm you."

"That is well, then. Ah! sir, while you have been gone, and since poor dear master died, there's been sad doings at 'The Home'—very sad indeed, sir. Miss Katharine"——

"What of her. Tell me—tell me. Is—is— She is not dead, surely?"

"No—no," replied the old man, hurriedly. "She's not dead, poor thing, though I don't know but what it would be better if she was. Alas! alas!"

"Explain yourself. Do not torture me any longer."

"I will not. But you must compose yourself, Master Rupert, and prepare to hear bad news. Alas! that ever I should have to tell it."

"Old man," said Thrustans, in a trembling voice, "do you not see that this suspense only increases my agitation? Speak—speak at once—tell me all."

"Yes," said Jack. "Tell him all that has befallen her."

The old man was quite overcome with grief. He had been all his life in the service of the Haywards, and he was attached to them with a rare devotion, so that he felt most keenly any sorrow that fell upon them.

Tears streamed down his cheeks.

His voice was choked and inarticulate with sobs.

"Miss Katharine," he said, "my dear young mistress, the richest heiress and the most beautiful girl in the whole county, is—is"——

"Oh! heavens! what?"

"Calm yourself, I pray. She is mad, and the inmate of an asylum!"

For some minutes after hearing this terrible announcement, Lieutenant Thrustans was completely prostrated. He was bereft both of speech and motion. He had conjectured many terrible things in connexion with his betrothed—had, as he thought, schooled himself to hear the worst, but the thought of madness had never once entered his brain—it was too, too horrible.

The sobbing of the old steward was the only sound that broke the silence.

At last the sailor found his voice.

"Mad!" he shrieked. "No, no! not mad! not mad! Tell me that she is anything but mad, and I will bless you. Speak, I say! Stevens—Stevens! Tell me that she"——

"God help us!" ejaculated the old steward, as Lieutenant Thrustans, having worked himself up to a pitch of frenzy, suddenly staggered and fell like one dead upon the earth, ere a hand could be outstretched to save him.

CHAPTER CXXI.

LIEUTENANT THRUSTANS SEES THE GLIMMER OF COMING HOPE.

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval were so utterly—to use a colloquial expression—taken aback by the startling intelligence respecting the betrothed of Lieutenant Thrustans, that they lost, for some few moments, their habitual self-command, or they would certainly have saved the gallant sailor from the heavy fall he had upon the gravelled path.

Koolah again uttered that horrible cry which had before

"Startled the dull ear of night," and Stevens, the steward, was so alarmed at it, that he drew back with the utmost precipitation.

Our friends, however, who knew somewhat of the animal to be aware that there was nothing to be dreaded from it in the shape of violence, stooped down, and raised him to his feet.

The cry of the faithful creature seemed to have had a revivifying power upon him, for his eyes opened, and a groan came from his lips.

"Kate—Kate!" he cried. "Speak to me, dear one. Tell me that this is all some horrible freak of my imagination. Kate, darling, where are you?"

"Rouse yourself, sir—rouse yourself," said Claude. "There is a necessity for immediate action. Kate is not here; but we, your friends, are."

Lieutenant Thrustans passed his hand ... a bewildered manner across his eyes, as though he could, by that process, dispel the mists that hung about his brain, and then replied—

"Stevens!"

"Yes, Master Rupert, I am here," said the steward, venturing to approach.

"What were you telling me about a madhouse, Stevens?"

"Oh! my dear young sir, pray be calm—pray be calm."

"I am quite calm," he said, as he freed himself from the support of Claude's arm. "Quite calm. Quite collected. Repeat what you said."

The steward trembled. There was something more terrible about the assumption of unnatural calmness than there was in the fiercest expressions of despair."

"I said," he replied nervously, "that poor Miss Katharine had gone mad."

"Who said so?"

"Mr. Murray, who was the gentleman who was appointed to be her guardian, you know, sir."

"My friend," said Jack, "for such I hope you will permit me to call myself, "endeavour, if you can, to regain something like a natural composure, and allow me to question the steward. Considering the difference there is in our state of mind, I do not think I should be going too far in saying that I could do so much better than yourself."

Again Rupert Thrustans passed his hand across his eyes.

"I believe I am going mad. I will try to be calm. Ask him. I will listen."

"You hear," said Jack, turning to Stevens. "Now tell me. You say her guardian reported her mad? Had you ever seen anything in your mistress's conduct to make you think her insane?"

"No, sir, I never did; but it was after she went to live in London that the fit came upon her. I did not see her, you understand, because I was here."

"Enough. Mr. Hayward had, then, a town residence?"

"He had, sir, in Woburn-square."

"And during her stay there she went mad?"

"Such, sir, was the report."

"And to what asylum was she conveyed?"

"I know not."

"Can you form no conjecture? Have you never heard anything to assist your doing so?"

"Never; and yet"——

"Yet what?"

"Now I remember, some eight months ago a man came here of a suspicious appearance, and demanded an interview with Mr. Murray. I refused to allow him to enter, upon which he took from his pocket-book a card, and told me to give it to my master, who would then see him."

"And did he?"

"Yes, and very much excited he seemed."

"But what was there in the fact of his coming that should make you recollect it?"

"For one thing, because he was the only stranger that ever came, and his manner, coupled with Mr. Murray's excitement, made an impression upon me."

Jack was silent for a moment.

He was baffled, and yet he seemed upon the verge of making the discovery.

Claude, who as usual had said nothing, but listened eagerly, now put a question.

"Did you look at the card you received?"

"Well, yes, I did, sir, for my curiosity was roused."

"And can you recollect what it said upon it?"

"Oh! yes, I have never forgotten; I seem as though I could see the card now."

"Good; that is important. Now tell us what were the words upon it?"

"Dr. Stoffel, Lowne House, Stamford-hill."

"Are you sure that was it."

"Quite. The name of Stoffel, in the first place, is a peculiar one. Then the man himself looked as little like a doctor as he well could."

"Indeed. What sort of looking man was he?"

"A short, coarse, vulgar-looking man."

"We are on the right track, Jack," said Claude. "It is astonishing how one event seems to rise up out of another."

While this conversation was taking place the young officer gradually recovered the command of his faculties, and now quite calmly, but very differently to the way he had before spoken, he said—

"What do you make of this, my friends? You seem as though you comprehended it."

"I should not like to say that," said Claude, for Jack kept silent, "but I think I could, with every assurance, say that the young lady is not mad."

"Oh! sir, is that indeed your belief, or do you say it in the hope of affording me some consolation. If the latter, believe me it is a cruel mistake."

"It is not. I consider there is every reason to think she is as sane as either of us are at the present moment."

"Not mad!" repeated Stevens. "How can that be? She is in the asylum."

"She may be, and yet not be mad for all that. You have seen but little of the world, my friend. Do you believe all you hear?"

"Why, no, in a manner of speaking, I can't say I do?"

"Of course not, you have acquired that much experience of men and the world. Answer me another question. What cause was assigned for Miss Kate's madness, for there was one, surely?"

"Oh! yes. They said she had gone mad about a young man, a sailor, whom she loved, and who had been lost at sea."

"Ha!"

Lieutenant Thrustans pressed his hands to his temples.

"You see," said Claude, "the villainy is becoming more apparent now."

"I am horrified."

"And well you may be."

"What course should you advise?"

"A bold one."

"What would it be? I have the most implicit faith in your judgment."

"I should propose, then, subject to your approval, that we make all the speed we can to Stamford-hill, the residence of this Doctor Stoffel, and, no doubt, keeper of a private lunatic asylum, and carry off the young girl by main force. Does the plan meet with your approval, Jack?"

"It does, unquestionably. There cannot be a doubt, I think, about the correctness of all our premises, and if she is to be saved from what must be a thousand times worse than death itself, it must be done by force and stratagem, and not by any appeal to the legal powers."

Claude was pleased that Jack so fell in with his views; and as for the lieutenant, not only had he made up his mind to submit to their guidance, but the plan proposed was quite in accordance with the sailor-like notions he had imbibed.

The steward scarcely knew what to make of the proceedings of the night, and he looked first at one and then at another with an air of such perfect bewilderment that it was quite ludicrous to see him.

"And now," continued Jack, who naturally assumed the leadership of the affair, "I know the place where this doctor lives. It is a long way from here, but the night is young yet. Let us start at once. Stevens, have you a horse in the stable?"

"Yes, sir."

"Saddle, it then, and bring it out for Mr. Thrustans. We are going away now; when we return we shall bring your young mistress with us."

The old man hurried off to the stables.

Claude followed him. He knew he was much more competent to saddle the horse than the steward was.

In a few minutes he appeared with what Stevens assured him was the best horse in the stable.

By the way in which the lieutenant sprang into the saddle and handled the reins, Claude saw he was an accomplished horseman.

Jack and Duval both vaulted into their own saddles, and all three were quite ready for a start.

Stevens only half understood what was taking place, and a rather anxious consultation took place as to whether he should be told of the fate that had overtaken Mr. Murray, but it was decided in the end that it would be best not to do so."

"No," said Claude Duval, "let us go at once. We have no time to lose. We must be there before the news of Mr. Murray's death can reach the ears of the rascal who keeps that most iniquitous of all places—a private madhouse."

CHAPTER CXXII.

RUPERT THRUSTANS AND OUR FRIENDS STILL CLING TO THE IDEA THAT IT IS AT LOWNE HOUSE THEY WILL FIND KATHARINE HAYWARD.

To trace step by step the progress of our friends from "The Home" to Stamford-hill would only have the effect of wearying the reader. Let it suffice to say that the distance as far as the then thinly-inhabited village of Stoke Newington was passed over without the occurrence of any incident worthy of special record.

The reader will not fail to have noticed that all three jumped, in a manner of speaking, to the conclusion that Lowne House, the residence of Dr. Stoffel, was the private lunatic asylum in which Katharine was confined, without having anything like positive evidence that such was the case.

But somehow or other the idea took a firm hold of their imagination, as things sometimes will, and they felt a degree of certainty upon the point amounting almost to conviction.

Whether they were right we shall quickly see. At present we think it quite possible that they have permitted their feelings to mislead them.

However, as we have said, they reached the little village of Stoke Newington.

Lieutenant Thrustans being amply provided with funds, they found no difficulty in getting fresh horses, so that the distance, although great, was passed over in what would be deemed an unprecedentedly short space of time.

But being now in the immediate neighbourhood of the place they sought, they resolved to proceed at a slower rate and talk over the plan of action to be pursued.

Jack was speaking in reply to a question put to him by the young officer, who had now recovered his ordinary state of mind, which showed that the wound he had received was quite a superficial one.

"We both know this part of the country uncommonly well," Jack was saying, "but still, for all that, our knowledge is not sufficiently extensive to enable us to say precisely where Lowne House is. I think I told you we had been some time absent from England."

"You did, sir."

"Notwithstanding that, I still think I can find the place, and that with little trouble; but before we reach it, we must settle something like a definite course of action. To wait and do this on our arrival at our destination will only be to lose time, so I propose that we go the rest of the way quietly, and that will not only give ourselves and our horses a rest, but afford us plenty of time for deliberation."

"Whatever you may think is for the best I'm quite ready to agree to," replied Thrustans.

"I am afraid you place too much confidence in us. I would much rather explain things as we go on."

"Such a course cannot but be satisfactory."

"In the first place, then," said Claude, "we must assume we are so far correct in our suppositions as this. Mr. Murray having been left guardian, has been tempted to try to get the whole of the estates and property into his own hands. During the persecution which Katharine must have endured at his hands, after his resolving to carry this project into execution, she probably told him of her betrothment to you. What other means he may have tried to effect his purpose does not matter. It is enough that one of them was to shut her up in a lunatic asylum, and propagate the report that she was mad. The story of her attachment to a sailor, and her grief at hearing of his loss, would form a plausible reason for so sad an occurrence."

The lieutenant was filled with admiration at the very skilful manner in which Claude had reduced the many and complicated events to a substance that carried on the face of it a strong impression of its actuality.

"Then," said Jack, "such being the state of affairs, his motive for acting as he did towards you, sir, follows as a matter of course. Your letter, which you forwarded to 'The Home,' addressed to Miss Katharine, would fall into his hands. He would read it and become aware of the appointment, but not of the peculiar terms under which it was to take place. In you he would see an enemy from whose untiring energy he would have everything to fear. To a man who had already perpetrated so much villainy, the assassination of a man—a stranger, too—upon a deserted, never-visited spot, would appear but an ordinary affair, and one, too, that was absolutely necessary to his retention of the property. He failed in his object, and the retribution which overtook him is as just as it is terrible."

It was now the officer's turn to look at Jack with surprise, after hearing from him this lucid account of the motives which led to the commitment of the frightful deed.

"I see," he said, "your minds are far more acute and logical than mine. More skilful, too, in untangling cause from effect, and drawing deductions from them."

"You flatter us."

"No. I merely compliment you upon the possession of an admirable power."

"Let us waive it, then. Does what we have together said bear to you the appearance of reality?"

"It does. Alas! that it should be so, it seems to carry conviction with it. Oh! my friends, what may the poor girl not have suffered?"

Our friends were silent.

Perhaps they were even better able to form an idea upon the subject than he was.

"It is terrible to think of," continued the lieutenant. "Let us hasten to set her free, for it would amount to positive cruelty upon my part were I to allow her sufferings to continue now I have been made cognizant of them."

"That brings me," resumed Claude, "to the point I wished to reach. We have advised a forcible removal from the asylum, when we have law on our side. But it is a very ticklish thing to have anything to do with; and, even if you are successful, some time must necessarily elapse before she can be released. But you ought to know that a person cannot be confined in a madhouse without the signatures of two diplomated physicians. There are men who will for a consideration sign a certificate that a person is mad whether or not such is really the case."

"Good heavens!" said the lieutenant. "I knew nothing of this before. Why, no one is actually safe."

"No one, when he has an unscrupulous enemy to deal with. And now, you will say, why not find out these physicians who have signed the certificate for Katharine's imprisonment—for that she is mad I do not for a moment believe—and punish them? But, believe me, such an attempt would be quite futile. Feeling how much was at stake, and as the keeper of the asylum would be as much implicated in the affair as themselves, they would manage, by the administration of drugs, or other means, to render her mad, at least at the time the examination takes place, and then she would be lost to you for ever."

"Oh! let us fly—fly at once," said the officer, who was horror-stricken at the recital of so much villainy. "Your plan is indeed the best."

"I am glad you think so. It is true Mr. Murray is dead, and that they would have no interest in keeping her—I mean so far as money goes; yet, you see, having committed themselves, they dare not release her."

"Come on—come on."

Lieutenant Thrustans would then and there have set off at a gallop, but Claude stayed him.

"Gently," he said; "we must act with all caution. Craft can only properly be met by craft. We are now at Stamford-hill. Our first act must be to ascertain the whereabouts of Lowne House."

"And then," added Jack, "we had better enter it, and by threatening his life, compel the asylum-keeper to give Katharine into our hands."

"Agreed."

The commodious residences which now cluster so thickly about this neighbourhood have all been built long subsequent to the times of which we write. Then it was broad, open country, but thinly dotted with habitations.

As the lieutenant uttered the word agreed, there came to the ears of all three a faint rumbling sound, accompanied by the tinkling of a bell, and, looking in the direction from which it proceeded, they saw in the distance a covered waggon, creeping slowly along the road.

"Capital," cried Jack. "I daresay from him we shall be able to gather the information we require, but, as he will be a long time reaching this spot at the rate he is progressing, I will, with your permission, gallop up to him and make the inquiry. It will be hardly worth while for all to go, and besides, seeing us in such force, might have the effect of alarming him."

"Yes," said Claude, "it will be best for you to go alone. We will wait here for you."

Of course, the lieutenant made no objection.

Claude, however, had divined Jack's motive for wishing to go alone, and what that motive was, will very quickly be apparent.

The waggon was somewhere about half-a-mile down the road, and was going in the direction of London.

It took Jack only a few minutes to overtake it.

From their position on the hill, Claude and Thrustans were able to watch his progress down the road, and see the cumbersome vehicle brought to a standstill.

Then something followed, which they could not very well make out, for the distance was too great for them to see Jack's figure very distinctly, but that something of a very unusual character was going on they were quite certain.

What it was Claude more than half suspected, though the seaman did not. However, we will just follow Jack down the road, and make the reader acquainted with exactly what was going on.

CHAPTER CLXIII.

AN AGENT IN THE NEFARIOUS SCHEME AGAINST KATHARINE FALLS RATHER UNEXPECTEDLY INTO THE HANDS OF JACK RANN.

"HALT!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, as he whirled his horse round suddenly to face the driver. "Halt. I wish to speak to you."

More upon the impulse of the moment than reflection, the waggoner, hearing a voice call to him to stop, tightened the reins, and the horses with the utmost willingness came to a stand-still.

"Anan, sir?" asked the driver, who was only partially awake, driving with their eyes shut being a feat such individuals are very fond of practising. "Anan, sir?"

"I want to go to Lowne House, Stamford-hill. Do you know it?"

The waggoner shook his head to give increased emphasis to his negative, and said—

"Noa, sir. I doant."

"Not know it? Why, it is where Doctor Stoffel lives!"

"Anan?"

"Curse your anan! It's where Doctor Stoffel lives."

"Doan't know him, sir. The only doctor as I knows of about these parts is Doctor Green, and it bain't him; leastways he's in the waggin."

"Villain!" roared a voice, which proceeded from beneath the canvas covering of the waggon. "Villain! how dare you say I was here?"

"Lauk, sir, I didn't think it wor no harm, sir."

"Drive on at once, and leave this man, who may be a highwayman for ought I know, to make his inquiries somewhere else. Drive on, I say."

"Oh!" thought Jack. Then he said, rapidly, in a loud, fierce tone, "If you venture to go on before I give you leave to do so, I will blow your brains out!"

"Mercy! mercy! It's a highwayman, as I'm a sinner. Spare my life! spare my life!"

"Sit still, then, and you are safe; but so sure as you attempt to drive on, you are a dead man!"

The waggoner dropped the reins, and huddled himself up on his seat.

Jack now rapidly made his way to the back of the waggon, and drew aside the canvas which covered it.

When he did so the moon shone full into the vehicle, and he was able to see the interior with tolerable distinctness.

To his surprise he found it contained several people.

He knew well enough that it was no unusual thing for people to ride in the cross-country waggons when coming to London, but such journeys were usually made by day, and not by night.

It was not those who could not afford to hire a better conveyance who were the sole travellers in so cumbrous an affair. Many did it for the purpose of eluding observation, for all the roads about London were then particularly dangerous to those who had anything to lose.

Added to this there did not exist that facility of communication between places which now exists, and to which we have become so familiar. There were many out-of-the-way places near which the stage-coaches never came, and from which the only way of reaching the metropolis was by means of some such vehicle as this was.

Several women were in the waggon, and upon seeing Jack they all set up a succession of screams, which made it quite out of the question for anything else to be heard above the din.

There was no resource but to wait until it subsided, and this soon happened, for they could not help seeing there was something aggressive in Jack's manner.

"Doctor Green," cried Jack, "I am sorry to trouble you, but I have very important business with Dr. Stoffel, whose address I am told is Lowne House, Stamford-hill. Can you direct me to it?"

"What do you want?"

"That, sir, lies between us alone. Can you tell me whereabouts it is?"

"Ye—no—no, I can't."

"Why you began to say yes. What do you mean? Now I have asked you quietly enough, but I don't put up with nonsense from anybody, so mind what you are at."

"Oh! you need not think to bully me sir!" said Doctor Green, screwing himself as far into the corner as he could; "I'm not to be bullied."

"Did you address those remarks to me?"

"Yes; and I repeat, sir, I won't be bullied!"

"Come out," said Jack, "come out like a man, and don't hide behind the ladies. Come out, I say."

"Don't you wish you may get it? Drive on, I say, drive on."

The driver knows better; and if you don't choose to come out I'll pull you out."

"Me, sir. I'd advise you to try it on."

There was something very offensive to Jack in the manner of this Doctor Green, and he could not help somehow connecting him in his mind with the keeper of the private asylum.

Now the doctor spoke as he did because he thought he was tolerably safe, for he occupied the top part of the waggon—that is to say, the part furthest from the end—so that all the other passengers were between him and Jack.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said our friend, "I am really sorry to trouble and delay you, but I cannot help myself. I want to know the position of a certain house, and, from his manner, it appears Mr. Green knows where that house is, but will not tell me. Can any of you give me the information?"

"No," replied a chorus of voices. "We are strangers, and were never in this part before."

"That is enough. I must trouble you to alight, and then when I drag the doctor out, I shan't hurt anybody."

Upon hearing these words there was a general movement on the part of the occupants of the waggon.

"No—no. Don't get out," cried the doctor, "he only wants to rob you, or murder you, perhaps."

But they were deaf to his cries, and they got out as quickly as they could.

"I'll tell you. I'll tell you. Stop! stop! It won't matter, though, for he don't live there now."

"That won't do for me. I must have you out. You and I won't part company just yet."

While he spoke Jack assisted the last person to leave the waggon.

There was now no one in it but the doctor.

[THE SMITH KNOCKS OFF TOM KING'S FETTERS.]

He screwed himself up into a yet smaller compass.

Jack drew forth a pistol.

"Now," he said, "I can see you from here quite plainly. I will count three, and if you are not out by that time, I fire. It will be an impossibility for me to miss you. One—two—"

Doctor Green rolled out with the greatest celerity.

But just as he was about to disappear over the tail-board, Jack clutched him firmly by the collar.

"Oh! no!" he said, "you won't get away from me very easily, you'll find. Oh! no!"

He touched his horse as he spoke, and dragged the doctor fairly out of the cart, but he still retained his hold.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," said Jack, "I hope you will accept my apologies, but what else could I do? The bird that can sing, and won't sing, must be made to sing. Good night. I hope you won't be interrupted during the rest of your journey."

As he spoke these words, without waiting to see what the people said or did, he turned his horse's head towards the spot where he had left his companions, and set off at a gallop.

If he had turned his head, which he did not, he would have seen that the people saw with no small consternation the very unceremonious manner in which the doctor was abducted.

Before he started, Jack had assured himself that his hold was a good one, and, relying upon his strength, he fairly dragged Mr. Green along.

To be sure it was not very comfortable for that gentleman himself, but that was a thing that troubled Jack slightly, for he considered he had no one to blame but himself.

Claude and the lieutenant heard him coming, and rode forward to meet him.

They were astonished to see a man clinging, as they thought, to his saddle.

"It's all right," cried Jack; "lay hold of him, Claude, for my arm is tired. Don't loose him. I think we shall find he knows a great deal that we are so anxious to know."

Claude laid hold of the doctor in a moment, but he dismounted first.

Then Jack had a good look at his captive.

He was a miserable little decrepit old man, and this accounted for the ease with which Jack had been able to hold him with one hand.

His demeanour was now abject in the extreme.

He was thoroughly terrified, and fully believed that his last hour had come.

"Mercy!" he shrieked. "Help! help! Murder!"

"Silence," said Jack, "or murder it will be. Silence him, Claude."

Claude Duval rather roughly put his hand over the old man's mouth.

"We must settle this," said Jack, as he dismounted. "I will soon make him secure."

He took off the curb-rein as he spoke, and tightly pinioned the old man with it.

Then going to Claude's horse, he possessed himself of his curb-rein also, and forming one end of it into a noose, he slipped it over his head, and drew it rather tightly round his neck, but not so as to impede his breathing.

"You can let him go now," he said. "I think he is pretty safe."

CHAPTER CXXIV.

OUR FRIENDS ARE SUCCESSFUL IN FINDING LOWNE HOUSE, AND MAKE A TOOL OF DOCTOR GREEN.

"SPARE me! spare me! Spare my miserable life!" said Doctor Green, and he sank upon his knees in the road as he spoke. "Spare my wretched life, and I will tell you all!"

It was clear he did not at all relish the noose that fitted him so closely, and his fear that this proceeding was but a preliminary towards hanging him was only natural.

"Upon those sole conditions," said Jack, "may you presume to call your life your own."

"I will tell you all, good sir. All—all."

"Silence! and do not venture to speak unless leave is given you to do so."

"I—I am silent."

The doctor was in a perfect agony of fright.

Claude looked at Jack for some kind of explanation.

As for the lieutenant, no words could possibly express the look of intense astonishment which was depicted upon his face.

He was like one in a dream.

And, in fact, when we come to consider upon the extraordinary nature of the events which had occurred during the last few hours, we shall scarcely feel surprised at the confusion of his intellects.

"I found this man in the waggon going apparently towards London, but whether he really was, or what was his motive for being there at all, is more than I can say. Certain it is, when I asked after Doctor Stoffel, his manner was so suspicious that I felt he must be in some way connected with that individual."

"No—n—!" began Doctor Green, but he was silenced by Jack.

"I can't make anything out of it," replied Duval. "But all I can say is this, that if all our suppositions prove to be correct, and this man is mixed up in the affair, I should say there was something out of the common way in such a coincidence of events."

"I hope you will get hold of no superstitious notions about it. However, now for the doctor."

Jack, as he spoke, turned to the trembling captive, and said—

"Show us the way to Lowne House, and that by the most direct route. Do you hear?"

"Yes—yes. Up the hill, good sir. Spare my life, up the hill, and then the first turning to the left."

"Your life is spared," replied Jack, "but if you attempt to deceive us, woe be to you."

Claude and Jack remounted.

They had now only the snaffle reins with which to guide their horses, but as they were tired there was little trouble in maintaining command of them.

It was Jack who kept firm hold of the one end of the rein, of which the other formed the noose about the doctor's head.

This left that gentleman two modes of action.

One was to stand still and be strangled

The other was to follow submissively.

The latter, as may be supposed, was the alternative chosen.

He was not, however, put to any very great inconvenience, for the three friends, as they might fairly be called, proceeded at a walk up the hill.

They were now silent, for it was by no means part of their plan to let the doctor know much about them—at any rate more than was unavoidable.

In a little more than ten minutes they reached the top of the hill, and then Jack said—

"How far on is the lane you spoke of?"

"Only a few yards now. Do you see that group of trees?"

"Yes—yes!"

"They are at the entrance of it."

"Oh! indeed. Come on."

Their pace was now accelerated a little, which was a most inconvenient circumstance for Mr. Green, for he was old and rather shaky about the legs.

Nothing but the most settled conviction that he was in some way mixed up with the iniquities of Lowne House would have induced Jack to behave as he did to him.

For our own part we think he might just as well have waited until he was assured of that fact.

But the strange life he had led enabled him to arrive very quickly at conclusions, and very rarely indeed was it that he proved wrong.

The lane which they were informed led to Dr. Stoffel's was a very dark one. On both sides of it grew some unusually large horse-chestnut trees, and so closely did the branches interlace one another that it was only here and there the moon could find her way through them.

Upon entering this place, the two highwaymen looked with additional keenness after their prisoner, for they thought it not unlikely he would take advantage of the darkness and endeavour to escape.

Like most other country lanes, this one was narrow and winding. In fact, in no part of it had they been able to see twenty yards before them.

Nor could they find the least evidences to show that there were human habitations at all contiguous to it.

Jack grew impatient.

"I say, Dr. Green," he cried, "how much farther along the lane is it?"

"Only a little way now. Oh, dear!"

"I should advise you to take care, if you value that miserable life of yours."

"You will find it right, good sir."

"Confound it! the house is Lowne, and no mistake," continued Jack, "the trees get thicker every moment."

It may not be amiss to explain what Jack meant.

"Lowne" was a word much more in use then than it is at the present day, though in many of the provinces it is constantly employed.

Its meaning, as many of our readers doubtless are aware, is "sheltered and screened from the wind," and the term is generally restricted to that kind of shelter or shade which is afforded by trees.

Hence, Lowne House signified "a house sheltered from the wind by trees."

Now, it was the name which at first struck Jack. It was just such a one as would be applied to a place of the description that they supposed Doctor Stoffel to keep.

"There!" cried Doctor Green. "Look! you see I am quite right. That brick wall surrounds the house."

All three upon hearing these words looked, and there they saw, on the right-hand side of the lane, the corner of an unusually high wall.

"Surround the house," said Claude. "Did I understand you this wall surrounded the house?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Then what is his motive for having such a high wall all round his house? Why, it must quite shut out all the view!"

"He! he! he!"

"Did you laugh?"

"No, good sir. No—no! I didn't laugh! Indeed, I didn't! Only the thought of shutting out the view."

"Ha! you have betrayed yourself! Now, answer me truly. Is, or is not, Lowne House a private lunatic asylum?"

"Oh! dear; I suppose you must know. Yes, it is."

By the time this little conversation was terminated, they had passed along that portion of the brick wall which abutted upon the lane, until they came to some large entrance-gates.

They were of wood, painted some dark colour.

Here they paused.

"And this is the entrance to Lowne House?"

"It is, gentlemen, it is."

"Enough; say no more than you are obliged. You are, of course, well acquainted with the premises."

"Really I—a—really"——

"Any hesitation will be your death."

"I am."

It was wonderful what a love the doctor had got for his life, but then it is a commodity that we all prize rather highly.

"Then," said Jack, in tones that left behind no doubt of his earnestness, "we are going to force our way in."

"Stop!" said Claude, "I have a thought."

He whispered something rapidly in Jack's ear, who thereupon said—

"To be sure, to be sure—much the best. Now, Doctor Green, listen to me."

Jack dismounted as he spoke, and his example was immediately followed by his companions.

Then a fresh consideration presented itself to their notice—what were they to do with their horses?

They could not enter with them very well, and yet it was important that they should be somewhere close at hand when wanted.

There was only one way to manage this, and that was to tie the horses to some of the lower branches of the trees.

This done, Doctor Green, much to his gratification and surprise, found himself freed from the thongs which had held him in bondage.

But Jack took care to keep a tight hold of him, and then Claude walked close behind him, and said—

"Do you feel that, doctor?"

"Yes, yes. Murder! You're running it into me. Murder!"

"Be quiet. It is my sword. All you have got to do is to obey. The moment you don't I shall run you through. It will be the easiest thing in the world."

"Murder!"

"Of course it will be murder if you force me to it, but I hope you will have too much good sense."

"Oh! dear."

"Now," said Jack, "you will answer questions just as I tell you; but, in the first place, how do you let the doctor know when he has any visitors?"

Poor Doctor Green thought the best thing he could do was to make a virtue of necessity, and he said, with an appearance of great candour—

"You will find the handle of a bell hanging against the wall. Pull it, and they will come."

It was the lieutenant who now spoke.

He began to see what was going on.

"All right," he said. "Here's the bell-handle. Shall I pull it?"

"By all means."

A tremendous clanging followed, which attested not only to the size of the bell itself, but the vigour with which the wire had been pulled.

"And harkye, Doctor Brown," said Jack, "we have made up our minds to get in here, but not by force as we first intended. You shall take us in and say we are friends of yours."

"I can't—I can't! Indeed I can't."

"Oh! very well then, you may as well die at once. We are bound to get in, but the best way will be for you to comply with our wishes."

The doctor groaned, but consideration for his own life triumphed over every other feeling.

"Hullo!" said Lieutenant Thrustans. "Here's somebody coming. "Down, Koolah, down!"

The tiger-wolf crouched submissively at his feet.

CHAPTER CXXV.

KOOLAH INDUCES DOCTOR STOFFEL TO COMPLY WITH HIS VISITOR'S WISHES.

THE sound produced by some one walking with a heavy tread upon a soft gravelled path could now be heard.

"Who's there?" asked a voice, gruffly, and a faint flash of light came through the interstices of the woodwork of which the gates were composed. "Who's there?"

"Say Doctor Green, who wants to see Doctor Stoffel immediately, upon important business," whispered Jack to his captive.

Claude seconded this command by a prick with his sword, and so he said, with a faint groan—

"Doctor Green. It's Doctor Green. I want to see Doctor Stoffel immediately upon important business."

"All right, sir," said the voice. "I'll open the gate in a moment."

The withdrawal of heavy bolts, and the clangour of a falling chain followed, and then a small door, constructed in the large gates themselves, was flung open.

A very rough-looking man stood upon the threshold.

"Come in, Mr. Green, it's all right. Come in."

Jack had got the doctor's arm very tight beneath his own, and they entered together, Claude and Lieutenant Thrustans following closely in the rear.

The man who had opened the gate was quite surprised to see four persons enter, when he thought the doctor only was outside.

He, however, did not make any remark, but after very carefully refastening the door, preceded them up a kind of carriage drive.

In a few minutes they came in sight of a large, dark, square building, from two windows in which issued a faint light.

The remainder was in complete darkness.

Claude and Jack concentrated the whole of their attention upon the unfortunate doctor, in order to see that he did not attempt to carry out any treachery against them.

Their fears, however, were quite groundless. He was completely terrified into submission, and henceforth he was but a puppet in their hands.

Two steps led up to the front door of Lowne House.

These were ascended.

The door itself was ajar, from which it might be inferred that the man who had let them in had emerged from it, and so left it.

He carried in his hand a rude stable-lantern, the sides of which were formed of horn, of so opaque a quality, that the rays of the candle within had the utmost difficulty in struggling through it.

The man pushed open the door, and then turning round upon the threshold, held it open to allow the visitors to enter.

He then very carefully shut and fastened it.

Our intruders stood close to each other in the passage, waiting for the keeper—for such they took him to be—to guide them.

"Go on, doctor," he said; "go on into the little parlour. Mr. Stoffel will be with you directly."

"Remember," whispered Jack in his companion's ear, "remember, your life is in your own hands."

Doctor Green evidently understood what was meant, for he walked across the hall towards a massive-looking old-fashioned door.

Jack opened it, and all entered with the exception of the keeper, who, of course, went to inform his employer of the late arrival.

A lamp on the table was burning brightly, and diffused a cheerful light through the apartment. Just, in fact, sufficient to disperse the darkness in the more distant corners of it.

Claude was compelled to sheathe his sword. It would have looked strange to have continued to hold it drawn in his grasp. A premature alarm would have spoilt everything.

Jack, though, still held his pistol, and took the opportunity of impressing again upon Green the policy of obeying them in everything.

"The least attempt at treachery, and you die! It will be impossible to elude my aim. Agree to everything we say; that is the only means by which you may hope to escape a violent death."

With many protestations, Dr. Green promised to do as he was bid.

The three friends then held a hurried whispered conference, in which they finally agreed upon the parts they were each to play.

To relate this, however, is needless. What they agreed to do will be best seen by the manner in which they acted

Doctor Green was forced to seat himself in a chair opposite to the door.

Jack sat next to him with the pistol in his left hand in such a position that the doctor's body was quite covered by it.

Claude sat down near the door.

Lieutenant Thrustans, who, despite all the efforts which he made to control himself, could scarcely control his agitation.

Koolah was near his feet.

With a rare sagacity, such as is displayed by no animal but the dog, it had followed him submissively and unobtrusively into the parlour, so that the keeper beyond, noticing that something in the shape of a dog accompanied the party, thought nothing of it.

These dispositions having been made, they waited impatiently the arrival of the private madhouse keeper.

In reality, these arrangements were made very briefly indeed, and there was scarcely time for Doctor Stoffel to arrive.

About two minutes afterwards a shuffling footstep in the hall reached the attentive ears of our friends.

"Beware, Doctor Green," said Jack, in an impressive whisper.

A half-articulate groan was the reply.

Then the parlour-door opened.

A man, whose appearance tallied exactly with the description Stevens the steward gave of it, entered.

He rubbed his hands together, and made a general kind of bow to his visitors.

He said nothing, however, but waited for them to explain their presence.

Of this Jack immediately availed himself.

"Doctor Stoffel, I presume?" he said.

"Yes," was the reply, accompanied with a bow.

"I have called—or perhaps I ought more properly to say we have called, and in the 'we' I include our mutual friend here, Doctor Green."

Upon thus hearing his name mentioned the unfortunate wretch could not forbear a groan.

"Dear me, Green," said Jack, "what's the matter?"

"Oh! noth—nothing—nothing."

"But you groaned."

"A slight pain."

"Oh! I see; boot pinched you, perhaps?"

"Ye-es."

"Then, if that is all, my mind is at rest. I feared it might be something serious. Pardon me, Doctor Stoffel, but, being a particular friend of your colleague's here, I feel a little anxious about him."

Doctor Stoffel was all abroad, as the saying is. A vague suspicion that all this meant something unpleasant crossed his mind.

Jack, however, went on rapidly.

"I was about to say we have been commissioned by Mr. Stephen Murray to see and have an interview with his ward. That is correct, Green, is it not?"

"Quite correct," said Green.

"But—but"——

"Believe me, my dear sir, time is of the greatest possible importance to us, so I hope you will attend to our wishes at once."

"Who are you?"

"A particular friend of Mr. Murray's, or he would not have entrusted me with this affair. To convince you, however, that all is quite right, we have brought your friend Doctor Green with us."

"Ahem!"

"Sir?"

"You will excuse me, I am sure, but my astonishment at what you have just said is so great that I was unable to say at once that I am quite at a loss to comprehend this affair. I can assure you I know nothing of what you have just spoken about."

A look of great pleasure immediately appeared upon the face of Doctor Green.

"Oh! indeed," said Jack; "well, this is just what we expected, only we thought we would try fair means first. Claude! guard the door!"

Upon hearing these words, Mr. Stoffel turned round on his heels with great suddenness, and made a rush to get out of the room, but he only ran into Claude's arms.

"Help! murder!" he cried. "Jarvis! Jarvis! I say."

Claude Duval caught him by the throat.

The amount of compression which he used was quite sufficient to put a stop to further outcries.

Lieutenant Thrustans then, as agreed upon, in case events should take the turn they had, caught Doctor Stoffel from behind, and pulled him over on to the floor on his back.

Then, upon a word from him, Koolah sprang upon the prostrate form.

But he did him no injury.

That is to say, no bodily injury.

The fearful aspect of this creature filled the rascally madhouse-keeper's soul with such a terror as he had never hitherto known.

"Speak above a whisper, or seek to make the least alarm," said Claude, "and you are left to the mercies of the tiger-wolf, above you."

Doctor Stoffel lay perfectly still.

The frightful aspect of the animal, whose jaws were but a few inches from his throat, subdued him.

"I will do all you wish," he said, "so that you save me from this terrible creature. What are your demands?"

"You are getting reasonable now," said Jack; "but do not think to deceive us. We want Katharine Hayward. We know she is here. To deny it would be useless."

"Take away this monster, and I will obey you in all things, I swear"——

"I would not take your oath. You shall, however, be released; but the creature looks upon you as its lawful prey, and it only needs a word or a sign from its master, and it would tear you to pieces."

CHAPTER CXXVI.

KATHARINE HAYWARD IS SAVED FROM LIVING DEATH.

Doctor Stoffel shuddered visibly.

The young lieutenant spoke to the tiger-wolf.

In obedience to his words, the terrible looking animal removed its feet from the doctor's breast, but most reluctantly.

"You can rise," said Jack; "but remember, this creature has its eye upon you. If he sees you move towards the door, that movement will be the signal for him to spring upon you. Think twice, therefore, before you attempt any treachery."

"What do you want, gentlemen? What do you want? Tell me, and I will do it?"

"We require Miss Katherine Hayward, whom you hold here unlawfully under the pretext of being mad."

"I will go and bring her to you."

"I would advise you not to do so. No, Mr. Stoffel, we don't like you well enough, and we don't know you well enough to trust you so far. Call in one of your men, and in our presence tell him to bring the young lady to this apartment. Do you hesitate?"

"No—no. Oh! I am ruined—ruined!"

"Call your man."

"I will. If you ring that bell he will come to see what is wanted."

"Very good," said Jack, as he rung it. "Mind what you tell him, or you will find the flesh torn from your body!"

The door was opened in another moment.

Doctor Stoffel again hesitated, and then he managed to stammer out his orders to the man, who was the same who had permitted our friends ingress.

"Jarvis," said Doctor Stoffel, "go to No. 14, and bring her here."

Jarvis looked rather surprised at this command, but saying nothing he withdrew.

The pause that now took place was full of interest and excitement.

Rupert Thrustans drew his breath with difficulty. His whole body trembled. His heart palpitated.

He was upon the verge now of seeing her he loved with so much constancy and devotion.

Doctor Green leaned back in the chair in which he had been seated. He resigned himself to the current of events.

A quarter of an hour, which seemed to our three friends like a quarter of a day, elapsed before they heard any sound indicative of the return of the man Jarvis.

At length his heavy tread was heard: the door was opened, and he re-entered, accompanied by what the lieutenant's heart told him was his betrothed.

We say his heart, for most surely by his eyes alone never would he have recognised her.

Claude, so soon as they were fairly in the room, shut the door again, and stood with his back against it, thus preventing the possibility of escape.

The situation of the different characters in the room deserves a few minutes description.

First, then, there was Claude against the door with his drawn sword in his hand.

Then there was Jack, armed with a pistol, standing near the chair in which the doctor sat, a huddled-up mass.

The keeper of the asylum clutching nervously at the edge of the table, unable to remove his gaze from the bright eyes of the tiger-wolf, who suffered not the slightest movement to escape him.

Jarvis, too, stood just within the room, looking from one to the other in bewilderment and alarm.

Shrinking behind him—her hair in disorder—her attire scanty and torn—her face pinched—her cheeks hollow—her arms wasted—that baleful-looking light in her beautiful, but now unnaturally bright eyes, which is ever the accompaniment of insanity, stood the heiress, the victim of the villainy of the treacherous guardian and false friend, Stephen Murray.

A cry, in which was concentrated a whole world of agony, came from the lips of the young lieutenant, as his eyes rested upon the fearful spectacle.

He sprang forward though as he uttered it, and clasped the poor maniac in his arms.

"Kate! Kate!" he cried. "Can this indeed be you? Speak to me, dear one! speak! Your voice cannot have changed! Let me hear it! Speak, speak, Kate! It is Rupert who speaks to you! Your own true love, Rupert! Kate—Kate!"

It was not the words themselves, but the impassioned tone in which they were uttered, that awakened the slumbering intellect of the poor girl.

A gush of tears came to her eyes, and her head sank upon his breast.

"Saved—saved!" she said. "I am saved! Oh! Rupert, they tell me I am mad, but I am not, indeed I am not."

Doctor Stoffel clutched the table edge with a yet tighter grasp. Had he not done so, his trembling limbs would have allowed his body to reach the floor, and he had everything to dread from such a movement.

Of a truth was he suffering some portion of the torment he deserved.

The lieutenant's heart was too full to allow him to speak. He could only kiss the tears from the face of her he loved.

It was some moments before either of the spectators of the affecting interview ventured to speak, and then it was Jack, who said—

"Pardon me, lieutenant; but, if you will take my advice, you will leave this place with as little delay as possible. You see the effect which residence here has already had upon her, besides which, we may be incurring danger."

What her madness might have found a resting-place in Katharine's brain, seemed to have flown away with her tears, for now in quite a calm voice she spoke—

"Yes—yes, Rupert! Take me away—take me away! Oh! I have dreamed of this—looked forward to it! I knew you would save me from the horrors of this place."

"And I will, Kate! I will!"

"I am glad," said Jack, to the young seaman, "that matters are no worse."

"Mercy—mercy!" cried Doctor Stoffel, as, finding it impossible to hold up any longer, he sank down upon the floor.

Koolah sprang upon him with an angry growl.

Fairly, indeed, might the lieutenant have been excused if he had suffered the tiger-wolf to destroy him, but that was a thing he could not think of for a moment, and so he stayed him.

Jarvis was a strong, determined-looking man, but the odds were too much against him for resistance to be thought of, so he stood exactly in the position he had before occupied.

"Jack," cried Claude, "make haste. "But before you go, what are we to do with these three rascals here? One, I fancy, is quite as bad as the other."

"I have been thinking about that," was the reply. "I think this will do it."

As he spoke, Jack stretched out his hand, and by a sudden jerk pulled down the bell-rope.

Claude knew what he meant instantly, and hastened to assist him. First of all, however, turning the key in the lock of the door, and putting it into his pocket.

It would not then be possible for any one to leave the room in a hurry.

Duval then pulled down the other bell-rope.

By this means they found themselves in possession of about twelve feet of strong cord.

In a great measure, now, Lieutenant Thrustans had succeeded in calming the young girl. He seated her gently in a chair, and then turned to those whose assistance had been so valuable to him.

By their wishes, Koolah was withdrawn from Dr. Stoffel, and put on guard over the man Jarvis.

In fact, the two doctors were past being able to lift a hand in their own defence.

They were tied back to back.

So tightly, too, were the bonds drawn, in order to make it more impossible to get free, that they fairly howled from the pain.

But no one could pity them for enduring that much anguish.

"We must find some means of stopping their noise," said Claude. "Stop a bit; perhaps I shall be able to find a couple of wine corks."

"They will do capitally. Try the sideboard yonder."

Claude did so, and in it he found several bottles of what appeared to be wine.

From two of those he extracted the corks.

Despite their opposition they were forced lengthwise into the two doctors' mouths.

They were about as effective gags as could well be imagined.

Their noise was stopped at once.

The question now arose as to what was to be done with Jarvis.

Jack found, however, some cord, which served to loop up the heavy curtains which hung before the windows.

There was not much of it, but still sufficient to bind the man's hands and ancles together.

Another cork was found, and thrust into his mouth.

Having so far disposed of the three villains, our friends between them lifted them up on to the table.

There, if they attempted to move about much, they would be sure to have a fall.

This was all done with inconceivable rapidity.

Poor Kate remained just where she had been placed, but the extraordinary nature of the events taking place around did not tend to decrease her agitation.

When, however, her lover came to her again, and, supporting her with his arm, led her out into the open air, a great change took place.

She was as rational as either of them, but a deathly weakness came over her, and it was only by lifting her in his arms that he prevented her from falling.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING TAKES PLACE.

So light a burden as Katharine now was was nothing to the lieutenant, and he hasteued down the gravel path, leading towards the gates, along which Jack and Claude had hurriedly preceded him, in order to afford him an opportunity of saying a few words to his mistress.

"Help! help!" he cried. "Help! She is dying. Help! help!"

Our friends turned round the moment these cries reached their ears, and then they saw the lieutenant running towards them with Katharine in his arms.

"It is only the effect of the night air after having been confined so long. It will be nothing. Follow us through the gates, and we will make our way towards some place where she can receive proper attention. Believe me when I say that all will yet be well."

These words, uttered as they were in a tone expressive of conviction, had their full effect upon the lieutenant, and, kissing again and again the face of his recovered treasure, he stepped through the little door in the gates into the lane.

Probably five minutes elapsed before Claude and Jack could get the horses ready for service.

Then they mounted.

Lieutenant Thrustans seated his almost inanimate burden upon the saddle before him, holding her tightly to his breast, by means of his right arm.

At a gentle canter they went along the umbrageous lane, they deeming that to be the pace which would be easiest for Katharine.

The young seaman spoke.

His voice was husky with an emotion which did honour to his heart.

"My friends," he said, "for though our acquaintance has been so short, and was so singularly brought about, yet such you have proved yourselves to be, no words or acts could possibly express the extent of my obligation to you. I am indebted to you for my life, and that, without which, I should not care to live. Had it not been for the assistance you have rendered me—the almost preterhuman power you have displayed in unravelling the thread of this most intricate affair, I should never have succeeded as we have."

There was a sensation of pleasure in the hearts of the two highwaymen as these words fell upon their ears. They had the innate consciousness that they were deserved, on this occasion, at least.

"You speak too highly of us," said Claude, "though I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that we have been the means of doing you a service. It has been done with the utmost willingness, has entailed upon us no inconvenience, and if you will believe us, we are rejoiced at the chance we have had of doing good."

"But I must yet further trouble you—still further increase the amount of obligation which I owe you. I am quite in ignorance of this part of the country, so I must get you to direct me to the nearest place where I can find shelter for her."

"It was our intention," replied Jack, "if you would have allowed it, to have taken you to an inn kept by a friend of mine in times gone by. You can trust him. It is, too, not far from here."

"I would not, could not have ventured to ask you to do this, but now you have proposed it it is equally impossible for me to refuse. Lead me there, I beg, and make me still more your debtor."

"I do not wish you to look upon it in that light," said Jack, "and you only embarrass me by doing so. I would rather you took it as a matter of course."

"But I cannot do that. It would be both unfair and unjust."

"Let us, then, say no more about it. Do not, however, think us churlish or ungrateful."

"I can never do that."

"Come on, then. The inn I speak of is not very far from here, and we shall not be long reaching it."

"I am glad of that. Kate—Kate, dearest. Look up. You are saved!"

Poor Katharine Hayward made no reply in words, but by the way in which she clung to him, Rupert knew that she fully comprehended what he said to her.

They emerged in a few more seconds into the high-road.

As they did so, Jack and Claude heard the faint beat of a horse's hoofs.

The former spoke in a whisper to his comrade.

"Claude," he said, "some one comes."

"I hear him."

"I cannot tell any more than you can what emergencies may arise. We have no money."

"Only those coppers."

"Curse the coppers!"

"So say I."

"We have no money. That is a state of things which I can never tolerate. Make some excuse to the lieutenant here for my absence, and I will gallop down the road, and see what traveller it is."

"Agreed."

"There is but one man, so the risk will not be very great."

"Oh! no."

"Very well. The sound seems to grow fainter and fainter. He must be going towards town. Perhaps if I stay longer I shall not be able to overtake him."

"Be off at once, I will make an excuse to the lieutenant."

"All right. Slacken your speed a little, and I will soon be up with you again."

While this brief dialogue took place, our friends had dropped slightly in the rear.

Relying upon Claude's promise to invent an excuse to the young officer, Jack turned his horse's head, and proceeded at a terrific gallop along the road in the direction of London.

The faint tramp of the horse's hoofs had become quite inaudible when he started, but he soon heard it again.

Presently he came in sight of the horseman, and he reined his horse in to a trot.

All around was made distinctly visible by the moon's rays, and, about a quarter of a mile ahead, he saw a mounted man.

Had such a thing been probable, Jack would have said that the horse he saw was in the last stage of intoxication, for he reeled about in the road in a most extraordinary manner.

Jack became more cautious, but, as he drew yet nearer, he saw that the man on the horse performed in his way quite as curious evolutions.

Our friend hardly knew what to make of so strange a sight. If he wished to learn more, though, the only means by which he could do so would be to ride forward and see.

From what the reader knows of Sixteen-String Jack, he may easily suppose this was just what he did do.

A dozen bounds and he was alongside.

Before he had time to speak, the man on the horse jerked out rather than said—

"In the king's name! Help! I say, I call upon you in the king's name for help! But the reward is mine, recollect. I've found him! I, Aaron Coxhead! Me! I've found him, the reward is mine."

"Found who?" asked Jack, stretching forth his hand and catching the strange horse by the bridle. "Found who?"

The man on horseback held up his hand.

"Do you see that, sir?" he asked. "It's a constable's staff. I call upon you for assistance in the king's name. I am Aaron Coxhead, constable of the parish of Hornsey. I have found Dick Turpin, the highwayman. A thousand pounds reward! He is at the 'Hand and Keys.'"

Jack comprehended all instantly.

The name of Dick Turpin was familiar enough to him.

He was in danger. This fellow evidently, by some means, had learned of his presence in the house of Tom Davis, and had, although quite ignorant of the art of equitation, ventured upon horseback to ride to London for assistance.

Jack shifted his hold from the horse's bridle to the constable's collar.

"Harkye!" he said, "it's all over with you. I am a friend of Dick Turpin's, and sworn foe to all constables and police-officers.

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Not a bit of it. I have no mercy for such as you. There you go!"

Jack fairly dragged him from his horse.

The animal, glad to get rid of so troublesome a rider, galloped back towards Hornsey at full speed.

Now Jack had noticed he had passed over a bridge beneath which flowed a sluggish stream.

Still holding the constable by the collar, much in the same manner as he did Doctor Green, he made his way to this place, and then dropped him over the parapet.

The water was only a few feet off, and he reached it with a tremendous splash.

"That's done," said Jack, "but there's no money. Never mind, I have done Dick a service. At the 'Hand and Keys,' is he?"

He made all speed to regain his companions.

"No luck," he said to Claude, and that was all, for just at that moment they came in sight of a house, from which gleamed a light.

"There is the place," said Jack. How lucky to find them up. Come on."

They rode towards the inn door as he spoke.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

RETURNS TO OUR OLD FRIENDS DICK TURPIN AND TOM DAVIS.

THE many complex and extraordinary incidents which ensued after the hearing of the mysterious sounds in the lane by Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, have followed so thickly and closely upon one another, that no opportunity for breaking off the narration has occurred, and therefore we have been unwillingly compelled to lose sight of the doings of the two chief characters in our story.

We mean, of course, Dick Turpin and Tom King.

The former, it will be recollected, was last seen carefully loading his pistols after the imperious summons for admission to the inn.

That it could be visitors at that late hour was considered quite out of the question, and therefore they reasonably enough came to the conclusion that they were Turpin's foes.

Tom Davis did not know what to do. Dick instructed him.

"Open the door," he said.

"Open the door? but suppose they are police?"

"I do suppose it, and consider it the best mode of action."

Tom Davis shook his head, and Ellen, seizing Turpin by the arm, cried—

"No, no, not that; it would be too—too dangerous."

Again came the knocking at the door.

"Open it, Tom," said Dick again, "if they are officers you may depend they have surrounded the house, and made it impossible for me to leave it. Open it, open it."

Thus commanded, and having better faith in Dick's judgment than his own, he went to the front door, and opened it.

"Hullo," said a voice, "is that you, Tom Davis? What an infernal while you have been. Are you grown deaf?"

These words at once let Dick know he had nothing to fear. The tones were certainly not those of a police officer.

Tom Davis opened his mouth and shut it again with an effort.

"God bless me!" he said; "I knows that voice, though I haven't heard it lately. Is it really you, Jack?"

"It is Tom."

"Dick," said Davis, "Dick?"

"What is it?"

"Why, there's actually Sixteen-String Jack outside the door."

A cry of astonishment came from Turpin's lips, which was echoed by some one from outside.

It will be seen from this that the inn Jack had spoken was the "Hand and Keys."

The cry of astonishment which echoed Turpin's came from the lips of Lieutenant Thrustans, who was thus suddenly and unexpectedly made aware of the true character of the man to whom he was so deeply indebted.

They had all alighted ere the door was opened. Sixteen-String Jack, and the lieutenant and his burden, entered.

Claude stayed behind to follow Jabez to the stable with the horses, for that worthy had also been aroused by the furious knocking.

Tom Davis hurried them into the room he had just left.

"Your surprise will keep," said Jack, in a low voice to Thrustans. "Katharine now requires all your care. When she is safe, I will explain."

A few moments served to put Ellen and Davis in possession of the principal facts.

Their sympathies were enlisted at once.

Rupert carried Kate upstairs, and laid her gently upon a bed. This done, he left her to Ellen's care.

On re-entering the parlour, he found that he who had been introduced to him as Mr. Engleheart had come in, and that all were talking rapidly and earnestly together.

The meeting between the three highwaymen had been a cordial one. Tom Davis, too, was quite as much pleased as any of them.

Jack had just finished relating the story of the constable when Thrustans entered.

Then, of course, the conversation dropped.

Claude and Jack took the young seaman on one side.

"Accident," said the latter, "has made you aware of who we really are. If you will think a moment, you will pardon and understand our motives for not giving you our real names."

Thrustans bowed.

"You have expressed yourself pleased with what you already know of us?"

"Could I be otherwise?"

"That knowledge then proceeds from actual observation; be good enough to remember that you can only have known the rest from hearsay."

The frank-hearted sailor felt this gentle rebuke, and he took the highwaymen's hands in his, as he said—

"I have been unjust. As you say, I ought to have judged you by your actions."

"That is sufficient, and now henceforth we shall be strangers. Do not say a word against it. You will excuse me for speaking plainly, and saying that your friendship, or, at any rate, an outward demonstration of it, can never do us any good, while, on the other hand, it cannot fail to do you harm."

"Never mind," said Thrustans, "I bitterly regret that I should have behaved as I did; but, hang it! I detest sailing under false colours. But you have proved yourselves true friends to me, and, sink me, if I desert you."

The two highwaymen could not fail to be pleased with the manly behaviour of the young sailor, but they were firm in their wish that he should forget them.

He was not, however, to be persuaded.

Ellen had sent Jabez off for a surgeon.

Two things induced Thrustans to quit the apartments.

One was his anxiety respecting Katharine's condition.

The other, the very evident fact that the three highwaymen wished to speak upon matters of their own.

Under the pretence, therefore, of retiring for the night, he withdrew, accompanied by the landlord.

Dick Turpin, Sixteen-String Jack, and Claude Duval were quickly at home with each other.

Davis had taken care to put before them plenty in the shape of refreshment.

As might be anticipated, the conversation turned upon Tom King's imprisonment. It will be remembered Claude and Jack were already acquainted with the fact, having overheard the parsons in the lane speaking about it.

"I will free him," said Dick. "I have sworn it, and I will do it. I care not for obstacles. If I have to pull old Newgate down, stone by stone, he shall be free."

"Well spoken," said Jack, "and if we can aid you in any way command us. Tom was a good comrade of ours, and has done us many a service. It is now our time to do him one in return, and I am glad of it."

"What is your plan?" asked Claude, in his usual quiet way.

"I have none arranged. To tell the truth, that was the very topic that occupied mine and Tom Davis's attention at the moment you arrived."

"It is high time something was agreed upon. Let us see, to-day is Saturday."

"Nearer Sunday," replied Turpin; "it is past twelve."

"And when do the sessions commence?"

"On Wednesday."

"You have not much time for action, then."

"No! That is true."

"However, there is time enough to accomplish a great deal."

Dick then proceeded to relate to his two new friends all those multifarious adventures which followed the capture of Tom King by the dragoons, up to the conversation he had just had with Davis, and with which the reader has already been made acquainted.

To all did they listen with the most profound attention. Not a single circumstance, however minute, was allowed to pass without being fully canvassed.

"And you have seen nothing of him since he had the files?"

"No, nor have I heard anything," replied Dick. "Davis was to go to-morrow."

"[illegible] let him do so. Until we receive his report we can do nothing definite. Our best plan will be to wait."

"I think so too."

"Who knows?" said Jack. "Tom King is a brave fellow."

"He is. Few braver."

"Very well. He has tools. Who knows, I say, whether he is or is not at this present moment in the act of achieving his escape?"

"It is possible."

"It is more than possible, it is probable. Others before his time have broken out of the old stone-ing without half such tools, and why should not he?"

CHAPTER CXXIX.

TAKES A PEEP AT TOM KING IN NEWGATE.

We think we may safely say that there is not one of our readers who does not feel equally anxious with Jack and Claude and Dick, to know whether Tom King really had been able to avail himself of the tools which had been brought to him in so ingenious a manner, under the belief that they would be instrumental in achieving his release.

It is so long since we saw anything of him that it will be necessary to recollect under what circumstances it was that we really did see him.

It was on the occasion of Dick's temerarious visit in the disguise of a farmer.

As soon, then, as the door closed, Tom sprang to his feet, and sought eagerly in the piece of pie-crust, which he had slipped on to the bed so slyly, for the files which Turpin told him were secreted there.

His heart gave quite a sudden bound when he felt in his fingers the thin pieces of spring steel of which the saws were composed.

He did not just then venture to particularly examine them, for fear some one should open the door suddenly, and surprise him.

He looked about him for some place where he might conceal them.

Now Tom was a firm believer in that philosophy which says, "if you want to hide anything securely put it into some conspicuous place," and so he proceeded to act in accordance with it.

His eye rested in a moment upon the grated aperture which admitted the light into the cell, and there he made up his mind to hide them.

"The very thing," he said. "I will just lay them on the stonework, and if they search all the dungeon over, ten to one if they think of looking there."

By standing upon the bed he could not reach the window with the tips of his fingers. However, that was sufficient, and he slipped them on.

Scarcely, however, had he done this, than he heard the sound of voices and footsteps in the corridor without.

He jumped quickly yet silently, off the bed, and flung himself at full length upon it.

Then the door was opened.

Four persons, looking very hot, and very much excited, rushed tumultuously into the cell.

The first was the governor.

The second the chaplain.

The third Winch.

The fourth one of Townshend's men.

Mr. Tapner evidently expected to find something extraordinary, and upon seeing Tom lying down on the bed as if nothing at all was the matter, a look of deep disappointment and vexation appeared upon his face.

King raised himself upon his elbow, and then stood up on his feet.

His surprise was in part real, in part affected.

The dread was at his heart that his comrade had paid dearly for his rashness.

At any rate he could see something had occurred to rouse their suspicions and disturb their equanimity.

He did not trust himself to speak, but waited for his visitors to commence the conversation.

It will be recollected that Mr. Tapner had a bit of a grudge against him, and this animus was shared in by the chaplain.

"Villain!" roared the governor, "infamous villain, what is the meaning of this?"

"It strikes me," replied Tom, "that I ought to ask you that question."

"You ask me? What do you mean? But I'll be even with you. I'll let you know you don't make an enemy of the governor for nothing. You shall suffer for it."

"Suffer for what?" asked a voice; and then, to the great confusion of Mr. Tapner, and equal delight of Tom King, who should walk in but Mr. Sheriff Blandy.

The curses that rose from the heart of the governor to his lips were of the most frightful nature imaginable, but he had sufficient prudence to control the impulse to utter them.

"Suffer for what, Mr. Tapner?" asked the sheriff again, as he walked with a mincing step into the cell. "Suffer for what, did you say?"

We should not be overshooting the mark, we feel sure, if we said that the greatest pleasure of Mr. Blandy's life consisted in teasing the governor. He enjoyed it amazingly.

"Suffer for his crimes, of course," replied Mr. Tapner, recovering a little from his confusion. "And that's what he deserves."

"Oh! indeed. I see. You all seem rather violent."

"Matter! there's enough the matter. Dick Turpin has been here, in this very cell, and had an interview with the prisoner yonder."

Mr. Blandy looked at the speaker incredulous.

"Nonsense!" he said.

"Do you call me a liar, Mr. Blandy?"

"Certainly I do not do so, and yet I might without departing from the truth so much as you do."

"What do you mean, sir?"

"Only this. If you have suffered Dick Turpin to come into Newgate, and then allowed him to go out again, all I can say is you cannot have much pretensions to being the governor of a prison."

"But how did I know it?"

"My dear sir."

"Oh! d——n your dear sir. I said, how did I know it?"

"You told me."

"I told you? What do you mean? I said how did I know Dick Turpin had come into Newgate."

"You told me he had done so, and that is all I know about it."

The governor fairly danced with rage.

"You must calm yourself, Mr. Tapner."

"Allow me, if you please," said the chaplain, stepping forward; "but first I must say that Mr. Tapner has had quite enough to aggravate one of the holy saints."

"H—m! I should not wonder."

"A person dressed as a farmer, and representing himself to be the father of this unrepentant young man, who is, I grieve to say, deeply hardened in iniquity, sought entrance to the prison, and had an interview. Oh! the hypocrisy and guilt of which some people will be guilty. That farmer, Mr. Blandy, was the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin!"

This was the first account the sheriff had had of the affair, and he was naturally amazed.

"We had our suspicions, but in the most daring manner this man of wickedness escaped."

"And what was his object?" asked Mr. Tapner, who thought, perhaps, asking questions was as satisfactory as answering them; "I ask again, what was his motive for coming here?"

"To see his friend, of course," said Tom.

"And give him tools," cried Mr. Tapner; "that's it, search the place, Winch, and you, What's-your-name.

The two officers set about ransacking the place from top to bottom. It was not very large, nor were there many articles in it, so that the search did not occupy a very great deal of time.

Tom was of course overjoyed to hear that Dick had escaped, and he resigned himself with tolerable patience to the result.

The bed and bedstead—although they scarcely deserved the name—were pulled to pieces and thoroughly examined, but of course nothing was found.

Then, having in fine searched every portion of the cell itself, with the exception of the place in which they were hidden, they commenced to search Tom's person.

They would have done this at first if they had had any

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS STOP THE TRAVELLER ON THE NORTH ROAD.]

...e the files were concealed about him, but now they resorted to it as a kind of forlorn hope.

Tom submitted to the search willingly enough.

They could not, of course, be positive that Tom had received any tools, and Winch, for his own credit's sake, swore stoutly that the thing was impossible, for not only had he searched the seeming farmer before he entered the cell, but was present during the whole of the interview, and they could not have been passed from one to another without his knowledge.

This of course was not true, but Winch was not afraid to say it was. The only person who was in a position to contradict it was Tom King, and it was not very likely he would do so.

"Well, we're baffled, it seems," said the governor, when the men had thoroughly satisfied themselves that Tom had the files nowhere concealed about him. "We're baffled, but we will make sure—of course with your permission, Mr. Sheriff Blandy." Here Mr. Tapner made a low bow of much respect, and turning to Tom, addressed himself to him: "We know you have no tools about you, but we are not quite so sure that there are not some cunningly hidden in the cell; and as a measure of precaution—ha! ha!—we'll remove you to another cell."

"I protest against this!" cried Tom King; "I protest against it. Mr. Sheriff, I appeal to you. It is to your interference that I owe my present comfort, and now he seizes upon this pretext to deprive me of it. Oh! it is monstrous, and I hope, Mr. Blandy, that you will not allow him to set your authority at naught."

"He! he!" gasped the governor, in an hysterical tone of voice; "That touches him. I declare my conviction that the prisoner has tools secreted somewhere in this cell, and I declare it my duty to remove him to some other place, as a precautionary measure. He! he! Oppose me at your peril, Mr. Blandy!"

"I do not for a moment dream of doing any such thing, Mr. Tapner, and you know it. Having such an impression on your mind, you are unquestionably right in ordering the prisoner to be removed; and it will be my duty to see you, should circumstances make it necessary for me to do so."

Mr. Tapner was terribly disappointed when he heard this speech. He cherished the hope that the pragmatic sheriff would oppose him, and then he would have something like ground to stand upon against him.

He was at a loss what to say, and Mr. Blandy, who, in his way, was a very good sort of fellow, and unquestionably the means of preventing a great deal of ill usage from being visited upon the prisoners, continued—

"Give your orders, Mr. Tapner. You have my full sanction, sir; but I shall make it my business to see that when you change his cell you put him into one which is fit for a fellow-creature to remain in."

"Oh! very good. Of course, Mr. Sheriff, you are the governor of the prison, and I am a fool!"

"You are right there, if you are not in the first part of your sentence."

"Sir?"

"Oh! don't fume. You called yourself a fool—I didn't; bear that in mind."

Mr. Tapner saw he had got the worst of it, so, turning his back contemptuously upon his tormentor, he said—

"Winch, bring the rascal this way! Bring him along, and keep a sharp eye upon him. He may think to escape, but he won't, no matter how much certain persons may connive at such a thing!"

CHAPTER CXXX.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE TAKES MOST EFFECTIVE STEPS TO PREVENT TOM KING'S ESCAPE.

MR. TAPNER placed a most withering emphasis upon the words certain persons, and turned upon the sheriff a glance which he intended should speak volumes.

But that gentleman, conscious how baseless the insinuation was, disdained to take the slightest notice of it, which mortified Mr. Tapner more than words could have done.

Despite his rather ticklish situation, Tom King could not fail to be diverted with the little scene that was enacted before him.

His vexation that he should thus be deprived of the means of escape was great in the extreme, but he could not help himself, nor was he clever enough to invent some plan by which he could defeat the intentions of the governor.

Yet it is more than probable that he would have hit upon some scheme if he had been able to concentrate his ideas, but the interest and enjoyment he felt in what was going forward prevented his doing so.

There was nothing for him to do but submit to being placed in some other dungeon. Resistance he knew would only have furnished an excuse to the governor for his ill-treatment, without his obtaining the least advantage as compensation for it.

Winch took hold of him by one arm, and Townshend's man by another, and led him into the passage.

Mr. Blandy preceded them, and Mr. Tapner and the chaplain brought up the rear.

"Where shall I put him, sir?" asked Winch.

But for the presence of the sheriff, the governor would have replied, "the darkest and dampest dungeon in all Newgate." As it was, he gave orders for him to be placed in a similar cell to the one he had occupied, which was situated on the opposite side of the passage.

The door was flung open by Winch, and the whole party entered.

Tom looked keenly about him, in order to find, if he could, some ground for complaint; but he could not. It was quite as comfortable as the one he had left.

Mr. Blandy, too, looked round the place; observing which, the governor sneeringly inquired whether he was satisfied with the accommodation.

That was the only bit of revenge he could treat himself with, and, paltry as it was, Mr. Tapner chuckled over it.

But Tom stepped forward, and what he said rather turned the tables.

"Mr. Blandy," said Tom, addressing that gentleman, "until I became an inmate of this prison we were perfect strangers. To my knowledge, we had never seen each other before, and yet you, at the expense of a great deal of personal abuse, have been kind enough to take my part, and as I firmly believe, save me from a great deal of ill treatment. For all this I can only tender you my very best and most sincere thanks; and as I can offer you nothing further, I beg you will accept them, prompted as they are by the feeling of deep gratitude which I experience for what you have been pleased to consider it your duty to do in my behalf."

This was a speech for which no one there present was exactly prepared, and certainly none less so than the sheriff himself, who, in the confusion of the moment, managed to stammer out some words of acknowledgment to Tom.

Then Tom bowed, and retired to the most distant corner of the cell.

"Really," said the Sheriff, "there must be some mistake; the fellow is a perfect gentleman!"

"Oh! its very fine—very fine indeed!" said Mr. Tapner, shrugging his shoulders. "Its quite affecting to hear you. However, I'm going. Perhaps you would like to stay with the prisoner, Mr. B.?"

"No," said the Sheriff; "I shall at once proceed to the Secretary of State, and lay before him a full account of what I have witnessed here at various times, and ask him candidly whether he considers you to be a proper person to be left in charge of a prison."

"Ha! ha!" said Mr. Tapner. "Ha! ha! come along Winch."

But though he strove to laugh it off, he did not at all succeed in doing so, and it required very little discernment to perceive that it made him very ill at ease.

As for Tom, to tell the truth he was not a little pleased when they all departed and left him to the solitude of his dungeon.

He listened to the dull echo of their footsteps along the corridor until he heard a door closed.

Then all was silent—so silent, that one would scarcely credit Newgate was in the heart of the huge, bustling City of London.

Evening was coming on.

The light that straggled through the grated, unglazed window of the cell grew duller and duller every moment.

Folding his arms across his breast, Tom paced up and down his cell.

At every step he took his fetters clanked dismally against each other.

They had, too, the effect of making walking a difficult and tiring exercise, but Tom King's mind was too restless to allow him to sit still.

In that silent place the sound even of his own voice was cheerful to him, and so he spoke his thoughts aloud.

"Confusion light on the officious governor," he said, "but for him, I should now be making use of those tools my friend ran such a fearful risk to convey to me. Thank heaven, though, he has not paid the penalty due to his rashness. He has escaped, or I should long ere this have heard of his recapture."

There was some consolation in this thought, and Tom grew calmer.

"Its no good grieving over shed milk," he said. "I must bid good-bye to the files, and be on the alert to take advantage of any little circumstance that may arise. I shall not despair yet."

As he uttered these words, the last ray of light faded from the dungeon, leaving him in profound darkness.

He made his way to the rude pallet which was to serve for his bed, and stretched himself at full length upon it.

"To-day," he said, after a brief interval of silence, "or rather to-night, is Saturday. To-morrow will be Sunday. The sessions I suppose will begin on Wednesday, as usual. I wonder whether I shall be put upon my trial, or whether Dick will, between now and then, put me in the way of making my escape. But why should I not make the attempt, and rely entirely upon my own exertions? I will do it!"

But scarcely had he come to this conclusion, and before he had time to rise from his recumbent position, than he heard the door at the end of the corridor unlocked.

It might be the turnkeys about to visit some of the other prisoners.

He waited, and listened.

But such did not prove to be the case. The footsteps paused upon the threshold of his own dungeon.

"Confound it," he cried. "Can it be that rascally governor come to torment me? If so"——

The opening of the door put a stop to his speech.

There was the governor, sure enough, and Winch as well.

Behind them were two other men.

"Oh! there you are, prisoner," said Mr. Tapner, as the light of the lantern Winch carried showed him Tom King lying calmly on the bed, "there you are, and there I'll take care you stop. You've got the idea into your head that you will be able to make your escape. But, ha! ha! I'll try if I can't be one too many for you, my fine fellow. Ha! ha!"

"If it affords you pleasure to annoy me," said Tom King, raising himself upon one arm, "I have no resource but to submit. Let me warn you, however, to be careful, for I shall make Mr. Blandy acquainted with your proceedings."

"D——n Mr. Blandy, and you and all!" cried the governor, his rage getting the better of him, "D——n Mr. Blandy, and all the world!"

Tom laughed at Mr. Tapner's impotent passion.

"Very good," he said, "Curse who you like, I don't suppose it will make much difference."

By a great effort the governor controlled his temper.

"Harkye!" he said, "you have yet to find what are the consequences of making the governor of Newgate your enemy."

"I don't value you a rush, nor your enmity either."

"Well, we shall see. You think of making your escape, but you won't find it a very easy matter, I can tell you. I'm not going to put you in a stronger cell, nor put more jewellery on your person, but I shall just leave you where you are."

"Thank you for nothing," said Tom. "I suppose that's because you can't put me anywhere else."

The governor's choler began to rise again, but he managed in a strange fashion to turn it into a laugh.

But such a laugh!

"You stay where you are, but not alone. Ha! ha! do you hear? Not alone! ha! ha! Wilson and Biggs will share the cell with you. What do you think of that? Ha! ha!"

CHAPTER CXXXI.

TOM KING MAKES RATHER A STARTLING PROPOSITION TO MR. WILSON AND MR. BIGGS.

SETTING aside the offensive manner in which this announcement was made, it was about as disagreeable a thing as could well come to Tom's ears.

All hope of making even the slightest attempt to escape vanished in a moment.

It is not a part of our plan to withhold from any one that which is their due, and therefore we cannot refrain from complimenting Mr. Tapner for hitting upon this means of making sure his prisoner should not slip through his fingers.

The two men, who had been named respectively Biggs and Wilson, upon being called by the governor, at once entered the cell.

They each carried with them a small three-legged stool to sit upon.

Satisfaction beamed from the countenance of Mr. Tapner as he rubbed his hands briskly together.

"That's a stopper for you, I know. Ha! ha! You carried on pretty well, but you see I don't intend for you to have all your own way. Oh! dear no! quite the reverse."

"If you think to aggravate me into assaulting you you are very much mistaken. I am not going to commit myself in any such way. As for your petty malice, I treat it with that contempt it so well deserves."

"Assault me! Look to your weapons, my men. He's a desperate character, and there is no knowing what he may not attempt to do. All you have got to do, however, is to see that he does not escape, and defend yourselves if necessary."

"All right, sir, said Biggs; "leave him to us; we'll take care on him!"

"Do so, and you'll find it won't be the worst night's work you ever did. I would sooner have my right hand chopped off than he should escape!"

"Don't you be afeard of that, sir. When you're gone I'll put my stool agin the door, and lean my back against it. Then Jim, he'll look arter the cove as well."

"That will do. Ha! ha! Let Mr. Blandy say anything against that, if he can! I only hope he will Ha! ha! How do you like it, you villain?"

Tom King resolutely closed his lips, and turned over on his bed, so that his face was towards the wall. No provocation, he determined, should make him assault Mr. Tapner, which was evidently what that individual wished him to do.

Mr. Tapner waited a moment or two, and then finding Tom still preserved silence, he waved his hand to Winch, and stalked from the cell.

According to his expressed intention, Mr. Biggs, so soon as the door was closed, put his stool against it and sat down.

Wilson took up his position near the foot of the prisoner's bed.

Both then drew from their coat pockets a brace of double-barrelled pistols, and carefully assured themselves that the charges were in proper order, and the weapons ready for immediate service.

They had also provided themselves with a piece of lighted candle, which they stuck against a projection of the wall.

It shed a dubious twilight over the cell.

Some minutes passed in silence, Tom still maintaining the same position.

Messrs. Biggs and Wilson had lighted their pipes, and were smoking away at a great rate.

It was not possible, however, for them to long continue silent. They had nothing whatever to occupy their minds.

"I say, Biggs," said Wilson.

"Yes, mate."

"I takes it as being very hard lines we should be put upon such duty as this 'ere without bein' allowed summut to drink."

"So do I; but its just like 'em! I wonder they don't deprive us of our blessed bakker!"

"I couldn't nohow stand that. Its right awful to think on! I often wonders what a poor fellow would do without his pipe."

A pause ensued, during which it might be inferred that the two worthies were speculating upon the knotty point mentioned.

Tom moved.

The men were on the alert instantly.

"My friends," said Tom, who raised himself slowly up and sat on the edge of the bed, "it seems we are going to pass the night together?"

"I rather s'poses we is!"

"Then there's no reason why we shouldn't come to an understanding and pass the time pleasantly, is there?" said Tom.

"Not as I knows on," said Wilson; "what do you say, Biggs?"

"Not if the gentleman's agreeable."

"Very well, then," said Tom, "that's settled, for if I had not been agreeable, I should not have asked you. But do you really mean to say they don't allow you anything to drink?"

"Not a blessed drop!" said Biggs.

"Not a blessed drop!" repeated Wilson, with additional emphasis.

"Then I don't envy you your job," said King.

"I dare say not; but then you see juty is juty."

"But not pleasure."

"You're right enough there!"

"Well, now, look here," said Tom, "just listen to me a moment; I've got something particular I want to say to you."

"Go on then, we is all attention; ain't we, Jim?"

"We is."

"Then come a little nearer."

"Why? No one can't overhear us."

"I don't know that; but I want to make sure. Come close here, and then I shall not have to speak so loud as you."

"No tricks?"

"No!"

"Honour bright?"

"Honour bright!" said Tom, emphatically.

"Very well, then, what have you got to say?"

As they asked this question, the two men, rather dubiously be it said, neared the bed.

"Sit down," said Tom. "You can sit on one side, and you on the other. You will be able to keep me as safe then as now."

The two jailers were full of curiosity to know what Tom had to say, so they sat down; besides which they thought it would be their best policy to humour their prisoner as much as possible, and so make matters as pleasant as they could.

To tell the truth, too, they felt rather flattered at Tom's condescension; for in those days a high tobyman, as highwaymen were called, were something more than ordinary mortals.

But from what the reader knows of Tom King, he feels sure that he is doing all this with some ultimate object in view.

What it was will be very quickly seen.

"As I said," he began, "yours is a very disagreable job, now what do you get for it?"

"Eh?"

"I mean how much are you paid?"

"Do you mean extra?"

"Yes."

"Not a blessed mag!"

"What? is it possible that this night duty goes in along with your ordinary work?"

"There's not no mistake about it."

"And they won't let you have anything to drink?"

"Not a spot."

"Then all I can say is, its scandalous. The idea of putting you on dangerous duty like this, and giving you nothing extra for it, is out of the bounds of all reason."

"Old Tapner ain't a giving sort," said Biggs.

"But," said Wilson, "you didn't ask us to come and sit close to you to ask us such a question as that."

"No, I didn't."

"What was it then?

"You shall hear, only I was obliged to introduce my subject, you know."

"Oh, in course."

"Very well then. Now, I hope you will pay the most particular attention to what I am going to say."

"Oh, go on," said Wilson, "don't keep us in suspense."

"I loses all patience," said Biggs.

"But the question I am going to ask you is a very important one."

"Let's hear it then."

"If you get nothing for keeping me a prisoner here, beyond your regulars, how much should you say would make it worth your while to let me free, or put me in the way of making my escape? Don't be afraid to speak, I can afford a good price."

CHAPTER CXXXII.

THE TWO MEN ON GUARD ARE DAZZLED BY THE OFFERS OF THE PRISONER.

Biggs looked at Wilson.

Wilson looked at Biggs.

"Don't decide hastily," said Tom. "Take your time to consider. I'm in no hurry. What do you say?"

Biggs slowly shook his head.

So did Wilson.

"Surely," cried Tom, with affected astonishment, "you don't mean to say you decline."

"We does," said the two jailers, with a sigh.

"Oh! stuff. Name your price."

"It won't do," said Biggs.

"Not but what its hard to see the chance of money go by you, but it won't do."

"Not by no means. You've tried that dodge on afore, Mr. King."

"Eh?"

"I say you've tried that dodge on afore. Do you recollect Jacks and Bishop?"

Tom did recollect them.

They were the men he had tempted to release him, by promising them a hundred pounds apiece for their trouble.

"In course he recollects them. We knows all about that, and how you told 'em a lot of lies about two hundred and fifty pounds being hidden in the sewer. But we old birds ain't caught with chaff."

"But look here," said Tom.

"Save your breath. Jacks and Bishop looked like a couple of fools, as they was, and what is the result?"

"Why, they are lagged," said Wilson, replying to his companion's question, "and will be put on their trial this very sessions."

Tom was rather nonplussed, but he recovered himself and returned to the charge in a moment.

Although there was little prospect of success, yet it was the only thing he had that looked at all like a chance, and so he was bound to try his best with it.

Curbing his impatience, he went on—

"You have not heard the rights of the story," he said.

"That is what they told you. If they had not been treacherous they would have received the money all fair and square. What they wanted to do, however, was to get hold of the two hundred and fifty pounds and take me back just the same."

"Is that a fact?"

"Of course it is!"

"Well, then, all I can say, it serves them right. Don't you, Biggs?"

"I does."

"Treachery never fails to meet with its due reward. Now, my friends, if you will listen to me, I will tell you the truth, without any lies, and if you like to say yes to my proposal, why, well and good."

"Shall we hear it, Biggs?" asked Wilson, as usual, of his companion.

"I think so."

"It can't do no harm, can it? 'Cos you see we isn't bound to accept it."

"Certingly not, Jim."

"Then, Mr. Tom King, we'll just listen to what you've got to say, if you'll only act on the square."

"You must do so too."

"We shall be sure to do that, provided you don't try on no tricks."

"And I shan't be foolish enough to tamper with my safety for the sake of doing so, I can tell you!"

"Well, what are you going to say?"

"I'll tell you without any bother."

The two men got closer to Tom, being full of impatience to know what he was going to say, for they could tell from his manner that it was something serious, and important at the same time.

"I am going to tell you something that I intended to keep always locked in my own breast. In the first place, you must know, then, that I was going through a wood some distance from London. It was night, and very dark."

"And who was your companion?" asked Wilson.

"Well, it won't matter if I tell you, the fact is, it was Dick Turpin."

"I thought so!"

"But that doesn't matter to my story. I say we were going through a wood at night, when, all of a sudden, we saw a light appear before us in the darkness."

"A light?"

"Yes; strange as it may seem, we saw a light, but that was not all, this light kept moving about in a most extraordinary manner. Sometimes we saw it, and sometimes we didn't, till at last it disappeared among the trees."

"My eye!" said Biggs, "weren't you skeared."

"What?"

"Frightened like?"

"Oh! no, not at all, only curious."

"Ah! well, I should have been skeared. I never was in a wood but once in my life, and, if I knows it, it is the last time I ever shall be; but never mind that, go on."

Tom was well pleased to see that the story he began telling, and with the exact particulars of which the reader is acquainted, awoke so much interest in their breasts, so that they seemed to lose sight of his object in telling them the adventure.

"Yes, go on," said Wilson. "I does above all things like to hear a downright good tale, 'specially if its true."

"Well, then, this is true, every word of it, and so, to go on with what I was saying, when the mysterious light disappeared we consulted together for a moment, and then resolved to find out what it was."

"Did you really?"

"We did, and went on and on among the trees, which grew closer and closer together at every step we took. We thought at first that it must be a will o' the wisp."

"A will o' the wisp?" said Wilson. "What's that, Biggs?"

"Don't know!"

"I will tell you, then," said Tom. "It is a curious kind of light, which sometimes rises out of the earth in damp places, and goes flitting about here, there, and everywhere."

"Why, he means a Jack a lantern!" cried Biggs. "I knows what that is!"

"So do I"

"It is only another name for the same thing," replied Tom.

"Well, you thought it was a Jack a lantern. What next?"

"We found it wasn't that, for when we put our ears on the ground to listen, we distinctly heard a footstep, and the sound of some one forcing a way through the gorse bushes."

"It was a man with a lantern, then."

"Just so. But no sooner had we made this discovery than the light disappeared altogether."

"Did it, though?"

"We waited a good while for it to reappear, but without result, so we crept forward again, and at last we reached a kind of dell, and down at the bottom of this dell there we saw the light again."

"What was it?"

"A lantern! We crept as close as we could to the edge of the dell, and then we heard some one digging. The sound of a spade turning up earth came to us as plain as could be."

"And couldn't you see nothing?"

"No; but I found a sort of narrow winding path leading down into the dell, so as carefully and silently as we were able, we made our way down it."

The two men got still closer to Tom, in their intense eagerness to hear what was coming next. They were so absorbed with the peculiar narrative that they could think of nothing else.

"When we got to the bottom," continued Tom, assuming an awe-struck tone of voice. "When we got to the bottom, we were able to see, by the light of the lantern, a man, who appeared to be digging a grave!"

"A grave?" gasped Biggs.

"That was what we thought it was."

"And what sort of a man was he?"

"Oh! a very old man, with only some tattered rags clinging about his person, to serve as clothes, and he was so thin and so bent, that you would never have believed he had strength enough to walk, let alone dig a hole in the ground. He went on with his work for some time, and then stopped and spoke. From what he said, we gathered that he had concealed a large box of gold, but now he came to dig for it he could not find it. He fancied he had not dug deep enough, and went to work ten times harder than before. His curses were awful when he found that his treasure had gone. He got out of the pit and stood on the margin of it, and called down the vengeance of heaven upon the head of the robber, and while the words were upon his lips, Dick and myself were startled by hearing the loud report of a gun, and then we saw the old miser, for such he was, fall headlong and bleeding into the hole!"

CHAPTER CXXIII.

MR. TAPNER MAKES A VERY SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED APPEARANCE UPON THE SCENE OF ACTION.

"WELL, I'm blest!" ejaculated Biggs. "It clean bangs all I ever heard on!"

"That it do!" said Wilson, "its the best of all! Let us hear what happened next."

"I will."

The two men again assumed their eager listening attitude.

Tom could not help smiling slightly.

But in reality it was not at all to be wondered at that the men felt the interest they did. Its startling character was well qualified to elicit it.

"Our astonishment," continued Tom, "when we heard the shot, and saw the old man fall into the pit was, as you may think, very great indeed, and it was the greatest wonder in the world we did not do or say something to betray our presence in that lonely spot, but we happened to possess sufficient self command to keep perfectly still, and we soon had cause to congratulate ourselves for having done so, for in a moment or two we heard the ground crush beneath the tread of a heavy footstep."

"Lor!"

"We watched and waited, and presently we saw a rough-looking man, with a hideous countenance, come close up to the pit. He looked closely into it, in order to find out, as I take it, whether the old man was really dead, and then we heard him say something about the miser's treasure, which made us think he had stolen it."

"Oh! do go on."

"We pounced upon him, and tied him up to the tree; and now," said Tom, turning to the two men, and speaking in a most impressive tone of voice, "now comes the most interesting part of my story."

"What?—what?—oh! what?"

"Let me get my breath! When we had done that we looked all round about the dell, to see if we could find the miser's box of gold."

"Ye-es—yes!"

"For a long time we were unsuccessful, but at last, just on the very brink of the dell, there we found a box carefully bound round with iron. It was about four feet long by three in width and depth."

"And—and"——

"That was the box containing the miser's treasure."

"You don't say so. Oh! Jim, how many guineas would a box of that size hold?"

"Oh! heaps upon heaps upon heaps!"

"And it would sure to be all gold—no notes, you know."

"Not a bit of it. Trust a miser for that."

"When we found it," said Tom.

"Yes, when you found it?"

"We carried it to some distance, and then dug a hole at the foot of a tree, and buried it."

"You did?"

"Most certainly we did."

"And you never opened it to look inside?"

"No, we could not, for the officers were after us, and we had something to do to make our escape."

"And is the box there now?"

"Yes, I could put my hand upon it; and that brings me to what I was going to propose. There is enough gold in that box to make an immense fortune for both of you. Now if you like to let me out, or help me to get out, I will give you my most solemn word of honour, and take any oath you may think fit to impose, that I will lead you direct to the spot where the treasure is hidden, and you shall have it all. Come, what do you say? Is it a bargain?"

This was an offer of so brilliant a description that the two men were quite dazzled with it.

Scarcely was it to be expected that they would for long hold out from embracing so tempting a proposal.

And, to speak the truth, Tom King was fully in earnest in what he said, and so the men felt sure he was, from his very manner.

Nevertheless, they spent some few moments in close consultation.

"Come!" cried Tom, impatiently, "if you are going to say yes, say it. You won't have such another chance for making your fortunes if you live a thousand years."

"Well, we say agreed," cried Wilson; "don't we Biggs?"

"We does!"

"Then!" exclaimed Tom exultingly, as he sprang to his feet, "then I shall be once more free! free to see"——

"A change in your guard," said a voice, and Mr. Tapner, the governor, put his head into the cell.

The surprise which this sudden appearance caused, made the three inmates of the cell for a moment quite speechless.

Messrs. Biggs and Wilson at length found breath enough to utter a dismal yell, and then they sank to the floor in an agony of apprehension.

Mr. Tapner, his whole face beaming with the most intense delight, came quite into the cell, closely followed by Winch and two other men.

"Ha! ha!" he cried, "I told you I should be a match for you. Thought, by telling a lot of stuff about buried treasures, to get free, did you? Ha! ha! Didn't think I might be listening through the keyhole to all you said! You omitted that in your calculations. Dear me! how funny that the governor of Newgate should be clever enough to outwit Tom King, the notorious highwayman. Sounds quite ridiculous. Ha! ha!"

Winch and the two men loudly echoed the governor's disagreeable laugh.

As for Tom King, his vexation knew no bounds, but he would not suffer it to become visible, and so afford the governor that additional satisfaction.

But the two men rose to their feet, and fawningly approached Mr. Tapner.

"Take those men prisoners!" he cried.

"Lor' bless you, Mr. Tapner, I hope as how you won't do no such thing, sir," said Wilson. "Don't you hope so, Biggs?"

"In course I does!"

"Why, you see, sir, we only pertended to listen to his artfulness; and the moment we seed you, sir, we should have told you all about it. We should, sir. Shouldn't we, Biggs?"

"I knows I should."

"Its all very well, but that lame tale won't do," said the governor. "Oh! dear no! Why you actually consented. Don't deny it, because I heard it with my own ears."

"We don't intend to deny it, Mr. Tapner."

"Then you consented?"

"No, no! we only pertended to consent. I'll take my solemn oath we only pertended to consent. Won't you, Biggs?"

"To be sure! So help my Davy, and no gammon! we only pertended to consent, in order to find out more about it."

"You hear Biggs, Mr. Tapner?"

"I do hear him."

"And you believe us, sir?"

"I believe you to be a couple of infamous scoundrels, and I'll have you locked up on the charge of assisting the prisoner to escape."

"No, no, Mr. Tapner; indeed we only pertended."

But the governor turned a deaf ear to their protestations, and turning to Winch, said—

"Go to the lobby, and bring a couple of men to take them prisoners and lock them up."

Then when Winch returned, which he did in a few minutes, for the distance he had to go was short, he had Messrs. Biggs and Wilson walked off, and he left two other men in the dungeon in their places.

"Don't listen to the rubbish he will try to pour into your ears. Its moonshine, every bit of it! But I'll have you so closely watched that it will be impossible for you to escape!"

"Trust to us, Mr. Tapner. We won't listen."

"That's best. What do you think now, Mr. Tom King? I would tell the sheriff if I was you. Ha! ha!"

But Tom turned away, disdaining to reply to the taunts levelled at him either by word or gesture.

Finding this to be the case, the governor, after a few of what, as he afterwards called them when speaking to the chaplain about them, cutting remarks, he left the cell, and the door was closed after him.

Tom King had no heart to say anything to his new guards, so he threw himself upon the hard bed and strove to sleep.

So passed the night.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

TOM DAVIS AND ELLEN FIND OUT THE CONSEQUENCES OF DISREGARDING THE ADVICE CONTAINED IN AN OLD PROVERB.

About ten o'clock on the following—that is to say, Sunday morning—two persons well known to the readers of this history turned out of Skinner-street into the Old Bailey.

One was a man of jovial appearance and extraordinary proportions.

The other was a being so dissimilar to him in every respect that people, when they saw them together, would hardly be able to believe they belonged to the same race.

She was a young girl—small, and very shortly made, with hands and feet that might be a child's.

Her hand rested on the arm of this big man, and as they were so close together it made the difference in their relative sizes the more apparent.

Of course our readers recognise them.

One was Tom Davis, the worthy landlord of the "Hand and Keys."

The other Ellen, once the poor orphan apprentice, now his adopted daughter.

His errand was to visit Tom King, and deliver the message he had been charged with for him.

As for Ellen, her presence may be easily accounted for.

She had asked to come, and Tom never thought of doing otherwise than granting her slightest wish.

And so on this Sunday morning, just as the clock in the belfry of St. Sepulchre's church was striking ten, they came in sight of the gloomy old prison of Newgate.

They crossed over the Old Bailey, and Tom, ascending the little flight of steps, rapped rather imperiously upon the wicket.

The consequence was it was opened at once.

But the man on the lock, when he saw they were only visitors, had half a mind to bang the door shut in their faces, and likely enough would have had a whole mind, had not Davis taken care to make an entrance as soon as it was open.

"Well, I'm blest! what is things a coming to next, I wonder?"

"Let me have none of your insolence," said Davis, "or you will find yourself in trouble. Where's the governor? I want to see him, immediately."

"Jinks," growled the man on the lock, "go and tell Mr. Tapner he's wanted."

Now, to the reader it may seem rather strange that Davis should ask to see the governor, instead of asking to see Tom King; but the fact was, he knew that without he adopted some very clever stratagem, he would not, after what had occurred, be able to see the prisoner at all.

He had a scheme already, and the reader will see what it is as things go on.

In a short time the governor came into the lobby, through a door that led to his own private apartments in the prison.

He was curious to know who it was that wanted him.

He looked rather surprised upon seeing Davis and Ellen, both of whom were strangers to him, but the former hastened to say, in the politest manner he was master of—

"The governor of the prison, I presume?

"Yes," said Mr. Tapner; "and as I am rather busy, perhaps you will be good enough to let me know what it is you want with me in as few words as possible."

"Certainly, certainly, oh! certainly. The fact is I have made a rather long journey up from the country solely upon the business I have with you."

"Indeed."

"Yes. About two months ago, I ought to tell you, I was driving along the Southampton-road with my daughter here, when we were stopped and robbed by a highwayman, who I have reason to believe was Tom King."

"Dear me, yes; and you have come up to London, I suppose, to bring forward your case against him. Just so. Be good enough to walk this way."

So saying, he conducted Davis and Ellen to a comfortably-furnished parlour, the window of which looked into the Old Bailey.

In the strong feeling he had against Tom he was rejoiced to find some real bonâ fide evidence against him, such as this appeared to be. It saved him a great deal of trouble, for it had been his intention to go to the length of getting up a case against him.

"Getting up a case," in the way the governor used the words, meant suborning evidence.

He was saved the trouble—and, what was more, the risk—but he was so exasperated with Tom, that he made up his mind to leave no means untried to procure his conviction.

Mr. Tapner placed seats for Ellen and Davis, and then sat down himself at a desk covered with papers, and taking up a pen, prepared to take notes of the statement about to be made to him.

"Now, sir," he said.

"You must understand," said Davis, "that one of my chief objects in coming up and bringing my daughter with me was to see the prisoner, for on the occasion we both had a good look in the face of the man who robbed us, and we should be able to tell directly whether Tom King was really that man."

"Oh! of course, of course. You shall see him at once."

"Perhaps," suggested Davis, "I had better, to save all trouble, see the prisoner before I make the statement, for if he should not turn out to be the man, why, of course, the matter will rest there."

"Just as you like, sir—just as you like. I am glad to find some one else besides myself anxious to further the ends of justice. I have no doubt the prisoner is the man who robbed you—no doubt in the world."

"One glance will be sufficient to assure us of that, will it not, Ellen?"

"Yes, father."

"Come with me, then," said the governor. "As you wish it, you shall see the prisoner first, and if you recognise him, make the statement afterwards."

"Just so."

The two now rose, and the governor, having called Winch, they proceeded in a body to Tom's cell.

Davis, while the turnkey was unlocking and opening the door, put his hand into his coat-pocket, where he had a letter folded up into a very small compass.

He had another difficult task to perform, and that was to place the letter in Tom King's hands unseen.

He took his hand out of his pocket, and held it between his fingers. So small was it that it could not be seen.

Then, as soon as the door was opened, he saw Tom, and managed, by the expression of his countenance, that he did not wish to be recognised.

King took the hint, and assumed a surprise at the visit.

"Now," said Mr. Tapner, "take a good look, and tell me whether you think that is him."

Davis walked into the cell, and looked at Tom. Then he shook his head.

"Look again," said Mr. Tapner.

"In the most natural manner, Davis put up his hand and touched Tom King on the shoulder, as though to turn his face more fully to the light.

Then, with the quickness of thought, he slipped the tiny piece of paper down Tom's neck, and said, suddenly, in a whisper—

"A letter."

"Is this the man?" asked the governor.

"No," said Davis, "I shouldn't like to swear it was, but my daughter will look, if you please."

"Oh! ah! Look at him, my dear. Is that the man who robbed you on the Southampton road?"

"No, I am quite sure it isn't."

"It isn't."

"No, the man that robbed us had large sandy whiskers, and his eyes were different, and he was taller and stouter. Oh! I am sure it isn't the same."

At this moment one of the men who had been watching in the cell touched Mr. Tapner on his arm and whispered something in his ear which made the governor's face assumed quite a blue tinge.

"Is it possible?" he cried, "Arrest those people, and confine them in separate dungeons at once. Away with them. I charge them with being accomplices of the prisoner."

CHAPTER CXXXV.

THE MAGISTRATE AT BOW-STREET GIVES TOM DAVIS A CAUTION.

Davis had seen the man whisper, and guessed in a moment that he was known.

Still he resolved to put a bold front on the matter.

"What do you mean, sir," he said, "by accusing my daughter and myself with being the accomplices of highwaymen? Take care what you are doing, sir, and mind what you say, for you shall prove your words."

"I am quite ready, Mr. Thomas Davis, quite ready. You see I know your name. Powell, here, is ready to swear you are the landlord of a public-house well known as the resort of desperate characters."

"You are dreaming, sir; I am no public-house keeper, but a farmer, and I live at Lymington."

The confident tone in which this assertion was uttered staggered the governor a great deal so he turned to Powell and said—

"Will you swear that man is Davis, the landlord of the 'Hand and Keys?'"

"Will I? Of course I will. You might just as well ask me to swear whether I was ever in Newgate?"

"You are quite certain, then?"

"Quite."

"That is sufficient, then. It is my duty to take both into custody."

"This is monstrous."

"You will have every opportunity afforded you of proving your identity before the magistrate to-morrow morning at Bow-street. Off with them."

It was useless to resist, so Davis suffered them to lead him to a cell.

Poor Ellen was terribly frightened, but her adopted father soon reassured her, and told her she had nothing whatever to fear.

"Search your prisoner," cried Mr. Tapner, as soon as they had left the cell. "Although I had my eye upon them all the while, yet it is possible something may have been given to him. Search the prisoner at once."

The two men sprang forward, and in a very rapid and dexterous manner searched him from head to foot.

But they found nothing.

How was it, then, that the letter escaped their practised observation?

We will explain.

As soon as Tom heard the governor proclaim who Davis really was, he judged that a search would be the result.

Therefore, while the attention of the governor and the men was chiefly centred in the landlord and Ellen, Tom managed slyly, and without attracting notice, to put his hand up to his neck and take out the letter.

It rested just between the neckband of his shirt and his skin.

Having it now in his grasp, the next thing was to find some safe place in which to secrete it.

He was at a loss for a moment, and then feeling how small it was, for he did not venture to look, he slipped it into his mouth.

The letter had been written on a long slip of paper about an inch and a half wide, and was rolled up tightly, and secured at the edge with some adhesive substance.

Consequently it was only about a quarter of an inch in diameter, and all know a much larger article than that could be easily concealed in the mouth.

Very fortunately it happened that neither of these manœuvres were observed, and when he was searched they never dreamed of looking into his mouth.

The case would have been rather different had they known actually as a fact that something had been given, but they had only a strong suspicion of it.

However, nothing was found.

Mr. Tapner was far from being satisfied, and yet he was immensely pleased to think he had secured one if not two of the highwayman's accomplices.

The day passed slowly away. Tom had removed the paper from his mouth, for he was fearful that the moisture would injure it.

There is no knowing what he might not have been tempted to give for the chance of reading this letter from his friend, for that it was from Dick! felt assured.

At last the men who were on guard over him were replaced by two more, and shortly after that Tom found an opportunity of perusing the epistle.

It ran thus:—

"DEAR TOM,—I have some news to tell you that will astonish you not a little. Your old friends C. D. and 16 S. J. have come back to England. They are with me now while I write this. We have learned that your cell has been changed, so I suppose you have lost the files. Never mind, perhaps it is all for the best. We have decided to let you go to trial. We will engage a first-rate counsel, who will, I daresay, be able to get you off. If so, you will find us all there at the door of the court. If you lose the day, don't despair; we shall get you out of the old jug, so make your mind quite easy. We should try it on before you took your trial, but there is not time. Besides, C. and J. think it best to give you the chance of getting off acquitted, because, if so, we shall be spared the risk and danger of getting you out; not that we mind it, only C. says it is courage sometimes to avoid danger. Between the three of us we are sure to carry the affair out successfully. I don't know whether you will be able to send us any message back. If not, we understand that you quite agree with what we are doing for you. Your sincere friend,

"DICK."

Tom read this letter over two or three times, and then gave himself up to reflection.

He was indeed surprised to learn that his two old friends had returned, and still more that they had fallen in with Dick.

However, the circumstance of all three having determined to get him off, made him much more at ease in his mind; so, after having perused the letter for the last time, he tore it up into small fragments, and dropped them upon the floor of the cell.

Of course, he made no attempt to escape, so Mr. Tapner expended all his wonderful cleverness unnecessarily.

Tom came to the conclusion that it would be best to take his trial. His chance of acquittal was, however, small. Still his position could not be made worse than it just then was.

He knew, too, the fearful peril his friends would incur in doing anything to forward his escape, and he was not selfish enough to wish them to run into danger on his account unnecessarily.

On the following morning Tom Davis and Ellen were placed at the bar in Bow-street, and charged with being accomplices of Tom King, then a prisoner in Newgate.

Mr. Tapner stated the case against them, and dwelt upon it in every conceivable way.

Then the men were called who swore to his identity.

But there was not sufficient evidence to support the charge; in fact it rested upon suspicion merely.

The magistrate, however, when he dismissed the case, thought fit to administer a rather severe caution, coupled with a threat of what he should do if he was again brought before him under similar circumstances.

To the mortification of Mr. Tapner, Mr. Davis and Ellen left the dock in triumph.

Their first act was to make all speed towards the "Hand and Keys," at which place they arrived in the early part of the afternoon.

Right glad was Mrs. Davis and the three highwaymen to see them return in safety. They had been in a state of great alarm.

Tom Davis at once gave an account of all that had taken place.

As soon as he finished, the three highwaymen called for their steeds, and were for riding off to London, but Davis advised them to remain till after dark.

To this prudent advice they were wise enough to listen, and at a little after eight they mounted and rode off to London.

"Don't let me see you again," said Davis, "until you bring Tom back; and it strikes me, after what has happened to-day, this will be anything but a safe place for you."

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN POINTS OUT TO CLAUDE AND JACK JONATHAN WILD'S GIBBET ON CLAPTON COMMON.

THIS was right enough; indeed it is greatly to be wondered at that officers were not immediately sent off to search the place to see whether any of Tom's friends were hiding there.

But they considered it so improbable a thing that they should run the risk of sheltering themselves in so dangerous a place, that they deemed it unworthy of their trouble.

Before, however, we follow the three highwaymen on their journey to London, we will take a glance at two subsidiary characters in our narrative, in whose fate it may be presumed the reader feels a certain degree of interest.

We allude, of course, to that gallant and frank-hearted young sailor, Lieutenant Thrustans, and his betrothed, who had been so cruelly persecuted by her treacherous guardian.

We wish to take the present opportunity of following their fortunes and disposing of them finally, in order that we may not have to interrupt the succession of the strange events which so immediately followed, events which, in the intensity of their interest, will be found superior to any of those which have preceded them.

But it is not our wish to keep the reader back from the perusal of the strange adventures which occurred immediately after the three friends left the public-house, so we will put into as few words as possible that which we have to say.

In brief, then, to the great joy of Rupert, after careful medical attendance, Katharine recovered her health, and what was of even more importance still, her reason.

The two rascally doctors were taken into custody, and Lowne House establishment broken up. They were anxious to confess, in the hope that by so doing they would receive more lenient punishment, and what they said was quite sufficient to make the villainy of Stephen Murray apparent.

The lieutenant then made his deposition upon oath of all that had taken place between himself and the guardian, omitting, by their particular request, all mention of the two highwaymen who had befriended him.

Among the papers belonging to Stephen Murray was found a document purporting to be a deed of gift of the whole of the estates from Katharine to him.

But this was declared a forgery, and the young heiress put into possession of her rights.

It will require no great amount of prescience to see that one of the first things she did was to bestow her hand upon Rupert Thrustans, whom she had loved so well before, but whose conduct had thoroughly endeared him to her heart.

At her request he gave up the nautical profession, although he was on the high road to advancement, and settled down to the quiet, happy life of an English gentleman.

In after years, when he had assembled about him a few warm-hearted friends, it was his delight to relate his strange adventures with the notorious highwaymen, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval.

As for Koolah, the tiger-wolf, he became more domesticated every day he lived, and suffered himself to be made the playmate of his master's children.

Having, then, brought things in connection with the young couple to so satisfactory a termination, we will follow our three friends.

They proceeded at a very easy pace.

"Sometime ago," said Claude, "a very clever lawyer lived at No. 8, in the Old-square, Lincoln's-inn. I don't know whether you have heard of him, but in my opinion, the best thing we can do is to put the case entirely into his hands."

"What is his name?" asked Dick.

"Well, that," Claude replied, with a laugh, "is more than I can tell you, but he calls himself Mr. Theophilus Lazenby."

"I have never heard of him," said Jack.

"Nor I," said Turpin.

"So much the better. He keeps his things very snug, I can tell you; but he is a clever rascal."

"And you think he will suit us?"

"Oh! yes. He will carry the affair through from beginning to end. I mean he will find the counsel, witnesses, and all that, but you must understand he never appears in the affair himself."

"How is that?"

"He can carry on his trade with all the more safety; but there is one thing I expect he will require—rather a heavy fee."

"The deuce! How much?"

"I can't say exactly."

"But what should you estimate?"

"Five hundred pounds!"

"Five hundred pounds?"

"Yes; and you may think yourself lucky if you get it for that."

"Then we must get some money from somewhere."

"I suppose so. How much have you got?"

"Something less than seventy pounds, which I took the other night."

[TOM KING IS BROUGHT TO TRIAL.]

"Then we shall want something like ten times that amount altogether."

"That's a great deal, and very little time to get it in."

"There is not much time, but we must set about it at once. There are three of us, and surely we ought to manage something extraordinary."

"It is so uncertain," said Turpin.

"You're right, it is; now, if you'll believe me, both Jack and myself have had several adventures since we landed, and not one has brought us any money."

"Except coppers," said Jack.

"Oh! d—n the coppers," cried Claude, who, whenever the adventure with the parsons was mentioned, always got into a rage, "d—n the coppers."

Jack laughed as he said—

"With all my heart; but not only have we had nothing but bad luck ever since we landed, but the rascally captain jumped overboard with our portmantle. which contained more than the sum we require."

"How vexatious."

"It is to be hoped, though, that we shall have a run of better luck."

"The best plan will be," said Turpin, "to stop everybody we meet, and not leave off until we have got the sum we want."

"That will be our best plan. We have got the best part of the night before us, and it will do if we see the lawyer in the morning."

"Poor Tom," said Claude, "he must be miserable enough where he is, but anyhow it won't be for long."

"If," said Jack, "we can only get him acquitted, all will be well. We will form ourselves into a band of four, and do something to make ourselves remembered."

"Just so—but steady, there is the turnpike yonder."

"All right."

"I propose," said Turpin, "that we take the turn to the left as soon as we get through the pike; that will take us out on to the Great North-road, by Clapton Common."

"It will be best, you think?"

"I do. On the high-road, we cannot fail to meet with a good booty. Trot gently through the pike."

The toll-man, hearing the travellers approach, hastened to open the gate and Dick threw him half-a-crown for his pains.

They were not long traversing the bit of cross-country road, especially as they gave their horses the rein, and they soon emerged upon the spot Turpin had mentioned—at that time rather a wild bit of country, and quite away from London.

Clapton Common, of which a vestige still remains, was then on both sides of the road—the high-road, in fact, intersecting it.

The moon now broke forth.

"Look," said Dick, as he raised his right arm and pointed out some object in the distance, "on yonder gibbet hang the remains of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, who was put there just fourteen years ago."

"I know it well," cried Claude Duval; "but I should think there is not much left of him now."

"Very little indeed," said Dick Turpin; "only the thing is pointed out as a curiosity, that's all."

CHAPTER CXXXVII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN EASE THE TAX-GATHERER OF HIS BURDEN.

By common consent all three pulled up before the gibbet and its ghastly burden.

There was sufficient moonlight for them to distinguish its outlines.

Thirteen years and a few months had elapsed since the gibbet was erected on that lonsome piece of ground.

During that time, the stout oak timber of which it was composed had bravely withstood the attacks of both wind and weather, though it was decidedly all the worse for its struggles against the power of time.

It had sunk some two feet into the soil, and had lost that perpendicular position it once had.

From the cross-beam of the gibbet hung the dark mass said to be the mortal remains of Jonathan Wild, though at the present time, without some such assertion, they would never have been taken as such.

How it was the body held together as it did seemed a mystery, until, upon a close examination, it was seen that the suspending irons formed a kind of cage in which it was contained.

As it swung gently to and fro in the night air, the rusty fastenings made a horrible creaking noise.

"And so that is all that remains of Jonathan Wild," said Sixteen-String Jack, after he and his companions had contemplated it some moments in silence. "It is an awful fate!"

He shuddered as he spoke.

"But surely," said Claude Duval, "if ever any one merited such a doom he did. He was a villain—a deeply-dyed villain, delighting in cruelty for cruelty's sake; a sworn foe to right and innocence; the willing accomplice in all kinds of villainy and guilt; a man dead to all generous emotions; ruthless, vindictive, and a very demon in his revenge!"*

"He little thought," replied Turpin, "when bringing so many to the scaffold as he did, that such would be his own fate; but there is retribution, even in this world."

"Come on," said Claude Duval. "I have seen enough of him. For my part I can only say, he deserves all he has got for his conduct to Jack Sheppard and Blueskin alone."

"I never heard the particulars of that affair. You see, I was but a child when it happened."

"I suppose not. Some day I will tell you, but there is no time now, for I can hear the sound of wheels along the road. Hark!"

"Yes," said Turpin. "Some one is coming, sure enough, though they are at a good distance yet."

"Yonder are some trees," cried Sixteen-String Jack. "Let us back our horses into the shadow of them."

This was done instantly, and then, silent and motionless as statues, they awaited the coming of their prey.

Every moment now brought the sounds more plainly to their ears.

"It is a light vehicle," said Jack, "and drawn by one horse—a dog-trap, I take it."

"It is coming from London!"

"Oh! yes, and will be in sight directly; are you all ready?"

"Quite."

"Then as soon as he gets opposite here we will all three dart out upon him."

"Good! I only hope he carries a good booty to make it worth our trouble."

"Silence, now, all of you! voices travel a long way on the night air. It is never policy to put one on his guard! Silence!"

Not another word was spoken.

The peculiar grating noise of the wheels upon the road grew louder and louder.

Whoever it was, he was coming along at a pretty good speed.

The road was quite straight for some distance, so the three highwaymen, as they looked down it in the direction of London caught sight of the approaching vehicle.

Five minutes afterwards it was on a level with them.

"Surrender!" cried all three of the highwaymen, with one voice, springing out upon the unfortunate and startled traveller. "Pull up, or we fire, and it is scarcely possible for all three of us to miss you."

"Mercy—gentlemen—mercy!" said the traveller, who they saw was a fat man, with a rather bulldog-looking countenance. "Spare my money, gentlemen; but, oh! take my life! No—no, I didn't mean that. Take my life, and—no—I mean"——

"Silence!" said Dick. "Another word, and it is your last! I always keep my word. I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

"And I am Claude Duval!"

The traveller turned a horrified glance at the speaker, as he heard him pronounce the well-known and much-dreaded name.

"And I am Jack Rann, otherwise known as Sixteen-String Jack!"

The fat man slipped down off the seat of the gig in an agony of fear, and made a ludicrous attempt to hide himself under the thick woollen mat at the bottom of it.

"Your money!" cried Dick. "Your money, and be quick about it. Hand it over, and your miserable life will be spared."

As Turpin spoke, he made a snatch at the mat, and threw it into the road.

Some dismal groans now came from the traveller's lips. He did not dare to speak after the threats that had been held out to him.

It was quite evident they would have got what they wanted, for he was quite incapable of giving it to them.

Claude performed that part of the business, but though he searched him thoroughly from head to foot, yet all he could find was about a pound in silver, and a monster pinchbeck watch.

He was about to turn away disappointed, when happening to touch one of the cushions on the seat, it moved, and disclosed beneath it a large leather bag, carefully tied round with a thong of the same material.

To snatch at it, and feel its contents, was the work of a moment.

"Money," he cried, "by all that's good!"

The traveller looked up, and when he saw the bag in Claude's hands, the groan he was about to utter changed into a shriek

"No, no," he cried, "mercy, mercy. If you take it I am ruined. Surely you will not ruin me good sir. The money in that bag does not belong to me, but I am responsible for it. Mercy, mercy! Do not take it. Oh! do not."

Dick put the muzzle of a pistol to his ear.

"Be silent," he said, "before you are compelled by a bullet."

"But it is the king's money. Five hundred pounds in gold! All taxes that I have collected. Me, my, more

* In thus speaking of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, Claude Duval was no more than just; but for a full and faithful account of the life of this unparalleled miscreant, the reader is referred to a work entitled "Blueskin," now publishing in penny numbers, uniform with "Black Bess," and by the same author. The details there given are from authentic sources, and may be relied upon as correct. Nos. 1 and 2, in a wrapper, price one penny.

You understand now that I shall be a ruined man if you take that."

"What!" shouted Claude, "are you a tax-gatherer?"

"Ye-es, good sir, I—I am, if you please," was the stammered reply, for Duval's manner was rather alarming.

"Then you will get small mercy from us," he said, as he slipped the bag, which he had been told contained so large an amount, into his pocket. "To almost any one else we would have listened, but not to you. Shoot him through the head, Dick, if he says another word; and you, Jack, bear a hand here. We'll tie the varmint to a tree. Come on."

Somehow or other our friends shared in that general dislike which is felt for tax-collectors. Very few, indeed, like them. We knew one once who actually set up in business, but of course it turned out a bad speculation.

More dead than alive, this fat man (who looked as though he throve on the blood of others) was lifted out of his gig, and by means of the reins lashed firmly to one of the trees on the wayside.

Had the unfortunate wretch ever so wished it, he could not have found breath enough to cry for help, but he could not control his groans.

A sharp cut with the whip was now given to the horse, and away it started at a most alarming rate.

As for our three friends, they put spurs to their steeds, and did not venture to draw rein until they were some distance from the spot where they had committed this most daring robbery.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK PROPOSES A STRANGE CURE FOR JEALOUSY.

"I THINK," said Dick, some few minutes afterwards, changing his mare's speed from a gallop to an easy canter, "I think, Claude, if the tax-gatherer told us the truth concerning the contents of the bag, we shall have money enough for our purpose."

"Pretty nearly," said Claude. "I will just take the liberty though of convincing myself that all is well, not, however, that I am much in doubt about the matter."

Duval cut the pieces of leather that was used to tie up the mouth of the bag, and looked into it.

"All right," he said, as he drew forth several guineas. "He has not deceived us. His fright was too genuine for that, and from the size and weight of the bag I am inclined to think he has told us the truth about the amount also."

"Hurrah!" cried Dick; "this, then, is luck indeed. Surely, with what I already have, we possess sufficient for our purpose."

"It may be, and yet none too much," said Jack; "let us stick to our original intent."

"Agreed."

"It will never do for us to run short of funds, and jeopardize the affair in that way."

"So I think," said Claude; "this is certainly an extraordinary slice of luck, but still it's time we had one, I rather think, and"——

Duval broke off suddenly, for a fearful shriek came from somewhere close to the spot upon which they now stood.

"Good heavens!" cried Turpin, "what a fearful scream—there it is again, and again! Come on, there is a female somewhere in distress."

A succession of shrieks, that were really awful from their intensity, continued uninterruptedly.

"This way," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack; "this is the way! Over the fence to that house yonder! Quick! quick!"

Before he had well finished speaking they had all three leapt over a low fence that was on the right hand side of the road.

It surrounded a small garden in which was a pretty little cottage.

It was evidently from this habitation that the screams issued.

Dismounting from their steeds, and leaving them loose, the three friends dashed open the door of the cottage and rushed in.

The scene that met their gaze was one of the utmost disorder.

The various articles of furniture the room contained were strewed about in the greatest confusion.

Those that were at all breakable lay in fragments.

Near the fire-place, shrinking down to the floor as close as she could, and endeavouring to crawl along it, was a woman.

Over her stood a man with rather a formidable blackthorn stick in his hand, with which he belaboured her incessantly, notwithstanding her shrieks and frantic cries for mercy.

So intent, too, was he upon what he was about that he did not notice the intrusion of the three highwaymen, until Dick Turpin sprang forward and caught him from behind, round the middle, taking away the use of his arms entirely.

Sixteen-String Jack wrenched the stick from his grasp.

Claude Duval assisted the victim of his brutality to rise, and would have placed her in a chair had there been a whole one in the place.

As it was, he was very glad to find her able to keep her feet, because it showed the injuries she had received were not so severe as he expected.

This done, they looked about them for an explanation.

The man who had been using the stick so dastardly struggled and fought to free himself from Turpin's grasp, but he might just as well have tried to have got out of the hug of a grizzly bear.

Jack pulled out a pistol, and cocking it, held it in his face, at the same moment admonishing him in a significant tone of voice to be quiet.

As might be expected, the man was an arrant coward—for no one but a coward would think of striking a woman—ceased his struggles instantly, and when his own life was in danger became submission itself.

"Speak!" said Claude to the woman, assuming as kind and as assuring a tone of voice as he could. "Speak! tell us the meaning of all this."

"Do not harm him, gentlemen. Pray do not."

"Can it be possible you ask for mercy for him who has treated you so unmanly?"

"Yes—yes! Oh! yes! He is my husband!"

"Then is his conduct the more inexcusable. What is his motive for thus ill-using you?"

The woman was silent, but Claude was by no means displeased with her for that.

He turned threateningly towards her husband.

"What is your motive for thus abusing your wife. Tell me, or so sure as I am a living man, I'll make you."

The man was silent.

Claude made a couple of paces towards him, but the woman, springing forward, held him back.

"Spare him, sir. Spare him!"

"Tell me his motive, then?"

"He—he—is"——

"What?"

"Jealous!"

"Yes," exclaimed the man, now the secret was out, "and cause enough she gives me. I should like to know who wouldn't be jealous."

"That is no excuse for ill-using her," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Not a bit," said Claude. Then, turning to the wife, he asked,—

"Have you ever given him just grounds for jealousy?"

"Never, sir, as I hope I have a soul to be saved."

"That is sufficient."

"Its false!" cried the man. "I saw her talking and laughing with the milkman this afternoon."

"And what of that?"

"What of that? Do you think I want to see a couple of horns growing out of my head?"

"No, but you deserve them. And let me tell you you are going the right way to get them. As for your suspicions, I believe them to be groundless, especially if they have no better grounds than the instance you brought forward. And now, is it for that you were base-hearted enough to strike her?"

"What's that to you, I should like to know?" asked the man, plucking up a spirit. "If it was, what is it to you? She's my wife, isn't she? and can't a man do as he likes with his own?"

"You will quickly find out what it is to do with us. You are a miserable hound, unworthy of the name of man.

and it is a thousand pities that any woman should be cursed with such a brute for a husband. Down on your knees this instant, and ask her pardon, and promise to be no longer jealous, if you wish to preserve your wretched life."

"Never!"

"Kneel!" thundered Jack, and he thrust the muzzle of the pistol into his ear. "Kneel, or you are a dead man!"

The wife would have rushed forward and interposed, had not Claude held her back.

The man fell upon his knees.

"Dare not to move! and now I will try if you cannot be made sensible of what retribution is. Dick," he added, turning to his comrade, "shoot him through the head if he attempts to move."

"Spare him, gentlemen, do spare him!" entreated the woman. "He is my husband, and I love him, although he does ill-treat me! Spare him! spare him!"

"Do you hear that, you wretch?" cried Claude. "If you have got any shame in you that ought to bring it out."

"Here," cried Jack Rann, addressing the wife, as stooping down he picked up the stick; "take hold of that, and if you value your husband's life do as I bid you."

Thus adjured, the poor woman took hold of the stick.

"Now," he continued, "stand there, and if he does not instantly beg your pardon, and promise better behaviour for the future, lay it about him, even as he did about you."

"No—no—no," cried the woman, full of terror at the very idea.

"If you wish to save his life you will. Stand there! It is his own fault if he suffers you to strike him, though he richly deserves it. Still, he has a chance if he chooses to beg your pardon."

"Oh! William," sobbed the poor woman, "you hear what they say. Do as they wish you, pray do, and do not force me to obey them."

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN MAKE ANOTHER PRIZE ON THEIR WAY TO TOWN.

Now this man, who, by the way, most certainly deserved the soundest thrashing that could be given him—this man we say, if he had been possessed of only a small quantity of that very valuable commodity, common-sense, would assuredly have then and there ended the matter by asking pardon of his wife, and promising amendment for the future.

But no, there was too much pig-headed obstinacy in his disposition to permit him to do this.

So he made no answer to his wife's appeal, but fixed his eyes doggedly upon the ground.

"He will have it," said Jack. "Now, ma'am, don't be afraid to hit him. Come down with the whole strength of your arm. Don't be afraid. If he ventures to move, I will blow his brains out. Now then, begin."

Now this woman, who was so unlucky as to have a jealous husband and a brute besides, by her own confession, loved him; so, of course, at first she had shrunk from the idea of inflicting pain upon him, although he had not scrupled to use her so badly.

But when she saw that he would not avoid the punishment, as he easily might have done, she began to see the justice of what she was about to do.

Still she resolved to give him one more trial: but alas! he remained as sullen as before.

"Since you are determined to have it, then, you shall," she cried, and as she spoke she brought the stick down upon her recreant husband's back with such lusty and rapid strokes, that he howled fearfully with the pain.

"Bravo!" cried Jack, "keep it up till he asks your pardon. I'll take care he don't move, or do you a mischief. Pay into him."

Thus encouraged, the woman, whose fury was now thoroughly aroused, continued her beating with right good will, though her arm ached so badly she could hardly lift it up.

Thwack! thwack! thwack! went the blows, till the husband could bear it no longer, and he dropped flat upon the floor, and implored her forgiveness in the most abject terms.

Then, by every asseveration he could call to mind, he promised never again to be absurdly jealous or to ill-treat his wife.

He was assisted to his feet thoroughly cowed; he was quite conquered.

"Forgive me, William," cried the wife, whose passion was now over, and bursting into tears, she flung herself into his arms. "Forgive me; but what else could I do?"

"That's right," cried Turpin. "You ought both of you to be grateful to us to the longest day of your lives. I hope the lesson, as it was a sharp one, will last you your lives. The best thing you can do now is to forgive each other—forget the past—and make a new beginning.

So saying, Dick left the cottage, followed by his comrades, partly assured that the pair were on better terms with each other than they had been for some time past.

They quickly mounted their horses, and, leaping the fence, were once again on the high road.

"There was not much profit in that adventure, at any rate," said Claude; "though I by no means regret the time it has consumed. It is to be hoped that he will behave better in future."

"I don't know whether it will be a permanent cure."

"That will depend chiefly upon the wife," returned Claude; "but I daresay that she, finding her husband was jealous, did all she could to teaze him. Its a very common, but very silly practice, and provocative of no end of marriage-life mischief."

"Stop your sermonizing," exclaimed Dick. "Look there!"

In obedience to his words, Claude and Jack looked down the road, and saw a man on horseback.

"What, more game?"

"It looks like it. Let us ride on as though we were ordinary travellers. If upon getting nearer we think he looks likely, we will stop him."

"Agreed."

On drawing nearer they found the man on the horse was a sturdy-looking fellow, wearing a quaker-shaped hat on his head.

The horse he was mounted upon was by no means a handsome one to look at, though he might nevertheless be a good one to go.

"We must try it on with him," said Turpin. "Keep in a line across the road. I shall be nearest, so I will stop him."

They were now silent, for they were close enough for the traveller to overhear what was said.

"Halt!" cried Dick, as soon as he was on a level with him, and levelling a pistol with the rapidity of thought. "Halt, I say!"

"Oh! Lord," groaned the man; "they're highwaymen."

"We are. Three to one is rather long odds, you know, so just hand over what you have got without any bother. If you do so at once, no violence will be offered you."

"Alack—alack!" replied the man: "this will be but a sorry journey for me. But still I count my life of more value than the money I happen to have about me."

"Spoken like a sensible man," cried Duval. "Just hand it over to me."

In compliance with this request the man, with many sighs, put a heavy purse in Duval's hands.

"That's all, gentlemen, upon my soul it is, except a few shillings to pay my expenses on the road."

"Be off, then; you are welcome to that, and thank your lucky stars that you have got off so easily as you have."

The man did not need to be told this twice, but, striking his heels against his horse's flanks, he set off at a pace that soon took him both out of sight and hearing."

"Capital," said Claude. "We really are in luck's way to-night. Why this purse must contain a hundred and fifty or two hundred guineas at least."

"Bravo! then we shall have enough

"We won't neglect business, though. o-night's work shall be talked about, and no mistake."

"We are going the right way, but we must be more cautious now; we shall reach the city very shortly."

So many important events call upon us for immediate notice, that we feel we cannot spare the time to relate in detail the other adventures they had that night, especially as none of them were of very peculiar or novel in their character. More travellers were stopped, but from none of them was taken sufficient booty to recompense them for their time and trouble.

It was rather late and very dark when they turned the corner of the Bank of England into the Poultry, and the streets were quite deserted

"There will be a devil of a row," remarked Claude, "about the money we have taken from the tax-gatherer, so I think the best thing we can do now is to see the lawyer to-night. He used to sleep in his chambers in Lincoln's-Inn when I knew him, and I daresay he does now."

"I have no objection to such a course," replied Turpin. "We shall have the matter off our minds, and, besides, we can easily make our way to old Matthew's, in Drury-lane, whose crib is, I take it, about the safest refuge we can find in all London."

"You know best about that, Dick."

"Then, if you will be guided by me, that is where you will take up your quarters. If there is any danger old Matthew is sure to get us out of it."

"Take it easy, then, and we shall not rouse suspicion."

CHAPTER CXL.

MR. THEOPHILUS LAZENBY HOLDS OUT BUT FAINT HOPES OF PROCURING TOM KING'S ACQUITTAL.

Our readers must all be of opinion that it was a very bold thing for our three friends to think of journeying through some of the widest and most populous thoroughfares in the metropolis, but they did it; and likely enough avoided that suspicion which they would have been almost sure to have raised had they taken for their route some of the bye streets.

As it was, no notice was taken of them whatever.

Down Cheapside, across St Martin's-le-Grand, along Newgate-street, past the dark, frowning walls of the old prison, down Skinner-street and Snow-hill, and up Holborn they shaped their way.

At the corner of Chancery-lane they paused to allow a hackney-coach to emerge, and then they trotted down it to the gateway of Lincoln's-Inn.

It was arranged that Claude Duval and Dick Turpin alone should enter, and that Sixteen-String Jack should stay outside to look after the horses.

The intricacies of the old inn were quite familiar to Duval, and he led his companion by the most direct route to No. 8, Old Square.

Late as it was, lights streamed from many of the casements. For one thing the sessions were near at hand, and a good many clerks were employed to rather late hours, in making out briefs for the counsel.

The door of No. 8 was standing open, so the pair entered, and commenced the ascent of the stairs without let or hindrance.

"Its on the fourth floor," said Claude. "Come along."

Several oil lamps were hung at intervals upon the staircase, so they were tolerably well able to see where they were going.

The topmost story was at length gained, and then on a door facing them they saw painted the words,—

MR. THEOPHILUS LAZENBY.

Claude Duval tapped sharply upon the panel, and waited silently.

Then the door was opened by a man who looked for all the world like some musty old parchment deed.

He looked keenly and suspiciously at his visitors.

"What do you want?" he asked.

"It's all right, The." replied Claude.

The old man recognised the voice, though he did not the person of his visitant. If his eyes failed him, his memory and hearing did not.

"Come in, come in," he said. "Why, it's years and years since I saw you! Come in, come in."

The old lawyer led them into an inner room, which was fitted up with tolerable comfort as an office or reception room.

The two highwaymen unfolded their business to him.

"Ah!" he replied, after having heard them to the end without uttering a sylable, "ah!"

"What do you say, Mr. Lazenby?"

"Awkward job!"

"Indeed!"

"Yes. I have heard something of it from private channels, and"——

"What?"

"Without actually being aware of the specific charge against him, yet I can say from pretty good authority that the case is as clear against him as a case could be, and that conviction is inevitable."

"What would you advise us to do? We are willing to pay well so long as we see a prospect of attaining our desires."

"Let me think, let me think."

A few moments' silence now ensued.

"I suppose there would be no chance of disputing his identity?"

"I fear none; his countenance is well known to many; as well known even as my own."

"That's bad! If it hadn't happened so, we might have got some one to swear he was the wrong man; but now that's all up."

"An alibi?" suggested Turpin.

"My dear sir, the thing is not to be thought of for a moment. The dodge is too stale and old, and in this case would be seen through directly. The only thing I can advise is the employment of some sharp counsel to watch the case, and attempt to overthrow the evidence."

"Let that be done, then. We leave you to choose the man best suited for the purpose."

"There is not much to be hoped for even then, if what I have been told about the case is correct. It is so simple, and yet so complete, that it will be impossible to find a flaw in it."

"Still it must be tried," cried Dick Turpin. "Look! here is a bag containing five hundred guineas, all in gold. Take it, and employ it to the best advantage."

Mr. Lazenby's eyes sparkled with avarice when he saw this large sum.

"All shall be done that can be done," he said, as he clutched it eagerly; "you may depend upon that. The sharpest man in practice shall be there to watch the evidence for the prosecution. But let me tell you further that robberies round about and in the metropolis have increased to such an extent that the legislature have determined to make an example of someone, and that someone is Tom King."

"They shall be cheated," said Turpin, "or I will myself perish in the attempt. My two staunch friends here have promised to aid me to the utmost of their power, and we are certain to succeed."

"I hope you may," said Mr. Lazenby, as he rose, to intimate the conference was over. "On my part, you may depend nothing will be left undone."

With this assurance the two highwaymen took their leave.

They found Jack Rann rather impatient at having been kept so long.

The result of the interview was communicated to him.

By the time they had finished the narration, they reached White Horse-yard.

Jack gave the peculiar signal, and the little side door was, as usual, opened by old Matthew himself.

He was rather alarmed when he saw three persons, but Dick Turpin soon let him know who they were.

The horses were placed safely in the stable, and then all four adjourned to the little private room behind the bar.

"I'm rather surprised at your venturing here, captain, when the officers are so keen on the scent; but its just like you—just like you. And now about Tom King."

"Very bad," he said, when Dick finished telling him. "Very bad! One thing, however. they didn't find the files; but they changed Tom's dungeon, as I suppose you know."

"Yes!"

"It's a sad pity; he might have worked his way to freedom by this time; but there he is, you see, and it appears to me worse off than ever."

"Not worse, that I see," said Duval; "I have faith in the old lawyer. He never buoys anyone up with false hopes, but he is generally successful for all that."

"Well," said Jack, "from what I can hear of the affair, my opinion is that he don't stand the least ghost of a chance of being acquitted, and I am sorry to say that when the authorities once make up their minds to hang a man they nearly always succeed."

"That may be, but I still cling to the belief that I shall baulk them."

"You know I should only be too glad for you to succeed, for I would myself go through no small amount of danger to do him a service."

"Well, you had better rest now," said old Matthew, "while you have the chance. I suppose you will be present at the trial?"

"Certainly, all three of us."

"Then the service of my old friend, the costumier, at the corner of Hart-street will be called into requisition, and I'll wager my life he disguises you so well that you may defy detection."

"I believe that," said Turpin, "from what I have already seen of his capabilities in that way. But come, if we are to roost, show us the way at once."

Half-an-hour afterwards all three, notwithstanding their anxiety and danger, were sound asleep, but old Matthew was awake and keeping guard.

CHAPTER CXLI.

TOM KING IS FREED FROM HIS FETTERS, AND DULY PUT ON HIS TRIAL AT THE OLD BAILEY.

VERY, very wearily did the time pass for Tom King in his gloomy dungeon, but at length Wednesday morning came.

He had learned that Tom Davis and Ellen had been discharged by the magistrate, but that was all the news of the outer world that reached him.

What his friends were exactly doing for him of course he knew not, but still he felt convinced they were doing the best and all that lay in them, and the intelligence that his two old comrades, Claude and Jack, had returned, and were exerting themselves to the utmost in his behalf, was a source of great additional hope and satisfaction.

He passed rather a bad night on Tuesday, and awoke tired and unrefreshed. He, however, rose, and having plentifully sluiced his face with cold water, felt wonderfully better.

He had yet some hours to wait, for the court did not open till ten, and he knew his, although the most important, was not the first case on the list.

He breakfasted, and that served to pass away some of the time.

At eleven o'clock he heard a great bustle outside the cell, and then the door was thrown open.

He sprang to his feet, and saw several persons whose faces he was familiar with.

There was the chaplain and the governor, and Winch, the turnkey, and behind them all was the smith who had riveted his irons on.

"Ha! ha! Tom," cried Mr. Tapner, in what he intended to be a highly facetious manner. "Ha! ha! Tom, not got away yet, you see. Managed to keep you safely so far. Ha! ha!"

"Has my time come," asked Tom; "because if it has, I am ready."

"Yours is the next case, my friend. The one that is on now won't take long. Its only a case of assault. Yours wont take long, I fancy, either. Dear me, its as clear as the sun at noon-day."

"You don't say so!"

"Oh! you'll find it out soon enough, never fear. Judge Sykes will try the case. What do you think of that? Judge Sykes. Do you remember him, eh? You robbed him of his gold repeater and diamond snuff-box on Ealing-common about twelve months ago. If you've forgotten him, he recollects you. Ha! ha! I can fancy how pleased he will be with the evidence against you, and how impartially he will sum up and leave the case in the hands of the jury. Ha! ha!"

By no outward sign did Tom show that he was in the least moved by what Mr. Tapner said to him, but he did recollect Justice Sykes and the robbery spoken of, and he saw his hopes of an acquittal vanish into thin air.

"We are going to remove those ornaments," continued the governor, alluding to the prisoner's fetters, "and by that time you will be wanted in the court."

At a word from Mr. Tapner, the smith came forward and knocked the rivets out of the fetters, which fell with a clang into the floor of the cell, and then Tom King was free.

Comparatively free.

To be sure he was as much a prisoner as ever, but still he was free from the irons which had so long galled his limbs, and he felt a sensation of relief and freedom immediately.

Scarcely, however, had he time to stretch his limbs than the tinkle of a bell reached his ears.

"Come on!" cried the governor, "its your turn! Guard the prisoner, and don't keep the people waiting."

Two men preceded Tom along the corridor, and two followed, while two more walked on either side of him, having a firm hold of his hands, and the collar of his coat.

In this way the court was reached, and Tom King suddenly found himself in the presence of what seemed to him at the first glance an innumerable multitude—a boundless sea of human heads and faces.

It was only natural for him to shrink a little when he found so many eager eyes fastened upon him, but this was a feeling that he soon subdued, and he looked about him calmly.

The hum of many voices filled the court, which was crowded with persons all eager to obtain a sight of the celebrated highwayman.

At first Tom had been able to distinguish nothing; all had seemed one perfect mass, but now he was able to note distinctly the different objects around him.

Firstly, and most conspicuously, was the judge, whose countenance he immediately recognised.

That was Judge Sykes.

By his side sat one of his brethren.

His eyes next rested upon the clerk of the arraigns, in his seat immediately below the judges, and from him to the barristers who were seated at the table.

To the right were the boxes appropriated to reporters, witnesses, and privileged spectators.

To his left the jury-box and jurors, and further on the witness-box.

Above and behind him was the gallery, as usual crowded to suffocation.

All these different things he noticed in the space of about three seconds, as he glanced around him, and while the clerk of the arraigns was fumbling with the papers before him.

At length that individual rose with some rather formidable-looking parchments in his hands, attached near the upper left-hand corner with a piece of narrow coloured silk ribbon, and gave a prefatory cough.

"Si—lence!" cried the usher of the court, carefully dividing the syllables of the word by making a long pause between them, and laying particular stress upon the i. "Silence."

All become suddenly profoundly still.

The clerk of the arraigns, then, in a rapid, jangling tone of voice, for which such functionaries are noted, commenced reading the indictment against Tom King.

The document itself, with all its needless and ridiculous circumlocution, was sufficiently difficult to comprehend, but it seemed to be his particular object to make so desirable a thing as understanding it quite out of the question.

He gabbled away until at last he paused quite out of breath.

Very little attention appeared to be paid to it.

The jury conversed in whispers.

The barristers at the table either looked over their briefs, or busied themselves in mending the quill pens.

The judges leaned back in their seats with their eyes closed.

But if all these were indifferent to the reading of the indictment, Tom King was not. He leaned forward over the dock, and listened with the greatest eagerness.

But, alas! the mass of legal jargon in which the simple facts were contained was far above his comprehension, and beyond a sort of conciousness that he was charged with robbing some one of something, he could make out nothing, and that was a piece of information he was already in possession of.

From this it appeared pretty clear that he must wait for the opening speech of the prosecution before he could form any precise idea upon the subject.

The clerk of the arraigns wiped his face and regained his breath.

"Prisoner at the bar, you have heard the indictment against you read, do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

A dead silence followed this question, and then Tom King, in a clear, musical voice, which was heard with distinctness in the remotest corner of the court, said—

"Not guilty!"

The faint buzz, which generally succeeds these words, now rose.

Tom looked eagerly at the different countenances of the spectators.

He had a dim sort of consciousness in his mind that his friends were somewhere present in the crowded court, and a natural instinct made him wish to ascertain their whereabouts.

But he was disappointed.

They were there, however, and his eye had actually rested upon them, but he knew them not, so carefully were they disguised; and though they noticed his inquiring, wandering glance, they felt how very unwise it would be to acknowledge it in any way, since such an act would have had the inevitable result of attracting attention to them, the thing of all things which they had most need to fear.

CHAPTER CXLII.

THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION STATES THE CASE AGAINST TOM KING, AND THE EVIDENCE OF MR. JOSEPH POWIS IS OF A VERY CONCLUSIVE CHARACTER INDEED.

"SI—LENCE!" said the crier again.

Then the counsel for the prosecution rose, and, glancing around him, adjusted his robes about him.

Everybody was instantly on the alert.

But no one listened with an interest equal to Tom King, if we may except his friends, who were then in court.

Amid, then, a most profound silence, the counsel began his address.

He assumed his favourite attitude—that is, he hooked his left thumb in the armhole of his waistcoat, while in his right hand he held his brief.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury:—

"The prisoner at the bar, I am sorry to say, is already only too well known by you, for although he is young, and his career of villainy as yet has necessarily been but short, yet he has managed to create for himself a most unenviable notoriety throughout the length and breadth of the land.

"As is well known, he has by various artifices, managed for a considerable time to elude the grasp of justice; but a day came—as he well knew it must come—when a termination was put to his depredations, and now he stands before you at the bar to answer the charges which will be brought against him.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I feel it is hardly necessary to state that the penalty which the law of the land awards for such offences as those he has been guilty of is death at the hands of the common executioner; but a repetition of that fact by me at the present moment can only have the effect of heightening the solemnity of these proceedings, as well as reminding you of the painful duty which you will have to perform.

"The prisoner, then, stands at the bar of this court to answer with his life the charges made against him; and although I hope you will not, while so much is at stake, draw a too hasty conclusion, yet, on the other hand, I hope, should he be proved by evidence to be guilty, that you will not shrink, through any false feeling of humanity or sentiment, from performing that duty which you owe to society at large for the protection of lives and property, however painful you may find it to be."

The counsel paused, it is presumed, to give additional importance, to what he said, and then resumed:—

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, it now becomes my province to state as briefly and clearly as possible the facts that will be brought before you in evidence.

"Firstly, then, it appears that on the twelfth of November last past Mr. Joseph Powis, a respectable tradesman, carrying on business as a maker of hardware goods, and residing at Birmingham, having business in London, did set out from that place in a coach, duly licensed for the conveyance of passengers.

'On reaching the neighbourhood of London, at which place the coach is due at six o'clock in the morning, and being still quite dark, the inmates of the coach were alarmed by the trampling of horses' feet, which was immediately followed by a voice calling to the coachman to halt, and the report of a pistol.

"The driver of the coach, gentlemen of the jury, finding his life in danger, brought the vehicle to a standstill, and was then compelled, under pain of death, to sit motionless upon the box.

"The driver, who will appear before you, and the guard also, will swear that the coach was attacked by two highwaymen, both well armed and mounted on steeds of a superior description, and that while one of the villains plundered those passengers on the roof of the coach, the other, letting down the window, plundered those within it.

"Mr. Joseph Powis, the chief witness in the case, was one of the inside passengers, and is prepared to swear that the prisoner at the bar, presenting a loaded pistol at his head, compelled him to hand over a considerable sum of money, at the same time declaring himself to be Tom King, the highwayman, and apparently glorying in his villainy.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, it will be further shown that, having robbed the passengers of all their valuables, the scoundrels decamped. Upon information of the robbery being given, warrants were made out for their apprehension, and officers of police despatched in pursuit. For a long time they were unsuccessful, and many more deeds of violence were committed, so that at length it was deemed expedient to call in the aid of the military, and eventually the prisoner at the bar was captured by a troop of dragoons at a place not far from Southampton, but his accomplice as yet remains at large, a terror to all those who are necessitated to travel with articles of value about their person.

"From all this, gentlemen of the jury, it will be seen that the case against the prisoner at the bar is fearfully clear, distinct, and complete; and having stated the different events, it will now become my duty to call before you certain witnesses who will depose to the truth of the facts I have laid before you."

The counsel threw his brief upon the table, and sat down.

Tom understood all now.

He saw how impossible it was to say anything in defence of what was alleged against him.

The statement which had been made by the counsel for the prosecution was a perfectly true narration of what had taken place on the occasion of Turpin and King robbing the Warwick mail, as described in the twenty-first chapter of this history.

The two judges whispered to each other.

The "gentlemen of the jury" tried to look sagely at each other, and then shook their heads.

The counsel for the prosecution having arranged his papers, cried—

"The first witness called is Mr. Joseph Powis!"

"Mr. Joseph Powis!" repeated the usher.

In obedience to the summons, the sharp-featured man, who had been rather strangely denominated as a maker of Brummagem buttons, made his way to the witness-box, and was duly sworn.

"Now, Mr. Powis, be good enough to state what took place on the twelfth of last November."

"I received a letter from a house I do business with in London, which made it necessary for me to set out on a journey to that place."

"You were then in Birmingham?"

"I was."

"Well, what next?"

"I took an inside seat in the Warwick mail, and all went well till we reached a village on the outskirts of London."

"When was that?"

"About half-past four on the morning of the fifteenth, or rather the sixteenth of November."

"What took place then?"

"We got to a very dark and lonely bit of road, and then I heard the trampling of horses' feet, and a loud voice crying to the coachman to pull up, on pain of death, and then I heard the report of a pistol."

"What next?"

"Before I had time to recover my surprise the coach window was let down, and a man appeared at it, and demanded our money, watches, rings, and whatever else of value we possessed. The man was armed with pistols, and declared his intention to shoot those who offered the least resistance."

"Go on."

"To save themselves from personal violence, the other passengers gave him what they had, and I offered him a guinea, but he swore he would count three, and if then I did not hand over all the money I possessed, he would shoot me dead. So, to save my life, I gave him a bag containing a hundred guineas, and then he rode away."

"Very good," said the counsel; "you have given your evidence in a very satisfactory manner indeed."

"I have forgotten one thing."

"Let us hear it."

"The man who robbed us said, 'I daresay you know my name—its Tom King,' or words to that effect."

"Exactly—and I presume you had a good look at the highwayman's face?"

"I did, sir."

"Then look round the court, and tell me whether you can see the man."

"That's him, sir, standing at the dock. I should know him from a thousand, and I'm ready to swear to him at any minute."

CHAPTER CXLIII.

JUDGE SYKES PASSES SENTENCE OF DEATH ON TOM KING.

THE evidence which had just been given by Mr. Joseph Powis, and, above all, his unhesitating willingness to swear to the identity of the prisoner was so conclusive that all in court looked upon the case as settled.

The tale he told was too straightforward and circumstantial to allow of a flaw being found in it, and the counsel that Lawyer Lazenby had employed, who was an uncommonly sharp fellow, threw down his pen, and leaned back in his chair without a word to say on behalf of the prisoner.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury," said the counsel for the prosecution, "will it now be necessary to call the other witnesses I have spoken of, or do you feel yourself satisfied with the testimony given by Mr. Joseph Powis?"

"Who appears on behalf of the prisoner?" asked the judge.

"I do, my lord."

It was the sharp practitioner who spoke.

Tom looked at him and shook his head, as much as to say it was no good his saying anything.

"Then," said the judge, "have you any questions to ask of this last witness?"

"I have, my lord."

"Very well," replied the judge, and he leaned back in his chair in a manner which showed how little interest he felt in what was going to be said, or how much importance he attached to it.

"Now, Mr. Powis, the night, or rather the morning, in question was rather a dark one, was it not?"

"It was."

"I thought so. I understood you to say such was the case, and, further, that the coach at the time it was stopped had just reached a very dark part of the road."

"That is quite correct, sir."

"Then let me advise you to be careful. If it was a dark night, and the coach was in a dark part of the road, how in the world could you see the face of the man who robbed you well enough to swear to his identity?"

Mr. Powis was silent.

"Mind, you're on your oath," said Tom's counsel; "think before you speak. Are you quite sure that it was the prisoner at the bar who committed the robbery upon you?"

"Yes, I am."

"You saw his face, then?"

"Yes, sir, I did, quite plainly."

"But how?"

"The lamp that was burning in the roof enabled me to do so."

"The lamp?"

"Yes; and not only that: he said his name was Tom King, and that is the name of the man at the bar."

"Yes, yes, that is all very fine, but it is not evidence. Are you still prepared to swear to the identity of the prisoner at the bar?"

"I am, sir; I saw him quite plain, and I heard him speak, and I am prepared to swear to his voice as well."

"Really," said the judge, opening his eyes and leaning forward, "really, it appears to me our learned friend is merely trifling with the time of the court. The evidence of this man Powis is, in my opinion, quite clear, complete, and unshaken."

"Then, of course, my lord," said Tom's counsel, sitting down, "it is no use for me to speak any further, and I bow to your decision."

"Have you any witnesses for the defence?"

"None, my lord."

"Then I opine the case is ended. There can be no need to call further witnesses for the prosecution, and I shall at once proceed to sum up, and leave the case in the hands of the jury."

There was a momentary pause, during which the judge pretended to read over his notes.

"Silence!" cried the ushers.

Then the judge, in a mumbling tone of voice, commenced summing up.

"Gentlemen of the jury,—

"The case now about to be laid before you for your consideration is so clear and perfect, that it will be no trouble for you to come to a decision.

"The prisoner at the bar, who appears to be allowed on all sides to be Thomas King, the highwayman, has, upon the evidence of a highly respectable tradesman, been shown to have committed a daring robbery.

"In the most positive manner he swears he was in the Warwick coach, that Tom King, the highwayman, rode up the coach-door, robbed the passengers, and took from him a bag containing a large sum in gold.

"To corroborate this, there are the coachman and the guard of the coach.

"I leave the case, gentlemen, in your hands. So straightforward a one has never before been brought before me, and it is impossible for you to come to any other conclusion than that the prisoner at the bar is guilty of the offence with which he is charged, as also of many more of a similar character."

The judge concluded his brief summing up with these words.

It must be confessed he put the case rather strong before the jury, but then, think of the circumstances of the case.

Besides which, a hundred years ago justice was much more loosely administered than it is now.

Of course the jury went through the form of consulting together upon the verdict, and then the foreman turned round, and they took their seats.

An intense silence now prevailed in the crowded court.

The clerk of the arraigns rose and said—

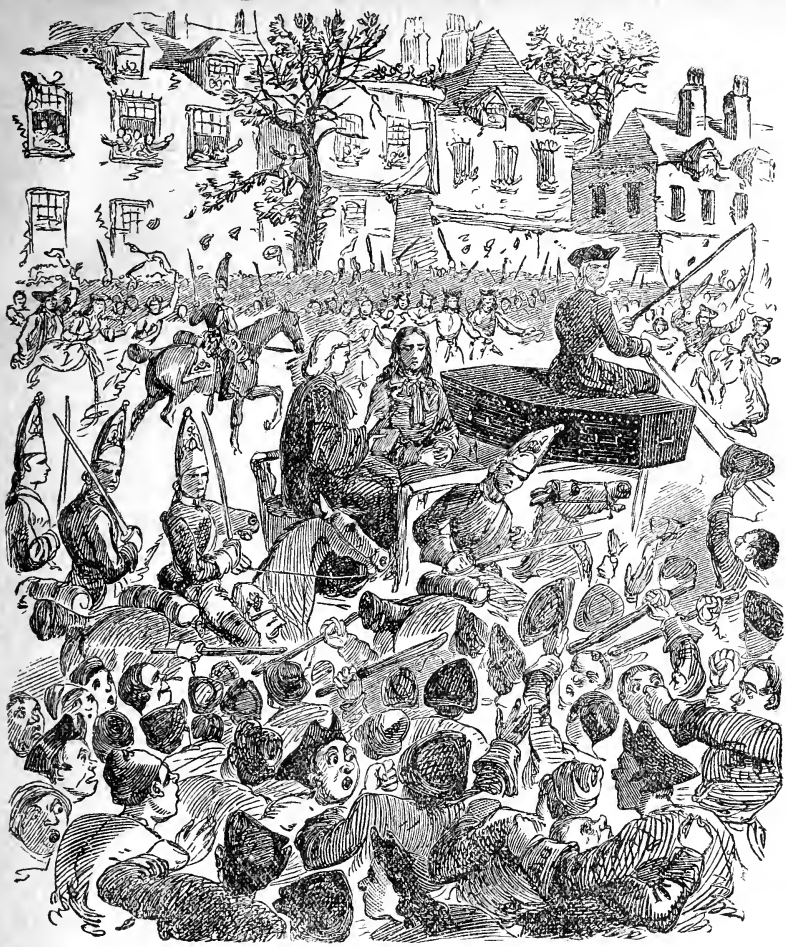
"Gentlemen of the jury, do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty of the charge brought against him?"

The foreman replied, in a clear voice—

"Guilty!"

A murmur arose from the crowd. The result was just what they expected.

Tom King assumed as much firmness of demeanour as he could under the circumstances, and looked the judge firmly in the face.



The clerk of the arraigns spoke—

"Prisoner at the bar, have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

The judge stooped and produced the black cap, which he carefully adjusted upon his head, and then, addressing Tom King, he spoke in the following manner:—

"Prisoner at the bar, you have this day been found guilty by a jury of your countrymen for an offence which you undoubtedly committed. It is to be deplored that there are others like yourself engaged in making war upon society, but I trust they will take warning by your fate, or they will assuredly meet with the same termination to their careers.

"The crime of robbery in the highways has lately increased to an alarming and insufferable extent, insomuch that it is now unsafe and dangerous for any one to go abroad alone.

[TOM KING ON HIS WAY TO TYBURN.]

"Now, this is a state of things which cannot be permitted to continue. The most effective steps will be taken therefore to suppress it, and in all cases where the charge is fully proved, and the prisoner found guilty, the full penalty of the law will be rigorously enforced.

"Prisoner at the bar, you, in common with every other person now present in this court, must be aware that the penalty due to such crimes as you have committed is death.

"You cannot have the plea that you were in ignorance of the consequences which would ensue upon your capture. What you did you must have done with the certainty of at one time suffering an ignominious death staring you in the face.

"But, in defiance of this, you still persevered in the evil course you had commenced. It may indeed be said that you, as an individual, made war against society as a body. There could be but one termination of such a struggle, and that would result in your defeat.'

The judge paused a second or so, and then continued—

"However much sympathy and commiseration may be felt by those who are now present for your unhappy position and awful impending death, yet there is another whose feelings must be almost, if not quite, as painful as your own.

"I allude, of course, to myself. Sitting here as I do in the capacity of judge and representative of the laws of the land, it is my duty to pass sentence of death upon you. In some cases this dreadful duty is somewhat lightened by the thought that some reprieve or pardon might be obtained, but in the present instance I have no such consolation. Your deeds of violence have been too many and too great for there to be a probability that any mitigation of your sentence will take place.

"Therefore I must adjure you to cast as much as possible all thoughts of this world from your mind, and prepare for the one you are about so soon to enter. I shall summon what courage I can to pass the dread sentence of death upon you; do you in like manner strive your utmost to receive it with composure, for it is my duty to assure you that there is not the slightest room for you to hope for any mercy.

"Prisoner at the bar, the sentence of this court, then, upon you is, that you be taken from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence to the place of public execution, which is appointed to be Tyburn; that you be there hanged until you be dead, and your body afterwards taken down and hung in chains as a terror to all evildoers and a warning to those who may think of embracing your mode of life. Let me most earnestly and solemnly entreat you to spend the short space of time which is allotted you to live in listening to prayers and religious conversations of the ordinary appointed to the prison, that you may look for that mercy from your Creator which you cannot hope to receive from your fellow-men; therefore, may the Lord have mercy on your soul!"

CHAPTER CXLIV.

MR. SHERIFF BLANDY AND THE GOVERNOR SETTLE OFF OLD SCORES.

PERFECT silence prevailed for at least a minute after the judge had finished uttering those awful words, which doomed an erring fellow-creature like himself to death.

All eyes were bent upon the prisoner.

Notwithstanding the hopes he had of escape, and the confidence he felt in the power and will of his companions to save him, yet it was not possible for him to be otherwise than deeply moved at his present situation.

Only a portion of the judge's words reached his understanding. The remainder was one uncertain hum, though he was all the time conscious of its import.

And during this period there rushed upon his mind all the more important occurrences of his past life. Above all, stood out the faithlessness of the girl he had loved so well, and to whom his present situation might be fairly enough attributed, for had she remained constant to him he would have been an ornament to society, for which he possessed every necessary qualification.

The last words of the judge's speech, and which to him seemed naught but a hideous mockery, aroused him from the state of abstraction into which he had fallen.

Then, when the last syllable was fairly articulated, he looked anxiously into the faces of the different spectators, in a vain attempt to find whether his friends were actually there present, and to judge by the expression of their countenances what effect the termination of the trial had upon them.

But as on the former occasion, although his gaze more than once rested upon them, yet he knew them not, owing to the care with which they had been disguised.

A jailer now tapped him upon the shoulder, and, turning round at the touch, he saw they were waiting to remove him from the bar.

Seeing this, he looked no more at the countenances of the spectators, looked no longer upon the stern features of the judge, but at once turned round and accompanied them.

Despite his efforts to compose himself, he was much dejected. It was indeed scarcely possible for a human being to pass through such an ordeal as he had, without feeling some emotion.

Indeed, had he have appeared callous, we should have ceased to retain the good opinion we have of him, for, although he sinned and set himself up in opposition to the laws, yet it was only under great provocation.

The short passage which led from the dock was very quickly traversed, and then Tom found himself in a small apartment, face to face with his old enemy, the governor, whose animal-looking face beamed with a diabolical satisfaction.

"Ha! ha. You'll alter your tune now, I'll be bound. I told you how it would be. We've made up our minds to hang you, and we'll do it. Try as you will, you cannot avert your doom. It won't be long, too, before your villainous companion shares your fate, and then the gallows will have had its due."

"You reckon upon cheating it, then, do you?" said Tom, quietly.

"Don't insult me, you scoundrel," cried the governor, mad with passion, for, just as Tom finished his dry remark, he heard it followed by a laugh, and, turning in the direction whence it came, he saw Mr. Blandy sidle into the room.

"What do you mean, sir?" roared the governor.

"What do you mean?"

"Mean by what?" asked the sheriff, with a coolness that provoked the governor to the last degree.

"Your conduct, sir!"

"My conduct?"

"Yes. I should like to know what you mean by encouraging the prisoners to set my authority at defiance, and insult me to my face. I ask you again, what do you mean by it?"

"My dear sir, pray don't be so violent, but just answer me a question. Why did you speak so unbecomingly to a man in the situation of the prisoner here? Did it look as if you had one spark of manliness in you? None but a craven-hearted man would have behaved thus to a defenceless man. It shows a mean, malicious spirit, and you richly deserve what you have got, and a great deal more beside!"

"Quit this room, sir!" shrieked the governor, whose rage now got completely master of him. "Quit this room, or I'll have you turned out of it! Quit the room, I say!"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," said the sheriff; "and if you will condescend to take a word of advice from me, you will be very cautious as to what you are about!"

"You be d—d, and your caution too!" replied the governor, clenching his fists, and walking in a bullying manner up to him. "Will you leave the room?"

"Most certainly not!" said the sheriff, thrusting the governor from him, for he had thrust his face into his. "I have an equal right here with yourself!"

"What do you mean by striking me, sir?" said the governor. "Perhaps you think you have a right to do that, but I'm d—d if I don't convince you to the contrary! Take that!—and that!"

As he spoke these words, the governor gave the sheriff a couple of heavy blows in the face, which made that gentleman stagger back a few paces.

Nevertheless, he maintained his composure, and said, calmly—

"I call upon all here to witness that I was struck first, and now, Mr. Tapner, we'll settle off our old scores!"

At these words, then, he made a rush at the governor, and laid about him with right good will.

Tom King, in spite of his dejection, enjoyed this scene mightily, and he was delighted beyond measure to find that the good-natured sheriff was considerably more than a match for the rascally governor.

As for the turnkeys who were present, their gratification was unbounded, though they concealed it as much as they could.

Nor could they very well interfere, for their duty was to keep firm hold of their prisoner.

The sheriff danced round and round in a manner that not only exhibited uncommon agility, but also quite baffled Mr. Tapner, who, blinded by rage and the blows he had received, knew not where to expect his adversary's attack, and as for returning his blows, that was quite out of the question.

The contest was not of very long duration, and just as Mr. Blandy gave the governor the blow which decided the battle, the door was opened, and the Lord Mayor, followed by several of the other city dignitaries (?) entered.

They looked at each other, speechless and aghast, at the extraordinary scene before them.

Mr. Blandy wiped his face with his handkerchief.

He had sustained but little injury from his opponent, who was stretched at full length upon the floor.

"What's the meaning of this?" asked the Lord Mayor.

All were silent.

"Will no one answer me?" asked the mayor.

"Will you permit me to speak, sir?" said Tom King quietly.

"Who are you?"

"Never mind. A prisoner, if you like, but a witness as what has just taken place."

"And can you explain it?"

"I can."

"Do so, then."

Mr. Tapner, the governor, insulted Mr. Blandy in such a degree that it was impossible not to resent it. He did, however, control himself, and then the governor without further provocation, struck him two heavy blows in the face. Staggering back, but still maintaining his composure, Mr. Blandy called upon us to bear witness that he had been struck first, and then gave Mr Tapner a sound thrashing, as he deserved."

"It's a lot of d—d lies!" yelled the governor, struggling to a sitting posture; "it's a lot of d—d lies, I tell you!"

"Mr. Governor," said the Lord Mayor, sternly, "be careful, or I shall have to fine you five shillings for swearing."

"D—n you all!" replied Mr. Tapner. "You can fine me what the devil you like!"

CHAPTER CXLV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL PROPOSE A SCHEME OF FIGURE OPERATIONS, AND ELECT DICK TURPIN CAPTAIN.

WHATEVER amount of prudence the governor may have possessed, it was pretty clear by this last defiant speech of his that the whole of it had departed.

The Lord Mayor looked all the surprise he felt.

"Mr. Tapner," he said, "I shall report this to the Secretary of State, and insist upon an investigation of your conduct being made."

"Do that, sir," said Tom; "and the result will be that he will lose his office, and it is a disgrace to the city so long as he retains it."

"Villain!" yelled the governor, whose rage burst forth again upon hearing the tones of Tom King's voice. "Villain! you are the cause of all this, but you shall suffer for it."

So saying, he made a wild kind of rush at Tom.

Now, the reader must bear in mind that King was not fettered in any way, although two men had hold of him by the shoulder.

Accordingly, when the governor came towards him, he, in the most natural manner possible, lifted his left hand and gave him such a crack between the eyes, that the governor fell flat down on the floor, as though he had been shot.

"Take that as a receipt in full of the little account between us," said Tom. "I hope you saw, gentlemen, that if I had not defended myself, he would have done me a mischief."

"Upon my word this transcends all I ever saw or heard of," exclaimed the Lord Mayor. "Officers, remove the prisoner to his cell at once, and in the meantime we will have the affair between Mr. Tapner and Mr. Blandy gone into."

Tom suffered himself to be led away unresistingly, but he felt much better now that he had really paid back to the governor some of the harsh usage he had received at his hands.

"I'm blest," said one of the turnkeys, as they led their prisoner to the condemned cell. "I'm blest if this isn't the rummest start that ever I heard on. I knew old Tapner would drop into it some day, he is so werry violent."

"Serves him right," said the other. "Tom, that was a first-rate blow you gave him. Right in between his eyes."

Tom King made no reply to these remarks from his janitors, and they put him in the condemned cell.

It was the duty of these men not upon any account to lose sight of their prisoner, so they sat down with him much in the manner Biggs and Wilson had done.

Tom was still without his irons, nor would they, without orders from the governor, be put upon him; but for all that he was quite without a hope of making his escape.

After all that had occurred on that, to him, eventful day, he felt it no little relief to lie down upon his rude couch, and try to think.

As he did so, and weighed over all the circumstances carefully in his mind, he was ready to give himself up to despair.

There was no way that he could see in which his friends could rescue him. The authorities had, as Mr. Tapner said, one and all made up their minds that he should hang, and having come to such a determination, and knowing the character of the prisoner and his friends, they would not be likely to omit anything in the shape of precaution.

We may as well say here that Mr. Tapner was suspended, and a deputy appointed in his stead, who was to act as governor until the charges brought against his predecessor were disposed of.

This deputy was a man who had long been on the look out for the situation of governor of Newgate, and as he had influence, had been promised it so soon as it should become vacant.

It was pretty clear that Mr. Tapner would be discharged, so this deputy determined upon using the utmost vigilance, so that he might be appointed to the vacant place.

Knowing, then, the fears that were entertained that the prisoner, Thomas King, would make an escape, and that his accomplices might be expected to take some energetic, daring steps to set him free, he resolved to try if he could not keep him secure.

The determination to hang the notorious highwayman was well known to him, so immediately upon being invested with authority he had Tom heavily ironed, and, moreover, secured to the wall, while four men, instead of two, were placed in the cell to guard him.

They were regularly relieved at intervals of two hours.

When Tom saw this he indeed gave himself up to despair, and trembled with the dread that his friends might make a fruitless effort to save him, which would result in their capture.

And so the day wearily passed away.

It was at that time the custom for a condemned man to receive as many visitors as often as he liked in his cell, and to be indulged with whatever things he thought proper.

On the day after the trial old Matthew came to see Tom.

The interview took place in the presence of the four men, so that little could be said.

Tom managed, however, to convey in a whisper the hope that Dick and his comrades would not risk their lives by attempting to take him out of Newgate, for sentinels were posted at every available spot, and an alarm could be instantly communicated.

To this old Matthew bid him to be of good cheer, that the highwaymen had sworn to save him from death, and they would do it, let what obstacles would arise.

But all this was conveyed with great difficulty, owing to the presence of the four men.

When Matthew had departed, however, Tom felt himself much easier in his mind than he had before his visit; he had reliance upon the power of his friends to save him.

But Tom's life, during the four days that preceded the one fixed for his execution, was monotonous enough, and too devoid of interest for it to be entertaining to our readers to describe it in detail.

Let it suffice to say that during the time Mr. Colley, the ordinary, was very attentive to him. Indeed, since the downfall of his coadjutor, he had very much altered his behaviour.

At length Sunday came.

The execution was to take place at Tyburn at twelve o'clock on Monday.

Tom maintained his composure.

In the afternoon Matthew paid him another visit, during which he managed to let Tom know that active exertions were being made to save him, and that he was to hope up to the last moment, and by no means to let his courage fail him.

This he promised to do.

And now we feel that we can leave him, and devote our attention exclusively to the proceedings of his friends.

It will be remembered that the last time they were brought particularly under the notice of the reader was when, having arrived at the "White Horse," they had, by the advice of old Matthew, made their way up stairs to a sleeping apartment, in order to obtain a few hours' rest and sleep.

Scarcely had the sun rose, then, on the following morning, than the three highwaymen awoke, and hastily attiring themselves, went down stairs to the little parlour behind the bar, where they found old Matthew waiting for them.

A substantial breakfast was placed upon the table, to which they did ample justice.

"And now," said old Matthew, as he looked up at the dingy-faced eight-day clock in the corner, "it is just a quarter to seven. The judges will take their seats at ten, so we must be at the Old Bailey at least an hour before that time."

"Well," said Claude, "what of that?"

"It will never do for you to walk up to the Sessions House dressed as you now are. You would be suspected, if not recognised at once. Dick knows the way to an old costumier's at the corner of Hart-street, Covent-garden, who disguised him once."

"And well he did it," replied Turpin. "I shall never forget my astonishment when he led me to a looking-glass and showed me, not myself, but an old, wrinkled, bowed-down farmer."

"He is second to none in his skill in disguising people. He first learned the art by dressing actors for the stage, and he has made it a kind of study. I dare venture to say that when you go to him he will disguise you so well that you shall neither of you know each other."

"If he does that," said Sixteen-String Jack, "he is a clever artificer indeed, but you will excuse me for saying that I doubt it."

"I can easily understand your doing that," rejoined the landlord, "but you will nevertheless find that I am no more than right. If you will take my advice, you will start off and see him at once, before many people get in the streets. It would be dangerous if you were to be seen to go in by some prying, meddling fellow, and then not to come out again."

"Leave that to me," said Turpin; "I know the way, and I know the old man. He won't be sorry to have me again for a customer, for I paid him liberally the last time for his trouble. Come, my friends, are you ready?"

"Quite," said Claude and Jack. "Lead on, captain."

"I shall object to you applying that title to me."

"And wherefore?"

"Because I do not deserve it any more than you do."

"Pho! pho! Dick, listen to me," said Claude Duval. "Jack and myself have talked the matter over between us. We have agreed to rescue Tom, have we not?"

"We have," replied Dick, "and we will do it."

"Of course. We need not be uneasy about that, and when we have done it we agreed to form ourselves into a band of four, and perform such exploits as should make our names remembered for ever, even as Robin Hood's is to this day."

"We did—we did!"

"Very well, then. Four men cannot act in concert without a leader. That is true, is it not?"

"Perfectly true," replied Dick Turpin. "No army could gain a victory without a general."

"That is just the remark Claude made when I spoke to him upon the subject," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and, such being the case, we must look upon ourselves as an army, and choose a general. We have resolved that it shall be you."

"Of course I feel flattered at your preference," said Dick; "but we need Tom's consent first."

"Not so; the majority of votes will decide the question, though I know well enough he will agree to it at once."

"Well, if you will have it so," said Turpin, "it is not for me to say not."

"Of course not," said Claude.

"We have determined, as I said, to form ourselves into a band of four," continued Sixteen-String Jack. "You shall be our leader. We will then act only under your commands."

"Well—well," said Turpin, "let us talk further about that when Tom King is amongst us."

"Certainly; but do you not see the advantages that would ensue from such an arrangement? We should be able to defy all efforts at capture, for, together, we should be a match for more than twice our number, and what traveller would be in a position to resist us?"

"No one!" laughed Dick; "that would be a merry time."

"We will take only from those who can afford to lose," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and, whenever we have an opportunity, hold out a helping hand to those in distress. In fine, we will, if you like it, constitute ourselves the champions of innocence against wrong, as the knight errants did of old, and our chief business shall be to redress grievances and succour the unfortunate."

"It is a grand and noble purpose," said Turpin; "and I shall feel proud to be at the head of such a confederation. I am firmly of opinion that we shall be the means of foiling the machinations of many evil ones against the good; and let us hope that the performance of every one of these deeds will weigh in our favour against those crimes we have from time to time committed."

CHAPTER CXLVI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN FIND THE COSTUMIER'S HOUSE FULL OF DANGER.

"It's all very fine for you three to stand chattering there, laying your plans for the future," said old Matthew Gale, in a good-tempered voice, as soon as Dick Turpin had finished speaking. "I say, it's all very fine, but in my humble opinion it would look far better if you would proceed to action."

"You are right," they cried, "it is quite time for action now, or we shall not be in time to get in."

"Follow Dick," said Matthew, "he knows the way to the old crib; he has been there before."

"Yes—yes!" said Turpin. "I will go out first, and you two can follow me at a little distance. We shall not be so likely to excite suspicion then!"

"Do you think there is any danger?" asked Claude.

"No more than usual. It is best to be cautious, and at this hour the streets begin to fill with people."

"They do—they do! and so the sooner you start the better."

"Look after Black Bess, Matthew," said Turpin, to the landlord, as he left the little parlour.

"Don't be afraid of that, she will be all right!"

"I knew I can trust her to your care."

"You can, Dick, with every safety. I would not have anything happen to her while she was under my charge for all the world. When you leave Hart-street, you had better make your way direct to the Old Bailey. I shall be there among the other spectators, and it will be the best plan, if you should happen to see me, not to recognise me."

"Of course! I'm off! Now, my friends, follow me! I shall cross Drury-lane and go down Russell-street, by the side of the theatre."

"Right!"

Turpin, assuming the air of a casual visitor to the inn, sauntered quietly along the passage, and stood calmly for a minute at the door.

He looked up and down the street.

To have seen him, one would have set him down as an idler, who had nowhere particular to go, and was debating which direction he should take.

It was a finished piece of acting.

It was done with an important motive in view.

Listlessly as his eyes appeared to wander about, yet in reality his glance was never more keen.

His object was to ascertain that there was no foe of his in sight.

The coast appeared quite clear. A good many people, of course, were in the street, considering the time in the morning, but that they were all ordinary pedestrians intent upon their own business, he was pretty certain.

Having assured himself of this, still keeping up the character of an idler, which he had assumed, he stepped off the doorstep and strolled up Drury-lane.

He went nearly as far as the corner of Princes-street, and then he crossed over to the corner of the theatre.

As he did so, he cast a hasty glance in the direction whence he had come, and saw, to his great satisfaction, his two friends walking along arm in arm.

They crossed over a little lower down.

Now that he knew they must have him in sight, Dick did not venture to look behind him again, but once more crossing over near the stage door of the theatre, he turned down Crown-court, which place is well known to many of our readers because it is there that the celebrated Dr. Cumming's Chapel is situated.

It is scarcely necessary to observe that it has been built since Dick Turpin's time, and that the court itself was not then the smooth, clean, well-paved, respectable thoroughfare that it is now.

On the contrary, it was rather notorious as the residence of several desperate characters, whose occupation was, for the most part, nocturnal.

Along this court, then, to its junction with Martlett's court, Dick Turpin went at a steady pace.

Turning round to his left, about fifty more steps took him into Bow-street, a few yards only above where the well-known police-office is situated.

Before he emerged into this last-named thoroughfare, he thought his most prudent plan would be to reconnoitre.

Accordingly placing his hand against the wall, he leaned forward, so that he could take a good look down the street.

While thus engaged, Claude and Jack came up with him.

"Is it all right?" asked the latter.

"I think so," replied Dick. "I see nothing suspicious.

"Then we will venture."

"In a minute, I will show you the house first."

"Do so—do so!"

"You see that large building, there, nearly opposite?"

"You mean Covent Garden Theatre?"

"I do."

"Of course!"

"Then perhaps you also know that that very narrow street running down by the side of it furthest from here is Hart-street."

"No I did not know that."

"Well, it is, and that shop at the corner, where the shutters are all up, is the residence of the costumier."

"Oh!"

"I will go over first," continued Dick, "and do you wait here. I know the secret of asking for admission. As soon as you see me enter, cross over, but not before. I will leave the door ajar, so that you can push it open and enter without delay."

"Agreed; that will be the best plan to adopt, and the safest as well, I should think. Before you start, though, I should recommend you to take another look down the street."

To those who are familiar with the place, the following description will be unnecessary, but it will be interesting to those who are not.

Martlett's-court, then, is a narrow court on the east side of Bow-street, and nearly opposite the glass building attached to the Royal Italian Opera House, known as the Floral Hall.

The Bow-street police-station is about half a dozen houses lower down on the same side of the road, and nearly opposite which is the court, where the magistrate sits every morning.

In this narrow passage, which is more like the entrance to a house than anything else, our three friends could stand very well concealed.

Dick was able, therefore, by peeping round the corner, and only permitting just the top of his head to be visible, to see right down the street, past the police-station, for the street in that part curves round a little.

As upon the former occasion all seemed quite well. Even the one police officer, who was nearly always to be seen standing at the door of the station, was just at that time absent from his post.

Dick Turpin, perceiving all was well, made a sign with his hands to his friends to remain where they were, and crossed over.

Claude and Jack Rann watched him with the greatest attention go up the two steps before the door of the costumier's abode, and then almost disappear in the depths of the old-fashioned doorway.

It was now more than ever necessary for them to be upon the alert to watch for the door opening.

It was full five minutes though before it did, and their patience was by that time well nigh exhausted.

They then crossed over.

The door was ajar, as Dick had told them it would be, and they were inside in a trice.

The old costumier, looking older, dirtier, and untidier than before, stood just inside the shop with an unnaturally thin candle in his trembling grasp.

And now, if either of the three highwaymen could have seen into the street, they would have perceived something which would have convinced them that their situation in the old costumier's shop was one of extreme danger.

From the shadow of a doorway adjoining Martlett's-court there emerged a bulky figure.

As he came fully out into the faint morning light his costume could be seen to be that of a police-officer.

He put his finger to the side of his nose, while a look of intense cunning overspread his face.

"Werry suspicious circumstance, indeed," he said; "and werry suspicious-looking characters, too. If I didn't know he was out of the country, I should say one of the two that crossed over last was Claude Duval! Who knows, he may have come back, and, if it should turn out to be him, what a capital thing it will be for me! I will just cross over after them and put my ear to the keyhole of the door. Likely enough I shall hear something that will repay me for my trouble.'

In pursuance of this determination, the "active and enterprising officer," as the newspaper reporter would call him, crossed the street and put his ear against the panel of the door.

But, although he strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, he could hear nothing but the murmuring of voices, without being able to distinguish what was said.

Finding this to be the case, he gave up the hope of learning anything by that means, and he bethought himself of another.

He put his eye to the keyhole.

And here arose one advantage from the feeble light the old man carried. The officer could just see into the shop, but none of the objects were distinctly defined.

The circumstance of his not being able to hear what was said can only be attributed to the fact that our friends were very careful to speak only just above a whisper, and, as for the old man himself, his voice was weak and tremulous from age and weakness.

These little obstacles had the very natural effect of inflaming the officer's curiosity, but he could see no way in which he could satisfy it.

After trying to peep through the chinks in the window-shutters, and finding it impossible, he gave up the attempt in despair.

"Now what will be the best thing I can do?" he said to himself, reflectively. "Oh! there goes Tom Price; I'll ask him."

Hereupon the officer beckoned to one of his brethren, who was coming slowly from the direction of Long-acre.

"Tom," he whispered, making a kind of tube with his hand to convey the sound. "Tom!"

"Wot's the row, now?"

"Hush! Come here."

The officer, who had been named by his companion Tom Price, was so impressed with the mysterious manner of his friend, that he surmised something very particular was up, and he approached him with stealthy steps.

"Tom Price," said the first officer, as he caught the person he addressed by the collar, and pulled him towards him. "Tom Price!"

"What is it? Speak, and don't be a fool!"

"I've seen three suspicious-looking individuals come out of Martlett's-court."

"Did you? When?"

"Just a minute or two ago, and they went into this shop in a very mysterious way, and they haven't come out yet."

The two officers endeavoured to look profoundly wise.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

MR. WRIGGLES IS DETERMINED NOT TO BE THIS TIME BAULKED OF HIS PREY.

"WHAT sort of looking coves was they, Gibbs?" asked Price, after a pause.

"Ah! there's the most important thing. Unless I make a great mistake, they are all three high tobymen, for that's just what they look like!"

"The devil!"

"You may well say that!"

"But didn't you recognise them?"

"Well, I can't say I did; but if it had not been that he's out of the country"——

"Who?"

"Why, Claude Duval! If I didn't know he was out of England, I should say one was Claude Duval!"

"He may have come back."

"That's what I think. Suppose it should be him."

"What's the reward?"

"I don't know. Something handsome, you may depend."

"And they all three went into that shop, you say?"

"They did. "I seed 'em with my own eyes."

"Why, its the old theatrical property-shop."

"I knows that."

"Then I shouldn't wonder if they haven't gone in to disguise themselves."

This was so probable a supposition that they both jumped to the conclusion that it must be correct.

"Its a lucky thing for us, Tom. Let's go to the station, and lay the information."

"Very good."

"Yet, stop! There's no occasion for us both to go. You stay here, and keep watch while I run across myself."

"Agreed; but don't be no longer nor you can help."

"Trust me for that," said Gibbs, as he ran off. "You mind and keep a sharp eye on the premises."

At the rate the officer went at, it did not take him above half-a-minute to reach the police-station.

"Where's Mr. Wriggles?" he cried. "Where's Mr. Wriggles?"

"He's out."

At this moment there was a clatter of horses' hoofs, and a party of mounted officers rode up to the door.

There was a few minutes' confusion, and then the whole troop alighted.

Foremost amongst them was our old acquaintance, Wriggles, the chief police officer, and who we have lost sight of for such a long time.

Gibbs stepped forward.

"Mr. Wriggles," he said, "Mr. Wriggles."

"Well, what is it?"

"If you please, sir, as I was on my beat I saw somebody's head peeping out of Martlett's-court!"

"Make haste with your story."

"Yes, Mr. Wriggles, I won't detain you above a minute. "Thinks I, 'That's suspicious,' so I hid in a doorway close by, and presently I saw a man come out of the court, and cross the street. Where do you think he went, sir?"

"How the devil should I know! Go on with your story."

"He went into the old theatrical property-shop at the corner of Hart-street."

"Well!"

"He looked a very suspicious character, and I said to myself, 'That's a highwayman!'"

"A highwayman?"

"Just so, Mr. Wriggles, and then, having heard some talking going on in the court, though I could not hear what was said, I waited where I was expecting to see more; and sure enough I was repaid for my trouble, for in about five minutes two suspicious characters came out of the court, crossed over the street, and went into the property-shop."

"Two, do you say?"

"Yes, and they looked as much like highwaymen as we do like police officers."

"I'm jigger'd!" ejaculated Mr. Wriggles, "if it ain't them, sure enough."

"Who, sir?"

"Never mind—go on."

Gibbs now perceived there was something peculiar in the manner of the officers who had just returned with Mr. Wriggles, and he wondered what it meant.

"Go on," said Mr. Wriggles; "did you recognise either of them."

"No, sir, I didn't; but, as I said before, if I didn't know he was out of the country" ——

"Yes, yes."

"I should say one on 'em was Claude Duval, for I never saw such a remarkable likeness in my life."

No sooner did he hear these words, than Mr. Wriggles behaved in the most extraordinary manner.

Gibbs thought he had clean gone mad.

And well he might.

He seized hold of him (Gibbs) by the hand, and almost wrung it off.

Then, uttering a cry which sounded more like a wild Indian's war whoop than anything else, he took off his hat and threw it up in the air.

Gibbs stood perfectly aghast.

The other officers, too, evidently shared in their chief's gratification, though they were not quite so demonstrative.

"Nabbed," cried Mr. Wriggles, "nabbed! I've nabbed them at last. Hurrah!"

"Who, sir, who?" asked Gibbs, timidly.

"Who? Why, Dick Turpin, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack! They have all three been upon the north road, and have robbed one of his majesty's tax collectors of a bag containing upwards of five hundred guineas."

This was a piece of information that completely took Gibbs' breath away.

"Then Claude has returned?" he gasped.

"He has, and he is in company with Turpin and Sixteen-String Jack."

"Then I claim the reward," cried Gibbs, "for they are all there in the costumier's shop at this blessed minute, and Tom Price is on the watch so that they don't leave it."

"Capital. Come on, my men. This will be the best morning's work we have done for a long time. Come on."

In a desultory throng the officers, to the number of seven or eight, followed Mr. Wriggles and Gibbs to the costumier's shop.

There they found Tom Price on the watch, who quickly assured them that no living creature had left the place.

"Then they are still inside a disguising of themselves, you may depend," said Gibbs.

"They are as good as nabbed then," said Mr. Wriggles, who, as the reader will know by the words he had uttered, had found the tax gatherer the three friends had plundered.

It now became necessary to dispose of his force to the best advantage, and with as much rapidity as possible, and in this Mr. Wriggles showed himself an able general.

A man was taking down the shutters of the shop in Bow-street, next door to the costumier's, and so he entered without difficulty, and quickly made the inmates aware of what was going on, at the same time calling upon them in the king's name to aid and assist him to the utmost of their power.

All the aid and assistance he then happened to want was merely for them to allow his men to go up to the top of the house.

He selected six for this duty, and instructed them to make an entrance into the next house as quietly as they could, and descend until they found those of whom they were in search.

This the six men set about readily enough. To reach the roof of the costumier's house was to them a matter of very small difficulty indeed, and there they found, as is usual in London houses, a trap-door in the roof, to enable the inmates to escape in case of fire.

This trap-door they found was secured on the inner side, but the fastenings were old and rusty, and gave way beneath the pressure they applied.

Having done so much, they left one of their number on guard at the trap, while the remainder slunk quietly down stairs.

In order that the highwaymen should be completely taken by surprise, Mr. Wriggles sent across to the station for a reinforcement, while he disposed the four other men, including Gibbs and Price, in such positions as to make it utterly impossible for them to leave the premises without being seen by one or other of them.

By the time he had done this, some dozen more men arrived, and placing himself at the head of the largest half of these, the others being employed as sentinels, he advanced to the front door of the shop, and knocked loudly at it, commanding them to open in the king's name.

Of course no notice was taken of this, so it was repeated three times, after which it would be lawful for them to break down the door.

By this it will be seen that Mr. Wriggles' calculations were by no means badly made. He reckoned by the time he had broken down the door the men whom he had sent to make the surreptitious entry would be ready to surprise them in the rear.

Of course these energetic proceedings, accompanied, as they were, with a great deal of noise, had the effect of attracting a large body of people, and the crowd kept increasing every moment.

From all possible directions they came, choking completely all the contiguous thoroughfares.

This, so far as the officers were concerned, was a fortunate enough circumstance, since it made it quite a matter of impossibility for either of the fugitives to leave the house they had so incautiously entered.

Success seemed to wait this time upon Mr. Wriggles, and he was in a state of the greatest gratification imaginable. Not only would a good share of the joint reward, which was offered for the apprehension of the three criminals, fall to his share, but he had as well a feeling of personal revenge against one of them at least.

It might therefore be expected that he would not be behindhand in doing his utmost to capture and lodge them in Newgate.

For the third time the command to open the door in the king's name was given by Mr. Wriggles himself, in his loudest tones, and then, as soon as the words were out of his mouth, he gave his men the signal to make their attack upon the door.

This they immediately did, and being provided with the tools necessary for the purpose, they, in a few moments, beat the door down from its hinges.

Calling, then, upon the highwaymen to surrender, they all made a terrific rush into the shop, followed by the foremost of the crowd.

But before we relate what next took place, and how the men fared who had made their way in by the roof, we will turn back to that point in our narrative when we left our three friends face to face with the old costumier, and relate what ensued thereupon.

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

THE CAPTURE OF THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN SEEMS INEVITABLE, BUT THE OLD COSTUMIER PROVES A FRIEND IN NEED.

"I REMEMBER you now, munificent sir," said the old man, as he held up the light in such a way that its beams fell upon Dick's countenance. "I have before had the pleasure of being of service to you."

"You are right," replied Turpin, "you have; and I require your aid again. These are friends of mine, and we have all been sent here by Matthew Gale."

"That is enough, gentlemen—quite enough. I require no other reference or recommendation. I am ready to do your bidding. Let me know your commands."

"We all three want a tolerably good disguise apiece, for which we are willing to pay liberally."

"I have before had a sample of your bounty, good sir."

"You shall be equally well treated if you do the job this time as well, and with expedition."

"It is a work of time, gentlemen."

"I am aware of that. Still, these disguises need not be so elaborate as the former one was. If you will select three suitable suits of clothes, we will soon have them on, and you can finish us off."

"Just so, gentlemen. Look here! You can take choice of these; they are all of the proper size."

Neither of the highwaymen spent much time in making their selection.

They chose three suits of a plain description, such as any commonplace person might wear.

This done, they proceeded to put the clothes on, which they did over those they were then wearing.

While they were thus occupied, the old man looked about among some wigs and hats.

These he handed to our friends, and then they one by one came in for a share of his attention.

Dick and Claude had already passed his hands and were in readiness, and Jack was all but done, when they all heard the unusual bustle in the street consequent upon the arrival of the police.

"Hark!" said Dick. "There is danger! I am sure of it. Someone has tracked us here, and made the officers aware of it."

"Nonsense."

"Silence, if you please," interrupted the old man. "If you will allow me I will go away and return with an account of what is going on outside."

"Do so," said Turpin. "I know I can trust you, or Gale would not have sent us here. Bring back the information we require, and you shall be rewarded sufficiently to satisfy you."

"I make no doubt of that," said the old man, with an avaricious grin. "I will not be long, good sirs. I will take the candle with me; you won't mind being in the dark. It will be safer, too, as well. There are curious old places in the house which no one knows of except myself, and I can easily get the information you desire."

So saying, the old man took up the miserable candle and left the shop.

He was not away above three minutes, but to our three friends they seemed like three hours.

"Well?" they asked, eagerly, as soon as he reappeared.

He placed his fingers on his lips for them to be silent, and then drawing close to them, he spoke in a whisper.

"The house is surrounded by police officers. Some are at this moment in the upper portion of this house, and which they will have some trouble in leaving, I rather think. At the front door of the shop is a body of men, who are armed with hammers and bars which looks as though they intended to force an entrance."

"This is startling and alarming news, indeed," said Dick Turpin. "What is to be done?"

At this moment it was that they heard Mr. Wriggles for the first time call out and command them to open in the king's name.

"Cannot you help us?" continued Turpin, turning to the trembling old man. "You tell us there are curious places in the house which are known to you alone. Is there one which will be of service to us in the present emergency, because if there is, name your own price, and you shall have it."

"It is in my power," said the costumier, "to take you to a place of perfect safety."

"And you will do it?"

"I will."

"That is well, but there is no time to lose, for, hark! there is the second command to open."

"All right. They must repeat the words a third time before they dare venture to break in, and before then you will be in a place of safety."

This was a most welcome piece of intelligence to our friends, who at first had felt something very like despair creep over them.

And now they heard quite plainly a hammering noise from somewhere overhead.

"That is the other party of officers. They will have a door or two to break down before they can reach us. This way, gentlemen—this way."

The costumier led the three highwaymen from the shop into the little parlour behind it as he spoke.

He carefully closed the door after him and secured it.

By the time this was done Mr. Wriggles had, for the third time, repeated the command, and then he shouted in loud enough tone for them to hear—

"I call upon you all to surrender! We are here in full force, and to hope to escape is sheer folly! We are bound to take you, dead or alive, so give yourselves up at once, and do not force us to use unnecessary violence! Surrender, I say, or the door will be broken down."

Mr. Wriggles waited a minute or so, to see whether any heed would be paid to it, and then he gave the signal to his men to attack and break open the door as we have already described.

"Now, gentlemen," said the costumier, "place faith in me, and act according to my instructions, and all will be well. Do you promise this?"

"Willingly, because it is the only chance we see of being able to effect our escape."

"Look here, then."

With some surprise, mixed with curiosity, they followed the old man to a cupboard on one side of the fire-place, on the other side of which was one precisely similar in appearance.

The door of the one to which he led them, the old man opened.

They saw that it reached nearly from the floor to the ceiling.

It was not fitted inside with shelves as they expected, but round the three sides of it a great many pegs had been placed, upon which hung clothing in both plenty and variety, and, in fact, it seemed quite full.

But though bulky, the things were yielding, and they easily pushed them aside.

"Walk in there, gentlemen, if you please."

Turpin and Claude Duval did so, but Jack held back.

"You don't mean to say this is the hiding-place you spoke of. If it is, I would rather be out of it than in it. You must be mad the officers will find us there immediately."

"You promised to place yourself under my directions."

"I did," said Jack, "and I will do so."

As he spoke, he stepped into the cupboard, closely followed by the old man, who shut the door carefully behind him.

They were not a moment too soon, for a grand crash reached their ears, which showed that the front door had been broken down.

"Stand still and upright all of you," said the old man, in a faint whisper. "You had better take hold of each other. I am going to touch a spring, which will let the bottom of the cupboard down."

The place was profoundly dark, but they obeyed the old man's words.

They could not see what he was about, but they heard a faint clicking noise, like the cocking of a pistol, and then they felt the floor of the cupboard slowly and silently descend with them.

The descent lasted nearly two minutes, although the distance was not above ten feet, but, as we have said, the floor of the cupboard sank with slowness.

A slight shock made them aware they had reached the bottom, but all was as dark as before, so they could not form an idea of what kind of place they were in.

"Step forward without fear. I shall have a light in a moment."

"It will be safe?"

"Quite."

The old man produced some phosphorous matches, by the aid of which he lighted a piece of candle, and when it fairly burnt up, our friends were able to see dimly about them.

They were standing at the extremity of a vaulted passage.

"This way, gentlemen, if you please," said the costumier, who stepped into it. "This way."

Our friends followed.

"And now I will show you the excellence of this contrivance, and, at the same time, convince you that you are perfectly safe. Watch me. My actions will be sufficient to explain to you, without words."

Hearing this, the three highwaymen looked keenly at what the old man was about to do.

The reader must please bear in mind, too, that though it has taken some time for us to describe all the particulars, yet, in reality, all took place in an incredible short space of time.

As our friends stood just within the vaulted passage, they could see the grooves into which the floor of the cupboard fitted.

The old man touched a spring, and then the square piece of wood, which formed the bottom of the cupboard, began to rise again.

They watched it go up and up until it was lost to sight, and presently they heard a snap.

"There," said the old man, "all's safe now. They will open the cupboard, no doubt, but they will find nothing suspicious in it, and the floor will be as solid as that of any cupboard, and unless they know the secret of the spring, I defy them to reach it."

"Whereabouts are we now?" asked Turpin.

"Underneath the pavement of Hart-street," was the reply. "Follow me. We have nothing to fear now from the officers, and you will see something which will surprise you not a little."

"But we have no time to spare," said the highwaymen. "Every moment is of importance to us."

"That I do not for a moment doubt, but, for all that, you will have to remain quiet somewhere until the mob disperse. Look here!"

The old man opened a door at the extremity of the passage as he spoke, and what they saw beyond it did indeed fill our friends with surprise.

CHAPTER CXLIX.

MR. WRIGGLES IS AGAIN DISAPPOINTED, AND THE HIGHWAYMEN PAY A VISIT TO THE FAMILY AT THE "SABLE TUNE."

No words of ours, however apt or well chosen they might be, could convey to the reader a true idea of the intense disappointment experienced by Mr. Wriggles and his officers when, upon rushing into the shop, they found it perfectly vacant, and exhibiting no signs whatever of disorder or recent occupation.

The hammering above, which was caused by his first detatchment of men trying to break down a strong door which barred their further progress, still continued.

There was a miscellaneous enough assortment of goods in the shop, and it was pretty full, still it did not take them two minutes to assure themselves that there was no one in it.

The little door leading out of it into the parlour next attracted their notice. It was fastened, but they soon had it open.

By the order of Mr. Wriggles—who began to have a disagreeable conviction creep over him that he had expended all his wonderful ingenuity and taken all his trouble for nothing—by his orders, we say, some of the men were sent up stairs to see whether they could not unfasten the door the others were endeavouring to batter down.

The little back parlour underwent a most rigid examination. There was not a single article in it which was not turned over and examined. The cupboard was opened and ransacked, all its contents one by one taken out, until it was quite empty, but all in vain.

Still Mr. Wriggles had an idea that there might be some secret connected with the cupboard, and he sounded the sides and the back with the stock of a pistol, but the dull sound produced was pretty good evidence that all was solid behind.

Then, as for the floor, the suspicion of its being moveable never once entered his mind. Besides, had he not stood on it and found it secure.

The conviction that his prey had escaped him impressed itself still more strongly and strongly upon him.

Some curses of a very awful and diabolical description came from his lips, which it is by no means our intention to repeat.

Every moment, now, that elapsed saw his hopes grow fainter and fainter.

There was not a corner in the house that was left unsearched.

But, of course, there was no result.

The officers, one and all, looked very blankly at each other, and especially Gibbs and Price—they were actually aghast.

But leaving the officers to get over their surprise and rage in the best manner they are able, and leaving them to their vain search in the costumier's abode, we will return to the vaulted passage in which we left Dick Turpin, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, and the curious old man.

The place into which they had emerged was underneath the stage of Covent-garden Theatre.

One glance was sufficient to show them that.

"You scarcely expected this, did you? But the fact is, I told you I was once connected with this place, and the passage you have seen was contrived for the convenience of a certain manager."

"Oh! indeed!"

"And then when I took to that house, and used to prepare the actors for the stage, I often used to avail myself of this mode of getting here."

"I suppose so."

"I had an idea, somehow or other, that one of these odd days it would prove useful, and so it has."

"Without something of the kind," said Turpin, "we should certainly by this time have been in the hands of the Philistines."

"Lead on," said Jack, "cannot you show us a way out of this place?"

"I dare say I can, but you must be careful that no one sees you emerge."

"To be sure."

"Up these steps, then."

The trio followed the old man up a flight of narrow steps, and then stood upon the stage itself.

The interior of the theatre looked like some vast cavern in the intense darkness, for what windows there were in the building, had been carefully blocked up.

It was quite evident the old man was well acquainted with the labyrinthine intricacies of the theatre, for he threaded his way through a forest of ropes and scenery with the greatest ease.

[TURPIN, DUVAL, AND RANN RESCUING TOM KING.]

At length he stopped near a small door in the wall.

"There!" he said, "is the place at which the actors enter and emerge. It opens into Covent-garden Market. As I said, all you have got to do is to take care that no one observes you leave, for if they do, the circumstance will be sure to give birth to suspicion, for this happens to be an hour when the theatre is never visited."

"I understand."

"Have you the means of opening the door?" asked Jack Rann.

"I have."

"Then open it just the least bit in the world, so that we can take a peep and see whether there is anyone outside or not."

"I am at your commands, noble sir," said the old man, as he proceeded to unfasten the door.

Having done so, he just opened it about half an inch, and closed it again with great rapidity.

"What is it?" asked the highwaymen.

"Nothing much," was the reply. "There is a police-officer standing there, and apparently with his attention wholly fixed upon this door."

"The deuce there is!"

"There is, indeed!"

"But it will never do to be kept prisoners here by one officer," said Dick Turpin; "we must take some decisive steps at once."

"What shall we do?"

"I hardly know; and yet I think the best thing to do will be to take another peep; and if he is still there, endeavour to decoy him in here by some means."

"Let that be it, then," said Claude. "I can't think of anything better, can you, Jack?"

"No."

"Let us set about it at once."

"You will do it, Dick?"

"Yes, as I proposed the scheme. You three stand aside a little, and I will open the door again, and peep out."

Agreeably to these instructions, the old costumier drew back, and Claude and Jack took up their positions close to the door.

Dick Turpin next proceeded, with all the caution possible, to draw the door the least bit open. He wanted to get it wide enough to be able to see outside without the officer being aware of it.

Fortunately the inside of the theatre was not only dark, but the doorway itself, owing to its position in the large building, was in deep shadow.

Sure enough, there was a police officer, with, apparently, his eyes fixed upon the little door.

Whether this really was so, or whether it was the result of accident, Dick could not tell.

And now how to proceed, so as to effectually prevent the man from giving the alarm, was rather a difficult question.

Dick looked out, but there appeared to be no other living creature, besides the police-officer, anywhere in sight.

Dick opened the door a little wider.

"Hist!" he said, at the same time beckoning to the officer to advance. "Hist!"

The officer saw the door open, and an ordinary-looking man appear at it, and heard him cry, "Hist!"

Now it will be as well here to state that this man was quite in ignorance of Mr. Wriggles's movements. He was, in fact, merely upon night duty, and happened to be standing where he was by the merest chance in the world.

Surmising that something unusual was going on, and not for a moment anticipating that he should run into any particular danger, he unsuspectingly advanced towards the door.

This was precisely the result which Turpin hoped for and expected, so opening the door a little farther, taking care to stand as much as possible behind it, he again mysteriously beckoned the officer to approach.

On he came.

"Now!" whispered Dick to Claude, who happened to be nearest to him. "While I keep his attention wholly occupied, you spring out and drag him in."

By the time he had concluded this hurried speech the officer reached the door.

"What is it?" he said. What do"——

What more he was going to say is unknown, for Claude just at that moment sprang forward, and putting one arm round his middle, and the other hand over his mouth, dragged him inside.

He was too much astonished to resist, until it was too late.

Dick shut the door instantly.

Claude shifted his grasp to the man's throat.

He struggled desperately, but it was of no avail.

"A rope!" cried Sixteen-String Jack; "find us a rope, and then all will be secure."

"Yes, noble sir," said the old costumier; "bring him this way, and I will show you plenty of the article you require."

"Lead on, then."

Between our three powerful friends, the officer had not the smallest chance.

The old costumier still held the light, and they followed him to a good-sized room, which was piled with miscellaneous lumber of all kinds, and especially old scenes, with the necessary rope tackle for moving it.

With some of this they very quickly tied the unfortunate officer hand and foot.

Then they closed the door, and repaired once more to the entrance.

"I believe," said the old costumier, "that you are now free to leave this place. You are disguised, but still I should recommend you to be cautious in your movements."

"Do not fear," said Dick. "Before we go, however, take this purse. I do not know how much it contains, but it is a heavy one. We are grateful for the service you have rendered us to-night, for had it not been for you we should, by this time, have been in the hands of the officers. You will see us again before long! Good morning!"

"Good morning, noble sirs!" said the old costumier, with a low bow, as the three highwaymen, one after the other, cautiously emerged into Covent-garden Market, and were quickly lost to sight.

CHAPTER CL.

OLD MATTHEW SUGGESTS TO DICK TURPIN A MEANS OF GETTING OUT OF HIS DIFFICULTY.

THE moment they felt sure they were secure from observation, the three highwaymen came to a halt.

"It is quite time we were at the Old Bailey," said Dick Turpin. "I am afraid, now, we shall have some trouble in gaining admittance."

"So do I," said Jack.

"And after what has just occurred, it will be trebly perilous for us to go there."

"I have no doubt of that," said Dick, "but I, for one, have no intention of staying away. Listen, this will be our best plan."

"What?"

"You shall hear. Disguised as we are now, we shall be almost certain to pass unsuspected, but to add to our safety, let us separate. I will go first, then you, Jack, can follow at some distance, and Claude bring up the rear. All we shall have to do will be to take care that we do not lose sight of each other."

"That will be best."

"I am glad you think so!"

"I will cross over to the opposite side of the street," said Jack, "and Claude can follow you; we shall then still further remove suspicion."

"Just so! And, as we are agreed, let us start at once."

After these words, the three highwaymen disposed themselves in the manner they had arranged, and avoiding the more populous thoroughfares, took their course in as direct a line as possible to the Old Bailey.

St. Sepulchre's clock chimed half-past nine as they reached their destination.

As usual, there was a crowd of persons about the entrance to the Sessions-house, and this was a circumstance very much in the favour of the highwaymen, for it diverted attention from them.

They were particularly careful to keep Dick in sight.

And now Turpin, for one whose person was so well-known to the police as he was, performed a very daring action, and one that made his two companions fairly hold their breath.

Walking straight up to one of the police-officers, who was standing at the foot of the staircase, he said in a feigned voice—

"We have heard there is to be a remarkable trial to-day. It is so, is it not?"

"Well, yes," said the officer, completely deceived by the appearance of the person who addressed him. "Tom King is going to be tried to day."

"Ah!"

"What do you mean?"

"Do you think," asked Dick, sinking his voice to a whisper, "that you could find us a place for a guinea, where we could see what takes place?"

"This way, please," said the police-officer. "This way, if you please."

The offer of a guinea was too much for him to withstand.

And so our three friends were comfortably installed in a front seat in the gallery, from whence a capital view of the court could be obtained.

The result of the trial has been already made known to the reader.

With an interest, which can be scarcely understood, they listened to all the proceedings.

As the counsel for the prosecution stated the case, Dick knew it was true in every particular.

Then when he heard it whispered that some months ago Tom King had robbed the judge himself of a very valuable snuff-box, he looked upon his condemnation as certain.

But, above all, he was incensed against the counsel employed by Mr. Lazenby, and for which he had paid so high a price.

This, however, was unjust. The evidence was too complete, and the conviction too determined upon, for him to stand the slightest chance.

The jurymen themselves had individually felt the inconvenience and danger of travelling with money or valuables of any kind in their possession, and they looked upon it as a duty to themselves to bring this man in guilty.

And so Dick and his friends waited there until the case was over and the prisoner removed.

Then they left the court.

There seemed to be no suspicion as to who they really were.

By preconcerted arrangement they all three separated and made their way to old Matthew's crib in Drury-lane by different and circuitous routes.

Sixteen-String Jack was the first to arrive.

A word from old Matthew let him know that, at present all was well, and that there was no new danger to apprehend.

He seated himself in the little private parlour behind the bar, already so well-known to our readers.

"I can see the result of the trial," said old Matthew, "without asking you any questions. However, it is no more than I expected."

"Nor I," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Still, we won't give up."

"Not at all. I think we have as good a chance now as ever."

"Better."

"Well, I don't know exactly for that. But here's Dick."

Turpin entered the parlour as he spoke.

"Where's Claude?" he asked.

"Not arrived yet."

"He ought to have been here first. I have come the longest way. I hope nothing has happened to him."

"Oh! you can safely let him alone for getting out of a scrape. Ah! here he is."

Claude Duval, looking rather flushed and excited, walked into the parlour, and closed the door.

"What is the matter?" asked Dick. "How is it you are so late?"

"Confound it!" was the reply. "Just as I got to the corner of Drury-lane I met an officer who declared he knew me."

"Indeed."

"I think he mistook me for some one else."

"Not that he thought you Claude Duval?"

"No. He would have raised a greater outcry than he did. However, I was obliged to dispose of him."

"How was that?"

"Why, just where we stood I saw a cellar under a shop, where a cobbler was sitting at work, and very attentively observing us, so I caught hold of the officer by the back of the neck and the seat of his breeches, and threw him right in."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Matthew Gale. "Capital. Ha! ha!"

"He went in with a tremendous crash, I can tell you; but I did not wait to see the result, but made my way here as fast as possible, and I believe without being observed."

"That's all right, then, and even if they do come peeping and prying, I can stow you where they will never find you."

"Thanks, Matthew. You are a real friend to us. And now about Tom. What are we to do?"

"That is a serious matter, Dick," said Claude, "and we must reflect before we decide how we are to act."

"Exactly."

"What is your advice, Jack? Do you think we could do any good by breaking into Newgate?"

"I am afraid not. Rely upon it, every possible precaution will be taken to prevent his escape. They have made up their minds to hang him, and without we are very careful they will do it."

"They shall not," said Dick, "while I live. The difficulties which I have already met with, and those which I can see, so far from daunting me or turning me from my purpose, only confirm me in it. The time, now, is drawing very short, but it is yet long enough to do wonders."

"That is true enough," said Claude Duval, "but it appears to be the most difficult and dangerous affair we have ever been engaged in. I was going to say hopeless. But we are resolved to stick to you, Dick, and help you, and we'll do it."

"We will," repeated Sixteen-String Jack.

"Thanks," said Dick Turpin, as he took a hand of each in his own. "Do not think the enterprise a hopeless one. I have a presentiment that we shall carry it out successfully."

"But how shall we act?"

"There I am at present at a loss, but if we all set our minds to work we shall soon think of something I have no doubt."

"Will you allow me to make a suggestion?"

It was old Matthew who asked the question.

Of course we will. What is it? You have been of good service to us in this way before, my friend, and we shall listen to what you have got to say with the greatest attention. What is it?"

"Really," said old Matthew, as a satisfied smile irradiated his rubicund countenance, "really, what I have to propose is so simple, that I am almost ashamed to say it after the way you have spoken, for I can tell you expect it to be something extra."

"We do! we do!"

"Then you will be disappointed, for it isn't."

"Let us hear it, and then we can judge."

"Very well, gentlemen; then what I was going to propose was, that you all three go to-night to the meeting of the family at the 'Three Tuns,' and lay the particulars of the case before them, and rely upon it they will hit upon some means of getting him free."

"Capital!" exclaimed the three friends.

Matthew looked pleased.

"That is as good a suggestion as could well be made," said Dick Turpin. "I have not ventured there since the night when Sir Theodore Houghton met with the reward he so richly deserved. That is a long time ago now, so I should think there would not be much danger in going there again."

"None at all, I should say, for no one could possibly expect you. It falls on a lucky night, too."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, this is Wednesday, and on Wednesday evening, as you know, there is always a full gathering."

"There is, but I had forgotten it. We will lay by for a few hours, and then we will go. I will put the case plainly before them."

And in pursuance of this determination, Dick Turpin, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, set out from the "White Horse" in Drury-lane, to visit the thieves' ken in Seven Dials.

CHAPTER CLI.

DICK TURPIN RECEIVES AN OVATION FROM THE "FAMILY" AT THE "THREE TUNS."

A LONG, low, smoke-begrimed, underground apartment, dimly lighted by tallow lips stuck in sconces, and placed at irregular distances along the walls.

In the centre a table, many feet in length, but disproportionately narrow.

Seated round it upon clumsy benches, inverted casks, and such like articles, were some forty or fifty desperate-looking men.

They were composed of one branch of the persons who in London get their living in defiance of the laws, or, as they called themselves, in their own vernacular, "the family."

The reader will remember that in the earlier portion of this story he was introduced to this apartment—if the term may be applied to such a place—as well as to some of the company in it.

It was, as we then stated, situated beneath the ground-floor of the "Three Tuns" public-house.

On this particular night—it being one upon which the whole of the "family" who possibly could do so assembled—the noise was prodigious.

The chairman, who, in accordance with custom, was installed in a wooden arm-chair, placed upon the end of the table, made vain and ineffectual attempts to restore order.

Every moment witnessed the arrival of some other member.

It was not until all assembled that the ordinary proceedings of the evening commenced.

Then the appeals of the chairman would be listened to, and tolerable silence obtained.

It was during all this wild uproar that our three friends entered.

They were far from wishing to attract attention just then, so they sat down unobserved upon the seat nearest to the door by which they entered.

It was the first time Claude Duval and Jack Rann had seen the place, and they looked about them inquiringly.

But in its general features the scene presented to them nothing new.

It was not long, however, before the room got completely full, and then the chairman succeeded, after many efforts, in procuring a temporary and partial silence.

"Silence, pals," he cried. "Silence. A very important piece of information has been given to me, and if you will all hold your rows a minute I will tell you what it is."

Cries for order now arose on all sides, and when they had subsided the place became tolerably quiet.

"Gentlemen," said the chairman, "I have the pleasure to announce to you the fact that there is to-night amongst us one who is a member of our glorious profession, and the most glorious member of it, too. Gentlemen, I propose that he takes the chair on this here occasion."

"Name—name!" cried the rude assemblage. "Name—name! Who is it? Who is it?"

"Order, pals, and you shall hear. The member alluded to as being present is Dick Turpin, the hightobyman!"

The uproar that followed this announcement is far beyond all description.

"Hurrah! hurrah! Bravo for Dick Turpin! Where is he? Let him come this way! Put him in the chair! Let's drink his health! Hurrah, pals! We'll have a jolly night of it! Bravo! bravo!"

Such were a few of the more vociferous cries which could be distinguished above the Babel of other sounds.

In obedience to this call, the unanimity of which was so evident, Dick Turpin rose from where he had been sitting, and forced his way through the throng towards the chairman.

He was quickly perceived, and then seized by a dozen arms, and lifted bodily on to the table.

In this position he was a very prominent object.

His appearance was saluted with an applause that was, without exaggeration, absolutely deafening.

He bowed low and gracefully in acknowledgment.

"Take the chair! Take the chair!" was the universal cry.

The man who ordinarily fulfilled the duty of president over the rude throng had risen from his chair, and stood by the side of it, holding one of the arms.

Dick seated himself in an attitude that was at once imposing and theatrical, and fresh bursts of welcome and applause succeeded it.

The ex-chairman raised his hand, and as the eyes of all the company were turned in that direction the gesture was seen, and imagining he had something important to say, they prepared to listen to it.

"Gentlemen," he cried, "listen to me for one moment."

"Hear! hear! Silence!"

"I feel a great deal of pleasure on the present occasion in making room for one who is far worthier to sit here as chairman than I am."

"Hear! hear! That'll do! that'll do!"

But the chairman, unheeding, went on.

"I have to propose, gentlemen, that you every one fill up your glasses, and drink to the health of our honoured chairman, the celebrated Dick Turpin, the hightobyman!"

"Hurrah! Bravo!"

Dick rose.

Instantly all, as soon as they saw the movement, were silent.

He took a tolerable-sized purse from his pocket.

He held it aloft in the air, as high as the ceiling would allow him, and then let it fall upon the table.

The coins jingled musically as they descended.

"There," said Dick, "that will pay for something all round. Call the landlord, and let every one order just what they like."

The noise which had formerly prevailed was silence in comparison with the uproar that succeeded this speech and action.

Dick's popularity was in the ascendant.

It was some time before all were served.

From the elevated situation he occupied, Dick had an excellent view of the room and its inmates.

So soon, then, as he perceived that every one had his glass filled before him, he rose.

The signal was obeyed by all present, and rising to their feet, they raised the brimming glasses in the air, while the health of Dick Turpin was drank with every possible manifestation of delight.

Then the tumult having somewhat subsided, he proceeded to respond; and, amid a perfect silence, during which the eyes and attention of all were fixed upon him, he spoke as follows—

"Gentlemen," he said, bowing, "of course you can understand how proud and pleased I am to find I stand so well as I do in your estimation, and how grateful I feel for the manner in which you have drank my health. But, gentlemen, I came here to-night with a particular object in view, and the way in which I have been received encourages me to make known to you what it is without further preface or delay."

Hear! hear!" interrupted a chorus of voices.

"Silence all! Let's hear what he has to say! Hurrah for Dick Turpin! Speak! speak!"

As soon as he saw a chance of making himself heard, Dick spoke, but as soon as he began there was an immediate silence.

"It must be well known to all of you," he said, "that my comrade, Tom King, has been captured, lodged in Newgate, brought to trial, and condemned to die at Tyburn on Monday morning. Gentlemen, Tom King is my friend, and, as a brave man, I honour him. It was through me that he was taken prisoner, and I have sworn to set him free. But hitherto all my endeavours have been foiled. The authorities have determined to bring him to death, and they have taken precautions such as never were taken before to prevent all possibility of escape and rescue. I engaged a clever lawyer to try to bring him off, but he failed. He still languishes in his cell, where four men keep guard over him, and watch his every movement. Gentlemen, I appeal to you, and call upon you to assist me to keep the oath I made, that I would set him free if I had to pull Newgate down stone by stone to do it."

"We will! we will! Hurrah for brave Dick Turpin and his friend, Tom King! Three cheers, mate! We will get him out! Hurrah! down with the old prison! Let's set light to it, and burn it down! That'll be the plan! Bravo!"

Turpin began to speak, and once more all were still.

"I cannot express my joy at finding you so unanimous in your wish to aid me. Gentlemen, I beg you will think over the whole of the case, and decide in what way his escape is to be achieved. There is plenty of time for deliberation, but before we go any further I have some intelligence to communicate to you which will, I hope, afford you the greatest satisfaction. I ought to have mentioned it before, but it is not too late to repair the omission. Gentlemen, I have the pleasure to inform you that there are two other friends of mine to-night here present. They are well known to you by name, and I hope you will give them a hearty welcome. One is the celebrated world-famed Claude Duval! the other"—

But Dick's voice was drowned by the confusion which this announcement caused, and the other name could not be heard.

Claude Duval rose, and was instantly recognised by the majority of "the family," who crowded around him with every manifestation of delight.

He was lifted on to the table as Dick had been.

And then, after the ceremony of drinking his health was gone through, and he had briefly responded to it, Dick spoke.

"The other friend who is here present is Jack Rann, better known as Sixteen-String Jack!"

It was now Jack's turn to be placed upon the table, and he stood there in a confused, shrinking manner, habitual to him under such circumstances.

The delight of "the family" at having among them at one time three such very notorious characters was unbounded, and for a moment Tom King was forgotten.

But Dick took care to remind them of it.

He had anticipated a hearty welcome, but scarcely the ovation he had received.

Two chairs, in addition to the one upon which he sat, were placed upon the table, and Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack seated in them.

Then all gave themselves up to an attentive consideration of the best means to be employed to effect Tom King's release.

Many means were proposed · in fact, every one had a scheme of his own.

The meeting was prolonged until a late, or rather, an early hour, and then they separated, having agreed upon the course to be pursued.

What it was it is unnecessary here to say. It will develop itself.

The three friends reached the White House again in safety, and there we will leave them while we devote some space to an account of what took place in the meanwhile at Newgate.

CHAPTER CLII.

THE HANGMAN DRIVES TOM KING TO TYBURN, AND MEETS WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE.

THE time passed wretchedly and wearily enough to Tom King while in the condemned cell.

On the morning following the occurrences just related, old Matthew Gale paid him a visit, and communicated to him the results of the meeting with "the family" at the "Three Tuns."

This intelligence was sufficient to rekindle hope in his bosom, for, if the truth must be told, he had begun to despair.

A remarkable change took place in his manner after the interview with the worthy landlord, which the men on guard over him did not fail to notice, and were extra vigilant accordingly.

But nothing took place to reward them for their trouble.

And so the days crept on until Sunday morning came.

This was the time that Tom most dreaded, and he would have given anything to escape the ordeal of appearing in the condemned pew in the chapel, and hearing the ordinary preach the condemned sermon over him, while he would be the cynosure of a thousand unfeeling eyes."

It was a needless aggravation of the last few hours he had to spend on earth.

But, finding it inevitable, he nerved himself to bear it as well as he was able.

The gallery devoted to the reception of those whose curiosity brought them to the chapel was crowded with fashionably-dressed people, for it was only those who had the means of paying handsomely who were privileged to see the show.

Tom tried his best not to do so, but he could not help shrinking a little when he was marshalled into the chapel, and led to the seat appropriated to those in his position.

It was rather singular that during the past week he was the only one who received sentence of death. At that time, when so many crimes were visited with the extreme penalty of the law, it was very rarely that such a thing as this occurred. The criminal annals of the period show that on most hanging mornings five to seven or ten perished.

How different it is now!

Only a week or two back the writer saw in the public prints the account of the trial of a man for highway robbery. The case was fully proved, and the prisoner found guilty. In the time of which we are writing the sentence would have been death upon the scaffold; as it was, the Common Serjeant committed him for two months with hard labour.

This, we think, is going to the opposite extreme.

The punishment is manifestly inadequate.

But to return.

Tom King was, as we have said, the sole inmate of the condemned pew.

The eyes of all were therefore directed entirely upon him. There was no one near him to distract any portion of their attention.

The position he occupied was about as uncomfortable and unenviable a one as could well be imagined, so it will not be thought wonderful that his embarrassment was so great as to make him only partially conscious of what was taking place. He seemed to see all things through a dense mist; and as for the words of Mr. Colley, the ordinary, if they reached his ears, they most certainly did not penetrate to his understanding.

It is questionable whether he ever experienced so great a feeling of relief as he did when he found, by the universal movement made by all, that the service was at an end.

Assuredly, never did his cell appear so pleasant a place as it did when he was led back to it.

The remainder of the day passed like the preceding ones.

In the afternoon, however, old Matthew paid him another visit, when he again assured him that all would go well, and despite whatever precautions might be taken by the authorities, they would be of no avail, and in no way prevent his rescue, which might be looked upon as a certainty.

And then, after old Matthew had departed, the last rays of daylight faded from the dungeon, and night rapidly came on—that night which it was determined should be the last he should pass on earth.

He threw himself upon his rude, hard couch.

But he slept not.

That was out of the question.

Each hour seemed an age.

The men who were on guard over him smoked their pipes in silence, for it was only occasionally that they spoke to each other, and then only when necessary.

And so the night wore away, and morning came.

There was an unusual stir in Newgate at a very early hour.

Outside, although many hours would elapse before the procession started, a dense crowd had collected.

From the corner of the Old Bailey nearest Fleet-street, it reached to Giltspur-street, and then far away down Skinner-street and Snowhill.

Its bulk continually increased, and there was every indication that it would before long form one unbroken line to Tyburn, at which place another and as large a crowd had collected.

The news that the celebrated highwayman, whose deeds had caused so great a commotion in the land, was about to pay the full penalty of his crimes, had been diffused over the whole metropolis, then by no means the gigantic place which it is now.

The greatest excitement prevailed.

As for Tom himself, although he had every confidence in his friends, yet he could not help feeling the full peril of his situation.

As, however, the day came, he grew much calmer, and was able to, in a great measure, shake off the nervous apprehensiveness which had possession of him during the darkness; but that was only natural.

The plan, too, which had been agreed upon by his friends for his rescue, was so good a one that, provided no unforeseen accident occurred, it had every chance of success.

Under the influence of these feelings, he was able to partake heartily of the rich breakfast placed before him; for, as we have had already occasion to remark, prisoners were at that time allowed to be indulged with whatever they liked in the shape of eating and drinking, and it is a disgraceful, but well-known, fact, that many malefactors were taken to the place of execution in a state of bestial intoxication.

Tom, however, drank only sparingly of some excellent wine, for Matthew had furnished him with ample funds.

When the breakfast was over, several persons came into his cell.

One was the new deputy-governor, who had taken the utmost pains to perform all his duties with scrupulous exactness, and he used every artifice he could think of to let the civic authorities perceive it.

He was followed by the ordinary, whose behaviour was now about as unlike what it had been as it was possible for it to be.

Then came two of the sheriffs, who had the disagreeable duty to perform of accompanying the prisoner to Tyburn.

One was unknown to Tom, but the other was Mr. Blandy, whose usually smiling countenance was now grave and sombre.

Some turnkeys closed the procession.

"Now, prisoner," said Mr. Cawthorn, for such was the name of the deputy-governor, "your time has come, and I hope, for all our sakes, that you will make no unnecessary bother, but submit to your fate with a good grace. Unlock the chain."

Three of the turnkeys now came forward.

Two of them took up their positions on either side of Tom and placed their hands on his collar, while the other took a bunch of keys from his pocket, with which he undid the massive padlock which secured him by a chain to a staple firmly imbedded in the solid masonry.

Tom was perfectly well aware that he would gain nothing by any attempt at violence, so he remained quite still and tractable.

Mr. Cawthorn was vastly pleased, for, of course, he attributed this peaceful demeanour to the circumstance of the prisoner having been deeply impressed with the words he had uttered by way of caution and advice.

It was easy to be seen that the good-hearted Mr. Blandy was deeply affected by Tom's position. His behaviour on several occasions had greatly pleased him; he could see that there was about him that unmistakable impress of a gentleman which can never be assumed, and very rarely disguised, and he much regretted that one so gifted and well-educated as he appeared to be, should suffer so ignominious a doom.

Having been freed from the chain which confined him to the wall, Tom was led by his jailers into the yard of the prison, in which stood the horse and cart which was to convey him to Tyburn.

Here the smith was in waiting to knock the rivets out of his fetters, for prisoners were never taken to the scaffold in chains.

This ceremony was quickly performed. Long practice had conferred a great degree of dexterity upon him.

It would seem that the authorities had some idea a rescue would be attempted, for a large body of mounted, well-armed police-officers were in attendance, as well as a whole detachment of dragoons, who were to form a complete circle round the cart.

Tom's heart sank a little when, from a gloomy gateway, he saw these make their way into the yard.

They completely filled it.

Well he knew it would be no easy task to overcome men so well trained to the use of warlike weapons as they were.

They had, too, been evidently selected as large, powerful men, and such as would be best able to repel an assault.

A great deal of bustle and confusion took place, for many of the horses were very restive.

A coffin was placed across the front of the cart.

It was a frightfully common affair, the wood of which it was composed was deal, painted black, while it was roughly fastened together with white-headed nails, which gave it a ghastly and horrible look.

CHAPTER CLIII.

PARTICULARLY RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH TOM KING WAS TAKEN TO TYBURN.

A PLAINLY perceptible shudder swept over Tom King from head to foot as this ominous object met his gaze.

But that was only natural.

It was a horrible idea to make a man sit down beside the coffin which was to contain in a short time his own remains.

One of the officials now tapped Tom on the shoulder, and bade him take his seat in the cart.

He obeyed.

Resistance would have been futile, and, worse than that, would have provoked ill-usage.

He was followed by the ordinary, who, on this occasion, was attired in full canonicals.

The hangman now crawled forward, and, taking the reins in his hand, sat down on the front of the cart.

And so the whole procession was formed before it began to defile through the low arched door into the Old Bailey.

By the usual time the whole of the preparations were complete.

It was no slight consolation to Tom to think that he was spared the indignities and exultation which Mr. Tenner would have displayed on the occasion.

A troop of mounted police, well armed with cutlasses, headed the procession.

Then, when they were in perfect readiness to start, the gates were thrown open.

As this was done, Tom caught a transient glimpse of a countless mass of human beings, swaying to and fro like waves upon the ocean.

The duty of these police-officers was, by forming themselves into a compact body, to force a passage through the crowd

They walked six abreast, and there was probably fifty or sixty of them.

Immediately after them came the cumbrous carriages in which the sheriffs were conveyed.

After them came another body of police-officers, but they were on foot. There was, certainly, not less than a hundred of them.

In the centre, and completely hemmed in by them, was the cart containing the hangman, the coffin, the condemned prisoner, and the ordinary.

Then an outer circle was formed by the detachment of dragoons, whose heavy horses caused the people to retreat to a respectful distance.

Tom looked upon the mass of well-armed men by which he was surrounded with something like dismay.

How could his friends hope to break through such a force, and rescue him.

The idea seemed absurd.

Truly were those in power determined that on this occasion, at least, their victim should not escape.

And thus, amid the shouts, screams, yells, groans, and hisses of the excited populace, the dismal procession started.

Tom looked eagerly around him, as soon as they turned the corner of the Old Bailey into Skinner-street.

But no faces which he could recognise met his eye.

It was, however, easy to see that the majority of the people, of whom the crowd was composed, sympathized with and were in favour of Tom King.

This was a circumstance that quickly forced itself upon the officers, though they had been previously led to anticipate that such would prove to be the case.

The appearance of Tom King alone was well calculated to enlist the good feeling of the people, and in addition to this, they had no great dislike for what he had done. They had none of them suffered any individual loss, for it was a rather notorious fact that neither he nor his comrade Turpin ever robbed those who could not afford to lose.

As it happened, none of those who had turned out to witness his execution were in that enviable predicament, nor was it likely that they ever would be.

Therefore, to them a highwayman was something more than an ordinary felon.

It is ever the case that, with the uneducated, courage is the attribute to be admired above all others, and is the one held in most esteem. We suppose it will always be so.

It was plain enough to be seen that, in the event of a rescue being attempted, they would befriend the prisoner and oppose the authorities.

This is a weakness common to all mobs.

The dense mass parted right and left before the advance of the solid body of mounted officers, who headed the procession.

As the cart reached the top of Snowhill, Tom turned a little and looked before.

Stretched up Holborn, as far as ever his eye could reach, was still the same mass of closely-packed human beings.

The shops were one and all closed, but the upper windows were crowded with eager and excited spectators, while in many places the very roof-tops were thronged.

Those persons who happened to be in Fleet-street or the Strand upon the day when the Princess Alexandra entered London, and saw the crowd that was there assembled, will be able to form a very good idea of what Holborn and the Oxford-road were like upon this eventful morning.

On reaching the foot of Holborn-hill, which then was a far more difficult ascent than it is at the present time, the cavalcade came to a halt.

The bell of St. Andrew's church was tolling dismally.

"Now," thought Tom, "will be the opportunity seized upon by my friends to achieve my rescue."

But as the three minutes, during which they stayed, passed away without the slightest manifestations being made, his heart turned cold, and a deadly sensation of sickness came over him.

The word was given, and once more the cavalcade was set in motion.

On—on they went without meeting with anything in the shape of opposition worthy of the name.

The crowd, which grew denser at every step, still shouted, groaned, and fought, as the humour took them.

Of course that wide and noble street which now connects Oxford-street with Holborn was not then in existence. It is, in fact, quite a modern improvement, having been executed within the remembrance of the majority of our readers.

Its site was then occupied by a thickly-populated district, a rookery, in fact, where crime and violence of every kind found a lurking-place.

The route to the Oxford-road then lay through the heart of St. Giles's. Indeed, that route can be taken even now.

There was a public-house in the High-street where hanging processions always halted, and where from time immemorial a bowl of wine was handed to the prisoner, who was supposed to drink the health of all the crowd.

But Tom was in no humour to comply with this custom, but still he deemed it advisable to do so, lest he should give offence to the assembled concourse.

The officers, too, and soldiers were given some refreshment, it being, in fact, a kind of half-way house.

The landlord himself came out with the huge bowl of punch in his hands, and gave it to Tom, who received it with a bow.

A loud hurrah arose from the crowd.

The guard were instantly on the alert, but there was nothing to apprehend.

Tom stood up in the cart, and, turning to the spectators, made another and a lower bow, and then drank some of the punch.

While he did so, he took the opportunity to cast an anxious glance over the crowd.

But no signs of his friends could he see.

Tom's hopes sank lower still, and when he sat down again and the procession moved on, he began in good earnest to prepare himself for death.

And yet, he asked himself, could it be possible that his friends would allow him to be taken to death without making at least an effort to save him? He thought not. They had doubtless some good reason for not making their appearance.

And thus, alternately flushed by hope and chilled with the cold breath of despair, he continued on his unwilling journey.

The broad country road, now called Oxford-street, was slowly traversed.

As they drew yet nearer and nearer to the fatal tree, so did their progress become slower and slower.

The body of police found their duty of forcing a passage increase in difficulty every moment.

But it was from no positive unwillingness on the part of those who were nearest to them that this arose.

It was because the people were already so closely packed that it was next to an impossibility to compress them into a smaller compass.

Very gradually, however, they gave way.

Then the triple-tree appeared in sight.

Tom knew it, not because he himself saw the ill-omened object, but because of the hoarse cry which arose from the people.

And still, as Tom's eyes roamed over the sea of faces, not one familiar countenance could he see.

But let it be said, that he did not perceive one that bore an expression altogether inimical to him.

But where was Dick, and Claude, and Jack? What had occurred to prevent them from carrying out their intentions as to a rescue?

Were the authorities to prevail? Was he to be a hangman's prey?

One would have thought so from a contemplation of the state of affairs.

But yet, let the chance be ever so small, his three companions were not the sort of men to give up without at least making an effort to save him.

It was in vain that Mr. Colley, the ordinary, endeavoured to arrest his attention. All that he said was wholly unheeded, for Tom understood him not.

The cart now reached the fatal spot, and here a brief pause was made while some necessary forms were subscribed to.

CHAPTER CLIV.

TOM KING IS RESCUED AT A CRITICAL MOMENT BY HIS FRIENDS.

It will be neither out of place nor uninteresting for us to take advantage of this interval in the proceedings of this terrible drama, and make the reader exactly aware of the manner in which persons were executed at Tyburn, inasmuch as the mode now adopted differs widely from it, which makes an explanation necessary for the due comprehension of the unlooked-events which so closely followed.

The method now practised must be pretty well known.

A firm wooden stage is erected, having at its opposite sides two upright beams of wood.

Resting upon the tops of these is a horizontal beam, from the centre of which the rope is suspended.

In the middle of the platform is a trap-door, secured on the under-side by a strong steel bolt.

Upon this trap-door the prisoner stands, the cord is scientifically adjusted about his neck, the white cap drawn over his face to conceal the convulsion of the countenance. All being so far accomplished, the ceremony is terminated by the hangman making his way beneath the scaffold and withdrawing the bolt.

The instant this is done, the trap-door swings back upon its well-oiled hinges, and the body, falling with great swiftness, is stopped by a sudden jerk, which in most cases is sufficient to extinguish animation.

But in the good old times they were by no means so humane; the simple fact of the procession to Tyburn being enough to bear out that assertion. That is all done away with now. The execution takes place in front of the prison, and the needless exposure to a gaping crowd avoided.

That, however, is not all. The contrivance of a scaffold with a trap-door in it was unthought of.

The gallows at Tyburn was composed of three large beams of timber, driven equidistantly into the earth in such a manner as to form a triangle.

Across these three horizontal beams were fixed, and it was from these the rope was hung.

But there was nothing resembling a scaffold. The earth about the place was smooth and grass grown.

This is how the execution was performed.

The cart containing the condemned was driven under the beams.

Then the prisoner was made to stand up in the cart while the rope was placed about his neck.

This done, the ordinary would finish his exhortations, the white cap put on, the ordinary and hangman would leave the cart, and the latter, seizing the horse by the bridle, would strike him with a whip, and draw the cart from under the fatal beam, leaving the body swinging in the air.

This was a mode at once barbarous and inhuman.

The fall was gradual, not sudden, consequently there was no dislocation of the vertebræ, and the poor wretch died slowly, in all the convulsive agonies of strangulation.

And now, after this long description, which was, however, unavoidable, we will resume the thread of our narrative.

The cart, then, containing Tom King, was drawn under the gallows in such a manner that one of the beams was directly over it.

As the horse stopped, the crowd became profoundly silent.

Close to the gallows were the carriages in which the sheriffs had been conveyed.

In a circle round these objects, that is to say, Tyburn Tree and the carriages, were first the officers on foot.

Then those on horseback.

The outermost ring was composed of the detatchment of dragoon guards, who anything but liked their duty.

Mr. Colley touched Tom on the arm, and asked him to stand up.

He obeyed.

Once more, and as he almost thought for the last time, he looked up at the sky, and then at the crowd before him.

In such a dense, enormous mass, and from his position, it was next to an impossibility for him to particularize individual objects.

He could see nothing of his friends.

But if he had, he asked himself, and they had been waiting till the present moment to make their desperate attempt, what chance would they have in breaking through the triple line around him?

None, he thought.

"Is it your wish, misguided young man," said the ordinary, "is it your wish to address those who have to-day assembled in order to see you die?"

"No," replied Tom.

"Do you confess, young man? Oh! let me beseech you so to do, and ask pardon of your offended Deity for your heinous guilt."

"Peace," said Tom. "What I do I do, but never for one moment will I believe that your interposition can be of the slightest benefit to me. So you need say no more."

The ordinary made a sign to the hangman that he had finished, and he immediately proceeded to pinion Tom, as a preliminary to placing the noose around his neck.

And now it would seem that the whole of the persons there present as spectators of the fearful scene had fixed their eyes upon the chief actors in it, and allowed the whole of their attention to be absorbed.

The officers and soldiers on guard were no exceptions.

They had ceased to believe that a rescue would be attempted.

This, as will be seen, was exactly what our three friends calculated upon.

While the authorities were on their guard and on the look-out for an attack, they stood but a poor chance of achieving their design.

When, however, they were lulled into a false feeling of security, and unprepared, would be the time, since they would be taken completely by surprise.

Seizing, then, upon the moment when universal attention seemed to be riveted in one direction, the signal was given to attack the soldiers and police.

It was shortly after dusk on the preceding evening that nearly the whole of the "family" repaired to Tyburn, and took up their positions around it.

They were divided into three bodies.

One was headed by Dick Turpin.

The other two by Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval.

For the reasons we have before given, it was at length decided that Tyburn should be the place where the rescue should be attempted, they believing that the chances there were much more in their favour.

So careful, too, were they to maintain a peaceable demeanour, that not the least suspicion was excited by their presence. At first sight they seemed mere ordinary people brought there by curiosity alone.

But their eyes were all the time fixed upon their leaders, and the moment the signal was given they were in readiness to obey it.

They drew their weapons, and made a vigorous and tremendous attack upon the guard.

It was irresistible, not only on account of their numbers, but because each man felt his heart was in his work, and the object for which they fought concerned him nearly.

Simultaneously they made their attack upon the guard.

At the same moment they cried, in stentorian tones—

"Hurrah for Tom King! Down with the sheriffs! Set him free! Set him free! A rescue! a rescue! On to them, boys! Don't flinch, and we are sure to win the day!"

But if the soldiers were for a moment taken by surprise, they quickly recovered themselves, and repelled their assailants.

And now the remainder of the mob, who were not actually of the "family," but yet who were prepossessed in favour of Tom, no sooner saw this energetic movement to overthrow the authorities, than they at once lent their aid.

In fact, it is probable they would have done this earlier, but they wanted a leader to give them the word of command.

In comparison with the number of the people, the soldiers and police were but a handful, and though well-disciplined and fully armed, they gave way before the pressure.

Foremost in the throng, and inciting the people on to the utmost, were the three friends.

With desperate energy they strove to fight their way to the triple tree.

But upon the first intimation of the attack, the sheriffs had acted with the greatest presence of mind.

Even if the crowd proved the victors they determined the victory should be a bootless one.

There was yet time to hang the criminal.

They might do with his dead body what they thought fit.

But Turpin saw this, and so did Claude and Jack, and they determined, at all hazards, to defeat it.

Tom King was unable to help himself in the least.

He was standing up in the cart.

The fatal noose was about his neck.

The white cap drawn down over his countenance.

His arms and legs were pinioned.

He was, therefore, not in a position to so much as struggle to avert his doom.

The soldiers and police closed round the gallows, as the crowd pressed onwards: closer and closer to it they drew.

The "family" fought like demons, and with a fury that nothing could withstand.

The hangman stepped out of the cart. But as he did so, his foot slipped, and he fell to the ground.

Quickly scrambling to his feet, and uttering some most awful curses, he ran to his horse's head, and catching him by the bridle, made him start.

The cart moved.

CHAPTER CLV.

THE AUTHORITIES ARE EXASPERATED AT THE DEFEAT OF THEIR SCHEME, BUT TAKE MOST EFFECTUAL STEPS TO CAPTURE THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN.—DICK TURPIN IS DULY MADE CAPTAIN OF THE BAND.

Tom King heard the wheels revolve, and felt the cart going from under his feet.

Another moment and he would be suspended.

But that moment was not destined to arrive, for just as the hangman set the cart in motion, and before it had moved more than a few inches, Claude Duval broke through the ranks, and, with one well-directed blow, laid the hangman prostrate, and stopped the cart.

Then, with an agility which no one would have given him credit for possessing, he climbed into it.

It was just at this moment that Dick Turpin reached the other side of the cart, and, leaning forward in his saddle, he took Tom in his arms.

"Quick, Claude!" he cried. "Quick, for your life! Get on to the coffin, and cut him down! I have him safe!"

How grateful those words were to Tom King.

He had heard all the confusion that had taken place, but seen nothing.

Claude Duval lost not a second in obeying Dick's instructions, and, taking a large sharp knife from his pocket, he mounted upon the coffin, and severed the rope at a stroke.

Dick caught Tom as he fell, and, exerting his utmost strength, placed him on the saddle before him.

Then he took a hasty glance at what might, with every propriety, be called the field of battle.

The conflict continued, but its violence was much abated.

The scene was one of inextricable confusion.

By the dead weight he held he could tell that Tom had fainted.

He undid the rope that had become drawn rather tightly about his neck, and tore the cap from off his face, so that his breathing should not be obstructed.

"Get clear, if you can," shouted a voice from somewhere above, "and do so as quickly as possible. There is a reinforcement coming."

Dick Turpin raised his eyes the moment these words reached his ears, and then he saw, very much to his surprise, one of the men he had brought with him, on the horizontal beams of the gallows.

From his elevated position he was of course able to command a very extensive view.

"Get clear, Dick!" he said again, "I can see the glitter of soldiers on the Oxford-road, and there is a tremendous cloud of dust! It will take them some few minutes to get here, but you must be off before they come, or it will be all over with you."

"We must fight our way through the soldiers

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS BEARING OFF TOM KING.]

police," said Claude Duval, as he jumped off the coffin. "Once among the crowd all will be well. They will open a way for us, and cover our escape. Where is Jack?"

"Here," said a voice, and Sixteen-String Jack, looking very much the worse for the encounter, presented himself before them.

"Are you hurt?" asked Turpin, anxiously.

"Not to speak of. We have gained our purpose; the battle is won. Is Tom all right?"

"He has fainted," said Dick, "but that was from the sudden revulsion of feeling, no doubt."

"Be off with you," said the man on the top of the gallows; "be off, or you will all be captured. There is a large body of soldier coming. In a few minutes they will be upon the spot."

"Soldiers?" repeated Jack, in accents of surprise, for he had not heard the man's former communication. "How could they have sent for and obtained a reinforcement in so short a time?"

"We must not stop to inquire," said Claude Duval. "The coast is clear now. I will get my horse."

As he spoke, Duval took from his pocket a large steel whistle, and blew upon it a blast of exceeding shrillness.

This signal was thrice repeated.

The clear, shrill sounds rose high above all the surrounding din.

Ere the last notes had become extinct, two men, mounted upon magnificent horses, rode into the little clear space that was immediately around old Tyburn-tree, for the express instructions the family had received were to keep as clear a space round it as they could, and to use their efforts to drive the soldiers and police steadily in one direction away from it.

These instructions were most admirably carried out by the family.

Claude and Jack sprang into their saddles as soon as the two men who had brought the horses had vacated them.

"We are ready," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Captain, your orders."

"Forward, then," said Dick, "since you will have it so. You, Claude, lead the way, and Jack keep at my side."

"Right!" was the immediate reply, and Claude Duval rode a few steps in advance.

He was closely followed by Turpin and Jack Rann.

Black Bess had enjoyed a long interval of rest, and was therefore strong and able to bear, without inconvenience, a double burden.

Tom King was placed in front of Dick, and was retained in his position on the saddle by Dick's arm.

With his other hand he held the reins, so that it was necessary for some one to be at his side to defend him.

No signs of returning animation showed themselves in either Tom's face or form.

As soon as they saw the three highwaymen bearing off his body, they uttered a stentorian cheer, and, as Claude had predicted, opened a lane to allow them to pass through.

"Thanks, my friends," cried Turpin. "Many thanks for the assistance you have rendered me to-day. I shan't forget it, you may depend."

And so, with similar speeches, he greeted the people as he passed onwards.

But the lane which had been made closed up after, even as the water closes around the rudder of a ship, leaving no trace whatever of its progress.

Our friends had reached somewhere about the centre of the crowd, when a loud blast upon a bugle reached their ears.

Jack turned, and looked back.

The cavalry, of whose approach they had been fortunately apprised, had reached the outskirts of the crowd, where a scene of the utmost confusion was taking place.

The bugle blast which Jack had heard was a signal for the soldiers to charge.

This was about as ill-advised a step as they could well have taken, for it brought them into immediate collision with the populace.

Their best policy would have been to conciliate them.

But the officer in command was one of those obstinate, pig-headed fellows, who always attempt to do everything by force, and so he gave the order to charge.

He had experienced a great deal of difficulty in getting so far.

Some explanation of their presence on this occasion is due, and we may as well give it here at once.

It must, then, be understood that on that very morning a communication was forwarded to the Secretary of State, whose contents were of rather a startling character.

The sum and substance of it was, that the writer had good grounds for believing that a desperate and well-organized attempt would be made to rescue Tom King upon the arrival of the procession at Tyburn, and that the attack would be headed by three daring and notorious highwaymen, to wit: Dick Turpin, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack.

Now, as a general rule, the Secretary of State, as all sensible persons would, took no heed of anonymous letters, and, therefore, having perused this one, he threw it into the fire.

In spite of himself, however, its contents would obtrude upon his mind, and he felt very uncomfortable indeed.

He did not like to break through his rule, and notice an anonymous letter.

Nor did he like the idea of allowing the opportunity of capturing the three highwaymen to pass by.

So, after wasting a great deal of time in fruitless debate, he resolved to send a troop of Light Dragoons to Tyburn.

As, we have seen, this was done.

But the Secretary was so long making up his mind, that the opportunity was lost, for, instead of arriving at the time they did, they ought to have accompanied the procession.

A properly drawn-up and legal document was given to the commanding officer, empowering him to capture the three highwaymen, and lodge them in any one of his majesty's jails. All good men and true loyal subjects were called upon to render the soldiers all the assistance in their power, to enable them to accomplish the end desired.

Thus armed, the officer set out.

He was in a very bad temper at the duty which had been assigned to him, and so, too, were all his men, for the military never like performing the duty of police officers.

What little patience the hot-headed officer possessed was quite exhausted with the time and trouble he had to force his passage through the mob to Tyburn.

On arriving, he saw at once that the rescue had already taken place.

Then he ordered the bugle to be blown, and gave the signal for a charge.

Thus attacked, the mob at once turned round and defended themselves, and a regular riot was the consequence.

The forms of the three highwaymen, being on horseback, were plainly visible to the officers and his men, and they endeavoured to cut a passage direct to them, through the living mass.

And however well the crowd of unarmed men stood the charge, they were compelled to give way before the sabres of the soldiers, who used them without mercy.

And so they struggled through the mob.

Yet, in spite of all their exertions, they could not gain upon their prey. In fact, the distance between them did, if anything, increase; for our friends, having reached the outskirts of the mob, were able to make better progress.

Still, their perils were very far indeed from being over.

CHAPTER CLVI.

THE TROOP OF LIGHT DRAGOONS CHASE THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN ALONG THE EDGWARE-ROAD, BUT LOSE SIGHT OF THEM AT BROCKLEY HILL.

Too late the commanding officer perceived that he had made a false move, and that it would have been better not to charge the mob at all, but waited on the outside of it, and then made the attempt to capture the highwaymen.

But although he felt the full force of this conviction, he would not allow it to appear in any way whatever.

The people, however, seeing the desperate manner in which they had acted, rather shrunk from them. Still, they were only able to go at a walking pace.

In the meantime our friends had got clear of those who had been of such important assistance to them, and reached the Edgware-road.

Then the people, as soon as they saw them break into a gallop, conceived they had done enough, and no longer offered even the semblance of resistance, but opened to allow the soldiers to pass through them, even as the highwaymen had done.

But these were neither members of the family, nor were they those who had suffered from the charge of the dragoons.

Away went Claude and Jack, urging the beautiful horses which they bestrode to the utmost, but, despite of her double burden, bonnie Black Bess kept ahead with ease.

Ere long, however, the numerous band of dragoons came thundering along the road after them.

The troop was one that had been long distinguished for the beauty and fleetness of its horses, and that was the reason it was selected, in case they should have to chase the highwaymen.

The road was broad and level. It was, moreover, firm beneath the horses' feet, and the speed they made really was amazing.

Neither of the highwaymen spoke, for conversation would have been next to an impossibility.

The whole of their attention, too, was necessary in looking to the safety of their horses, for a false step or a slip would have been fatal.

Tom showed no signs of recovery, and this was a circumstance that filled Dick Turpin with uneasiness. He began to fear that the rope had already pressed with sufficient tightness round his neck to strangle him.

Or he knew that it not unfrequently happened that a sudden and unexpected deliverance from any great peril resulted in death.

An instance of this was given to the writer some three years back. The narrator was an eye-witness. At the time spoken of he was a resident in Dublin, and business took him frequently to the barracks there. On one occasion a soldier was sentenced to be shot, though the offence of which he was found guilty would be deemed by most a trivial one. Some hopes that the sentence would be mitigated were entertained, but the morning for the execution arrived without bringing with it anything official. The man was led out to die.

An order was made that all civilians should be excluded from the barracks, but the narrator contrived to evade this order, and was present in the courtyard. A small body of soldiers, destined to perform the disagreeable duty of executioners, were marshalled forward, and the guns loaded. The condemned man, who was calm and composed, was led out and blindfolded. A handkerchief was placed in his hand, the letting fall of which was to signify that he was ready. An intense silence prevailed, but it was presently broken by the loud tones of an officer, who cried, "Make ready!" The rattling of muskets immediately followed. "Present!" cried the officer again. The guns were pointed at the doomed man, who at that moment let fall the handkerchief. Then followed a moment's awful stillness. The soldiers, with their fingers on the triggers of their guns, awaited the command of their officer to fire. But the word never came. The feelings of all present were wrought up to the highest pitch. None could imagine the cause of the delay, until it was announced that the condemned man was repricved. The poor fellow rose to his feet as soon as the words reached his ears, but he almost immediately fell backwards. It was thought that he had swooned from excess of emotion, but, upon examination, it was found that he was quite dead. Joy and the sudden delivery from death had killed him.

Such is the substance of the narrative related to the writer. Some of the minor details may not be quite correct, but still the story is told as near as he remembers it. For the truth of it he cannot, of course, vouch, though, as before stated, the gentleman who related the incident stated that he was present, and well acquainted with the whole of the particulars.

Of the humanity of the military authorities nothing need be said.

Let us resume.

Turpin, then, finding the insensibility of his friend continue, was afraid that joy had killed him.

He had no opportunity, however, of ascertaining whether this was actually the case, for their pursuers were hard upon their track.

They would have, too, a very difficult job to escape, even if they were so fortunate as not to be captured, which was, of the two, by far the most probable event.

But when men feel that life and liberty depend upon their exertions, it is wonderful what deeds they can perform—such as under less dominant influences they would not dream of attempting.

The soldiers, too, were indefatigable, and tore along in pursuit of the highwaymen at a tremendous speed. They, however, were not actuated by such a powerful one, but almost. They felt they had a disagreeable duty to perform, and, therefore, the sooner they performed it the better.

Besides, the little fracas with the mob had warmed their blood, and they began to have a personal feeling in the matter, which increased every moment.

Then, again, there are few to whom hunting is not a most delightful sport, and they were huntsmen in every sense of the term, only theirs was of the most exciting character, for the game they hunted was human beings

They spared neither whip nor spur.

Still, in spite of all their exertions, they could not get on so well as they wished. Do what they would, the highwaymen maintained the same distance between them, and that distance was just out of gunshot.

They came on, too, in a straggling throng, for those who rode the fleetest horses were foremost. Had they have kept in rank, and all moved at one regular pace, they would have stood no chance whatever of capturing their prey.

When making their arrangements for Tom's rescue, our friends had not calculated upon such an energetic pursuit, nor did they anticipate that Tom would be incapable of helping himself. In fact, a horse had been provided for him to mount upon, but which, under the circumstances, they deemed it best not to encumber themselves with.

All our readers may not be aware that the Edgware-road is a broad turnpike-road, running in a north-westerly direction from London. For exactly ten miles its course is a straight line, deviating not in the slightest perceptible degree, having not an appreciable curve during the whole of that long distance.

Many people have, no doubt, been filled with admiration when they saw it, and remarked what a beautiful road it was, but our three friends were quite of a contrary opinion, at all events, just then.

It gave them no opportunity of evading those in pursuit, for they were all the time in sight.

Had there been a bend in the road, the case would have been different. Once free from the observation of their foes, they might have a chance of finding some place of refuge.

There was no help, therefore, but to keep straight on.

The road was familiar to all three of them, and they knew that a bend in the road would not occur until they reached Brockley Hill, at which place it curves round rather suddenly to the right.

In a little more than a mile, however, it resumes its former direction, and continues in a straight line to St. Alban's.

This bend in the road, then, was the only chance they had of being out of sight of the dragoons, and it was there that they calculated upon being able to strike across the country.

Such being the case, it was obviously their best policy to strain every nerve to place as great a distance as they could between them.

At the rate they were going at, the ten miles was very soon accomplished, and the bend in the road reached.

As they swept round it—which they did with great swiftness—Sixteen-String Jack turned in his saddle, and looked back.

The foremost of the soldiers was rather more than three quarters of a mile distant.

The large or principal body about a mile off.

The cloud of dust which their horses threw up made their position apparent.

Our friends kept on for half a mile further, and then came to a halt.

Their pursuers were neither within sight or hearing.

An anxious consultation now took place as to what was best to be done; but scarcely had they commenced, than Turpin perceived Tom King evince some signs of returning consciousness.

This was an event which filled him with joy.

"You must not heed him now," said Sixteen-String Jack; "in something less than five minutes the dragoons will reach this spot. That, then, is all the time we can hope to have to reach some place of concealment, for to continue the race would be nothing but folly! What are we to do?"

"I know not what will be best," said Turpin.

"We must do something, without you intend to fall into their hands."

"This will serve us in place of nothing better," exclaimed Claude Duval. "Look here."

He pointed to a board, which was fixed on the top of some wooden palisadings, on the left hand side of the road.

"What is it?"

"Draw nearer, and you will see."

"'This house and grounds to let——'" said Jack, reading the words upon the board. "Capital! That will do it. We shall find safe refuge there for a little while, beyond all doubt. Do you not think so, Dick?"

"Yes—yes."

"Then leap over the palings without loss of time, or the dragoons will be upon us."

Indeed, at this moment the beat of the horses' hoofs upon the hard road came quite plainly to their ears, and impressed upon them the imperative necessity there was for them to be expeditious in their movements, if they intended to elude capture.

CHAPTER CLVII.

DICK TURPIN DECIDES UPON TAKING SHELTER FOR A TIME IN MINERVA VILLA, BUT SOON FINDS IT TOO HOT TO HOLD HIM.

"KEEP still, for heaven's sake!" said Dick Turpin to Tom King, as he backed Bess to the opposite side of the road. "Keep still until we are over. It will be taxing the mare's powers to the utmost to put her to such a leap as that."

This was unquestionably true.

Very few horses could be found who would have faced such an obstacle as that palisading.

It was between four and five feet in height, and on the other side grew a quick-set hedge, which made it at least a foot higher in the lowest part, and, of course, considerably wider.

No slight achievement would it be for a horse to leap such an obstruction, and for any one to do so that carried a double burden seemed quite beyond the bounds of possibility.

But Black Bess was a creature of no ordinary stamp, as the extraordinary deeds which she performed will testify.

But, as Dick said, he was now taxing her to the utmost.

He patted her neck encouragingly, taking the reins in his teeth while he did so, and then gave her the impulse forward.

She obeyed it with the utmost willingness, and, making a tremendous rush, cleared the palings gallantly, alighting on her feet on the soft turf on the other side with a barely perceptible shock.

All who have had anything to do with horses must have noticed how great an influence example exerts upon them.

So it was with the two horses upon which Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were seated.

Without the example of Black Bess before them, the probability is they would never have accomplished the leap; as it was, they performed it with apparent ease.

Claude's horse, however, missed his footing upon reaching the earth, and fell on to his knees.

He struggled to his feet again.

Then all three highwaymen dismounted.

The trampling of the dragoons sounded nearer.

The place into which they had so unceremoniously leaped appeared to be a park or shrubbery, but, whichever it might be, it was in a very neglected condition.

The ground was covered to a depth of several inches with decayed leaves, and this explained at once how it was Black Bess had descended so lightly.

Dick Turpin laid his comrade Tom upon the bed of leaves, and gave him the strictest injunctions to neither move or speak.

Then he took Bess by the bridle, and led her close to the palings.

Claude and Jack immediately followed his example.

All now awaited with extreme impatience and anxiety the approach of the dragoons.

In the positions they then occupied, it was quite impossible for anyone passing along the road to see the least vestige of them.

Nor would the hard impacted roadway receive any impressions of the horses' hoofs, to show at what part the leap was made.

The only risk they ran was that, at a critical moment, the horses might, by some slight sound or movement, betray their whereabouts.

This, however, they considered a remote contingency.

Another circumstance in their favour was that, at the time they halted, they were out of hearing of the soldiers; consequently, the officers would be out of hearing of them.

There would be no sudden cessation of the horses' footsteps to generate the suspicion that they had sought a hiding-place on the roadside.

For all that, their position was a ticklish one. There was a chance of their being discovered, in the event of which, all resistance would be futile: captivity or death inevitable.

The clanking of the soldiers' accoutrements could now be heard, mingled with the rapid hoof-beats.

Another moment and they would reach the spot where our friends were concealed.

Placing their arms round their horses' necks, and keeping a firm hold upon their bridles with the other hand, the three highwaymen sought, by gentle caresses, to keep the creatures quiet.

Of Black Bess Dick had little fear, but the other two were strange horses, and the worst was to be looked for.

Then the soldiers swept by with undiminished speed.

It was evident they had no suspicions as yet.

The noise they made, and the cloud of dust which enveloped them, were something prodigious.

But the highwaymen did not venture to make the least movement until the last of the throng was almost out of hearing.

Then, animated by one impulse, all three directed their steps to where Tom King had been laid.

Upon their approach, however, he rose.

A glance told them that he had not only quite recovered, but that he fully comprehended their situation.

"Waste no more time with me!" he said; "You have for my sake already run too many risks. Let us proceed to action!"

"Spoken like yourself!" said Claude and Jack, both grasping him by the hands. "We have met under strange circumstances, but let us hope it will be a long period before we separate."

"Thanks!" said Tom King; "but we must defer such speeches to a better opportunity. Those who are in pursuit of us, and who, I take it, from the clatter they made, to be soldiers"——

"They are. A troop of light dragoons."

"I thought as much. They have passed us; but you cannot tell how soon they may meet some one on the road who will tell them no one answering to our description has gone by."

"We cannot," said Turpin, who was beyond measure pleased to find his comrade's mind so clear; "and in the event of such a thing, they will immediately guess we have sought shelter somewhere, and will turn back, and make a vigorous search."

"There can be no doubt of that," said Claude Duval; "so the sooner we see about making our position more secure, the better. You lead the way, Dick."

Turpin led Bess forward, taking pains to keep as much in the shelter of the trees as possible.

"What place is this?" asked Tom.

"I do not know the name of it," replied Turpin; "but while we were in the road deliberating as to what course we should pursue, Claude saw a board stuck up with words painted upon it to the effect that there was a house and grounds to let. These are the grounds, and there, look, is the house."

Dick Turpin, as he spoke, raised his arm, and pointed to a gap in the trees, through which a view of a large and substantial-looking stone mansion could be obtained.

Claude and Jack, who were in the rear, pushed forward when Turpin pointed, to see what it was.

It was the front of the house which they saw.

Before it was a very spacious lawn, skirted by a broad carriage drive.

This, however, was in many places scarcely distinguishable from the lawn. Both were completely overrun with weeds.

The house, too, had an appearance of neglect about it, or, more properly speaking, it was in that state of dilapidation into which houses so soon fall when they are left unoccupied.

With buildings the natural order of things is reversed. They wear out quickest when they are not used.

"It looks a cheerless place, does it not?" said Turpin.

"It does, indeed."

"Would it be safe, think you, to venture upon the lawn?"

"In my opinion it would be wisest not to do so. You stand a chance of being seen."

"I know that, but I was wondering which would be the best plan to adopt, to push forward and get out into some of the cross-country lanes, of which there are so many hereabouts, or to take shelter for a time within the house itself."

"That will, I expect, be rather a difficult point to settle," said Claude. "My first idea was that the place would afford us capital means of concealment."

"But yet," said Jack, "it looks to me more reasonable to endeavour to place a great as distance as we can between ourselves and the dragoons."

"So it does," said Tom, "I quite agree with Jack there."

"Then perhaps you will agree with me in this as well, that the safest road for us to take to escape the dragoons would be the road back to London, provided, of course, that we can do so without their knowledge, for if they chased us back to London we should be irrevocably lost."

"It is a bold idea," said Tom, "to think of running into the jaws of danger in that manner, and yet I should not be surprised if the daring nature of the act did not carry safety along with it."

"That is just the view I take of the case," said Jack.

"But," exclaimed Duval, "it will never do for us to remain consulting here. If we do, all the chances will be lost."

"There are three courses open," said Turpin. "One is to take refuge in the house—another to seek an entrance into some of the cross country lanes—and the other to ride back towards London. Now, which shall it be? You must decide at once!"

"We will leave it to you, Dick," was the unanimous reply. "What you think the best to do shall be done. Speak."

"I will," replied Turpin, "because I think by so doing that valuable time may be saved. The soldiers seem to have gone on, and in my opinion the safest thing we can do will be to lie snug in yonder house until a bit of the bother is blown over, and the vigilance of the authorities relaxes."

"Agreed," cried the three highwaymen. "Lead the way, Dick. We will follow."

Having thus decided, they proceeded, without further loss of time, to seek an entrance.

In order to do this, Dick, after a rapid survey of the exterior of the mansion, did not go upon the lawn, but continued to force a passage through the trees round to the back part of the house.

This they found very secluded. Indeed, there was no dread of their being overlooked from any quarter.

But the neglect which they noticed in the front, was much more apparent in the back part of the premises.

Crossing a garden, which alone was the very personification of desolation, our friends came to one of those French windows, as they are called, which reach from the ceiling to the floor, and open in the manner of folding-doors.

This they instantly fixed upon as the place where an entrance would be most easily effected, and this proved quite right, for they got the window open without a very great deal of difficulty.

"The best plan," said Turpin, "will be to bring all the horses into the house with us. They can easily come through the window, and then we know they will be quite safe."

CHAPTER CLVIII.

THE SOLDIERS, DIRECTED BY MR. GROVES, APPROACH THE EMPTY VILLA AND SURROUND IT, WHICH FILLS OUR HIGHWAYMEN WITH CONSTERNATION.

WHETHER or not the empty house would prove a safe place of refuge depended entirely upon one condition.

That condition was an obvious one.

It was that the officers should not learn in any way that they had taken shelter there. If they did, their predicament would be an awkward one indeed, for to be besieged in a place of that sort by so many well-armed men would be no joke.

But what Turpin thought was, there was no mode that he could think of by which the soldiers could be made aware that they had taken shelter there at all, and consequently that being a never-visited place they would be safer there than they could possibly be elsewhere.

Passing through the room into which they had come by means of the French window, they emerged into a hall of very tolerable dimensions.

This was the lightest place in the house, for in the rooms the shutters had been closed, so that, except where a few rays of daylight made their way through the chinks, they were in utter darkness.

But in the hall there was a very good supply of light. It came in through a fan-light over the door, and also through a large and beautiful stained-glass landing, which could be seen just at the bend in the stairs.

They had no trouble in tying the horses to the balusters, and then they felt themselves quite free to go where they chose.

"Let us ascend," said Dick; "not only shall we be in lighter rooms, but also from our elevation able to command a view of the surrounding country, which may prove an advantage to us."

"Most decidedly," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I only hope they don't come here to look for us, for as sure as they do we shall be in a fix."

"I do not anticipate such a thing, myself, even for a moment, though there is no harm in being prepared."

"None at all, and now that brings me round to the subject I spoke of once before. Tom, my boy, I want you to give me your attention for half a minute."

"What is it, Claude?"

"I will tell you in a very few words. The other day, while we were all three talking about your escape, Jack and myself came to the determination to form ourselves into a band of four, as soon as you were free, and place ourselves under the command of Dick, who should be our leader, or captain, or whatever you like to call him. All we want is for you to consent to the proposal."

"Then you have it, and, if you will believe me, I never said yes to anything more willingly in my life. It is the best plan of action that could possibly be adopted."

"Hurrah!" said Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, in the same breath. "Hurrah! I thought you would agree to it."

"I do. Together, I believe we may do much, and be safe, but separated we could do nothing, and should, in a short time, take a ride to Tyburn, as I did to-day. Indeed my own case is about as good an instance of what I say as could very well be found. Had I been alone I should have perished, but through having you for my allies, I have been saved, and, to the end of my life, I shall always feel grateful to all three of you for what you have in done in my behalf."

"Come on," said Dick, "we have only done by you what you would have done by us; I am impatient to see the upper part of the house."

"Lead the way, then, and we will quickly follow you," answered Sixteen-String Jack; "I am quite as impatient as you are."

Turpin sprang up the stairs, with his comrades at his heels.

Upon reaching the landing they saw before them a number of doors.

Dick choose one which he imagined, from its position, would have its window situated in front of the house.

"Hold back," he said, "we must not show ourselves, for, as you know, this is a safe place for us only so long as no one suspects us to be in it."

It was well indeed for all that Turpin had the presence of mind to check, on the part of his companions, the very natural impulse which they felt to go direct to the casement and look out.

All four crossed the room cautiously, and then crawling to the window, peeped out of it,

It was next to an impossibility for them to have been seen by any one outside, for they only raised the upper part of their heads above the sill.

The first thing that attracted their notice was the entrance gate leading into the grounds surrounding the house.

It was some distance from it, and opened into the Edgware-road.

Before they had time to see anything more, Jack uttered an exclamation.

"Done!" he said. "We have brought our pigs to a nice market. Look, here come the dragoons back again."

The other three saw them before Jack finished speaking, for they followed the direction of his eyes.

About a quarter of a mile off down the road, and coming at a walk, was the troop of soldiers who had been so specially sent out by the Secretary of State to capture them.

They were looking about from side to side with great eagerness, as though each moment they expected to catch sight of something for which they were on the look out.

Turpin drew a long breath.

"It's all right," he said. "I expected they would come back, seeing and hearing nothing of us in advance. They must have been right on to St. Alban's."

"They needn't know we are here," said Claude; "and I don't think there is anything that would serve to put them on the scent. I wish night would come."

"Your wish will soon be gratified, then. The sun must be about setting, by the colour of his beams."

"Under cover of the night we should be able to steal away from here first-rate, and betake ourselves to a place of greater safety."

"Good heavens," exclaimed Jack Rann, whose eyes had never been off the soldiers for a moment. "Good heavens, they have already discovered us! They are pointing to the house!"

A glance confirmed this startling intelligence. At the short distance from the house which the dragoons were, it was easy enough to see that they were all attentively regarding the empty house.

But whether this had any connexion with our friends was more than they could say.

It would, however, be quickly seen.

Our readers can one and all imagine with what intense eagerness the highwaymen watched the progress of the soldiers along the road.

All depended whether they made a halt before the entrance-gates. If they did, all would be over with them.

Nearer and nearer they came, and at the same gentle speed.

Had they given up the hope of capturing them?

It looked like it.

And now, when the foremost in the troop were within about a dozen yards of the gates, the eager anxiety of our friends increased to an intolerable extent.

Their doubts and fears were quickly set at rest.

The troop stopped before the gates.

And now the interest they felt in what was going to happen next absorbed the whole of their faculties. They could neither move nor speak.

That the empty house was their destination was evident enough, for gradually the whole troop formed in a dense cluster round the entrance-gates, which were at length, after a good deal of trouble, thrown open.

Then they filed in, making in a direct line for the front door of the house, without paying the least regard to the path.

To reach the lawn took them but a few moments.

Then, as they came more fully to view, they noticed something which had until then escaped their observation.

And that was that the soldiers were accompanied with a stout bulldog-looking man, who was attired as a country farmer.

This man evidently was on rather friendly terms with the officer, for he walked near the neck of his horse in an important and imposing way.

It so happened that several of the panes of glass in the window out of which the highwaymen were looking had been broken out—indeed, demolished is the more appropriate word.

This happened luckily, for it enabled our friends to hear with tolerable ease what was being said outside.

They listened, stretching their ears to the utmost. A few words would decide them how to act.

The commanding officer was speaking.

"And so, Mr. Groves, this is Minerva Villa, is it?"

"It is, sir."

"And you think most likely the gentlemen we seek have taken shelter there?"

"I do."

"Then, if I speak the truth, I must say I don't."

"You're wrong."

"Not so! You do not know our men. They have cleverly enough managed to give us the double, and, by this time, are many a mile off. You may make your mind easy about that; though, of course, I shall search the villa just for the sake of feeling satisfied."

"Do so! and you will be rewarded."

"What makes you so positive, Mr. Groves?"

"Well, I don't mind telling you. Some fifteen years ago, Jonathan Wild was pursued by the police along this road, when all of a sudden he disappeared: and where do you think he went to?"

"That is more than I can tell—without this house was empty then, as it is now, and that he took shelter in it."

"Such is precisely the state of the case! The house was empty, and he did take refuge in it."

'The devil he did?"

"Yes; and what is more, he was caught: and now you know what makes me think they are hidden there, because they appear to have disappeared about the same spot; and they are quite as likely to think it a likely place of concealment as Jonathan Wild."

"To be sure! I am much obliged to you, Mr. Groves, and we will soon set the matter at rest."

By the time this little dialogue was at an end—every word of which had reached the highwaymen's ears—the whole of the soldiers had reached the lawn, for several of the horses having fallen lame, they came in stragglers.

Turning round, and seeing all there, he, in quick military tones, gave them the order to dismount, and form themselves into a circle round the building.

This manœuvre was quickly executed.

Some of the men proceeded to picket the horses.

The commanding officer and Mr. Groves walked about together.

As soon as the men had formed themselves into a circle round the villa, he turned to his companion, as he said—

"There; if they are in the house I shall very soon have them. I hope and trust they are there, and then this disagreeable duty, which I feel it a disgrace to be set to perform, will be over."

CHAPTER CLIX.

RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH MINERVA VILLA WAS ATTACKED BY THE DRAGOONS, AND THEN BURNED TO THE GROUND.

To say that the four highwaymen viewed these energetic proceedings with something akin to dismay, would be to tell no more than the truth.

What hope could they have to cope with so many, with the least chance of success?

None at all.

They looked upon their capture or death as certain, and so resigned themselves to either the one or the other.

The place itself was in the worst possible conceivable state for them to stand a siege.

They had found no difficulty in making an entrance, nor was it likely the soldiers would.

They were at their wits end.

Dick Turpin was vexed, and took all the blame upon himself for what had occurred, though, of course, he had acted, as he thought, for the best. Too late he saw that the plan proposed by Sixteen-String Jack would have been the best one to follow.

Such regrets as these were now worse than useless; still he could not help cursing the officious Mr. Groves from the bottom of his heart, for it was clear enough, had it not been for him, they would not have been molested.

Dick resolved to pay him out, if ever he was blessed with an opportunity.

What is the best thing to be done? was the question uppermost in the minds of all of them.

But they could think of nothing.

Their reflections were disturbed by three terrific bangs upon the knocker of the front door.

Then a voice called upon those within to open in the king's name, and to fail not at their peril.

Of course, no notice whatever was taken of this appeal.

It was thrice repeated.

They were now permitted by the law to break into the house.

"I can see but one plan that offers us the least chance of success, and that chance is so very remote, that we might almost as well stay where we are and be captured!"

Let us hear it, nevertheless," cried Claude.

"It is this. Let us mount our horses, and then taking advantage of a time when the attention of all is occupied, let us make a sudden dash out—cut our way through the soldiers—and then fly for our lives!"

Claude shook his head.

"It is a desperate plan," he replied, "and, from the very boldness of it, deserves success. One thing would be greatly in our favour."

"The soldiers are not mounted, and if we succeeded in getting through their ranks we should have the start of them, for it would take them some little time to get into their saddles."

"So it would—so it would. I did not think of that."

"Moreover, night is coming on apace."

"Another very favourable occurrence. I am beginning to get a better heart."

"I have an amendment to propose," said Tom King, "and one to which I have no doubt you will agree."

"Quick, then. Speak it!"

"Let us barricade the place below as well as we are able, so as to keep them for a short time at bay."

"Well, what then?"

"In the meantime let us set fire to the house in as many places as we can."

"Set fire to the house?"

"Yes, why not?"

"What is the good?"

"Cannot you see?"

"No, that I am sure we cannot."

"I am surprised. When the house is fairly alight we will mount, as Dick said, and wait as long as we possibly can."

"Yes—yes!"

"And then, when the flames are at their height, and when they are least in anticipation of such a thing, we will fling the door open, and make a rush for our lives in the way Dick proposed."

"That is an amendment, with a vengeance!" said Sixteen-String Jack, "but yet I like the plan. If you can manage to carry it out, you will have a much better chance of making your escape."

"You think so?"

"I do."

"And you, Claude?"

"Yes, if the barricading can be done, and the soldiers kept out long enough."

"That I own is the worst part of it. But still, are you willing to make the attempt?"

"Perfectly, since it cannot, by any possibility, make our condition worse than it is, while there is just a faint hope of making it better."

"Exactly; and you, Dick?"

"I consent, of course, and let us carry it out at once. Who has the means of setting light to the place?"

"I have," said Jack.

"Then do you perform that part of the business, while we three will do our best at barricading the doors and windows. You had better begin to set light to the top of the house."

"All right. You perform your part of the business, and I will perform mine."

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack darted up the stairs, and, with great rapidity, made his way to the top of the house.

The top floor consisted of two large attics, which had clearly been, at some former time, used as lumber rooms, for a considerable quantity of rubbish yet remained on the floor.

This was just what he wanted, so, taking a piece of paper from his pocket, he disposed it to the best advantage; then took out his phosphorous bottle and matches.

By the aid of these the paper was soon set fire to, and he had the satisfaction of seeing it blaze up bravely.

Then he turned to the front room, and went through a similar performance.

This done, he returned to the other room, and found there was quite a fierce fire burning, so he scattered the fragments about in such places where they would most readily take hold of the woodwork.

Only those who have seen a fire break out, can form a correct estimate of the speed with which the flames spread. When seen it almost seems incredible.

With such pains as Jack took, the upper part of the house was quickly in flames.

Then he descended to the next floor.

Here the materials were not so plentiful, but the walls were all lined with wood, so he tore down one or two of the panels and lighted them, placing them afterwards in such a manner as to easily catch the remnant.

And so on he performed his task, and without being long about it, too, and when he descended into the hall, were the others were, the upper part of the mansion was roaring like a furnace.

And now we must go back and relate what happened to the other three.

As Sixteen-String Jack dashed up the stairs, they ran down them into the hall.

Just when they reached it, the soldiers commenced a violent attack upon the front door.

They were not used to their work, or they would have looked for a place where a breach could have been more easily effected.

They did not, however, calculate that the door would prove much of an obstacle, nor would it have done so, had not our friends fitted a couple of stout bars into their staples, and then piled against the wood-work all the heavy articles they could find.

Then they took a hasty survey of the proceedings of the besiegers outside, but they did not seem to be making an attack at any other point.

In fact, what the officer intended to do was to keep his men well surrounding the building, and then to batter down the door, and enter with a good body, and take the inmates prisoners; or, if they attempted to fly, they would only fall into the hands of those stationed outside.

So far all was good, but the plan which the highwaymen had hit upon was just calculated to upset it.

Finding the barricading done, Dick Turpin produced a tinder-box, and so did Claude, and the pair, in a few moments, set fire to the ground floor in more than fifty places.

The fire caught surprisingly, but the house was old, and full of dry wood-work.

It blazed bonnily.

When they perceived the fire from the outside, it had obtained a firm hold of every part of the house.

The violence of their blows redoubled.

When Jack, therefore, descended the stairs, he found the lower part enveloped in flames.

The horses got frightened and restive.

As a last stroke, they set fire to the barricade, which they had erected against the front door.

The heavy, cumbrous articles, of which it was composed, were as dry as tinder.

The soldiers continued their attack with increased fury, and presently a crackling sound announced that the door was giving way.

When they saw this was the case, the highwaymen led the horses into the room which they had entered.

This one they had been careful not to set fire to.

Nevertheless, the woodwork was burning in many places, and the apartment was filled with pungent, suffocating smoke.

This being the case, Jack ran no risk by going to the window and opening the shutters.

It became evident, then, immediately, that the flames and the smoke were driven from the front to the back of the house.

Outside the window, when the shutter was thrown back, our friends could see nothing but a dense mass of black smoke.

But how far it extended, or whether it merely hung there as a curtain, was more than they could tell.

They trusted, however, to its being the former.

They mounted.

But the moment they seated themselves in the saddles, a terrific crash announced the demolition of the front door.

But when they beat it down, such a furious body of flame and smoke rushed forth, that they were, one and all, compelled to retreat.

From every window, too, and from the roof as well, the flames and smoke came pouring forth, and it was clear that in a few minutes very little would be left of Minerva Villa but a heap of blazing ruins.

The officer in command hardly knew what to make of the affair.

All he could do, however, was to order his men to be extra vigilant, and fire upon any one they saw attempt to make their escape under the cover of the smoke.

A minute elapsed, during which the smoke grew thicker and thicker.

Then the loud report of a volley of fire-arms was heard, and at the same moment the roof of the old villa fell in with a tremendous crash, burying all beneath it.

CHAPTER CLX.

OUR FRIENDS GET CLEAR FROM THE BURNING VILLA, BUT BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

A COLUMN of white dust shot up high into the night sky as the roof fell.

In its downward course it caused the walls to collapse, and all fell together to the ground in one immense smoking, smouldering heap, which was all that remained of Minerva Villa.

We now return to the proceedings of the highwaymen, whom we left as they seated themselves in their saddles.

The smoke, hanging as it did in a dense mass in front of the window, favoured them greatly in what they had to do.

If this had not been the case, they could not have made the charge in a body as they intended, and therefore they would have stood a much fainter chance of achieving their purpose.

Tom King, the reader will remember, had no horse, so Dick insisted upon his mounting behind him.

The horses now began to show signs of distress, so they guided them as silently as they could through the window.

The sagacious creatures seemed to recollect having entered it, and also to be aware that silence was desirable, and they put their feet to the ground with the greatest stealthiness.

The smoke completely hid them when they emerged.

All three of the horses were now made to stand close to each other.

Ere they made the charge, they listened in the hope that, by so doing, they might make themselves acquainted with the position of their foes.

They also strove to recollect what they should have to encounter in the shape of obstacles.

But in both instances the effort was a vain one; they could neither form any definite idea of the position which the soldiers occupied, nor could they distinctly call to mind, having only once seen it, the general aspect of the garden.

Their charge, therefore, would be obliged to be made headlong, and at random.

Providence must be trusted for the result.

And now, to look at the general aspect of affairs, there really did seem to be a probability that the highwaymen would escape unscathed from one of the most perilous straits in which it had ever been their lot to be placed.

There is no doubt, however, but that for Tom's lucky thought about setting fire to the house, they would at that moment have been in a far less enviable position.

Yet they were far—very far from being safe. The rank of the dragoons would have to be broken through. They would have to run the risk of the shots that would be fired at them.

The smoke which had so far been such a friend to them was now a foe.

It was just at this minute, and when they had determined upon the charge, that the roof of the villa fell in, as related at the end of the last chapter.

The crashing sound frightened the horses, and made them increase their speed.

Then, dimly and faintly through the smoke, they saw a flash of fire, and heard the loud report of the guns.

The soldiers who discharged them had not, of course, caught sight of the fugitives, for that was simply impossible, but they had heard the tramp of the horses' hoofs, and they aimed their pieces in the direction of the sound.

Instantly all were on the alert, and prepared to withstand a charge.

But the highwaymen were upon them before they were aware of it.

So impetuous was the charge, that the soldiers, who were only a single line on foot, gave way.

"The prisoners have escaped!" they cried, as loud as they could bawl. "This way! this way! An escape! Bring the horses round! Mount, and ride in pursuit! Quick! or you will be too late! Fly! There they go! Over the fence! They're off, by Jove!"

These were a few of the ejaculations that came from the lips of those who had witnessed the highwaymen's daring charge and flight.

One half-second after the encounter with the dragoons, and they were clear of the bewildering smoke.

And just in time it was, too, or a most serious accident would have occurred, which would have possibly resulted in their capture.

Just before them was a rather high wooden fence.

They saw it, and the horses saw it only just in time.

The obstacle in itself was nothing, and they went over it without the least trouble.

Beyond this was a paddock, and then a meadow; afterwards a hedgerow, and then they emerged into a narrow, winding country lane.

They turned their horses heads towards London.

Black Bess carried her double burden bravely, though nothing but the most urgent necessity would have tempted Dick to place her powers to so severe a test.

The sounds of pursuit reached them.

The dragoons themselves began to feel quite a personal interest in the affair, and they all acted as though it was of the utmost importance to themselves to succeed with the design they had in hand.

Therefore they ran to the lawn where the horses had been picketed, and scrambling into their saddles, set off at a helter skelter pace, without thinking of, or waiting for, the word of command.

But in spite of all they could do, the highwaymen had got a good start, and in a long chase a start is everything.

The road they had now chosen was very unlike the Edgware-road. Not only was it tortuous, but miry, and very heavy and tiring for the horses.

They resolved to leave it at the first opportunity.

The pursuing dragoons used whip and spur unmercifully, and goaded on their poor and jaded animals at a furious rate.

This persistence in keeping upon their track made all four of the highwaymen uneasy. It showed how determined was the effort made to hunt them down.

And when we take a careful and comprehensive view of the whole matter, we shall not fail to see that they had ample room for apprehensive dread, and that they might dread the worst.

If they survived this attempt at annihilation, they thought they could bid defiance to all others which might afterwards be attempted.

This was such a systematic and well-organized pursuit, that its termination appeared to point to running the highwaymen to earth.

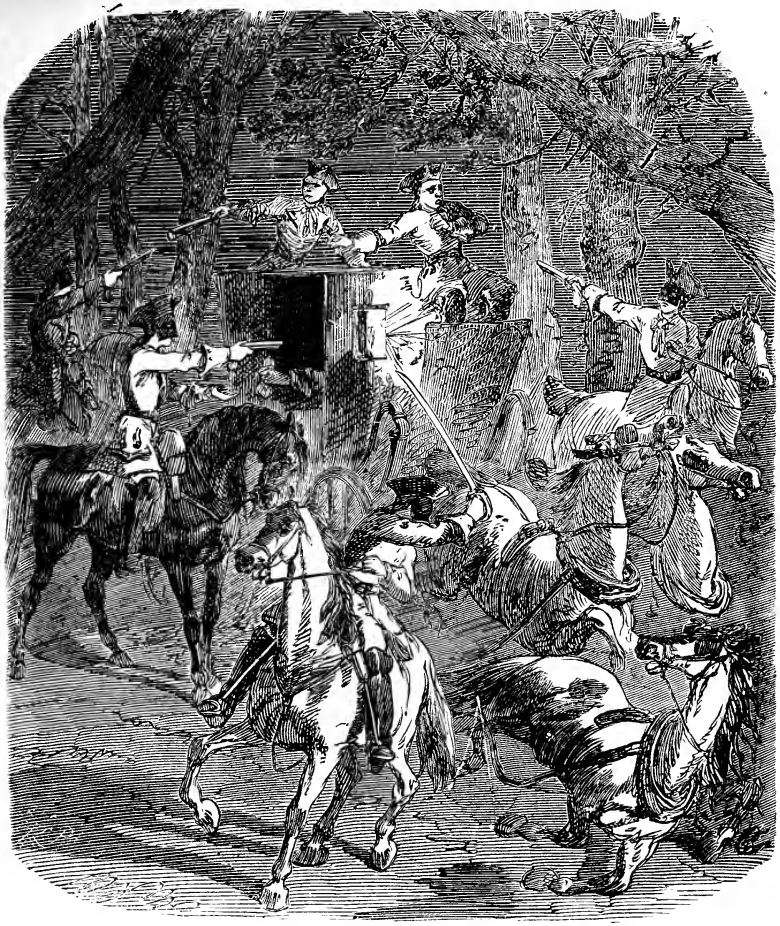
Tom King, having no horse, was quickly felt to be a very serious inconvenience, inasmuch as it prevented Black Bess making full use of her powers, and, besides, fatigued her in no ordinary degree.

She had now been on the road for a long time, and had received neither rest nor refreshment, except such as she received for the few minutes she was in the hall of the empty mansion.

But there was one thing that was very much in their favour, and that was darkness.

This increased every moment as night deepened, and as the clouds piled themselves up in the sky, shutting out all glimpses of the blue vault.

A blustering wind, too, came every now and then in violent gusts from the south-west, and there was every indication of coming rain.



This the highwaymen did not care for, so that the roads were not made too heavy by it.

In spite, however, of their utmost efforts, they were a long time before they could get out of earshot of their pursuers, who came thundering on with untiring perseverance, but at last they began to grow fainter and fainter.

The imperative necessity of adopting some strategic measure now pressed itself upon the minds of all four of the highwaymen. To continue their flight under existing circumstances would be nothing short of utter madness.

Presently they came to a place where the river Brent crossed the lane. It was spanned by a huge wooden structure, for it so happened that just there the mimic river was of more than its ordinary width.

The horses hoofs raised many a strange echo as they clattered over the bridge, but scarcely had they reached the opposite side than Claude Duval cried out, in a loud voice, "Halt!" at the same time arresting the progress of his own steed.

The command was immediately obeyed by his two comrades, who were filled with surprise, in which alarm was also mingled, for they dreaded that some accident had befallen him.

The next words, though, that he uttered dispelled their fears, and infused a momentary gleam of hope that they would yet succeed in baffling their enemies.

"Halt!" Claude cried; "I have an idea which I think can be successfully carried out. The river here appears to be both broad and deep. What is to prevent us from walking our horses into it, and then swimming down the stream."

"Nothing," said Dick Turpin. "It is a good thought, but it must be acted upon at once, or we shall be either seen or heard by our foes. Into the stream at once."

"We cannot make our position worse, be it how it may," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he followed Claude down the rather precipitous bank of the river, and then fairly walked his horse into the stream.

"It will be a rest for our steeds. Slip off the saddles and hold on by the bridles. If they are not encumbered with a rider's weight, the cold water will fill them with new life."

Before Dick Turpin had finished this speech, all had taken to the water and were ready for a start; nor were they any too soon, for the approach of the Light Dragoons was now plainly distinguishable.

To their unspeakable relief, they found the river, near the centre, was quite deep enough to allow the horses to swim down it with ease, and not only that, there was a strong current tending in a southerly direction.

Certainly it was rather a strange mode of progression, but though it was slow it was silent, and they built their hopes on the supposition that the route they had taken would be unsuspected, and their pursuers accordingly thrown completely off the scent—for a time, at any rate.

In accordance with Dick's commands, as soon as the horses found themselves out of their depths, all four slipped from their saddles, and committed themselves to the water.

having a firm grasp upon the reins, they found a small amount of exertion sufficient to keep them afloat.

The horses seemed to be much refreshed by their immersion, and they struck out more vigorously every moment.

But though their course seemed slow, it was not so actually. Progress in water is always deceptive, and, as they had the current in their favour, they drifted onwards almost without being aware of it.

CHAPTER CLXI.

FOR A SHORT TIME OUR FRIENDS SUCCEED IN ELUDING THE DRAGOONS.

From time to time they cast anxious glances behind them, in anticipation of seeing something of the troop of dragoons.

But the outlines of the bridge became confused, and at last faded altogether from their sight.

This happened before they heard the dragoons arrive.

Still they thought it not exactly prudent to leave the river yet, for fear they should not be far enough off to prevent the sound of their horses' hoofs being heard.

The river wound about very much, and they were not able in the darkness to take notice sufficient for them to tell how much they had doubled on their course.

There was the danger that it might wind them round again to the high road which they had left, but upon Turpin being applied to for information upon the subject, he replied that there was no danger of any such thing.

"I know the course of the little river well," he said. "If we continue to follow it we shall come out upon the Uxbridge Road at a point called Stonebridge, about half-way between Wilsdon and Twyford. Do you know the place?"

"Quite well," replied his comrades.

"That is enough, then. When we get there it will be time enough for us to consider which will be the next thing we had better do."

"You are right," said Tom King, "and one of the first things necessary will be to provide me with a horse. Black Bess won't be able to carry your weight and mine.'

"That is true, and it is a shame to tax the poor animal so. Nothing but dire necessity would have induced me. But never mind, she has not sustained much damage yet."

The river, after a little while, grew shallow again, which caused them to make another change.

They resolved, however, not to leave the course of the river, but walk their horses along the banks.

This time Claude Duval would insist upon Tom King riding behind him.

Without meeting with any adventure worthy of narration, they reached the stone bridge which spanned the river, and were glad to get up upon the broad highway.

From having been so long in the water, their clothing had got completely soaked through, and it now hung about them in a most disagreeable and uncomfortable manner.

To a spectator, at any rate, they would have appeared but very sorry objects.

The chill night air struck through to their very bones, and made their teeth chatter like castanets.

They clustered together, and a rather anxious consultation took place as to what step was to be taken next.

No sounds indicative of the vicinity of their pursuers reached their ears. They felt pretty certain, in fact, that they had completely succeeded in throwing them off their track.

Such being the case, the comforts which would accrue from a pleasant fire and a glass of something hot and strong, came vividly across their imaginations.

But their appearance, all dragged with mud and water as they were, was quite sufficient to rouse suspicion.

"Our position won't be improved by waiting," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and so the sooner we make up our minds what we are going to do the better."

"So say I," said Claude; "I am about as uncomfortable as a human being well could be."

"I only know of one thing that we can do," said Turpin, "and that is running rather more risk than I think advisable."

"Let us hear it."

"Am I am your captain, you say?"

Exactly."

"Then you are under my commands?"

"I suppose we ought to consider ourselves so.

"Then I will tell you what I had thought of, and what to me seems about the only course left open to us,"

"Well?"

"You can decline if you like. About a mile further on from here is a public-house known as the 'Fox and Grapes,' kept by a man named Pilbeam."

"I just know the house," said Tom King, "and that is about all."

"I know the landlord, and the landlord knows me," continued Turpin; "I have stayed at his house when I have been hard pressed by the runners."

"And he never betrayed you?"

"No; and yet there is something about the man's face and manner which makes me mistrust him."

"Perhaps that is your fancy."

"It may be."

"Why did he not betray you before?"

"It may not have been worth while to do so, and, more than that, at the time I speak of, I had not done anything particularly notorious."

"I see."

"But now you may depend there will be a great outcry made against us. The fact of a troop of dragoons having been despatched purposely to effect our capture will bear out that assertion. A large reward will be offered for the four of us; enough, in fact, to tempt any man."

"You are right; it will be running a great risk."

"Precisely; and yet, after all, he may be well disposed towards us, and have no thoughts of acting treacherously."

"You are willing, then, that we should try our luck?"

"I am; good fortune has always hitherto invariably attended us, and I do not see why she should desert us now. The thing is, the house is not far from London, and they may have heard of what has taken place at Tyburn to-day."

"Most likely, I should say."

"Still, if you are willing, I think we cannot do better than take shelter there for an hour or two at least—not solely on account of ourselves, but our cattle."

"And it must not be forgotten," said Claude Duval, "that we are now four strong, and that it would be no ordinary foe that we should have to dread."

"True; when we look more closely at it, the danger is not so great, only it would be awkward if the dragoons chased us here."

"It would, and no mistake; but I do not think we need be afraid."

"But, come, are you ready, all?"

"All!"

"Forward, then!" exclaimed Dick Turpin; "it is the first house you will come to on the left-hand side of the way."

Once more putting their steeds to rapid motion, they sped along the road.

The "Fox and Grapes" was very quickly in sight.

As soon as it was they drew rein a little.

To have made too much clatter would not have served their purpose at all.

Lights were beaming from nearly all the windows on the ground floor of the inn, thus showing that its inhabitants had not yet thought of retiring to rest.

There was an opening at the side of the public-house leading to the stables, and down this they turned.

The hoofs of the horses made a slight sound, and it appeared to be heard by the individual who performed the duties of ostler, for there came from the further end of the yard a flash of light, as though some one was carrying a lantern.

Our four friends dismounted, and then, taking the horses by the bridle, advanced to meet the man carrying the light.

Upon approaching him they found him to be a youth of about twenty years of age, with dark, curling hair, and a good-humoured expression of countenance.

"Well, Joe," said Turpin, with the air of an old acquaintance; "well, Joe, do you recollect me?"

Joe turned the lantern so that its principal beams should fall upon Dick's countenance.

"I thought it was your voice," he said. "Why, you are the noble gent that gave me a guinea the last time you were here, for grooming that black mare of yours."

"Just so. These are friends of mine, and they as well as myself, want their steeds well taken care of."

"I'll do it, sir. I'll do it."

"I knew you would: and now, Joe, do you know who I am?"

"I think I do."

"How did you come to know?"

"The guard of the coach told me."

"Ah!"

"Yes, but don't be afraid of trusting me. I'll never betray you as long as the world stands!"

"I will trust you, Joe, and if you will believe me, so far as your own money interest goes, you will get more by befriending me than ever you will by giving me up to justice."

"I wouldn't do no such thing! No, not was it ever so!" said Joe, with great emphasis. "Let me have the cattle, and I'll take care they are all right. You say those with you are friends of yourn?"

"Yes."

"May be some of them that helped you at Tyburn this morning?"

"Ah! How did you learn anything about that?"

"Why, Lor bless you, I was there myself, and didn't I pay into the officers downright well."

"I am much obliged to you, and here's some one who will feel even more so than I do."

"Then that's Tom King?"

"It is; but you ought to know it is not at all prudent for you to mention his name in that sort of way. You don't know who might be listening."

"Mum's the word with me in future."

"Will it be safe for us to enter the house?"

"Well, I don't know. You see it might be and it might not."

"I suppose so," said Dick, with a slight smile.

"Has any one belonging to the place seen you come in?"

"No one but yourself, I think."

"Very good; then if you will be content to come up into the loft with me, and make yourselves as comfortable a bed as you can amongst the hay, I think it will be the best thing for you."

"Can you conceal us, there?"

"Without any trouble, if no one has seen or heard you arrive besides myself."

"I am much obliged to you for your offer," said Turpin. "You won't lose anything by it. I will consult with my friends a moment."

"All right. You'd better come inside the stable, and then you won't be so likely to be seen. Come up."

Joe, the ostler, led the horses into the stable, and was followed by the four highwaymen.

Then pulling the door shut, Joe hung the lantern on a hook in such a way that its light was pretty equally diffused over the stable, and our friends drawing close together, considered over the proposal the ostler had made to them.

In the end, after arguing the matter pro and con for some time, they determined to accept his offer, and followed him up into a spacious hayloft, which extended over the whole range of stabling.

CHAPTER CLXII.

THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS STILL FOLLOW IN THE TRACK OF THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN.

THE fresh hay with which the loft was literally crammed sent out an odour peculiarly grateful and pleasing to the senses.

At least, it was so to our friends.

They were really surprised to find what a comfortable bed the ostler managed to make for them.

Then, when they laid down, he covered them carefully with it.

Fain would they have taken off their wet clothes and dried them, but that was not to be thought of, and they found the dry hay quickly absorbed the moisture from them.

All four were dreadfully fatigued, and very badly in want of rest.

"Are you all right, gentlemen?" asked Joe.

"Yes; and could sleep, if you would only keep guard over us, and warn us of the approach of any danger."

"Sleep, then, for rest assured I will do so."

"Many thanks."

"Do not think," said Claude Duval, "that we shall allow this great service to go unrewarded."

"Well, I won't say I shall be angry with you if you offer me something for my trouble."

"That's right. We shall look upon it as work done, and pay for it accordingly."

"Good night, then, gentlemen. Sleep in security, for upon the least sign of anything going amiss, you may depend I shall wake you."

"We can depend upon that?"

"You can."

Joe, the ostler, descended from the hayloft into the stable, where he proceeded to give his every attention to the horses, for the state they were in required it.

But he was well master of his business, and in a very short space of time indeed he had thoroughly cleansed and fed them.

Continually looking danger in the face as they did, made the highwaymen indifferent to it in a very great degree, and though they were on this occasion surrounded, as one might say, by an atmosphere of danger, and with their liberty depending solely upon the fidelity of a man they scarcely knew, but who had professed good faith towards them, they allowed themselves to sink into a profound slumber.

It was placing a great temptation in the ostler's way. The aggregate rewards that were offered for the apprehension of the four would amount to a considerable sum, and be enough almost to tempt any one when they found it all but within their grasp.

We should not be doing that strict justice which it is always our wish to do if we said that some thoughts of the wealth he would obtain by acting treacherously did not flit across Joe's mind: and when the operation of grooming the steeds was over, he sat down upon the lid of the corn-bin, and putting his head between his hands, gave himself up to thought.

A severe struggle took place in his breast.

By giving up the highwaymen to justice, he would be merely doing his duty to society, and at the same time he would be placing in his hands what to him would be competency for the remainder of his life.

More than once he started to his feet, walked to the stable door, having all but determined to deliver them to their foes.

But as often he returned, and resumed his seat.

And so the night wore on.

Little did the slumbering highwaymen think that they were in such peril as they were. Peacefully, quietly, and deeply they slept.

But Sixteen-String Jack, who was lying nearest to the circular window in the loft, suddenly grew restless.

He rolled over and over, and tossed his arms up and down.

The rustling sound which the hay made as he displaced it tended still further to disturb him.

Presently he awoke.

Accustomed as he was to waking up and finding himself in strange places, for he very rarely was twice at the same place—accustomed as he was, we say, this time he felt baffled and confused.

But the feeling lasted only for a moment.

Quickly shaking it off, he rose to a sitting posture, and endeavoured to pierce the darkness which surrounded him.

In this attempt he was unsuccessful, but he could tell by the deep and regular breathing that his companions slept.

The circular window, of which we spoke, was close to him. The wooden shutter, with which it was provided to exclude the wet when necessary, was drawn over it; but as it only fitted rudely, he could see the night sky through many a chink and crevice in and round about it.

In contrast with the interior it looked quite light.

Before he laid down again and composed himself to sleep, Jack thought it would be no harm to draw aside this shutter, and have a look at the appearance of things outside.

Accordingly, he crept towards it as quietly as he could, for he by no means wished to disturb the repose of his companions.

The woodwork was swelled or damp, for the shutter stuck firmly in its frame.

A little patience, however, enabled him to push it on one side silently, so that a space was left large enough for him to put his head through and look out.

Before him was the inn.

The sky was cloudy, the wind blowing occasionally with great violence, and then subsiding almost to a calm.

Through the rifts in the clouds, which were continually opening and closing up, came a faint, grayish-white light, by the aid of which he could see for a considerable distance around him.

The stable was built at the rear of the "Fox and Grapes," but the stable window was so situated as to command a view of the high road in the direction of London.

Along this he gazed, until it could no longer be distinguished from the surrounding meadows.

A solemn stillness was everywhere about. Not even the hooting of an owl, or the whirring sound of the bats, as they winged their nocturnal flight, could be heard.

But suddenly a faint sound smote upon Jack's ear.

He listened, but this time in vain.

He could not hear it.

A sudden furious gust of wind swept by, which made noise enough to drown all other sounds.

When it subsided again, however, he listened even more intently and eagerly than before.

"Horsemen!" he muttered, after a few moments' pause; "they are well mounted, too, and coming at great speed. Who are they, I wonder? The dragoons, perhaps, who may have got upon our track. Now I hear them. Why, there must be a score of horses, at least, to raise a sound like that."

He projected his head yet further out of the circular window, and bent all his faculties to listening.

This time there could be no possible mistake. The clatter of the horses' hoofs could be plainly enough distinguished. They were, however, at a great distance. Only the stillness that prevailed could have enabled him to hear them at all.

"I will wake them up," he said, alluding to his comrades; "it may bode no special harm to us, and we may not be in any special danger; still it is best to be prepared."

Acting upon this conviction, he drew in his head.

The breathing was quite sufficient to guide him to the exact spots where his companions lay.

He was well aware that the soundest sleep may generally be broken by a touch. He came to Dick Turpin first, for he happened to be nearest to him.

He placed his hand upon his face, and said:

"Hist! Wake up, Dick, and be prepared for action. There may be danger!"

Turpin was awake instantly.

"Crawl to the window yonder," said Jack, "while I wake the others. You will not need me to tell you what is the matter."

Dreading the worst, Turpin crawled to the window.

While he did so, Jack hastily roused up Claude Duval and Tom King.

There are some who, for the first few minutes after they are awakened, are scarcely conscious of what is going forward, but our friends were not of these.

Danger was a word sufficient at once to put them into full possession of all their mental faculties.

Eagerly and excitedly they all crawled to the window.

"What is it? What is amiss?" asked Claude and Tom King, anxiously.

"Hark!" replied Sixteen-String Jack. "Cannot you hear the tramp of horses' hoofs?"

"Yes."

"And what is more," added Turpin, "I can see them! I should think twenty, at least!"

"They are coming from London?"

"Apparently."

"Then they are our foes?"

"There is little doubt of that."

"Look, Dick, again. Can you make out what they are?"

"No; they are at too great a distance. All I can see is a dark moving mass."

"How shall we act?"

"That is hard to say."

"There is but one course open to us," said Claude.

"And what is that?"

"To stay here where we are, and conceal ourselves as best we can. We stand no chance of leaving here unperceived."

"But little, I am afraid," said Turpin.

"It cannot be done."

"We may, after all, be alarming ourselves without a cause," said Jack. "They surely cannot have any special knowledge of our whereabouts. Perhaps they have only a suspicion that we are on this road, and if so, they will be almost sure to ride past."

"We shall have our doubts set at end soon," said Tom King. "They must be very close now. Can you make them out yet?"

"Yes; I think I can."

"And are they the dragoons?"

"That I cannot say for certain, but they are mounted soldiers of some sort, and well armed, for I can see the glitter of their weapons."

"It is them, then, safe enough."

"How far should you take them to be off?"

"About half a mile."

"Draw in your head, then, for fear you should be seen. It is never worth while to run unnecessary risks."

"You are right," said Dick Turpin, drawing in his head, for during the foregoing conversation he alone had been looking out, while the others crouched down close behind him.

CHAPTER CLXIII.

RELATES WHAT TOOK PLACE UPON THE ARRIVAL OF DRAGOONS AT THE "FOX AND GRAPES."

THE approaching soldiers came on at a gallop, which seemed to shake the very earth.

It was Tom King who drew back the shutter to its full extent as he said:

"That will be much better. If we lie down all of us we shall be able to see, without running much risk of being seen."

This was so obvious that all followed his suggestion, and then looked with straining eyes and slightly quickened pulses at the approaching cloud, for such it seemed.

Suddenly, however, the clouds opened overhead, and a brighter light was shed upon the scene. The forms of the approaching horsemen were now plainly visible.

They were either the same troop of light dragoons, which had previously chased them, or another detachment from the same regiment, for their accoutrements were just the same.

The closer they came, and the more plainly they saw them, the further our friends drew back.

It should be distinctly understood that the window we have so often mentioned was situated in the gable end of the stable, and a view straight up the road could be obtained from it.

On came the soldiers, showing no signs of diminishing their speed.

Our friends' hearts beat high with the hopes that they would sweep by, and leave them unmolested.

Neither ventured to speak. All their attention was absorbed in watching and listening.

The voices of the riders, and the ringing sound occasionally produced as their weapons clashed against each other, could now be distinctly heard.

Two more minutes would carry them past the front of the inn.

The question was, would they go past, or would they draw up?

They could only ascertain by mastering their impatience for yet a little longer.

Little did they think of the danger they were actually in.

The state of the ostler's mind was quite unknown to them.

They did not entertain the slightest doubts as to his good faith.

If they had they would not have taken things so quietly as they did.

"Are the soldiers going to stop?" was the question that occupied their minds to the exclusion of all other thoughts.

They almost held their breaths as they came still nearer.

And now Dick's eyes caught sight of a human figure standing at the gateway leading to the highway from the stable-yard.

A second glance showed him it was the ostler.

He did not speak, but raised his arm and pointed.

The other three turned their eyes in that direction.

A suspicion that all was not well crossed their minds, and then deepened into conviction.

Before, however, they had time to adopt any particular mode of action, the troop of dragoons, with a sudden dash, pulled up in front of the inn.

They gave themselves up for lost.

While the trampling was subsiding they heard a loud voice say—

"Hullo! there; who are you?"

The question lifted a load off their minds.

It showed them that the suspicions they had entertained were baseless.

The ostler was not in collusion with the dragoons.

He had not connived to bring them there.

Chance alone had done it.

But why his presence at the gates at that late hour, when one would have thought all persons were asleep?

That looked suspicious.

These thoughts flashed simultaneously through their minds in the brief interval which elapsed between the officer asking the question and the ostler replying to it.

"I'm the ostler," he replied; "Who are you?"

"Don't be insolent, fellow."

"I ain't insolent."

"I tell you you are."

"I tell you I ain't."

The officer seemed upon the point of breaking out into a rage, but by a great effort he controlled himself.

Probably he thought he would be demeaning himself too far to fall into a passion with an ostler.

Choking with rage, he cried—

"Let me advise you to be careful."

"Thank you all the same, I am. How are you?"

"In the king's name!" cried the officer, who was the same hot-headed individual who had ordered the charge to be made upon the mob, and who was now more than ever disgusted with his task of hunting highwaymen, "In the king's name I call upon you to answer my questions truthfully and without prevarication!"

"Fire away," said Joe, "I'm a-listening; what do you want to know?"

"We are armed with a warrant for the apprehension of three notorious villains, known respectively by the names of Richard Turpin, Claude Duval, and Jack Rann, alias Sixteen-String Jack. They have with them one Thomas King, who is under sentence of death. I call upon you in the king's name to say whether you have seen them."

"I don't know as ever I seed 'em," said Joe.

"How long have you been standing here?"

"That's my business."

"Be careful, or it will be my duty to arrest you on suspicion."

"Suspicion of what?"

"Being an accomplice."

"Me?"

"Yes, you. Do not dally with us any longer. Have you been standing here long?"

"What do you want to know for?"

"Have you seen four men go by, mounted on three horses, during the last two or three hours?"

"No, I haven't," said Joe.

This was perfectly true.

He had not seen them go by.

"You haven't?"

"Certainly not, though I haven't been standing here all the while, but I should have heard them."

"But your conduct is suspicious."

"Is it?"

"Yes. You seem to be waiting for something."

"So I am."

"What is it?"

"I don't see as I ought to tell you. You've got a dress, and look very grand, but you're an awful trou some fellow. However, if it will do you any good, I will tell you what I am waiting for."

"What is it?"

"The Uxbridge coach."

"The Uxbridge coach?"

"Yes. I have been expecting it ever so long, and here it comes at last."

At this moment, in confirmation of Joe the ostler's words, the loud blast of a horn rung shrilly on the night air.

"There she is. The Dreadnought; but she's behind her time."

"Curse the Dreadnought!"

"Oh! as you please."

"And you haven't heard any one pass?"

"No."

"Nor seen them either?"

"No."

The officer turned round, and spoke in a low tone to those who were nearest to him.

The reader can conceive what pleasure the highwaymen felt when they found the ostler so determined to stand their friend, and throw the soldiers off the scent.

In breathless eagerness they waited for what was going to happen next.

The guard on the coach blew his horn again, and the rumbling of the wheels began to be heard as the unwieldy vehicle came bowling along the highway.

The officer of dragoons could make nothing of Joe.

Nor was there any suspicion attaching to his conduct, for, for all that he knew, it might be part of his duties to await the arrival of the coach.

But, if he was not suspicious, he was not satisfied.

"How long have you been here? Tell me," he said.

"About ten minutes."

"No longer?"

"Well, I won't swear it hasn't been a quarter of an hour, for the coach is late to-night."

"We have the most positive information that the persons of whom we are in search are somewhere on this road."

"Well, I don't say they ain't, because it's likely enough they are, but I haven't heard them. Lor bless yer! they'd be cunning enough not to make much noise in passing a house."

"There's something in that."

"If you'll take my advice, you'll wait till the coach comes, and then ask if they have met any suspicious looking characters on the road."

"A good thought! I will."

"Here it comes, then! You won't be kept long a-waiting."

From where the highwaymen were concealed, it was not possible to obtain a view of the road leading to Uxbridge, but they could tell by the grinding of the wheels that the coach was not very far off.

The troop of dragoons placed themselves in a straggling sort of line across the road.

In a few minutes afterwards the coach pulled up.

"In the king's name," cried the officer, "I call upon you in the king's name. Have you passed any horsemen on the road?"

"No, ne'er a one," replied the driver.

"You are quite sure!"

"In coorse I am!"

"Let me tell you there are four highwaymen on the road to-night."

A chorus of screams from the passengers followed upon this announcement.

"Four highwaymen?"

"Yes; and four as desperate villains as ever breathed. I am charged with a special warrant from the Secretary of State to apprehend them and lodge them in jail, and empowered to call upon any one to assist me in so doing."

"I only hopes you'll catch them, that's all! But you may take your oath they are nowhere between here and Uxbridge, or else I should have seed 'em!"

"That is enough!"

The soldiers drew on one side, and allowed the coach to pass.

The coachman cracked his whip, and off the horses started on their way to London at a capital pace.

The officer of dragoons looked half a mind to follow them, when he asked suddenly—

"How long does the coach take to reach here from Uxbridge?"

"About half an hour, I should think."

"Then it's likely enough they passed before the coach started. Forward, my men, they are somewhere on this road, I am confident, and to find them I am determined. Forward!"

CHAPTER CLXIV.

JOE, THE OSTLER, MAKES ALL THE REPARATION FOR HIS FAULT THAT HE IS ABLE, AND THEN ADVISES THE HIGHWAYMEN AS TO THE BEST COURSE FOR THEM TO TAKE.

In obedience to the command given to them by their superior officer, the troop set itself in motion and were soon at a considerable distance from the "Fox and Grapes."

And so the great danger which had threatened our friends, thanks to Joe, the ostler, had passed away, leaving them unhurt.

They could scarcely believe in the reality of their narrow escape.

Joe watched the retreating horsemen down the road to see that none of them lingered behind, and then turned towards the stable.

Dick looked out.

"Joe," he said; "Joe, come here."

Now Joe had no idea the highwaymen were awake. He thought, somehow, that they were asleep all this time, and he felt confused.

That was because his conscience smote him for what he had meditated doing.

'Come up here, Joe, I want to speak to you."

"All right, Captain, I'll be with you in a moment."

And he was as good as his word, for in less than the time mentioned he stood beside them.

"Joe!" they all four cried, "you have saved our lives! What can we do to show our gratitude?"

"Don't say a word about that, I don't deserve it."

"Not deserve it?"

"No, I do not, and I may as well be candid with you as not."

"But you deceived the soldiers."

"I know I did."

"You put them off the scent when they had us in their power."

"I know that, too."

"Has not that course saved our lives? To be sure it has, and how can we be otherwise than grateful?"

"I tell you I don't deserve that you should think so well of me."

"Why not?"

"What do you think is the reason I was up and dressed and standing at the gate when the soldiers arrived?"

"We have no idea. You told them you were waiting for the coach."

"Just so."

"And wasn't that the reason?"

"No; I wish it was."

"Can you tell it us? We are curious."

"I will tell you, though it will cause me to lose your good opinion, but better do that than hold it wrongfully."

"Speak on. You need not fear."

"But you do not know what I have to say."

"Nor do I want to know, if you would rather not tell it."

Poor Joe was silent. His emotions mastered him.

He was full of remorse for the deed he had contemplated.

But yet, with a candour which cannot be sufficiently admired, he made up his mind to tell them.

He little thought it, but by resolving upon such a course, his fault was more than half atoned for.

The highwaymen noticed his agitation, and were very much surprised at it. They knew not what to think.

"Have patience a minute," said Joe, "and I will tell you."

"You need not, if it is something so painful to you."

"But I will. I went to the gateway because I had made up my mind to go to London."

"To London?"

"Yes."

"For what?"

"To betray you."

It is impossible to describe the tone in which these three words were uttered. Equally vain would it be to paint the astonishment of our four friends.

They were incredulous.

"Betray us?"

Joe did not reply.

"You cannot be in earnest, Joe," said Dick Turpin, kindly, for he felt deeply touched by the manner in which the lad had behaved. "You cannot be in earnest?"

"I was," said Joe, in a choking voice; "and you never ought to trust me any more."

"But," asked Claude Duval, "if you had made up your mind to betray us, why did you behave in the manner you did to the dragoons?"

"I repented then, though when I first saw them coming, I made up my mind to tell them you were here. It was the reward that did it."

"The reward?"

"Yes. How much do you think the rewards that are offered for all four of you would amount to if they were added up together?"

"A very large amount, and enough to tempt anyone."

"Do you think so?"

"Assuredly."

"Bear with me, then, and think no worse of me than you can possibly help. When I left you, and had groomed the horses, the thought came into my head to add up the rewards."

"And how much did they come to?"

"Two thousand pounds!"

"Why, that's five hundred a-piece!" said Turpin.

"There is more offered for you than any of the others."

"And when you added it up, you thought how desirable it would be for you to possess such a sum."

"I did; but I didn't think of getting all of it; now do you know the reason why I so wished to obtain a portion?"

"What is it? You have told us all so far pretty freely, and if, as I suspect, this is something in your favour, by all means let us hear it."

"I don't know for it being in my favour, but, you must know, I have a mother."

"Alive?"

"Yes, and very poorly off. She depends wholly upon me for all she has, but, as this is not much of a place, it is but little I am able to take her."

"I begin to understand."

"That is not all," said Joe. "There is—there is——"

"What?"

"Some one I am fond of."

"Oh!"

"But she will not have me until I have saved money enough to take a public-house myself."

"And very prudent of her."

"Do you think so?"

"Certainly."

"Well, you see now what I thought."

"Pretty clearly, I think," said Turpin. "You have a mother and a sweetheart, of both of whom you are fond. The one you would like to see much better off, the other you want to see your wife. Is that it?"

"It is."

"And with the reward you would have been able to do all this, and which, without some such slice of luck, you would have to wait a long time for."

"That is just what I thought."

"Then I do not for a moment wonder that you contemplated giving us up to justice. Do you, my friends?"

"Not at all!"

"In fact, I wonder you held back. You have not told us what caused you to alter your mind when the dragoons came up. Did you think there would be too many to share the reward with to make your portion worth having?"

"No; that was not it!"

"What then?"

"I hardly know, but I think it was more the manner in which the officer spoke to me than anything else."

"Now, Joe," said Turpin, "listen to me."

"Can it be possible that you wish to be friends with me after this?"

"Certainly; I think very highly indeed of you!"

"And you are willing to forgive me for my baseness?"

"Every excuse possible can be made for you. Will you listen to me?"

"You know I shall."

"Now do not be offended at what I am going to say, nor refuse what I am going to offer. Will you meet me at Stonebridge, about half a mile from here, at twelve o'clock to-morrow night?"

"For what?"

"I will then reward you for what you have done."

"I deserve no reward."

"Do not say that, because I think otherwise. Will you meet me?"

"If you wish it."

"I do wish it."

"And may I ask the reward you intend to offer me?"

"Yes; I have no reason for concealing it from you. I will give you the means of accomplishing your desires."

"You will?"

"I certainly will."

"After the manner in which I have behaved?"

"It is just that which determines me to act as I have said. What do you say, my friends? Do you approve?"

"Most certainly, and we will do all we can to assist you."

"Thanks. I knew such would be the case. Now, Joe, we have wasted rather more time perhaps in talking than we ought to have done, but never mind, so that we understand each other. The dragoons are far enough off by this time."

"They are; and, if you will take my advice, you will have your horses saddled without delay, and set off in an opposite direction."

"We will; but now, Tom, that reminds me of your difficulty. How are you to manage for a horse?"

"I know not," replied Tom King, "without Joe here can provide us with one. Can you?"

"I can, if you will pay me for it."

"Very well; Claude, I fancy, can manage to do that. Let us have them at once."

"Come down, then. They only want the saddles clapped on their backs, and you can assist and save time."

The highwaymen followed Joe down the ladder, and the saddles were quickly put on.

The horse that was brought out for Tom to buy, was one that had been left with the ostler to sell.

The price was forty guineas. Claude had enough, so the horse was bought, and Tom mounted it.

"Now, Joe," said Dick Turpin, as they quietly walked their horses out of the stable-yard, "don't forget to be at Stonebridge at twelve o'clock to-morrow night, and I will place in your hands a sufficient sum of money to enable you to gratify your wishes."

"I don't deserve it," blubbered Joe, as the highwaymen rode away.

CHAPTER CLXV.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN LEAVE THE "FOX AND GRAPES," AND LAY IN WAIT FOR THE OXFORD COACH.

"I FAIRLY tremble," said Sixteen-String Jack, "when I think what a frightfully narrow escape we have had, though no one could blame the lad for acting in the manner he did."

"I cannot, for one. Little did the officer think that his hot temper was the means of losing us."

"Which way shall we take?" inquired Claude Duval.

"You are our captain, Dick, and we are under your commands."

"Then let us push on to the Oxford-road. If we keep on for about half a mile, and take the first turning to the left, it will bring us out at Harlington-corner. Do you know it?"

"Quite well."

"Forward, then, because the sooner we are off the Uxbridge-road the better."

Brief as was the rest the horses had had, yet it was long enough to enable them to recruit their strength, and not only that, they had been well-fed and groomed.

They, therefore, willingly responded to the impulse forward which their riders gave them, and swept at a swinging gallop along the turnpike road.

Tom King was pleased to find that the horse he had purchased bore every indication of being a good one, and of a kind well suited to his requirements.

Upon turning into the lane, however, they were compelled to go at a slower pace, for it was very narrow, and had two deep ruts on either side, where the cart-wheels had been.

Dick took advantage of this opportunity to speak to his friends, and unfold his views.

Accordingly, when they were all close enough together for conversation to be easy, he spoke.

"We have succeeded so far," he said, "in eluding our foes, and making their plans of no avail. That they have tried what they could do is tolerably certain, and now, just for a change, I propose that we try what we can do in return."

"Agreed, captain—agreed!" cried the three others.

"What is it you propose?"

"A bold and daring deed at any time, but now unusually so."

"What is it?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"No—no. Tell us, do not keep us in suspense."

"I will not. I propose, my friends, that when we get into the Oxford-road, which we shall do in about half an hour——"

"Yes—yes."

"When we get there, I propose we look for some dark and sheltered piece of roadway, and there lay in wait."

"But for what?"

"The Oxford Mail Coach!"

"Are you in earnest, Dick?" asked Claude.

"Never more so in my life."

"It is a daring deed, then."

"So much the better. I like to achieve exploits that will bear talking about."

"But it will sure to be crowded with passengers, and the guard and the driver, it is well known, have been chosen as being brave men, and well able to make use of the weapons with which they are provided."

"I know all that," said Dick, "but I do not see anything in it to cause me to alter my determination."

"Let us do it," said Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack; "the bolder the deed the better it pleases me. As for Claude——"

"I shall give way to the majority," said Duval; "but while I do so I think we are running into much unnecessary peril."

"We have been in greater many a time. Come, Claude, shake off your fears."

"I have none."

"Here we are, then," cried Dick Turpin, as they emerged into the Oxford-road, "let us try our luck."

He proceeded to make an examination of the priming of his pistols as he spoke, in doing which he was immediately imitated by his companions.

All being made secure, they trotted on at a gentle pace, expecting every moment to hear some sound indicative of the coming of the coach.

The place, however, where they now found themselves was scarcely so well suited to their purpose as they could have wished.

The country for miles around was open, and the hedgerows more than ordinarily low.

It was getting much lighter, too, every moment, and in the east a faint misty radiance foretold that before long it would be daybreak.

Of course, had the mail-coach come along while they were in this part, Dick would not have changed his determination of stopping it, but, as it was, he deemed it good policy to move on and meet it.

A gallop of about ten minutes, though, brought him to a place which seemed expressly made for his design.

The ground rose up to a slight elevation.

Instead, however, of the road passing over it, as is generally the case, a path had been cut through it, thus doing away with the steep ascent that there would have been on one side.

But doing this had its disadvantages as well as its advantages, though probably the latter more than balanced the former, as it made the road for a few yards very dismal and dark indeed.

In the highest part, the embankment on either side was about fifteen feet in height.

The sides were as perpendicular as a wall almost, and were profusely overgrown with rank vegetation.

The top of the embankment was fringed by a quick-set hedge.

From the foregoing description, it will be seen that, although the road was of a good width, yet the sides were more than sufficient to cast a dark shadow over it.

In the day time even, except when the sun was at his greatest elevation, it was a dark-looking place, and at night it was all but impossible to see your hand before you.

Well suited therefore was it in all respects for the successful accomplishment of the daring adventure upon which the highwaymen were bent.

The only thing now necessary was for the coach to come.

All their preparations being made, our friends did not speak, but sat like statues on their horses in various picturesque, listening attitudes.

Dick Turpin and Tom King had taken up their stations close to each other on the south side of the road.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, in a similar manner on the opposite side, only lower down towards London.

They were to attack the fore-part of the coach.

The others the rear.

Minute after minute passed by, but still they could hear nothing like the grinding of wheels.

They began to be fearful that they were too late—that the coach had passed.

So dark as it was, seeing the time was quite out of the question.

Nor had they any clear idea of what the time was, only from the appearance of the sky they judged that dawn could not be far off.

In fact, they could find it growing lighter and lighter each instant.

If the coach did not come soon, they would have it daylight, and that would have by no means suited them.

At last, however, and just as their impatience had increased to an unbearable extent, the long-wished for sound arrived.

Very faint it was at first, like the rustling of the wind among the trees, and such by an unexperienced listener it would be taken to be, but long practice had enabled our friends to discriminate between the two.

The state of expectation in which they had been kept had put them in a proper mood to execute their daring feat.

The road was straight, and presently, as they looked along it, the bright carriage-lamps on either side became visible.

On—on they came, with a motion that appeared perpetually incressive.

The rumbling of the wheels sounded like the muttering of far-off thunder.

With their bridles tightly in their grasp, a loaded pistol in each of their left hands, our friends held themselves in readiness to attack the coach.

The guard blew a loud blast upon his horn as they entered the hollow, in order to warn anyone who might be there to get out of the way of the horses, for in the darkness that there prevailed it would be impossible for them to be seen.

The driver of the coach had just confessed to the passenger, who sat on his off-side, that he never felt very comfortable when driving through this dark bit of road-way, when a bright red flash appeared, followed almost instantaneously by the lond ringing report of a pistol.

A voice cried out, "Halt!" exe the reverberations had fairly died away.

The horses were terrified.

Claude Duval, who was nearest to them, by a sudden and dexterous movement of his hand, succeeded in throwing the leaders down.

Those behind could not avoid falling likewise.

They kicked and plunged fearfully.

But keeping out of the reach of their hoofs, Claude drew his sword, and watching his opportunity, in two strokes severed the traces.

While he was doing this his companions had not been idle.

We must describe their actions separately and in detail, though of course, they all happened simultaneously.

According to the arrangements made, Sixteen-String Jack spurred his steed as close as he could to the coachman's box, and holding a pistol pointed at his head, commanded him not to move at his peril.

But the coachman, who was not a man to give in lightly or easily, immediately drew a double-barrelled pistol from a little pocket in the seat, made purposely for its reception, and taking a hasty aim at the dusky figure, he pulled both triggers in rapid succession.

Jack managed to move aside in time to avoid the first bullet, but he was not equally fortunate with the second, for he felt something inflict a stinging sensation upon his cheek, as though he had been struck by a thin switch. He knew by this that the bullet had ploughed up the skin.

"Shot for shot!" he cried, as he pulled the trigger of his pistol and fired.

CHAPTER CLXVI.

THE TIDE OF FORTUNE, WHICH HAS BEEN FOR SO LONG IN FAVOUR OF THE HIGHWAYMEN, NOW TURNS AGAINST THEM.

A LOUD yell of a most awful and startling character followed the discharge of Sixteen-String Jack's pistol, and the coachman, after swaying to one side, fell headlong off the box.

The cry was echoed by the passengers on the roof, who were now in a state of the greatest possible alarm, and almost dead with fright.

"Move not, at your peril!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, drawing another pistol and pointing it at them, for his blood was now thoroughly heated, and he did not much care what he did.

The passengers on the roof could tell he was a desperate character, and so obeyed his imperions demand, being fearful that their lives would not stand in his way, if they angered him.

And in this they were perfectly right, for the pain of the wound he had received in his cheek grew worse and worse every moment.

And now for Tom King.

He, as we said, was on the other side of the road.

When the coach was level with him, he sprang out, and held his pistol to the guard, and cried out to him not to move upon peril of his life.

But the guard had his hand upon the stock of the blunderbuss, which hung at the back of his seat.

Slowly and imperceptibly he raised it in his hand, until at length he got it so that its broad, bell-shaped mouth was pointing to Tom King.

His finger was on the trigger when Jack fired his pistol.

The flash dispelled the darkness, and Tom saw the bright barrel of the blunderbuss, with its muzzle turned towards him.

Comprehending what had taken place, in a moment he struck his horse sharply with the spur, which caused the animal to utter a snort of pain, and bound forward.

That saved his life.

The guard had his finger on the trigger, and he pulled it.

The blunderbuss exploded with a sound like that of some mimic cannon.

A perfect storm of bullets flew forth, but they did no execution.

They sank into the earth of which the embankment was composed, but that was all.

Turning his horse back, Tom held his pistol to the guard.

But fully believing that his last hour had come, he shrank down in his seat, and hid himself from sight.

The other passengers, with Jack at one end and Tom at the other, were cowed into perfect submission.

And now for the last, we proceed to describe the actions of Dick Turpin

At the same moment that his companions sprang forward to do as we have described, Dick Turpin, by a particular touch upon her flank, which the gallant creature fully understood, made Black Bess take one leap, and then alight just at the door of the coach.

[THE FARMER GIVES THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN A HOSPITABLE RECEPTION.]

There she stood, as though carved in stone, except she tossed her head proudly, as if in satisfaction at what she had done.

Long practice had taught Dick Turpin the knack of letting down a coach window rapidly and dexterously from the outside.

It made a terrible clattering noise.

"Your money or your life!" said Turpin, assuming as ferocious a tone and manner as he possibly could. "Do not dally with me. The coach is surrounded by my men, so that resistance will be futile. Hand over your valuables at once—to those who refuse their death will be on their own head."

As he spoke these words, he projected the barrel of the pistol which he carried into the coach.

By stooping slightly in the saddle, he was able to observe the actions of those within.

The inside was quite full of passengers, and by the flutter of dresses, as well as several screams which followed his appearance, he could tell some of them were females.

His principal attention, however, was directed to an individual who sat with his back to the horses, next to the door.

He was tall and well-built.

His attire was of sober black, and the coat he had on was one of unusually large dimensions.

Round his neck was an enormous frilled neckcloth, in which, whenever he bent his head, his chin was completely buried.

He had taken his hat off.

Upon his head he wore a large white wig, every hair and curl of which was scrupulously arranged so as to be in perfect order.

His face was large, full, and florid, having, in fact, a bloated appearance so conspicuous in the countenances of those who are too much addicted to the good things of this life.

His mouth was large and sensuous, his eyes small, deeply set and sleepy-looking.

All this Dick Turpin was able to take in at a glance.

But it was not that there was anything very peculiar in this person's appearance or costume that made him regard him with so much attention. It was because he felt a vague consciousness steal over him that he had seen that face before.

It was not a friend's, he was confident, nor was it under favorable circumstances that he had seen it.

All of a sudden, like a flash of light, Dick recollected not only where and when he had seen him, but also who he was.

It was the counsel who had prosecuted Tom King at the Old Bailey.

Consequently, Dick looked upon him as a foe, though of course the man had done nothing more than his duty.

It did not take an instant for all these thoughts to pass through Turpin's mind.

No attack, however, was attempted to be made upon him by any of those who occupied the interior of the coach.

Probably the reason of this was none of them carried arms.

In fact, the Oxford mail coach was looked upon as being about the safest conveyance that could possibly be imagined, and the idea of any highwaymen having the audacity to stop it and rob it was not dreamt of.

To those who were spectators of the scene, no interval was appreciable between the time Dick reached the coach-door and took off his hat.

The light in the inside fell with full force upon his countenance.

It was far, very far indeed from being an unpleasing one. There was upon it an expression of dauntless courage, which no one would fail to admire.

He had dropped the reins upon the neck of Black Bess, for he knew that he could safely trust her not to move, and this allowed him to have both hands at liberty.

In one, then, he held his hat, and in the other a pistol.

He repeated his demand.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "I must trouble you for all you have of any value. If you are wise, you will give it up at once. You cannot possibly escape, for the coach is well surrounded by the men who acknowledge me as their captain. If I cannot obtain what I want by gentle means, I shall be compelled to have you dragged out, one by one and searched. But this I shall not do if you will satisfy my wants. Come, my hat is before you."

This was said with an air of the greatest apparent ease, but all the time Dick took good care to keep a sharp eye upon every one, and was quite prepared for any sudden movement that boded danger to him.

But the passengers, finding the hopeless predicament they were in, like sensible people, preferred to lose their money rather than risk their lives, so they began slowly one after another, to drop different articles into the hat.

Watches, brooches, seals, bracelets, purses, and loose cash all made their appearance.

But there was nothing like so much in the hat as Turpin considered there ought to be.

Another demand produced a trifle more.

"Really," said Dick, at length, "if you go on in this way I shall lose what small amount of patience I am blessed with, and then when I do I will not be answerable for the consequences. Come be generous. I have been temperate where many would have been violent. I should be sorry to subject any one of you to the least ill-usage, and you ought to give me full credit for my consideration, when you find you are so entirely in my power."

The obviousness of this at once struck home to the hearts of all, and they gave up their things freely, being satisfied that, under the circumstances, it was the best course they could possibly pursue.

They had two disagreeable alternatives.

One was, to give up what they had.

The other, to have it taken from them.

The result of both was just the same, and so the first was clearly the lesser evil of the two.

In a few minutes it was heavy enough to satisfy him, and so drawing back his arm and replacing the pistol in the holster, he quickly transferred the booty to the capacious pocket of his coat.

While he did so, his ears caught the sound of some one weeping, while every now and then utterance was given to a deep and heart-breaking sob.

One of the inmates of the coach was in trouble about something.

What that something was, Dick determined at all risks to find out.

Of course it was no other than a female who thus manifested her grief.

And was it not his duty, as he emulated the doings of the knights-errant of old, to succour, protect, and comfort all females in distress?

CHAPTER CLXVII.

A VISION OF GENTLENESS, BEAUTY, AND GRIEF APPEARS TO DICK, WHICH AROUSES THE DORMANT FEELINGS OF HIS BETTER NATURE.

LEANING forward, then, in his saddle, Dick put his head inside the window of the coach.

Its inmates observed it with surprise, and began to fear that the highwayman was not satisfied with what he had extorted from them already.

But this alarm was soon dissipated.

In a kindly tone of voice, and which he could always assume without an effort, Dick spoke:

"I can hear some one weeping," he said, "which is sufficient to show me that one of you is in trouble. Whoever it may be, I conjure them to speak, and if it lies in my power to do anything to assuage their grief, believe me I shall only be too glad to do it."

A profound silence followed these words.

No one replied to him in any way, but he still heard the sobs, as though a violent effort was being made to stifle them.

"Speak," said Dick again, after a brief pause, and in a more earnest tone of voice than before. "Fear nothing. Who is in sorrow?"

"You speak kindly," said a woman's voice, "and so I do not mind telling you that it is this young girl who is sitting next to me who is crying so, but whether you can do her any good is more than I can tell."

As she spoke, the woman drew on one side and allowed Turpin to catch a glimpse of a young girl who was sitting next to her, and leaning as far back as she could, as if in the endeavour to escape observation.

She was dressed entirely in black.

Her face he could not see, for she had concealed it in a white cambric handkerchief, which she held up to her eyes.

What her age might be he could not, therefore, guess, except from a contemplation of her form, and as its contours were only partially developed, he came to the conclusion that she must be young—fifteen or sixteen at most.

The hand that held the handkerchief before her face was as tiny as a child's. But the fingers were long and wasted, looking as though her grief had been great and incessant, and as if she had suffered much.

The moment Dick's eyes rested upon this young creature, he felt an immediate and deep interest in her.

He longed to see her face.

That it was a very beautiful one he did not doubt.

With a still greater depth of pathos than had tinged his words before, he addressed her.

"Fair girl," he said, "answer me, as a great and inestimable favour, the question I am about to ask you. You are in deep—very deep grief. I am a rude, violent man, but I am willing, nay, anxious to stand your friend. Tell me then, without fear, whether it lies in my power to alleviate your sorrow."

The counsel who had prosecuted Tom King, and who resolutely disbelieved that there was anything like disinterested kindness in human nature, moved impatiently round in his seat, and uttered an indignant "Pish!"

Dick just glanced at him, but took no further notice just then.

As for the other passengers, they were one and all deeply moved at the manner in which the highwayman was acting.

There was something about his whole air and manner that was sufficient to convince them that he was playing a part, but that he was quite in earnest in what he said, and unquestionably would, if the opportunity was offered him, try his utmost and do his best to ease that young heart of its anguish.

The woman who had before spoken, and moved to allow Dick Turpin to see the girl, now bent over her, and by her manner it was evident that she was endeavouring to persuade the young girl to speak, and, if she did no more, at least to thank the highwayman for the interest he had manifested in her welfare.

Her arguments had their effect, for the young girl removed the handkerchief from her face.

The light fell upon it.

In all his experience, and, as the reader may imagine, it had been tolerably extensive—never, Dick thought, had he seen a human face so nearly like what an angel's might be supposed to be as that one was.

Not even the painter's art, wondrous though it be, could do justice to its singular and rare beauty.

How insufficient, then, must words be to convey an impression of it.

We shall not attempt the task, but simply say that it was a reflex of the holiest and best feelings in human nature.

But the whole was chastened, overspread, and softened by the traces of grief—deep, permanent, inconsolable.

There was a strange feeling about Dick's heart—a feeling which he had never until that moment felt—as he gazed upon this heavenly face, and felt her dark eyes fixed in earnest gaze upon him.

How great the contrast!

The one the personification of gentleness, purity, and holiness.

The other of plunder, violence, and sin.

And yet Dick Turpin, as many of his actions have testified, was far from being all that is bad in humanity. There were many who, in his day, were looked up to with respect, and whose names even now are held in reverence, who were far worse than he.

But, nevertheless, he felt a strange aching in his breast, and a choking sensation in his throat, as he thought how great a gulf there was between them.

Even as her eyes met his for a brief instant in that mournful gaze, they filled with tears, and she again carried the handkerchief to her face.

But feeling that gratefulness alone ought to compel her to command her feelings sufficiently to express her thanks, she made a strong and successful effort to subdue her grief.

And then, when she would fain have spoken a few words, utterance was denied her, and the words passed away in an inaudible murmur.

In the deep and absorbing interest which Dick felt in this little episode, all other things faded from his mind. He no longer thought of the perils and difficulties of his situation, nor remembered that his life at that moment hung upon a thread,

"Speak," he said, still more gently. "Let me have the satisfaction of hearing you say that it is in my power to relieve you of at least some portion of your distress. Speak to me frankly."

"I will try," replied the young girl, who found her voice at last. "You speak kindly to me, and so—so—you see you spoke so kindly that—that—I could not bear it."

The tones in which she spoke, though very, very sad, were low, sweet, and silvery.

Dick was still more entranced.

Those other passengers, too, who had up to then looked on this scene with indifference and coldness, began, in spite of themselves, to feel an interest in it.

So modest and retiring had this young girl been during the whole of their long journey, that they were scarcely sensible of her presence and existence.

Now they began to wonder how it was they had not noticed her.

All but the prosecuting counsel had an expression on their faces significant of sympathy, but he looked on contemptuously.

"I have nothing to tell you, sir," continued the young girl, whose voice grew firmer as she proceeded, "at least nothing that will interest you. Believe me, I am very, very grateful to you for your kind expressions of good feeling towards me, and I shall always pray that you may quit this kind of life, for which you are so unsuited."

A shade passed over Dick Turpin's face.

It was one of vexation.

But he chased it away quickly; but when he spoke again there was a perceptible alteration in his voice.

The young girl sank back again into her old position, and replaced the handkerchief over her face.

"Is that all you have to say to me?" asked Turpin.

There was no reply.

He was almost choked, but he continued.

"Can I do nothing to assist you? If I can, pray let me know it. It will enable me to in part atone for that which I have done to-night."

The girl again looked up.

"There is only one thing," she said, "and that I ought not to ask."

"Why not?"

"I ought not."

"Will you let me hear it, and allow me to judge whether you ought to ask it?"

Again silence.

"Speak! Let me hear it! Cannot you grant me that favour?"

A flush mounted to her face, and spread over her neck and forehead, as she replied—

"I am an orphan, and the clothes I wear will show that my bereavement has been recent. It has been sudden, too. Both my parents died within a week of each other, and not ten days ago! I am on my way to London, where my relatives reside, and where I trust I shall soon find employment. I am poor, and now destitute, for when you held your hat inside the coach, and commanded us with threats to put into it what valuables we each possessed—threatening us if we refused—I placed in it a small, beaded purse, which contains every farthing I possess in the world; I have not even enough to pay the expenses of my journey, and what I shall do I know not. Your last behaviour has been so different to the former, that I have overcome the repugnance I felt in speaking to you; but now that I have done as you wished, I trust you will withdraw, and allow us to proceed without offering further violence."

It would be hard to say what were Dick's sensations while the girl addressed this long speech to him. The grieffful manner in which she spoke, and the utter desolation of her position, cut him to the heart.

How much additional sorrow, too, had he caused her?

His hand stole to the pocket of his coat, and he sought among its miscellaneous contents for something that felt like a beaded purse.

He drew it forth.

"You would have asked me to restore it to you?" he said. "I do it gladly. If this is it, take it freely. It will ever be a reproach to me when I think of to-night's doings."

So saying, Dick held the purse towards her.

It was of blue silk, elaborately worked with steel beads. It was of a kind now grown obsolete, with sliding rings, and a receptacle for money at both ends.

But as he thus held it in his hand he could not help noticing how slender and how light it was, and what a little money it contained.

"That is it," said the girl, beginning to weep again "my mother worked that purse, and gave it to me on my last birthday."

"Take it back, then," said Turpin, as he placed it in her hand, "and with it my best wishes, though I suppose they will not do you any good. I take shame to myself, however, that I——"

"Off with you, Dick! off with you!" cried a voice; "fly at once! The Philistines are upon us!"

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

THE OFFICERS THINK THAT THEY HAVE AT LAST GOT THE HIGHWAYMEN SECURE IN THEIR GRASP.

DICK TURPIN gave a great start at this sudden interruption to his apologetic speech.

He recognized the voice.

It was Claude Duval's.

If we were to say that he had completely, for the time being, forgotten the existence of his companions, we should scarcely be going beyond the truth.

In a moment, however, he recollected all, and he was once more calm and self-possessed, as he always was in the hour of extreme danger.

Bowing deeply, therefore, to the inmates of the carriage generally, and the young orphan particularly, he, with great deliberation, left the coach door.

He could hear the sounds of many voices, and the clattering of horses' hoofs.

"Halt, all of you," he cried. "Halt!"

He wheeled his horse round as he spoke.

But before we proceed to relate what happened next, it will be necessary for us to describe the events which had transpired during the time Dick had been at the coach door.

Tom King, then, still remained in the position he had occupied, that is to say, he was at the back part of the coach, keeping the guard and the passengers near him in subjection.

Sixteen-String Jack was near the box. Not one of the passengers, after the summary manner in which he had dealt with the coachman, ventured to stir or make the least resistance.

Claude Duval, who had had the difficult duty of stopping the horses by throwing the leaders down, had been chosen for the execution of this duty because he was the tallest and by far the strongest of the four.

This, as we have seen, he had successfully performed. The leaders had been dexterously thrown down, and as they fell, brought the others to the ground with them.

By a few strokes of his sword, then, he severed the traces, and entirely freed the animals from all contact with the vehicle.

They plunged about madly for some moments, making it extremely dangerous for anyone to be near them.

Then they one after another struggled to their feet, and with a snort and a bound set off at a furious and frantic gallop along the road.

Their first fright over, they proceeded to their destination more steadily, being ——right glad to miss

The lumbering of the wheels.

All fear of the coach moving being now at an end, Claude rode up to the side and very coolly made those who sat outside hand him everything they had about them of the slightest value.

Menaced in the front and the rear, they could do nothing but submit.

Claude's pockets soon grew heavy.

His character had already been pourtrayed.

Cautious ever in running into danger, and willing to avoid running the slightest risk, yet, once in, no one could be more recklessly brave and daring.

He began to think, however, that to stop the Oxford mail was by no means so difficult and dangerous as it seemed.

But just as he had finished taking from the last person on the roof, he happened to look across the fields in the direction of London.

The dawn had sufficiently advanced to make objects even at a considerable distance dimly visible.

Coming along at a rapid pace, and with their arms extended towards him, was a large troop of mounted police-officers.

That they were aware of what was taking place, and making direct towards the coach, was quite certain; and it was when he had this conviction that he called out to Dick in the startling manner he did, as related at the end of the last chapter.

Not even the awe in which they were held by the pistols of Jack and Tom King could prevent those on the roof from giving utterance to a shout of gratification at the sight of this unexpected succour.

Although our highwaymen were not aware of the means by which the officers had learned what they were about—being, in fact, quite in the dark upon the subject—that is no reason, we opine, why we should not put the reader in possession of the facts of the case, for in this narrative it has been our special aim, even at the expense of interest, to avoid all inexplicable appearances.

We may briefly state, then, that this party of officers was one of many who had been despatched by the authorities upon the sole mission of watching the roads round the metropolis, and endeavouring to capture the highwaymen.

In fact, never before had such energetic steps been taken for the apprehension of any criminals, and no expense and no pains were spared to achieve their object.

Already have we seen how near they have more than once been in capturing our friends, but chance, fortune, or whatever it may be, had every time been in their favour.

But now they were menaced with a danger of no common kind.

The officers who now came over the fields were, without exception, experienced, well-tried men, and well up in the duties of their profession.

They had been set to patrol the Oxford-road, and be on the look-out for any event that might be of a suspicious character.

They were, moreover, not the only ones who had been sent out with similar instructions. Every road, indeed, leading from the metropolis was thus guarded, and the more important ones were furnished with as many as three or four detachments.

This, of course, necessitated the employment of a vast number of new hands, but none of these were sent upon this dangerous errand, but set to do the work which the others in an ordinary way performed.

The one body that had patrolled one portion of the Oxford-road during the whole of the night without the occurrence of anything unusual, and, as day was coming fast, they began to think that for that night at least they had had their trouble for nothing.

Chilly and miserable—for remaining on horseback the whole of a winter's night is no joke—they were thinking of turning in somewhere, when the sound of several steeds coming along the road at a headlong, break-neck gallop, reached their ears.

Fully impressed that something was going to happen at last, they became instantly on the alert.

There was about a score of them, so they formed in a double line across the road, determined to oppose the further progress of whoever might be coming.

Naturally enough, the idea they had had upon the subject was that those who were coming along at such a furious rate were the very individuals of whom they were in search, and the reason of their rapid speed, that the other detachment that was stationed nearer Oxford was chasing them.

Having formed this hypothesis, they began, as one may say, to count their chickens before they were hatched.

An old proverb particularly impresses the utter folly of doing this, and on the present occasion the wisdom of the advice was made powerfully apparent.

For, behold, instead of seeing the four redoubtable highwaymen approach, they beheld nothing but four riderless horses.

Their disappointment may be imagined, and it was more from the influence of this feeling than any other that they stopped where they then were.

The horses, which were those who had been cut loose from the coach, seeing the obstruction in their path, came to a dead stop.

They were close enough, however, to enable the officers to perceive, by the assistance of the early morning light, that they had been cut away from some conveyance or other.

Then one of their number expressed his conviction that the horses were none other than those of the Oxford mail coach.

The number—four—served to confirm this assertion, and to bring his companions to the same belief.

"Then you may depend," said one, "that the villains have actually had the audacity to stop the mail, and that under our very noses."

"Pho, pho," said another, "I can hardly think it. They are daring, I admit, yet scarcely foolhardy enough to do such a trick as that!"

"Well, we don't know. Anyhow, we must go and see, and if it turns out as I expect, we must not let them escape, or if we do, we shall be laughed at all the rest of our lives."

"Be off at once, then," cried one, who was in command of the rest. "We shall lose our opportunity while we stand chattering here."

There was a sudden movement forward after the utterance of these words, and then the officer who had first spoken, said:

"Let us take to the fields, and by keeping under the shelter of the hedgerows, we shall be able to steal upon them unawares."

"A good idea that of yours, Nutkins," said the commanding officer, "and it shall be acted upon. Ride along, my men, gently and quietly, until we come either to a gap in the hedge that we can conveniently leap, or else a gate which we can open and pass through."

They did not have to go far along the road before they found a gate leading into the fields on the left-hand side of the road, and one of them dismounted to open it.

It was locked, but that proved a circumstance of little moment, for the officer took from his pocket a bunch of picklocks, and had it open in a trice.

In those days the line of distinction between officers and criminals was less clearly defined than it is now, and there were positively times when all traces of it were lost, and the one merged completely into the other.

Here was an instance.

The gate was held open while the rest passed through, and then secured again.

Their road was then plain before them.

Meadows stretched around in all directions.

Over these they were able to pass at a good speed, without making any noticeable noise.

They took care to keep as close to the highway as possible. But presently the appearance of the place altered. Instead of smooth, firm meadows, they came to a succession of ploughed fields.

Rapid progress over these was quite impossible, so they preferred to make a detour, believing that to be the quickest in the end.

It was after this, that turning round to get nearer the high-road, they saw the coach standing still, and surrounded by mounted men.

CHAPTER CLXIX.

A WOOD UPON THE OXFORD-ROAD AFFORDS A TEMPORARY PLACE OF SHELTER FOR THE HIGHWAYMEN.

THIS was a sight for which, despite their anticipations, the officers were scarce prepared.

But there was no doubt whatever as to what was going on.

They had arrived in time to see the highwaymen in the very act of plundering the coach.

Confident in the power which, in point of numbers, they had over them, and stimulated by the reward and credit they would gain if they secured them, they, with a boldness most remarkable, dashed their spurs into their horses' flanks, and urged them forward at the top of their speed.

It was a lucky thing for our friends that Claude was fortunate enough to see them as soon as he did, or the consequences might have been even more disastrous than they were.

The manner in which he called out we have already described.

Dick Turpin comprehended in an instant the full extent of his peril.

To have all four galloped off at random, and possibly in different directions, would, he felt sure, be fatal, and so he gave the loud command to halt.

His comrades obeyed instinctively. Already they began in good earnest to look up to him as their leader.

It was at this moment that the officers reached the hedgerow just before the cutting or hollow commenced.

Excited by the prospect of capturing the highwaymen, they leaped over into the roadway, and came on at a prodigious rate, and making a terrible clatter.

"Form together!" cried Turpin, as he saw them coming; "all together! Are you ready?"

"Quite," cried his three followers, as they ranged themselves close to him.

"Forward, then!" he exclaimed; "it is a case of the devil take the hindmost."

He himself set the example of retreating at full speed, for he spoke in a peculiar manner to his mare, and allowed her to feel the reins fall slackly on her neck.

She gave one terrific bound, and then flew over the ground with a long sweeping gallop.

Indeed, so great was the speed she attained, that Dick was compelled to rein her in, in order not to leave his companions.

Do what they would they could not make their cattle go even for a short distance at a speed that would match Black Bess.

And yet they were all animals of first-rate quality.

The officers, as soon as they perceived this sudden movement on the part of our friends, uttered a loud shout, and, as they dashed into the hollow, presented their pistols, and fired an irregular volley after their retreating forms.

The passengers in the coach implored the police to stay and render them some assistance, but they were quite deaf to their cries.

Their object was to catch the highwaymen, and, either dead or alive, lodge them in Newgate.

The horses upon which they were mounted could not be said to be exactly fresh, for they had been out all night with them patrolling the road, but they were not tired, as the progress they made testified.

Our friends, however, had got the start of them, though it was so slight as to be scarcely worth mentioning.

Away—away they went, the hoofs of their horses striking sparks of fire from the flint stones of the road.

It was towards Oxford, and away from London, that they went.

The officers kept well behind them.

They made sure they had their prey safe, if they could only manage for a little longer to keep them in sight, for they knew if they did so while the chase continued, they must eventually come up with the other troop, who were patrolling another portion of the same road.

Then, hemmed in before and behind by forty well-armed men, what hope could there be that our friends would escape.

They would be literally surrounded.

The odds ten to one.

But there was one condition upon which this depended, and that was that they should continue to fly along the highway.

If they left it the case would be quite altered.

Most eagerly did the officers look out ahead for some indications of the coming of the other troop.

The morning was a beautiful one.

The dense and heavy clouds which had during the night overspread the entire firmament seemed to be driven back by the first flush of dawn, as the pale gray light struggled into the sky.

But when the sun's beams rose above the horizon, they completed their dispersion.

And so, by the time the whole of his bright, rosy disc was fairly visible, there was not a cloud or speck of vapour to be seen.

His rays had in them but little warmth, still, for all that, they were not deficient in illuminative power, and where the ground rose up to a slight elevation, a very extensive prospect could be obtained.

It was after breasting the highest of these hills that they had yet come to that Dick Turpin pulled up his mare, and called out to his comrades to halt.

Then, turning round in his saddle, he took a long and careful look behind him.

His pursuers were hard upon their track, though the distance which intervened between them had perceptibly increased.

Having satisfied himself upon this point, Dick examined the road before him.

He could see for many miles, but nowhere anything suspicious in the shape of an obstruction.

Then he went down the hill at a walking pace, but descended only so far as to be in such a position as not to be within the range of their pursuers' vision.

He stopped.

"It will not do to keep up this sort of thing," he said, "or we shall assuredly be run to earth. Besides, I question whether your horses would maintain it."

"Mine would not," said Tom King; "I have noticed that during the last mile she has given palpable signs of flagging, and I believe she would have given up ere this had it not been that the example of the others encouraged her to make greater exertion. Look! now we have stopped, her distress becomes more apparent."

And, indeed, the appearance of Tom's steed was such as to fill our friends with the utmost concern.

That it would be able much longer to keep its legs was clearly impossible.

"What is the best thing to be done, captain?" asked Claude Duval. "It will not do for us to wait. Every second bring our pursuers nearer to us."

"True," said Turpin. "I stopped because I felt it would be madness to continue the chase any longer."

"But you do not dream, surely, of making a stand against so many?" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"We must either do that, or manage so as to get out of their way. What is to be done?"

"That is for you to decide."

"Well then," said Dick Turpin, as he cast a rapid look around him, taking in at a glance all the varied features of the landscape. "If you will take my advice"——

"We are bound to do that," cried his comrades. "You are our captain. It is for you to command, and for us to obey."

"Since you will have it so," said Dick, with a slight laugh, "agreed."

"What are your orders?"

"Follow me to yonder wood," said Turpin, pointing to a dense mass of trees on their left, a little further on. "If we can plunge into its intricacies unperceived, I think we may manage to elude them."

"It is the only chance we have," said Tom King, "and a poor one at best. We have no time to lose. Let us set off at once."

"Stay," said Dick, "we will borrow a hint from our pursuers. Over the hedge with you. Not only shall we be less likely to be heard, but we shall be able to gain the wood with less chance of detection."

There was common-sense in this, so watching for a spot where the hedge was a little lower than it was elsewhere, Dick put Black Bess to the leap.

The gallant animal cleared the obstruction, apparently without an effort, and alighted in a meadow.

Example is a great thing with many animals, but especially with horses, and the present proved a remarkable instance of it. Singly, neither of the other three horses would have cleared the hedge at the first attempt; as it was, they went over beautifully.

The meadow into which they leaped, although of great extent, was quickly crossed.

Beyond it was a ploughed field.

They were separated by a low wooden fence, which could scarcely be called an impediment to their progress.

"Keep to the path," cried Dick, taking the lead, and alluding to a well-beaten foot-road which ran along by the side of the hedge.

Along this they could only proceed in Indian file, and at a comparatively slow pace.

By bending their heads down to a level with the horses' necks, they found the hedge was both high and thick enough to screen them from the observation of any one who might be on the high-road.

This ploughed field was succeeded by another and another.

Then the wood was gained.

As soon as they found themselves fairly among the trees, they felt they were for a moment comparatively safe.

Without pausing, they pushed on in an oblique direction, for now that they were so silent they could hear the officers coming along the road at a furious rate.

Whether they had actually made their way into the wood unseen was, of course, more than they could take upon themselves to say, but they believed, or at any rate hoped, such was the case.

Brave, bold, and daring, as we know the four to be, those qualities would not be enough to enable them to cope with a force so much in point of members superior to theirs.

A fair fight between them might be protracted for a great length of time, but it would inevitably result in their defeat or death.

Even now they stood upon very dangerous ground, and we confess we feel no slight amount of anxiety in looking forward to the events which must now immediately ensue.

CHAPTER CLXX.

DICK TURPIN IS MINDFUL OF THE PROMISE HE MADE TO JOE, THE OSTLER, AND DETERMINES TO PERFORM IT.

The reader should bear in mind that our friends had been upon the road for very many hours without resting, for their brief sojourn in the stable at the "Fox and Grapes" was scarcely worthy of the name, since the whole of their stay there was something less than two hours.

No men could bear so much fatigue without feeling its effects, and highwaymen, in that respect at least, were in no way different to ordinary mortals.

It is no wonder, then, that they and their horses should exhibit very perceptible signs of exhaustion.

As they penetrated still deeper and deeper into the wood, the sounds of pursuit came still more faintly to their ears.

At length they altogether died away, and then they began in good earnest to entertain the hope that they had succeeded in throwing the officers off the scent.

Had it been night instead of day their chances of ultimate escape would have been much greater, but many hours would have to elapse before darkness again covered the earth.

Presently they reached a large open space, perhaps rather more than an acre in extent, and, when near the centre, Dick suddenly wheeled round.

The others drew in immediately.

"Let us halt here a moment," he said, "and listen. It may be that the officers have, like ourselves, taken to the wood."

"All four listened eagerly, but, save the rustling of the trees and the chirping of the birds, they could hear nothing.

Not satisfied with this, however, Sixteen-String Jack slipped off his horse, and, without letting go of the reins, laid himself down at full length upon the turf.

In this way, with his ear pressing upon the ground, distant sounds would become more audible.

For full two minutes did he continue in this position, his companions during the whole of the time remaining profoundly still.

Then he rose to his feet.

"I can hear nothing," he said. "If they are in the wood at all, they must be a long way from here."

"That is a great relief, then," replied Turpin. "It would be out of the question for us to go much further."

"I am almost ready to fall from the saddle," said Tom King, "and no one who knew what I have gone through during the last forty-eight hours would wonder at it."

"You are quite right there. It is to me a matter of wonder that you have kept up so well as you have," said Claude Duval. "It is what few men could have done, and to look at you no one would give you credit for so much power of endurance."

And an inspection of Tom's personal appearance would have fully borne out what his companion said.

His frame was slight, his skin soft and fair, his features delicate, yet not feminine in their character.

"A rest is imperative," cried Turpin; "our cattle require it quite as much, or even more, than ourselves. Our best course, I take it, will be to push straight on. In doing so we must inevitably emerge upon the opposite side of the wood, and, judging from the extent of it, we are not likely to run much risk in being seen by our enemies."

"It is to be hoped," said Jack, "that when we do reach the other side we shall not be long in finding some place where we can rest for a few hours."

"Forward, then," exclaimed Turpin. "Keep on in the same direction as we have done hitherto. But let me tell you it will be necessary for us to exercise the utmost care in seeking out a roof to shelter us. The deeds we have recently performed, added to the preceding ones, will create no slight commotion in the land. All will be made aware of them, and such a reward offered as will tempt people to go to any length to capture or betray us."

"Very true," said Claude Duval, "but we must have a rest somewhere. I can hold out as long as most, and I must confess I am all but overcome."

Nothing further was now said.

At an easy, gentle rate, agreeable to their horses and themselves, for now they had little fear of being pursued, they pushed through the trees.

But the wood was even greater in extent than they had at first imagined it to be, and if they had not known they had paid the greatest attention to the route they took, they would have feared that they were only wandering round and round.

In a short time, however, to their no small gratification, they began to perceive things which indicated that the confines of the wood were close at hand.

The dense undergrowth of fern and brake began to disappear, and the trees were thinner in the stem, and at a greater distance from each other.

Before they quite left the protection of the wood they were very careful to reconnoitre.

But no traces of their enemies were anywhere to be seen.

It was with a feeling of great relief that they assured themselves such was really the fact.

Cautiously, then, they emerged on to a common of considerable size.

Gorse bushes were growing upon it in abundance, as well as many other dwarfish shrubs indigenous to such places.

But none of these grew high enough from the ground to in any way obstruct their view, which was unusually extensive.

What common it was they had no idea, for, to the best of their knowledge, they had never been in that part of the country before.

They skirted it for some distance, in the hope of finding some beaten path that would take them across it, nor were they disappointed in their search.

Before long they arrived at a broad track, which stretched before them in a straight line as far as ever they could see.

With little or no hesitation they took this path.

The morning was now beginning to get advanced, for their passage through the wood had taken some time.

When they entered it, it will be remembered, the sun was only a few degrees above the horizon.

Now he had attained a considerable altitude, and, for the time of year, his beams were unusually warm.

Nowhere in the sky was the thinnest cloud or mass of white vapour perceptible. All was one pure, beautiful, azure blue.

In their progress across the common the highwaymen, from time to time, took care to cast around them anxious glances to see that their foes were not approaching them.

It was but at a walk that they went, for every step they took only served to show how much exhausted they were, and how badly prepared they would have been to defend their liberties and their lives.

They were right glad when the other side of the common was reached, for their situation, while they were upon it, was by far too much exposed to please them, or make them feel exactly comfortable.

They found the path they had been pursuing made a junction with a high-road which ran through a little village, the thatched roofs and red tiles of which could be distinguished through the trees, as well as the slender spire of the church and the time-stained sails of the windmill.

It was decided not to pass through the village, as their appearance could not fail to excite a great deal of comment. It would be better, they thought, to find some isolated dwelling—a road-side public-house for instance—where they could remain for a little while.

Acting upon this belief, they left the village to their right, taking their way down a narrow, shady lane.

Where it led to they knew not, but, from its direction, they imagined it would lead them clear of the village. They entered it.

The walking pace was still continued.

Before they had proceeded many yards they heard a clattering sound by far too familiar to their ears for them to mistake it. A horseman at rather a fast trot was approaching them.

"Who is it, I wonder?" asked Dick.

"A traveller."

"Shall we stop him?"

"By no means."

"Are you in earnest?"

"Certainly. We appear to be unknown here; let us endeavour to remain so. If we were to plunder this man there would be an end of our resting anywhere about here."

"So there would, Dick, so there would. We'll just walk on quietly as we are, and allow him to pass us."

So said, so done.

The space of little more than two minutes brought the approaching horseman in sight.

He was evidently going in the same direction as themselves.

As his pace was something considerably more than double that of our friends, he soon reached them.

"Good morning!" he cried, in that cheerful, good-tempered way so noticeable in the country. "Good morning!"

"Good morning!" cried our friends.

"It's a lovely morning for the time of year!" cried the traveller, slackening his pace, "is it not?"

"Very, indeed!"

He was a sturdy, healthy-looking, middle-aged man, and would have done well to have sat for the portrait of that familiar character, John Bull.

By the way in which he accommodated his speed to theirs, and attempted to enter into a conversation, it was plain he was of a talkative, sociable disposition, and delighted in making himself friendly with all he happened to meet.

Thinking it would best serve their purpose to humour him, our friends did so.

Englishmen, a hundred and thirty years ago, had then, as now, a favourite subject for conversation, and that is the weather.

As soon as the topic was exhausted, the burly man, who, by his dress and manner, appeared to be a farmer, said:

"You will excuse me, gentlemen, for saying so, but I be main curious to know where you are going, and I'll tell you why, because this here lane ain't no public road, but a private way as goes direct to my farm, and nowhere's else, as I knows on."

He turned an inquiring glance upon our friends as he spoke.

Turpin took upon himself to reply, as the others continued silent.

"You are asking what we don't know ourselves, for, to speak the plain truth, we came out this morning for a ride, and have lost our way."

"Oh, that's it, be it?" said the farmer. "Danged if I could make it out! Now, look here, you seem tired and hungry, and civil sort of gents, would you like to come to my house and have an hour's rest?"

CHAPTER CLXXI.

AFTER A BRIEF REST DICK TURPIN SETS OUT ON HIS PERILOUS EXPEDITION TO STONEBRIDGE.

"You make no mistake," replied Dick Turpin, "in saying we are hungry and tired, for we are both, and I trust you will accept our thanks for your kind offer, which we shall have very great pleasure to embrace."

Dick took off his hat as he thus spoke, and made a very low bow, in doing which he was immediately imitated by his companions.

The farmer, thinking not to be out of the fashion, took off his broad-brimmed beaver, and bowed as well.

"I'm much obliged," he said. "You see we are but plain, simple, country folks, like, and not used to Lunnun ways, and all you'll find to eat and drink is simple country fare, and——"

"There's nothing we so much admire as country fare, is there, Fitz-John?" said Turpin, addressing Sixteen-String Jack, who happened to be nearest to him.

"Nothing in the world, Clarence, nothing in the world," replied Jack.

The worthy farmer, when he heard the highwaymen address each other by such aristocratic names, at once became impressed with the idea that those whom he had so casually encountered must be persons of distinction. To be sure their appearance was not exactly the sort of thing to strengthen him in such an opinion, but he knew young bloods delighted in getting themselves into scrapes, and showing the contempt they had for the rich clothes they wore.

His desire for them to visit his house amounted to absolute frenzy, for this farmer in no way differed from most of the English agricultural classes in the reverential feeling they had for the nobility.

"This is my farm, gentlemen," he said, as they reached the end of the lane, "and, though I say it myself, a pretty one it is, and if you will only be good enough to condescend to sit down and take a meal with me, I shall feel much honoured."

"But," said Turpin, not wishing to make it appear how anxious he was to avail himself of the invitation, "we are none of us, owing to some rather rough sport, in a condition to go anywhere."

"Oh! yes, yes," said the farmer; "don't let that stand in your way on no account."

"We are much obliged, for if we are to tell you the truth, we are sadly in want of food and rest. I don't know how it is you are willing to allow such suspicious-looking characters as we must be to enter your house, without it is owing to your superior discernment, which has enabled you to see what we actually are!"

"Gentlemen," said the farmer, who was no more insensible to skilful flattery than the rest of mankind. "Gentlemen, I hope you'll excuse me saying so much for myself, and making so bold as I do. But I flatter myself that if I can do nothing else, I can tell a real gentleman from a false one. Now, it doesn't need for me to give a second glance in order for me to see that you are real gentlemen, every one of you, and that is the reason I ventured to ask you to step in."

The farmer took out a spotted blue pocket-handkerchief as he finished this speech, and wiped his face with it; then pushing open a gate, he led the way into his own farmyard.

Our friends merely bowed in reply to his speech, and followed him.

The glance which they gave at their surroundings fully justified what the farmer had said. Neatness, order, and fruitfulness were everywhere apparent.

The bright golden autumn sun, which shed his beams upon the scene, contributed not a little to its appearance.

Half buried by an orchard, the trees in which our friends could see were literally loaded with fruit, was the farmer's homestead.

It appeared to be a long straggling building, one story high, looking very much as though some six or eight thatched cottages had been built, and then all knocked into one.

Upon a closer approach this became all the more observable, though the probability is that such was not the course adopted in building it.

The farmer observed the look of gratification which was upon the faces of his guests, and his heart warmed still more towards them.

Subduing his propensity to talk, lest by so doing he should distract their attention from some of the beauties of the place, he walked on in perfect silence.

His farm was his hobby, and he did not begrudge either time or money in improving it, and the result of his labours must have been highly satisfactory and pleasing to him.

The door of the farmhouse was soon reached.

There was a pretty old-fashioned porch over the door, and in this, although the season was so far advanced, three persons were seated, two of whom, upon hearing the farmer approach, rose and ran out to meet him.

They were two pretty, fresh-coloured country girls, and looked to be sixteen and eighteen respectively.

Upon perceiving the four strangers they drew back in confusion.

"My daughters," said the farmer, proudly, alighting from his horse as he spoke.

Our friends again bowed, and with such a courtly grace, that the hearts of the two maidens were quite won by the action.

They then proceeded to follow the farmer's example, and dismount.

The steeds were all given into the charge of a clownish-looking lad, who led them off to the stables.

Fain would our friends have accompanied him, and seen where their cattle were bestowed, but they felt they could not well do so without exciting suspicion—a thing they by no means wished to do.

So they allowed them to go, but it was with the mutual mental resolution that they would, before long, find some pretence for looking at them, and seeing exactly where they were placed.

The third person who had been sitting in the porch was the farmer's wife—a buxom dame, well worthy to be the mistress of such a spot.

The highwaymen followed the farmer into the large kitchen, where, with that cordial heartiness which is now so rarely seen, they were invited to sit down and make themselves at home.

The conversation which passed between those assembled is scarcely interesting enough for us to give it in full, but we should be tempted to do so, however, if merely for the sake of character, but so many exciting and thrilling incidents press upon us for speedy recital, that we shall refrain from doing so.

Let it suffice to say, that the welcome and hospitality our friends received was of the warmest kind, and when, after the dinner had been served, the whole party sat down to the table to enjoy themselves, the happiness of the whole party was complete.

Never before had the old roof echoed to such shouts of hearty laughter as it did that day. Giving no thought of their imminent danger, and the immediate vicinity of the officers, our four friends entered fully into the spirit of the scene.

Spying his first opportunity, Dick rose from the table, and went outside.

His comrades knew his object.

Dick found the stables only a few yards distant from the house.

Well pleased was he to find that all the horses had been well fed and rubbed down.

Caressing Black Bess, as one would a favourite dog, he left the place again, for he was fearful of calling notice upon himself by remaining too long.

The stable door he found, upon examination, to have no other fastening than a latch.

Then, before entering the house again, he looked about him carefully, so as to impress the position of the different objects upon his mind, for he calculated that in all probability he would want to find his way there in the dark.

He had not forgotten the promise he had made to Joe, the ostler.

The reader must know, in fact, that Dick Turpin was not the man to make a promise and hold back from it on account of the extra danger he might, by so doing, bring upon himself.

On re-entering the kitchen, he found things looking much about the same as they did when he left.

Another tankard of the famous old October ale was brought in, and while they quaffed it they amused themselves with relating many an incident well calculated to excite both interest and laughter.

And so hours passed.

Not the slightest suspicion that they were the famous highwaymen, about whom the farmer had a great deal to say, was entertained.

At length, pleading their fatigue, they were allowed to retire.

It was then just about sunset.

As good luck would have it, the rooms in the farmhouse were so arranged that our friends were obliged to take a double-bedded room.

Nothing could have suited them better.

When they were all four within the chamber, they threw off the heavier part of their apparel, and flung themselves upon the beds, heartily grateful for the chance which had procured them such a luxury.

Their fatigue was great indeed, and in less than ten minutes they were all sound asleep, so sound that it would require no ordinary noise to awaken them.

Truly are they in a dangerous and helpless situation now.

Those officers who had pursued them would not be very long before they found they had in some way missed them.

Then they would return, and perseveringly search for the spot where they would most likely disappear.

Suppose they should get upon their track and find them—slumbering, helpless?

Then indeed would the officers have an easy prey.

Let us hope, however, that the extraordinary run of good fortune which they have at present had, may continue for yet a little longer, in order that we may follow them in their soul-stirring exploits.

Nothing, perhaps, which they have ever done, will serve so well to show the bravery of their dispositions than the readiness and ease with which they laid down and surrendered themselves to sleep at a time when they knew they were, in the strictest sense of the word, environed by danger.

May no unfriendly hand disturb them.

So far there is no indication of coming danger. Without the house all is strangely calm and still.

[DICK TURPIN AND CLAUDE DUVAL BINDING THE BILL STICKER TO THE GATE.]

Is it that deceptive lull which so often precedes a storm? We must wait and see.

The night wears on.

The darkness gradually increases, and the stars, one by one, peep out of the blue sky.

CHAPTER CLXXII.

TOM KING VAINLY ENDEAVOURS TO PERSUADE DICK TURPIN TO ABANDON HIS PERILOUS PROJECT.

BETWEEN four and five hours after the highwaymen had entered the bed-chamber, Dick Turpin awoke.

Hastily rising from the bed, he proceeded to attire himself with those portions of his apparel of which he had divested himself.

He took the greatest care not to make any more noise than he could possibly help.

His three companions still slumbered.

When he had laid down to sleep, it was with the resolution to rise at least two hours before midnight fixed firmly in his mind.

And he had awoke.

He did not know the time exactly, but he felt pretty sure he had not overslept himself.

Watches he had in plenty, but there was no light, and no means of getting one to enable him to see the hour by any one of them.

The operation of dressing occupied but a few moments.

When he was quite ready he paused and listened.

All was still.

He was rather in doubt whether he should wake either of his comrades. As the reader suspects, it was his wish to go alone.

If he awoke them, he feared they would try to persuade him out of his resolution.

But, then, if he left them without their knowledge, and they should awake before he returned, the most disastrous consequences might ensue.

He resolved to wake Tom King.

This he did by shaking him slightly.

"Hist! Tom," he said. "Be silent."

"Is it danger?" asked Tom, in a voice almost below a whisper.

"No; calm yourself. There is no danger at present that I am aware of."

"Then why are you up and dressed?" asked King, sitting up on the bed.

"Be quiet, and I will tell you. I do not want to wake Claude and Jack."

"Why not? What is the matter?"

"You shall hear."

"I am all impatience."

"Do you recollect last night that I made a promise to Joe, the ostler?"

"Yes, now I do."

"Had you forgotten it?"

"For the moment."

"Do you remember what the promise exactly was?"

"Yes; that you would meet him at midnight at Stonebridge, and place in his hands a sufficient sum of money to enable him to set up in business."

"Just so."

"But, Dick, my friend, surely, under all the circumstances you do not think of attempting to fulfil your promise?"

"No, I do not."

"I am glad of that; I was afraid you were."

"You misunderstand me, I think."

"How?"

"You said I did not think of attempting to fulfil the promise."

"I did."

"And I do not mean to attempt, but to do it!"

"But the danger?"

"It has never yet made me turn aside from my purpose, and never will."

"It is madness to think of such a project."

"Nay, I am inclined to think it less difficult than you appear to do."

"And did you think of going alone?"

"I did."

"Worse and worse."

"Why?"

"It is utter madness—I might say, suicide!"

"Pho—pho! I am sure you magnify the peril. Listen to me, Tom."

"I cannot."

"But you must."

"Am I to understand that you have fully resolved upon going?"

"I have."

"Then I give in, for I know when once you make up your mind to do a thing, no arguments in the world will turn you."

"It is so, and more especially upon the present occasion."

"Then, Dick, such being the case, you will at least grant me one favour."

"No."

"But you will."

"No. Before you speak I know well enough what the favour is. You wish to accompany me."

"That is it."

"I knew it. Tom, my friend, for the sake of my own safety, no less than your own, I must refuse."

"Why?"

"For many reasons. In the first place, the officers will be looking for us in twos or fours. By going alone I run less risk of detection."

"There is something in that."

"There is a great deal in it. Believe me, I have not decided upon this course of action without due and sufficient thought, and I am firmly convinced that it will be best in every respect to go alone."

Tom was silent.

"Do not be displeased, my friend. I awoke you in order that my disappearance should create no alarm, since you would be able to account for it."

"But how long shall you be away?"

"That is a question I cannot well answer. I hope no longer than it will take Bess to gallop from here to Stonebridge and back."

"But we are a long way from that place, are we not?"

"We are, and yet perhaps not so far as you would imagine. I have taken accurate notice of our route, and I feel confident of being able to push across the country to my destination in a tolerably straight line."

"I am very uneasy about it, Dick," said Tom, after a brief pause. "Take my advice for once, and do not go."

"I am very sorry I cannot, but my mind is made up. Nothing ever yet held me back from keeping my word, and nothing shall."

"That is all very well on principle"——

"Now, Tom, don't say any more. It is quite needless, and I cannot stay to hear you. I shall try my utmost to go and come back without the people here knowing anything of it. Bess is tired, it is true, but yet I fear not she will do it."

"I shall see you go very unwillingly."

"That may be, but, Tom, as you value my friendship, do not let anything tempt you to follow me. Promise that you will not."

"I cannot refuse you, Dick, because"——

"There, never mind. You promise, do you not?"

"I do."

But Tom spoke the words very reluctantly.

"That is enough. Now let me go. I shall return all safe, do not fear. If Claude and Jack wake up before I come back, tell them where I have gone."

"I will. I know what they will say, however."

"So do I, and you need not tell me. I have been to the stable, as you know. The house, being all upon the ground floor, will be left easily, and I can make my way to the stable without any difficulty. Then I shall saddle Bess, and be off."

"It sounds very fine, Dick, but you do not think enough about the awful risk you run."

"And you think too much about it."

"Not so."

"It resolves itself into a matter of opinion, and I cannot stay to argue the matter with you. Lie down, and, if possible, sleep until I come back, for I am sure you are more in want of sleep than either of us."

"I am very weary."

"Of course you are. How could you be otherwise? As for myself, the sleep I have had has quite refreshed me, and I am ready for anything. Good-bye! I shall soon be back."

Dick cautiously and quietly opened the window as he spoke.

It was one of those old-fashioned latticed casements opening like a door, and composed of a number of tiny diamond-shaped panes of glass.

The opening made was just large enough for Dick to pass through, and no more.

The ground was about three feet below him, and he alighted without a sound.

Tom stood at the open casement.

"Shut the window, Tom," whispered Dick, "and go and lie down again, and leave me to myself. I shall come back safe, I know."

Tom did not reply, but he shook his head silently and significantly.

He did not close the window.

Dick did not stay to argue with him, but directed his steps to the stable.

The night was clear and fine, and Tom, as he stood at the window, was able to see to a considerable distance.

All presented the calmest imaginable aspect, and as he gazed out into the stillness, and saw the stars twinkling faintly overhead, he could not help asking himself whether all that had happened was not a dream, and whether there really were such persons as police-officers.

It was a strange semi-somnolent state into which he had fallen.

How long it continued he knew not, but he was aroused by hearing a slight noise.

He looked up.

In a moment he recollected all.

Then immediately after he heard a faint sound, which was to him perfectly intelligible.

A horse was trying to walk noiselessly.

"That is Bess," he said. "I trust neither she nor her rider will come to harm to-night."

Even as he uttered this aspiration, those he had seen appeared in sight.

Slowly and carefully Black Bess was picking her way through the farm-yard.

There was no moon, but yet such was the stillness and transparency of the atmosphere, that he could watch him to a great distance.

At last his form, and that of his steed, became so ill-defined that it was only by a great effort that he was able to keep his eye upon it.

He felt assured that if he once removed his glance he should never be able to fix his gaze again upon it.

Fainter and fainter they grew.

He strained his eyeballs vainly.

They disappeared.

With a heavy heart Tom closed the window, and again laid down upon the bed.

But this time, do what he could, sleep fled from him. His mind was too busily occupied in thinking of his friend, and the perils he would probably encounter.

"May he achieve his errand, which is a good one," he said, "and return in safety, but I doubt very much whether my wish will meet with a fulfilment."

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH DICK TURPIN MET JOE, THE OSTLER, AT STONEBRIDGE.

WHETHER the forebodings which haunted Tom King's mind are doomed to be realised we shall quickly see, for leaving him to his uneasy slumbers, we will follow Dick upon what it is only just to term—his temerarious expedition.

The bearings he had taken enabled him to go direct to the stable.

He pushed open the door, and a word spoken to the sagacious creature was enough to make her at once come forth.

The saddles and bridles were hanging near the door. His own he knew by the touch, for the stirrups were of a peculiar pattern.

Hastily placing it upon her back, and making all secure, he leaped into the saddle.

Then, as Tom had seen, he had walked her as gently and quietly as he could across the farm.

But no sooner was he beyond its precincts, than, uttering a cheering shout, he patted his mare upon the neck, and letting the reins fall loosely, allowed her to proceed at her own speed.

Thoroughly refreshed by her four hours' rest, Black Bess put forth that astonishing speed for which she has always been famed.

Endeavouring as much possible to go in a straight line to his destination, he paid no heed to the beaten roads. Like some wild huntsman, he scoured over the fields, leaping hedges and brooks, and not turning aside for any object.

It was a long time since Dick had enjoyed such a gallop as he then had upon the back of his bonny mare, and its exhilarating influence soon exerted itself upon him.

In the whole of his wild ride he met not a single living creature. Without any stretch of the imagination, he might have fancied himself upon an uninhabited island.

But he soon discovered that the distance from the farm-house to Stonebridge was greater than he thought it was, and he began to grow apprehensive that he would not be in time to keep his appointment.

Although her speed was even then greater than any other horse would have made, yet he did not scruple to urge her to still greater exertion, for he knew that the full extent of her powers had not yet been reached.

On, on, over hill and dale, hedge and stream, they flew, crossing lanes and high-roads, and plunging into and swimming across those brooks which were too wide to leap.

In the darkness the two rapidly-moving figures could scarcely be distinguished; or had any one caught a transient glimpse, they would have looked like some spectral horse and rider.

And now, at last, the broad, smooth Uxbridge-road, a little above Stonebridge, was reached.

Dick paused in a field that was on one side of the road, and, ere he leaped into it, listened to assure himself that there was no chance passenger or enemy of his within hearing.

No signs of either reached him, and feeling secure from immediate danger, he touched Bess lightly on the flank.

It was all she needed to make her give one bound, and then alight upon the hard roadway.

Lightly and gracefully she did it, and then stood firm as a rock, in readiness to turn in any direction.

Dick turned her, of course, towards the place appointed.

"I don't know," he said, "whether I am over my time, but for all that I shall trot the remainder of the distance. Joe would not expect me to be punctual to a minute, I have no doubt. Gently, Bess, gently."

At a trot which, though it seemed an easy one, yet got over the ground in a surprising manner, the remainder of the journey was performed.

As soon as Dick saw the dim shadow of the bridge before him, he slackened his pace still more, and kept a sharp look out on both sides of him.

For a moment he turned sick at heart when he thought of the horrible position he would be in should Joe, the ostler, have after all proved treacherous, and caused an ambuscade to be laid for him somewhere about that place, but he combated this feeling as much as possible, for he thought he was doing the young man an injustice by harbouring such a thought against him.

The bridge was reached.

On arriving in the centre of it, he pulled up and waited.

As he thus stood, he was even in the darkness a conspicuous object.

"If I pass this danger," he said, "I shall consider myself safe."

It was a hazardous mode of obtaining the satisfaction.

But all remained still as before.

"I am here either too soon or too late," said Dick. "I will draw aside a little while and watch."

He was rather at a loss where to conceal himself, so as to be able to see any one approach without being seen himself; but at last the thought occurred to him that if he descended by the side of the bridge to the margin of the river, he might stand there in the shadow without his presence being suspected.

No sooner did the thought occur to him, than he resolved if possible to carry it out, and accordingly he walked Bess to the end of the wall of the bridge, and made her go down the slope.

At the bottom he found a place where she could stand comfortably.

As the level of the river was only a few feet below that of the road, the archway was a very low one, and as Dick sat upon his mare, he was able to look just over the parapet.

He took care to place himself as close to the stonework as possible; then he waited.

A few minutes passed.

"No one is here," he muttered, "am I behind my time? I have a watch or two, I will try if I cannot find out what the hour is."

As he spoke, he drew from his pocket a very massive silver watch, the face of which certainly was not more than four inches in diameter.

This he held so that the greatest possible amount of light should fall upon it, but even that was not enough for his purpose.

Finding he could not see, he determined not to be baulked if he could help it, so he opened the glass, and felt the position of the fingers.

In this way he was able to tell to a trifle, but not accurately; he made out the time to be something less than a quarter to twelve.

"Hurrah!" he said, as he made this discovery, "then I am here first, after all. That's just what I like! Bravo, Bess, lass! There's no other steed in England, or in the world either for that matter, who could have performed the distance you have in the same space of time.

It would seem by the way in which Black Bess pawed the ground, tossed her head, and uttered a low, whinnying, neighing sound, that she was fully aware her master was speaking in her praise.

Deeming it best, however, to subside into silence, lest the tokens of his presence should reach unfriendly ears, Dick spoke to her to be silent and still.

He was immediately obeyed.

Then, assuming his former attitude, he peered over the low stone parapet of the bridge.

It was somewhere about ten minutes after this that Dick heard some one approaching at a rapid walk, and looking in the direction of the "Fox and Grapes," he almost immediately saw the outlines of a human form.

There was every probability that this was Joe, the ostler, but as a means of precaution, Dick determined not to discover himself till he had quite satisfied himself upon the point.

And now whoever it was that was coming, began to whistle in a very loud tone one of the popular melodies of the day.

Presently the figure reached the bridge.

Even as Dick had done, it walked to the centre, and there stopped.

Still Turpin did not move.

Then the figure spoke.

"I am afraid he won't come," he said, "and I don't wonder at it. He's far enough off by this time, I'll warrant. How glad I am I did not tell mother and Susan what I expected. They won't be disappointed now, as they would have been if they had known all about it, and then him not keep his word. However, it's only just twelve, and I ought not to expect him to be punctual. I'll wait an hour before I give him up."

Thus resigned, the ostler walked to the side of the bridge and sat down, determined to keep his disappointment down.

"Joe!" said Turpin.

The ostler heard the voice, and glared around him in alarm.

"Joe!" said Dick again, and this time a little louder.

"Who is it?" asked Joe, recovering himself a little; "is it the captain?"

"Yes; silence! I will be with you directly."

Joe could tell by the sound whereabouts the highwayman was, and he crossed over to that side of the bridge.

Turpin, in the meantime, turned Bess round, and regained the high-road.

"It really is the captain!" said Joe; "ah! I never thought you would come."

"But here I am, you see."

"Yes, you are here, but do you know your danger?"

"Never mind that, Joe; I made you a promise."

"I know you did."

"And I am here to perform it."

"It's a great deal more than I deserve."

"Not a bit of it! Now, Joe, how much do you want?"

"I don't know."

"But surely you have fixed upon some sum that would be just about enough for your purpose."

"Yes I have."

"And how much is it? Come, tell me."

"Two hundred pounds."

"Is that all?"

"All! I think it is a very great deal, though it may not seem much to you."

"But, Joe, don't be afraid to speak. Do you really think the sum you mention would be sufficient?"

"I do."

"Very well, I don't; and so to make sure, you shall have just double."

"Double?"

"Yes, double."

"Four"——

"Hundred pounds!"

Joe gasped for breath. The bare idea of possessing so much money was more than he could bear with anything like composure.

In the meantime, Dick very coolly began to take the money out of his pocket and count it.

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

DICK IS ALARMED BY THE APPROACH OF THE PATROL, BUT JOE, THE OSTLER, SUGGESTS A CAPITAL RIDING-PLACE.

"Hold your cap, Joe," he said, "and I will put the money in it."

Joe doffed his hat in a moment.

Then Turpin, as fast as he had ten guineas counted, dropped them in.

The hat soon grew heavy.

Many and many a purse contributed the money, but Dick took care to give nothing but guineas, for he by no means desired to give the poor fellow notes, which might be recognised as having been stolen.

Upwards of three hundred and fifty guineas had he thus counted, and transferred from his pocket to Joe's hat, when a faint, muffled sound arose.

Both stopped and listened.

Louder, louder, and louder it grew.

"It is the patrol," said Joe.

"The patrol?"

"Yes, they are out to-night in double strength, so I am told, upon all the roads leading from the metropolis."

"That is awkward."

"Very."

"I am glad you told me this."

"Why?"

"Because I shall know how to act."

"I thought you were in ignorance of it."

"And why?"

"If you had known, I thought you would never have run the risk of coming here."

"I should. It is a part of my principle always to keep a promise. What I say I mean."

"But hark!" said Joe, "they are coming at a good rate. Can you hear the horses?"

"Quite plainly. Are they dragoons?"

"I do not know. I have seen three or four different parties upon the road to-night. Some were dragoons—some police-officers."

It seems as though they had made up their minds to capture us."

"They have, and unless you are very, very careful, they will do it."

"Pho, pho!"

Although the advance of the patrol could be plainly heard, owing to the silence of the night, yet they were at a great distance, and completely out of sight.

"You must be careful," said Joe, earnestly. "Until you are all captured the authorities have resolved that every road leading from London shall be thoroughly well watched, so that for you to commit a robbery will be impossible."

"But we stopped the Oxford mail last night," said Dick, with a smile.

"And a foolish thing it was, too," said Joe, "though I hope you will excuse me for making so bold as to say so."

"Why? We had a capital booty!"

"Likely enough. I have heard that every passenger was stripped of all he possessed. But you were in quite difficulty enough, I think, without making matters worse."

"Never mind that now," said Dick. "All's well that ends well. Will the patrol pass over the bridge?"

"Assuredly."

"How shall I get out of their way then?"

"I hardly know. They won't pass you without stopping and questioning you, and then, ten to one, you will be recognised."

"Perhaps not."

"There is the risk."

"Yes, of course, there is the risk."

"Then do not run it."

"But have you any idea which will be the best for me to do?"

"If you attempt to fly, you will, ten to one, be heard and pursued."

"That I should not mind in a general way, only Bess has had her powers very much taxed lately, and I do not wish to strain her by putting her to a gallop, though if I did so I should get out of the way easily enough."

"She is a wonderful animal."

"She is. Now, Joe, can you think of anything? I don't want the patrol to see me, and I do not want to put Bess to a long and fatiguing gallop. What shall I do?"

Joe scratched his head.

"That's a hard question to answer," he said.

"There is not much time to spare."

"I can only think of one thing."

"What is it?"

"I hardly like to tell you."

"Why not?"

"Because it is so hazardous."

"Do not hold back for that reason. Generally speaking, the greater the hazard the more I like it."

"Do you indeed?"

"I do."

"You are a strange fellow, I can hardly make you out."

"Never mind. Quick! What is your scheme?"

"You see this bridge?"

"Of course."

"Well, I think it just possible that if you were to go down by the bank, and then walk your mare under it"——

"I understand. You think, then, the patrol would pass over our heads without knowing anything of us being so near?"

"It is just likely."

"It is very likely."

"Do not be too sanguine."

"Joe, my lad, it is the best idea I have heard for some time."

"Do you really think so?"

"I do! And how it is I have never thought of it before I can't conceive. It is so simple, and yet so certain to succeed."

"You will try it, then?"

"Most certainly."

"Then come at once, or if we stay longer where we are we shall stand a chance of being seen."

"You are right; and as you must know the way about here better than myself, just be my guide for once."

"I will."

"Take hold of Bess's bridle, and lead her where she is to go."

With a gratified feeling swelling at his heart, when he thought the bold highwayman so approved of his plan, Joe took the mare by the bridle, and led her to a place where they could descend to the brink of the river without difficulty.

"How deep is the water?" asked Turpin.

"Under the arch only a little more than a foot, except in rainy weather, and the bottom is all beautiful little pebbles.

"The very thing. Bess will be able to stand there without any trouble."

"She will; but if you sit on her back you will have to stoop a great deal, for, as you see, the arch is very low."

"It is; but we can manage nicely, I think. Now, Joe, the best thing you can do is to jump up behind me. Quick! don't stop, for we have no time to lose now."

"I don't like," said Joe.

"But it won't do for you to stand in the water yourself, and if you are here alone you will rouse suspicion. Jump up."

Feeling it would be vain to remonstrate, Joe jumped up behind Dick, and then the latter, walking Bess into the water, guided her along the centre of the stream.

A faint plash as she lifted her feet out of the water alone betokened her progress, and the patrols were not yet near enough for them to hear such a sound as that.

Half-a-dozen steps, and she was fairly underneath the arch.

As Joe had said, it was necessary for them to stoop very much, but such a trifling inconvenience as that they were quite ready to put up with.

When exactly half way under, Dick stopped his mare.

The noble animal seemed fully to understand all that was going forward, and to comprehend the necessity there was for silence, for no sculptured horse could have stood more immovably than she did.

The cold water round her hoofs was doubtless agreeable and pleasant to her.

Neither of the strangely-assorted pair who sat huddled upon her back ventured to speak, for the vibration of the earth told them that the patrols were very close at hand indeed.

On, on, with a dull sound, tramp, they came.

Under the arch the sound reached their ears, like the muttering of far off thunder.

Dick felt pretty well at ease, and did not much anticipate an attack; but still he thought it best to be on the safe side, so he drew forth his pistols, and, as well as he could, examined the priming, and put them in a condition fit for instant service.

This done, he felt more secure, and awaited the coming of his foes with great composure.

Only one thing gave him anxiety. Would the patrol ride on without stopping at the bridge?

If they did stop his position would be awkward in the extreme.

Another minute now would set his doubts and fears at rest.

He bent all his faculties to listening.

The horses came, he fancied, at a gentler pace as they neared the bridge.

But this he thought must be his fancy.

Some words that were spoken, however, showed him it was not.

No sooner had the foremost of the patrol set foot upon the bridge, than a loud and commanding voice cried out, "Halt!"

Joe clutched Dick tightly.

"Halt!" said the voice again, and then, when the trampling of the horses had ceased, all was still.

"Kemp!"

"Yes, sir."

"Come forward."

The two beneath the bridge heard some one on horseback advance out of the ranks.

"You will stay here, Kemp."

"Yes, sir."

"You understand your duty. Ride quietly up and down until you meet the other sentries. As soon as you hear anything at all suspicious, do not wait to see whether it really is so or not, but at once fire your carbine, which will be enough to bring the remainder of the force to this spot."

"Yes, sir."

"Do you understand?"

"Quite, sir."

"Forward then!" said the officer in command. "If the villains are on the road to-night, it will go hard with me if I do not capture them."

CHAPTER CLXXV.

THE SENTINEL ON THE BRIDGE PROVES A SERIOUS OBSTACLE TO DICK TURPIN AND JOE.

As these words were spoken, the patrol put themselves in motion, and left the spot at a sharp trot.

Dick listened for a long time to their retreating footsteps.

He found himself in a most unenviable predicament.

There was a soldier posted as a sentinel just above his head, with the strictest injunctions to raise an alarm if he heard the least suspicious sound.

He was in the water under the bridge.

That he would be able to walk Bess out without attracting the sentinel's attention was scarcely to be hoped for.

What was he to do?

He was in a serious dilemma.

Joe wished to speak, but did not dare to do so. He sat mute and still behind the highwayman.

The sentinel, whose name appeared to be Kemp, remained for some time just where he was, looking after the receding forms of his companions.

Then Dick heard him say something to himself, which showed that he was not in the very best of tempers.

"Hang this sort of work!" he said; "it's a scampering shame, that it is, to set soldiers to do police duty! Curse the highwaymen! I only hope I come across them, and see if I don't settle them pretty quick. A nice treat on a cold winter's night to patrol up and down a lonely road like this. However, I s'pose it's no good grumbling: I must begin and abide by it."

Having come to this philosophical conclusion, Kemp slowly walked his horse up towards the "Four Grapes."

It now became rather an interesting point for Dick to ascertain how far his beat extended, and whether, when he reached its utmost limit, it would afford him an opportunity of slipping out unperceived.

The pace at which this patrol went along the road was a very leisurely one, and it was some time before he got far enough off for Dick to be able to speak in safety.

As soon, however, as he had done so, he said—

"Well, Joe, what's to be done now?"

"You may well ask that," said Joe; "we are in an awful fix; you see what comes of taking my advice!"

"Your advice was good enough, if these confounded patrols were not so vigilant. Who would have thought, now, they would have taken the trouble to post sentinels in that manner?"

"Who, indeed?"

"Hark! Can you hear him.?"

"Not now."

"Nor I. How far do you think he will go before he turns back?"

"Not very far, I should think."

"Well, Joe, I'll tell you what I wish you to do."

"I'll do it."

"I know you will. As we cannot hear the patrol, he will not be able to hear you if you slip off the mare's back, and go under the arch as quietly as you can, and creep up the bank."

"But what do you want me to do?"

"Find out how far he goes, if you can, and whether it would be safe for me to come out."

"I wished to propose the same thing to you."

"Did you?"

"Yes, only I was afraid you would misunderstand me."

"Well, no matter about that. Slip off, and knowing the place as well as you do, you will easily be able to gain the high-road. Then note how far he goes."

"All right," said Joe; "I'm off."

As he spoke he dismounted.

The water reached half-way up to his knees, but he did not care for that.

Feeling the sides of the arch with his hands, he crept along stealthily, and was soon at the top of the bank.

Here he crouched down, and took a long look up and down the road.

The sentinel was quite out of sight, and it was only indistinctly that he could hear the beat of his horse's hoofs.

Whether he was approaching or receding he could scarcely tell, for the sound did not seem to grow louder or fainter.

But this was owing to the distance, and the slow rate at which the patrol went.

The sound began to increase in loudness.

"He's coming back," said Joe, as he crouched still closer to the earth.

And now he was rather puzzled.

The officer, he felt sure, had gone towards the "Fox and Grapes."

And yet, as the sound got plainer and plainer, he felt confident it came from the opposite direction.

He waited, watching and listening.

The horseman who was coming must be either a traveller or another patrol.

By the speed he judged it to be the latter.

Nor was he wrong; for presently, through the darkness, he could distinguish a military-looking form on horseback.

It rode right up to the bridge, waited a moment, then turned round and retraced his steps.

"Ah!" said Joe, as he slid down the bank towards the stream, "I see it all now."

"What have you learned?" asked Turpin, anxiously, as soon as he was within hearing.

"Hush," said Joe.

"Will it be safe for me to emerge?"

"Listen, and I will tell you what I have seen."

"Go on, then, I am impatient to leave this place."

"I don't doubt that," said Joe. "It's nice and cool in the summer, I should think."

"How far does the sentry go?"

"It doesn't matter."

"Not matter?"

"No, there are two of them, and their beats are so arranged, that when one is furthest from the bridge the other is upon it, and the reverse."

"Confound their caution!"

"So say I."

"Then, don't you think they go far enough for me to be able to get out unheard?"

"I should think you would stand a bit of a chance if you were to wait until they were both halfway."

"I see, both about the same distance from the bridge."

"Just so."

"Then, with care, you think I might do it?"

"It is your only chance."

"It shall be tried, then, and it won't be my fault, nor Bess's either, if it does not succeed.

"Now's your time, then. I'll walk out with you, and I only hope you'll get off all right, as you deserve to do."

"Stop that, Joe. If you want to offend me, just begin praising me. Lead the way out of this place."

"Quietly, quietly, or you will spoil all."

Joe again took Black Bess by the bridle, and led her along.

They quickly emerged, and then Dick stopped to listen.

He could hear one of the sentinels approaching at a brisk walk.

"Good-bye, Joe," he said. "Take care of yourself. I shall get across the country as quickly as I can, and I am glad I came to-night, for I have acquired some information very important to me, and which I could not otherwise have got. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," said Joe, "and to the longest day I live I shall feel grateful to you."

At this moment they saw a bright flash as of lightning, and then heard the loud report of a carbine.

"We are seen," said Dick. "Fly, Joe, and I will do the same. They will find it no small task to catch me, I'm thinking."

So saying, he struck Bess upon the flanks with his heels, which caused her to give one terrific bound, and then dart forward with incredible speed.

The shot which had been fired was speedily answered by another, and then the trampling of horses at full gallop followed.

"Hurrah!" said Dick, as Bess leaped a hedge that most horses would have turned away from, "hurrah! Let them follow us; we will lead them a rare dance to-night."

That he had been perceived by one of the sentinels seemed tolerably certain, for he now heard most unequivocal signs of pursuit.

But he felt he could well afford to laugh such efforts to scorn now that he had got so good a start.

One bold effort he determined should free him from them, and so, urging Bess to the utmost exertion, he flew along with the swiftness of the wind.

Very soon all sounds of his pursuers died away.

Then he drew rein, and went at a pace less fatiguing to himself and to his noble mare. Impatient as he was to reach the farm, where his friends were doubtless as impatiently awaiting him, he would not satisfy that feeling at her expense.

But the long, sweeping, easy gallop which she went at, and which she could perform with the greatest ease, carried him over the ground at a very swift pace indeed.

As near as possible, he took the same route back as that by which he came.

How late it was he had no idea, but there were no signs of daybreak visible in the sky, and he yet entertained the hope of being able to reach his destination before the farmer or any of his family were astir.

At last the comfortable-looking place came in sight.

Here he pulled up, and returned with the same caution as he had left.

As he crossed the yard near the stable he looked towards the window of the room in which his companions were.

It was open.

Within he could see a face, while a hand was waved towards him.

"That's Tom King," he said; "he is a true friend, and deeply grateful for the service I have rendered him. It will cut me to the heart to ever part with him, and so it will to part with you, my lass," he added, patting Black Bess upon the neck.

Then, having arrived at the stable door, he alighted, took off the saddle and bridle, replaced them on the nail from which he had taken them, and sent the mare to find her own way to her stall, which he felt sure she would be better able to do than himself.

Then closing the stable-door, he made his way to his chamber.

"Thank God," said Tom King, "you have returned safely. A thousand times, as the night wore on and you did not return, have I been tempted to set out in pursuit of you, and nothing but the promise I made you would have been sufficient to keep me back."

"It is as well you made it," said Turpin. "All has passed off right enough. I must give you the particulars another time. Has neither Claude nor Jack awoke?"

"No."

"Let us lie down, then," said Turpin, "and while we have the chance get all the sleep we can."

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS HAVE THEIR SERENITY DISTURBED BY THE APPARITION OF A BILL-STICKER.

THE sun was high up in the sky before our friends awoke.

The inmates of the farm would not have them disturbed on any account.

As for the farmer himself, he was delighted, and nothing would have pleased him better than for his strange guests to have stayed with him for a month.

That they were gentlemen he was confident.

Tom King, too, had succeeded in making a favourable impression upon both his daughters, and the reader will scarcely feel surprised at this.

Upon awaking, they took all the pains with their toilette which they possibly could, and by the aid of clean water and a brush they much improved their personal appearance.

The wound which Sixteen-String Jack had received from the coachman was so slight as to be scarcely worth talking about. There was a long ugly scratch along his cheek and ear, but it did not look like what it really was, but as though he had been torn by a brier.

Of his night adventure Dick did not say a word, for he resolved to defer the narration of what had taken place to a better opportunity.

All four felt pretty sure the officers must have lost the clue to their whereabouts, or they would have heard something of them before now.

On leaving the chamber where they had passed the night, they repaired to the kitchen where so many happy hours had been spent the day before.

There they found assembled, and apparently waiting for them, the honest old farmer himself, his wife, and his two daughters.

The favourable impression which our adventurers had made was deepened considerably by the improvement visible. They did, indeed, look like gentlemen, and Tom King more especially, who, as the reader already knows, was one both by birth and education.

A substantial meal was spread upon the table, and, take the apartment for all in all, it would have been difficult to find a place that had so many evidences of comfort about it.

The air, unlike that of the previous day, was raw and chilly, so a large fire had been heaped up in the spacious fire-place.

The flames were high and bright, and cast a cheerful glow upon the faces of those who sat around, as well as on the walls and rafters.

Dick thought, as he looked around, he had never before seen such a picture of content, and he could not help contrasting the placid life of the inmates of the farm, undiversified as it was with any remarkable incident, and his own wild, turbulent career, full of wild and soul-stirring excitement. The one was like the unruffled waters of a lake, the other like the mountain torrent.

During the meal, which was as happy and as jovial a one as that on the preceding day, no one, to have looked at the four highwaymen, and noticed the careless, happy expression of their countenances, would have thought that so heavy a price was set upon their heads, and that the officers of justice were straining every nerve to effect their capture.

Of the jests, the merry tales, the jokes, the laughter, we shall say but little. The episode of their stay at the farm-house is too dull and devoid of interest for us to linger over its details.

But as our aim is to give the real lives of these notorious characters, we could not pass it over without making mention of it.

There was no wish that the highwaymen should leave the farmer's roof; in fact, they were pressed to stay, and our friends would doubtless have accepted the invitation, from the fact of its affording them a secure and unsuspected hiding-place, had it not been for an untoward incident.

Scarcely had they finished the hearty breakfast laid before them, and in which the farmer and his wife joined, out of compliment to their visitors, when a strange step was heard outside.

Our friends judged it was a strange step, for the dog, which had been lying in front of the fire, arose and uttered a low, fierce growl.

"Down, Rover! down" cried the farmer, then turning to his daughters, he added, "go to the door, Alice, and see who it is."

In obedience to this request, the elder of the two sisters went to the door and opened it.

"Good morning, miss!" said a voice. "I'll just trouble you to take that, and, if you'll allow me, I'll stick one or two about the farm."

"What is it?"

"It's a bill, miss, offering a reward of two thousand five hundred pounds for the apprehension and conviction of those four desperate highwaymen, Dick Turpin, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, who are supposed to be hiding somewhere in this neighbourhood."

It would be impossible to describe in any reasonable space the effect which this speech had upon our friends.

But the emotion they showed was not for a moment attributed to its real cause. It was thought to be merely the surprise which the sudden intelligence had elicited.

The farmer got up off his chair and went to the door.

"Good morning!" said the man, who, by the implements he carried, was evidently a bill-sticker. "Good morning!"

"Good morning!" replied the farmer. "What's that you say about highwaymen?"

"Here's a bill offering a reward of two thousand five hundred pounds for their apprehension, and containing a full and accurate description of their appearance."

"Oh! indeed!"

"They are thought to be in hiding somewhere in this part of the country, so I want you to give me permission to stick a few of the bills round the farm."

"Oh! certainly—certainly! stick up as many as you like! I only hope they'll be caught, for, rat 'em, they robbed me once of my money as I was coming home from market!"

"Did they, though!"

"Yes, they did."

"Then you needn't fear they'll do it again, for such steps are taken as will make their capture certain; they cannot escape, and every road is guarded."

"Glad to hear it!" said the farmer. "Glad to hear it! Where's the bill you spoke about? Oh! there it is! Alice has got it! But come, you seem a civil sort of chap, will you walk in and warm you, and have a jug of ale?"

"Thank you! if you will?" said the bill-sticker, putting down his can. "It's an awfully cold morning, and I am chilled to the bone!"

"I daresay you are. Come in—come in!"

The bill-sticker entered.

The highwaymen felt very uncomfortable indeed, but what were they do?

Move they could not, without exciting suspicion, and so they were obliged to remain where they were and stand their chance of being unrecognised.

The bill-sticker was a thin, sharp, active-looking, little man, with a very inquisitive cast of countenance, and ferret-like eyes, which glanced over everything in the place in a moment.

A chair was placed for him near the fire, and a large mug of ale poured out.

"Drink that," said the farmer, heartily, as he handed it to him, and if that don't warm you, nothing will."

"Many thanks, and good health to you all," said the bill-sticker, as he took the proffered mug and drank off its contents; but all the time he did so, he fixed his eyes upon our friends with the greatest attention.

Of course they noticed it, and knew what was the reason.

But their entertainers thought it was only rude curiosity on the man's part, for so impressed were they with the idea that their guests were gentlemen, that the fact of there being four of them did not rouse their suspicions.

The farmer had taken up the bill, and was looking earnestly at it, but to read the document was beyond his power.

He saw the figures on the top, £2,500, and, by dint of spelling every letter, he made out the word "Reward."

"I say," he cried. "Just let us hear what the bill says. Now, Mr. Bill-sticker, read it out to the company."

"Oh! certainly. Just hand it to me."

"Excuse us," said Dick, bending forward and speaking in a low tone to the farmer, "but while you listen to this we should like to run out and look at our cattle; they are valuable creatures, and we always make a point of looking at them the first thing every morning."

"No—no, never mind now. Stop and hear the description read."

"It is not worth while—we shall not be long away, and I thought if we went while you were listening to that, we should not be missed so much."

"Oh! very well—very well," said the farmer. "But don't be long gone. I shall be main sorry to part with you."

Dick upon this rose, and made a sign to his companions to do likewise.

The bill sticker looked after them suspiciously, but he did not like to speak, for fear of falling into some ridiculous mistake.

All four of our friends could not help giving a sigh of relief upon finding themselves in the open air.

"Game's up," said Turpin. "That man suspects who we are. I saw it in his eyes. Quick to the stable with you, and then we will mount and be off."

"That's the plan," said the others, as they followed him. "Confound the fellow for coming and turning us out of such comfortable quarters."

"So say I," replied Dick. "Only let me catch him, and see whether I don't pay him out."

They laughed.

Dick pushed open the stable door, and then, entering, each one set about the task of getting the horses ready for the road.

They were saddled in an incredibly short space of time, and then led out.

"Mount," said Dick, "and let us be off—unseen, if we can, or that bill-sticking rascal will raise such an outcry as will alarm the whole country-side."

Scarcely had the words left his lips, and before they had fixed themselves in their saddles, than, with a sudden rush, the bill-sticker and the farmer ran out of the house.

"Murder," they cried. "Stop them! Highwaymen! Stop them! Two thousand five hundred pounds reward! Stop them! Stop them! Oh! murder! Fire!"

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

DICK TURPIN AND CLAUDE DUVAL FIND ANOTHER BILL-STICKER IN THE LANE, AND TAKE THEIR REVENGE UPON HIM.

DICK TURPIN thrust his right foot into the stirrup, and then, gathering the reins in his left hand, he raised his hat and made an ironical kind of bow.

"Good morning, gentlemen," he said. "You see we are off, and rather suddenly. But it can't be helped. I'm sorry to leave you. Good bye."

As he thus spoke he touched Black Bess lightly on the flanks, and she darted off at once.

The others followed.

The vociferations of the farmer and the bill-sticker soon died away. To be sure they ran as fast as their legs would carry them, shouting as they went at the top of their voices, but they were no match for the highwaymen's horses.

"I should like to smother that fellow in paste," said Claude Duval, as they walked their horses up a bit of a hill. "Confound him for coming and turning us out of such comfortable quarters. I don't know when I was so happy before."

"Oh! never heed that," said Jack. "I for one had quite enough of it, though I must say I shall always look up to the old farmer as one of the right sort."

"It's that infernal bill-sticker," said Turpin "I only hope we fall across him, and I'll make him remember us for one while."

"What do you intend to do next, Dick?"

"We ought to reflect a little before we act, I think."

"I am sure we ought."

"We have pretty good evidence that all the roads round London are pretty well watched, and I will give you an idea how it is done."

Dick then proceeded to relate to his friends the adventures he had had during the night. Their astonishment may be imagined, for Claude and Jack never knew that he had been absent from the chamber.

But, despite their recklessness, they could not help feeling rather uneasy at the extreme vigilance of their foes. They could no longer conceal from themselves that they were in real earnest.

"I think," said Tom King, "that the very best thing we can do is to leave London for a while, and bend our steps inland. We have never visited the midland counties yet. What do you say to doing so?"

"Say!" cried the others; "that no better plan of action can be proposed."

"Since we are so unanimous, then," said Turpin, "we had better start at once. That we are more than suspected to be in this part of the country we have abundant evidence, and for that reason it strikes me we shall have a great deal of difficulty in leaving it undetected."

"We must expect that; but we have got out of worse difficulties before now, and I trust we shall again."

"And now where are we?"

"I have no idea."

"Which direction, then, ought we to take to go where you propose?"

"There is only one way. It is about noon now, I should think."

"Just ten minues' past," said Dick, consulting a watch.

"Very good, then; the sun is somewhere about due south, so the simplest plan will be to go straight on and keep our backs to it."

"We shall do, then; but mind, above all, you keep a sharp look round."

"What's that, then?" cried Claude. "Do you see?"

"Where?"

"Further on down the lane."

"I see nothing," said Dick.

"Look at that large tree yonder. Can't you see something close to it moving about?"

"Yes I can," cried Tom King. "It is a piece of stick moving about."

"I see it now," said Turpin. "Halt a moment, and let us try if we cannot make out what it is."

"It looks to me," said Claude, "as though somebody was standing in the lane, and poking the trunk of the tree with a walking-stick?"

"But what on earth can they be doing that for?"

"I don't know."

"There doesn't look anything dangerous in it."

"There does not, and yet there might be. We must now look with an eye of distrust upon everything we cannot understand."

"Let us walk on gently and see what it is, and be prepared, if necessary, to defend ourselves."

The lane down which our friends were now travelling was a very winding one, with good high hedges on both sides of it.

It was round the first bend in it that this strange sight was seen.

At a walking pace, and looking very keenly about them, they went on.

As soon as they passed the curve, the mystery explained itself.

A man, armed with sticks and brushes, was pasting bills upon the trunks of such trees as were wide enough for the purpose.

"Another bill-sticker, by Jove!" said Turpin; "curse all the tribe. Why, if they go on at this rate, we shall be made known everywhere! Let us alight, Claude; we'll serve this one out, at all events."

So saying, Dick dismounted, and his example was immediately followed by his three companions.

"But what shall we do with the horses?"

"I will hold them, if you like. They will be safest if I do, and you three are surely a match for that fellow!"

"Oh! yes."

Sixteen-String Jack immediately took charge of the horses.

This care off their minds, the others walked steadily down the lane.

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS DISCOVER THE DESERTER EXHAUSTED ON THE WAYSIDE.]

The man was so intent upon what he was about that he did not perceive their approach.

He had just got a refractory bill to stick against the bark of the tree, and he was patting it down at the sides and corners, in order to make it secure.

Dick would not speak to disturb him, but made a sign with his hand to Claude.

The two then crept forward on tip-toe, until they were close to the man, who little suspected who were behind him.

Then they gave a sudden dart forward, and caught him by the arms.

The bill-poster uttered a cry of fright upon feeling himself seized thus unexpectedly, and he twisted his head round in order to see who his assailants were.

Familiar as he had made himself with the description given on the bills, he recognised our two friends at a glance.

"Murder!" he cried. "Help! Save me! Oh! Lor'! Two thousand five hundred pounds! Oh! murder! Fire!"

"Stop that!" said Dick, and as he spoke, he snatched up the paste-brush, and sent it with a dab into the man's face.

Of course, it became an impossibility for him to continue his outcries any longer, for the brush was well charged with paste, and it filled up his mouth completely.

He managed, however, to make a terrible spluttering.

"Villain!" said Claude Duval; "what do you mean? Answer us this moment, what do you mean?"

The bill-sticker made an effort to speak, but, as he did not seem to relish swallowing his own paste, it was an ineffectual one.

"Oh! you won't speak," said Claude; "then we will have our revenge upon you. We have sworn not to leave a single bill-sticker alive, and you have fallen into our hands."

An expression of the most absolute fright came over the face of the unfortunate man, and his hair fairly bristled up and stood on end.

In a spasmodic sort of way he managed to gasp for mercy.

"It's no use," said Dick, who at the same time made an expressive motion to his friend, which he perfectly understood.

There was a five-barred gate close by, opening into a field, and Claude immediately divined Dick wished him to be tied to it; for though they strove to frighten the man by threats, they had never for a moment entertained the idea of doing him any serious or wanton injury.

The bill-sticker himself, however, was not aware of this, and when he felt himself being forced backwards to the gate, he did not know what he had to dread.

"Here, Tom," cried Dick, "while we hold him, just feel in this fellow's pockets, and find whether he has anything about him in the shape of rope that will do to hang him with."

"All right!" said Tom King, interrupting himself in his occupation of reading the bill which had been stuck upon the tree. "I'll do it."

In a very scientific manner, Tom proceeded to rifle the man's pockets, and he very soon had the whole of their miscellaneous contents strewed upon the ground.

Among the rest were several pieces of very strong twine.

"These will do," said Turpin. "Now, Claude!"

Both set to work to tie the man to the gate, and this they did in a very little while. The cord they had was not quite enough, nor was it so thick as they would have liked for their purpose; but they made the best shift with it that they could.

There was a piece of leather strap that was fastened to the paste-can, and made so as to slip over the shoulder.

This they took, and formed one excellent band with it.

In brief, between them, by dint of a great deal of rummaging, they found a sufficient quantity for their purpose; and at length they had the hapless bill-sticker tied firmly to the gate, and quite powerless to help himself.

"Now, villain!" cried Dick, "you will remain where you are until such time as some one comes along this lane and releases you; and as it appears to me to be rather an unfrequented one, you will, I expect, have to wait for some time."

The bill-sticker had got rid of the brush out of his mouth, and he set up a dismal howl.

"Silence! Oh! you won't! Then take that!"

Dab went the brush into his mouth again, almost choking him with paste.

As it was stuck quite firmly between his jaws, and, as he had no use in his hands, he would have some difficulty in getting rid of it.

Quite satisfied with what they had done so far, their next proceeding was to take possession of the packet of bills the man carried with him, and also to pull down the one that was stuck against the tree.

They then formed the whole into a loose pile, and Dick, taking some phosphorous matches from his pocket, set light to it in several places.

Then a bright flame shot up, and in a little while all of them were consumed.

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

OUR FRIENDS ARE NOT DESTINED TO GO FAR ON THEIR INTENDED JOURNEY WITHOUT MEETING WITH AN INTERRUPTION.

The poor bill-sticker looked with a rueful eye upon these proceedings on the part of the highwaymen.

To think that he should be able to see two thousand five hundred pounds—for in that light he looked upon our friends—right before his nose, and yet not be able to take it, almost drove him to distraction.

"So far very good," said Turpin, as he poked about the ashes of the bills, to see that none was left unburnt.

"Put his cap on," cried Sixteen-String Jack, who had been an amused spectator of the scene. "Poor fellow! he'll catch cold. Put his cap on."

"All right," said Claude, who divined the meaning that lurked beneath his comrade's words.

Stooping down, he picked up the can in which the paste was carried.

A good portion of its contents was spilt upon the road way, but yet there remained the more glutinous part of it, which clung tightly to the sides and bottom.

All saw now what Jack meant.

A shout of laughter came from their lips when Claude, holding it up as high as he could, reversed it and brought it down upon the man's head.

It was large enough to go right over it, and the rim rested upon his shoulders.

He looked about the most ludicrous object imaginable.

The tin can looked like some remarkable helmet.

"Now let us be off," said Dick. "We have done quite enough to make him remember us to the longest day of his life, and the sooner we move away the better. It won't do for us to stay too long in one place."

"Come on, then; we have certainly put a stop to his exertions—for a little while, at least."

"I wish he represented all his tribe."

"No doubt."

The four highwaymen remounted their steeds, and, after casting one last look at their enemy, resumed their way.

But they went at an easy pace, for it was obviously their best policy to husband their horses' strength as much as possible, whenever they had an opportunity, in order that when a time arrived which rendered it necessary for them to make great exertion, they might be equal to doing it.

"I cannot see any signs or sounds of pursuit," said Dick. "Can you?"

"None whatever."

"It is too much to hope that we have altogether eluded our pursuers. They are off our track now, but there is no knowing how soon they may be on it again."

"There is not."

"Both ourselves and our cattle have had a long, good rest, and, if we do not suddenly fatigue them, they will be able to take us a considerable distance without requiring another halt, and you know whenever we make one some fresh danger is pretty sure to arise."

"True."

"I suppose we still keep to our intention of seeking the midland counties, and trying if we cannot make ourselves snug there for some time?"

"Oh! yes—yes."

"We are all agreed upon that, then, which is sufficient for the present."

The lane, after a few more capricious convolutions, terminated in a broad high-road.

They did not know for certain, but, from its position, they judged it to be the one leading direct to Warwick.

If this should turn out so, their future progress would be easy.

And so, without any incident worthy of recording, they travelled this road until close upon sunset.

They had passed and met many vehicles and people, and from the latter they had received a great deal of scrutiny, but they did not offer to interfere with our friends, and our friends did not offer to interfere with them.

It was, then, just as the sun was about to set, that they noticed on the road before them a tremendous cloud of dust.

"That is a stage coach, I'll be bound," said Turpin, after looking for a few moments.

"It looks like it."

"It does."

"But, Dick," said Claude.

"What?"

"You do not think of stopping it?"

"No, I cannot say that I do."

"I am glad of that."

"Why?"

"Because it appears to me our presence on this road is at present unsuspected, and such being the case"——

"You think it would be injudicious to do anything that would serve to put the grab upon our track."

"I do."

"And so do I. Nevertheless, I hope it will prove to be a stage coach."

"Why?"

"We shall then know whether we really are upon the road to Warwick. I have not much doubt upon the subject, but still I should like to feel quite sure."

"I can say nothing against that."

"Oh! no. We will ride by quietly, and then we shall create neither suspicion nor alarm."

"Good."

In accordance with this, our friends trotted quietly along.

They did not go all four in a body, but in twos.

Turpin and King first.

Claude Duval and Jack Rann a little in the rear.

The stage coach came bowling along in capital style, and in a very short time they were able to distinguish the driver and the passengers on the top.

The sun was then just setting behind a large black cloud upon the very verge of the western horizon, and his last bright red beams fell with full force upon the approaching vehicle.

It was a beautiful sight, and one that might well call forth the admiration of any one.

But, ardent and enthusiastic as our friends were over horses, it gave them especial delight.

In fact, so charmed were they, that they forgot all else, and reined in their steeds to look, shading the sun from their eyes with their hands as they did so.

The driver, seeing this, and having heard of the stoppage of the Oxford coach, felt just in the least degree apprehensive when he saw our travellers, and he drew a long breath when he found he was allowed to pass unmolested.

It was more than he anticipated.

"All right," said Dick. "That was the Warwick mail. We shall have now no further trouble about our route; all we shall have to do will be to keep straight on."

As he spoke, the sun sunk completely behind the cloud.

A sudden darkness seemed to overspread the face of nature, and a chill blast of wind made the denuded branches of the trees clash lightly against each other.

Evening deepened into night, and when the moon arose, which she did with an almost full face, our friends were a considerable distance from London.

From having met with no molestation, they began to indulge in the hope that they had got beyond the range of the dragoons.

Such being the case, it was clearly their best policy to push on as quietly as they could, taking care to do nothing calculated to call attention to their whereabouts.

While they adhered to this, their progress through the country can afford but little matter for incident.

It was, however, something past ten o'clock when, in spite of themselves, they had about the strangest adventure they had ever met with, and which, in its results, had a material effect upon their future course of action.

What that adventure was we shall now proceed to relate.

The horses having been so long upon the road without once stopping to rest, began to evince signs of weariness, and the highwaymen themselves were somewhat cramped and stiff, by remaining so long in one position.

It was, therefore, thought advisable to come to a halt for a little time.

There were no dwellings anywhere near. Nothing but wide open country.

Nor could they see in the distance anything that looked as if they were approaching a village or town.

But on either side of them were some very verdant meadows, screened from the high-road by a hedge many feet in height.

In one of these they determined to stay awhile, and perceiving a gate at their left hand, they opened it and passed through.

The meadow was one of great extent.

Getting as close to the hedge as they could, our four friends dismounted, and, holding the reins in their hands, laid down to rest awhile.

But though the hedge was high, they were fearful that their horses would be seen if they stood up as they were.

But how were they to get them to lie down?

That was a question.

In past times Dick had taught his mare, Black Bess, to lie down, and he had little fear that she would obey him now.

He resolved to try, for then, they thought, and reasonably enough, that they might induce the other three to follow her example.

Accordingly Dick rose, and patting her on the neck bade her lie down.

At the same time that he uttered this command, he pressed against her shoulder.

The gentle creature understood him, and, bending her knees, lay down upon her side.

As they expected, this being done before the other horses, they were able to make them lie down also.

While they remained in this position it was a matter of impossibility for them to be seen from the high-road by any one.

In order to keep their horses thus, they were obliged to keep hold of the reins, and lie down close beside them.

But the creatures were too tired to be restless, and they lay there cropping the short sweet grass in silence.

As the bright moon shone down upon them they looked exceedingly picturesque.

The rest did them all good. Those only who have sat for as many hours in the saddle as our friends had without alighting, can tell how fatiguing it is, and how welcome a change, no matter of what sort, always is.

Half-an-hour, perhaps, passed, and during the whole of that time they had not been disturbed by the passing of a single thing along the high-road, but now a faint sound reaches their ears, which showed them that they on that night were not alone upon the road, as they thought they were.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN ARE UNSUSPECTED WITNESSES OF AN EXTRAORDINARY INCIDENT.

"THEY are horsemen," said Claude Duval, as he raised himself upon his elbow, in order to hear more plainly.

"They are horsemen, and well mounted."

"You are right, and, not only that, they appear to be in force. I should think there must be six of them, at least."

"Listen!"

There was a silence of some minutes' duration, during which all four of the highwaymen listened eagerly and earnestly.

The sound, which had at first been so faint as scarcely to be distinguished, and so equivocal that none but the most practised ear could have told what it really was, now grew more and more distinct, until, in a short time, the peculiar clattering noise which horses' hoofs make when striking upon the hard road, was plainly heard.

"Are they our foes?" asked Tom.

"Very likely, I think," replied Turpin.

"They have got upon our track in some way or other, you may depend."

"If so, then, it is obviously our best course of action to remain where we are."

"Certainly."

"They will pass us, to be sure," said Turpin; "but then, you must recollect, we shall have the disadvantage of their being on the road before us."

"Yes, that's true enough."

"Still, better that, I think, than have them at our heels; but we are by no means certain that they are officers. It may be, they have nothing at all to do with us."

"Yes, it may be so; but it is not very likely, I think. However, we must be unanimous in one thing."

"What is that?"

"Why, that under all circumstances, the best thing we can do is to remain quite still while they pass, let them be who they may."

"Oh! yes."

"So far well, then. The horses seem quiet, and I should think we might venture to leave them, while we crawl yet closer to the hedge. The moon is shining, and we shall be able to see everything on the road as plainly as if by daylight."

"So we shall, and, by so doing, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing who they are, and whether they are in pursuit of us or not."

"Just so."

"Come on, then, and lie down. The hedge does not grow too close together for us not to be able to see through it, and, though a slight sound would not reach their ears, still it will be safest to take up our positions at once, so that, when they do reach this spot, we shall have no necessity to move in the slightest."

"There spoke Claude Duval," said Dick Turpin. "Ever cautious, never running into danger if he could possibly avoid it.

"Never mind that now, Dick. Take up your position so that you can see plainly all that passes, and we will all do the like. Quick, they will be here directly."

And, in truth, it seemed as though the little troop of horsemen was very close at hand indeed, but at present they were further off than our friends exactly imagined. The intense silence was so deceptive.

Tramp—tramp—tramp they came.

Our friends' excitement and impatience rose to its highest pitch, and they crept forward as far as they were able.

The moon was high up in the sky, and lighted up the road with great brightness.

From where they were, however, they were bound to have a capital view of whatever went by.

On they came, at the same regular, steady trot.

At last they came in sight.

They were not police-officers.

One glance was enough to assure our friends of that.

Nor were they their more dreaded foes, the light dragoons, who had kept hitherto so pertinaciously upon their track.

But, to the unbounded astonishment of the highwaymen, these men, who were well armed and mounted, pulled up exactly before the spot where they lay concealed.

It looked, indeed, just as though they knew the precise spot where they were.

But this was only fancy, and the idea was disappointed almost as soon as it had formed itself in their brains.

And now our friends, with a feeling of the greatest possible curiosity, lay profoundly still, just as they were, for, having halted, the least sound would be heard by the horsemen in the road.

For themselves they had no fear, but they could not for long be answerable for their horses.

Why the troop had halted just where they did they could not conceive, and the peculiar situation in which they were placed, made them fear that it boded no good to them.

"This place will do as well as any, I fancy," said an authoritative voice, "if you are sure he will pass here."

"We are quite sure of that."

"Then get behind the hedge and wait."

Our friends considered discovery certain, but they had sufficient discretion not to make the slightest movement.

It was very strange that these persons, whoever they might be, should think of concealing themselves where the highwaymen had.

It was one of those extraordinary coincidences that will sometimes occur.

It was a fortunate thing our friends did not move and betray their hiding-place, for it so happened that they chose the opposite side of the road, where there was a gap in the hedge.

Through this they, one after another, made their way, and, so far as the highwaymen could tell, dismounted from their steeds, and disposed themselves much in the same manner as they had done.

That they were waiting for some one, their action, and the few words they had let fall, pretty clearly evidenced; and who it was they waited for, and why they waited for him, they were full of curiosity to know.

They were each full of thought, and would have longed to have conversed, but they deemed it would be imprudent.

Those in the hedge, or, rather, behind it, no doubt were fully of opinion that they had the place all to themselves, and the chance circumstance of any one else lying in wait at the same place, never once struck them.

The result of this strange combination of incidents will be quickly apparent, for, as the highwaymen listen, they begin to hear the sounds of an approaching horseman.

On—on he came, and that at a most rattling pace. His horse, indeed, was going at full gallop.

The manner in which the hoofs struck upon the ground told them this.

It was only fair to suppose that the six men behind the opposite hedge heard the same sounds that our friends did, but there was no movement of theirs made to indicate it.

On came the horseman, and, the nearer he came, the greater grew the highwaymen's suspense.

There was a vague feeling in their minds that something terrible was going to happen, but, beyond that feeling, they had no idea that they could reduce to anything like consistency and form.

Whether the ambush boded any danger to the coming traveller they had no means of knowing, nor the special shape which the danger might assume, and, even if they had, they would not have been able to have apprized him of it.

At length he came in sight, at all events to Claude Duval, who chanced to be in such a position that he could see some distance further down the road than the others could.

By some fatality the horseman slackened his pace, and came on at a trot.

He glanced, too, uneasily from side to side, as though he had a presentiment of coming evil.

His horse was reeking with perspiration, and his mouth and chest were covered with thick white foam.

The rider was a man dressed in a semi-military costume.

All this Claude took in at a glance.

Suddenly, and just as the horseman was in front of the spot where the six men had concealed themselves, a loud voice cried out, in startling tones—

"Halt!"

Ninety-nine people in a hundred would have done as the rider did.

He stopped his steed in a moment.

But this action was all the more natural on his part, since from his occupation he was in the habit of receiving abrupt commands, and instantly obeying them.

Scarcely, however, had the echoes of the voice which had pronounced the word "Halt!" died away, and before the soldier had fairly stayed the progress of his horse, than there arose a loud and sharp explosion.

Mingled with this was a cry.

It came from the lips of the rider.

The men behind the hedge had taken up that position, then, to assassinate him, for the explosion was such as would be caused by a volley of small firearms.

A cloud of smoke hid all things from view for a moment, but, when it cleared away, the pale moonbeams discovered the rider and his steed lying in a strange confused and bleeding mass upon the road.

Our friends were horrified.

That such a cold-blooded and atrocious assassination could be planned and put into execution by Englishmen was almost more than they could believe.

But that such was so, there could now be no dispute.

Simultaneously and unanimously they sprung to their feet, and, drawing their swords, they rushed to the gate that led out into the lane.

The hedge was too thickly planted for them to force a way through it.

What might be deemed an infinitesimal portion of time sufficed for them to reach the gate.

When they entered the meadow, they had not fastened it, but merely let it swing to, which, from the way the hinges were hung, it had a tendency to do.

Dashing it open, they all four, in a compact body, rushed into the lane, and sped along it to where the unfortunate rider lay.

But they saw, ere they reached the spot, that the six assassins had crawled through the gap in the hedge, and were making for the same point.

CHAPTER CLXXX.

IN WHICH IS GIVEN SOME EXPLANATION OF THE ASSASSINATION IN THE LANE.

"FORWARD—forward, my friends!" shouted Turpin, as he perceived this circumstance. "Do not let them reach the poor fellow before we do, and thus allow them an opportunity of finishing their barbarous work."

With a rush, then, and a shout, they reached the place where the slaughtered soldier lay.

But the assassins, seeing persons approaching, did not fly, but came on as though it was fully their intention to contest what they had done.

Both parties arrived at the same moment.

Both had their swords drawn.

The assassins had the advantage in point of numbers, since there were six of them, while our friends were four.

But they had come off victorious at greater odds than those, and they felt no misgiving in attacking them, though, when they were close to them, they noticed in their foes a certain military appearance which they had not at first observed.

"Villains!" said Dick, "what is the meaning of this deed? Are we in England, that such things are suffered? Concealed behind the hedge, we have been spectators of all. Explain yourselves."

"We do not recognise your right to desire such a thing," said the man who had given the others instructions to get into ambush, and who, though there was no difference in them, might be supposed the one having the command. "We do not recognise your right. Begone, or you may get yourself into trouble."

"I say, explain yourself," said Dick, again, "or we will compel you to do so at the sword's point."

"That man is a traitor."

The one in command pointed to the ghastly, bleeding mass at his feet.

"Then, if so, why did he not receive a traitor's death?"

"He has."

"Not so. For the traitor there is the headsman's axe, and a public execution. Why was he shot down like a dog?"

"For State reasons."

"State reasons?"

"Yes; and now, knowing so much, and which I have exceeded my duty in telling you, depart."

"Never! The reasons you have given are not sufficient for us; and, look you, I stand now before his corpse, and none of you shall approach to extinguish the last spark of life that may cling to the wounded wretch, except over the dead bodies of myself and my companions."

"Treason—treason!" cried the man, "treason! These are doubtless traitors and rebels, too. Upon them! Take them prisoners! Slay them if they resist!"

With this, the six men precipitated themselves upon our friends, who met the onslaught bravely.

It would seem that these men were armed only with a sword and a short carbine. The latter had been discharged, so it would be a hand to hand contest.

A spectator would soon have seen how superior the highwaymen were in the use of the sword. They flashed their weapons round them with a rapidity which completely confused their adversaries.

Soon they had around them a circle of the dead and dying, while they, by the dexterity they parried all blows aimed at them, were unhurt.

Seeing the advantage they had gained, they pressed with still greater determination upon the assassins, over whom they felt they would obtain a speedy victory.

At length, all but two were beaten to the ground, and they, seeing the futility of longer opposing themselves to the highwaymen, threw down their swords, sank upon their knees, and sued for quarter.

This, of course, was granted to them upon the condition that they did not move in the least from where they then were.

The highwaymen were glad enough to sheathe their swords, and rest a moment to regain their breath—for the conflict, though short, had been a desperate one.

While doing so, however, they looked around them at what might, with great propriety, be called the field of battle.

Four of the assassins were stretched upon the ground, weltering in blood.

One was dead: his head had been literally split open.

Three others were so badly wounded that it was very problematical whether they would recover.

One of these was the commander.

Then turning round, they saw a still more terrible spectacle.

Mingled in one inextricable mass; bleeding—palpitating—from those places where the six bullets had entered.

The faint groans that arose, however, showed that the unhappy man who had been so treacherously slaughtered, was not dead.

The scene was a singular one.

"I say, Dick," exclaimed Claude, "this is a very singular affair, don't you think?"

"I do."

"What do you make of it?"

"Nothing."

"That is conclusive, at any rate! Can none of you make anything of it?"

The other two shook their heads,

"Can you make anything of it, Claude?" asked Dick.

"I confess I cannot. Altogether it seems quite inexplicable. Had it occurred in Italy—Rome, for instance, I could have understood it."

"Ay, so could I; but here, in England, it is a mystery."

"Let us go to the two who have asked for quarter. Surely from them we shall be able to get some information."

"You question them, Dick; and don't let us be long about it, for if any one was to come along the road, we should be in a very awkward predicament indeed."

"We should. I will question them quickly."

Followed by his three comrades, Dick Turpin drew closer to the two men, who still remained upon their knees as they had been bidden.

"Now," said Dick, sternly, "we have spared your lives when we might have taken them. For this you are compelled to do something to show your gratitude. Now tell us the meaning of all this."

"Ask us, and we will reply," said one.

"Yes, we will," said the other.

"Good, then. Tell me why you so treacherously shot down that poor soldier yonder."

"He was no soldier."

"That does not matter."

"He was a rebel!"

"A rebel?"

"Yes."

"How so? In what way was he a rebel? Against whom and what did he rebel? Where is the rebellion?"

"In Scotland, sir!"

"In Scotland?"

"Yes; the Pretender's son, assisted by the French, has landed on the northern shores of Caledonia, where it is his intention, so we hear, to raise an army, and invade England."

This was startling news to our friends.

"How long have you learned this?"

"Only to-day, when a spy brought word that a messenger from the rebel camp to some Jacobites in London, was on the road, and would pass this way."

"And so you were ordered to shoot him down in the way you did!"

"We were, and did no more than obey the orders we received."

"This is monstrous!" cried Dick; "were he ten times a rebel, he deserved better treatment than that. What end did you hope to gain by his assassination?"

"There you ask more than I can tell for certain, but I fancy they expected to find upon his person papers which would enable them to arrest the chief Jacobites in London!"

"It is a poor cause for such means to be taken, and they will never better it."

"We have nothing to do with that. A soldier's duty is merely to obey."

"Are you soldiers, then?"

"We are."

"But you wear no uniform."

"I am aware of it. We were ordered to attire ourselves as you now see us. I imagine because we should be less likely to attract attention."

"It is as foul a deed as well could be. But you have told us enough! Rise! begone! and consider yourselves well off that you have escaped with your lives!"

The two disguised soldiers did not need to be told twice that they might go. They scrambled in a moment to their feet, and set off at full speed.

"This is a most extraordinary affair altogether, but we will say no more about it until we have looked to the messenger, and as soon as we have done that we will be off!"

So saying, Dick strode to where the person in question lay.

His three friends followed him.

A little examination showed them there was no hope that they would be able to restore him to life. He still lived, it is true, but it was but the last flickering of the lamp.

Dick bent down over him.

The horse was quite dead.

He had fallen in such a manner upon his rider, that to separate them would be an impossibility without causing the poor wretch much unnecessary suffering.

"Speak!" said Dick. "If there is yet life enough in you to do so, speak! We are friends. Rest assured of that. Friends to you and to your cause!"

"Prince Charlie!" cried the dying man, in a feeble tone of voice. "Prince Charlie for ever! The papers! the papers!"

"Where are they?"

"They contain full details of the course our army is going to take, and there is a list of all persons in London who are favourable to our cause."

"But where—where are these papers?" said Dick. "Tell me where they are, and I will answer with my life that they do not fall into the hands of the Hanoverians!"

"Hurrah! for Prince Charlie!" cried the dying man, again. "He will yet be the king, and the Stuarts will be restored to their rights! That will be a bonnie time, but I shall never see it! The air grows dark—dark! Hurrah! for Prince Charlie! *Tandem triumphans. At length triumphant! I am cold! My lungs fill—fill—with blood! I—I"——

There was a gasping groan, and the spirit of the rebel fled for ever.

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

TOM KING RECALLS AN ADVENTURE TO DICK TURPIN'S MIND WHICH HE HAD FORGOTTEN.

"DEAD!" said Turpin.

"Yes, poor fellow!" replied Tom King. "He's dead enough now, and of all the shameful and disgraceful things I have ever heard of, this is the worst."

"The very worst!" said Claude Duval. "But let us be moving. I look upon it as something like a miracle that we should have had the road to ourselves so long as we have without an interruption, but we shan't much longer, for hark! I can hear a vehicle of some sort or other coming now."

The others paused at this, and after listening a moment a slight sound reached their ears, which verified what Claude had said.

"But do not let us go," said Tom King. "Whatever it may be that is coming, it is a long way off at present."

"But why should we stay?"

"Do you remember what the poor fellow said about the papers? It will not take us a moment, let us possess ourselves of them."

"Agreed!" said Turpin.

No cloud dulled the brightness of the moon, and so they were well able to see what they were about.

But the task they had set themselves was by no means an agreeable one.

When they moved the mangled remains, they perceived a kind of wallet that the messenger had carried suspended from his neck by a strap.

In this, doubtless, would be found the papers of which he had spoken.

By cutting the strap in two places they were able to get possession of this wallet.

It was of leather, and secured by a lock, which they did not attempt to try to unfasten, but Dick with his sword cut away the leather around it.

The wallet opened at once.

Their suspicions as to its contents were quite correct. It was filled with papers.

They were tied up neatly in packets.

Tom King transferred them to his coat-pocket.

"There," he said, "we can do no more good here, that that is certain, so we will be off at once."

"Quick!" said Turpin, "or you will be too late."

They all four now ran down the lane to the gate.

Opening it, they all passed through, caught their horses, and mounted in an incredibly short space of time.

They did not reach the high-road, however, one moment too soon, for the vehicle they had heard approaching was now close at hand.

Short as the rest had been, it was enough to reinvigorate the horses, and they dashed along the road at a rate that soon left all sights and sounds behind.

About five miles further on they came to a rather steep hill, so they checked their cattle while they ascended it.

* The motto upon the Pretender's Standard.

Tom King took this opportunity to speak to Turpin; he had been anxious to do so for some time.

"Dick!"

"Yes, my friend."

"What we have just heard and witnessed has very forcibly brought back to my mind an incident which had entirely slipped my memory."

"What is it?"

"Is it possible it has not reminded you of it?"

"No, I remember nothing."

"I will tell you. Do you remember our first meeting?"

"Of course I do."

"Very well. It was not far from the 'Hand and Keys,' at Hornsey, was it?"

"Tom Davis's?"

"Yes."

"No, it was not very far from there. What of it?"

"Do you recollect how your mare was in London, and how Davis went to fetch it?"

"Perfectly."

"And how we went afterwards together?"

"Yes. What then?"

"As we were going on to London, we heard a horseman approaching; we stopped him, and he drew his sword and attacked me."

"By Jove! yes. The Young Pretender."

"The what?" asked Claude and Jack, who had listened with some curiosity to the little dialogue that had taken place between Turpin and King.

They, of course, were quite in ignorance of the incident, though the reader will doubtless remember it.

Should he not, it will be necessary for him to refer to the twenty-ninth and thirtieth chapters of this history, where it is given in detail.

The adventure was related to Claude and Jack.

"So," said the latter, "you really mean to say that you chanced to meet with young Charles Edward Stuart?"

"We did."

"And you did not find him a coward?"

"Quite the reverse, as the adventure proves."

"I asked, because he has always been represented to me as a coward."

"That is his enemies. He is no more a coward than I am."

"You must know," said Dick, "that Tom is quite on the side of the Stuarts."

"I am, and though they may have had their faults and failings, yet they are, nevertheless, the rightful heirs to the throne of England."

"Ah!" said Sixteen-String Jack, "that's a matter that interests me very little. What say you, Claude?"

"The same."

"Though, of course, just looking at it, I should be more on the Young Pretender's side than I should be on a foreigner's."

"Hear! hear!" said Tom. "Spoken like an Englishman. If they had been content to elect an Englishman to the throne, all would have been well, and there would have been but little disaffection; but, for my own part, I feel it an insult to the nation to set a lot of beer-swilling, muddle-headed Germans on the throne."

"You are getting excited, Tom."

"Never mind. It is a subject upon which one may be excused for exhibiting a little feeling."

"So it is."

"I spent my youth in the north of England, almost on the border, and so it is only natural that I should have imbibed some Scotch notions."

"That immediately accounts for your predilection in favour of the Stuarts."

"In a measure it does; but now, Dick, do you remember a little circumstance in connexion with our meeting with Charles Stuart, and which we have not yet mentioned?"

"I think I do."

"You must do."

"What is it?" asked Claude Duval.

"Why, this! Dick and myself both swore that as soon as he raised his standard, or rather as soon as the news of his having done so reached us, we would hasten to place ourselves under his banner!"

"You did?"

"Certainly. Didn't we, Dick?"

"Oh! we did, there's no denying that."

"And now we have the news that he has just raised his standard."

"But," said Claude and Jack, "do you think of going?"

"Why not? You would not have us break our words."

"Well, not exactly; but a soldier's life is none so pleasant."

"Pho, pho!"

"You will find it out."

"We shall be favoured."

"Put not your trust in princes."

"Ha! ha!"

"You may laugh."

"But, seriously speaking; and I will propose it more particularly to the captain here. Under all circumstances, don't you think the best thing we can do would be to push forward to the north, and take refuge in the ranks. We shall be quite safe there."

"I, for one, should approve of such a course, not only because I have sworn to do so, but because of the safety we should obtain."

"Then, captain," said Jack and Claude, "if that is your opinion, of course we subscribe to it!"

"Not if it is at all against your inclinations, my friends. You yourselves elected me to be your captain, but it is far from my desire to control all your actions. If you would rather not accompany us upon this expeditiou, you have only to say so, and we will either separate or abandon the idea altogether."

"It appears to me, now I come to think of it," replied Sixteen-String Jack, "about as good a thing as we could do."

"Then I give in to the majority," said Claude Duval. "I should be very sorry for us to separate."

"So should we all!"

"Am I to understand, then," asked Turpin, "that in this matter we are quite of one mind?"

"Yes."

"And our plan of operations will be to make what speed we can to Scotland."

"Just so."

As these words were uttered they reached the top of the hill, and as the ascent had been a long and steep one, they paused for a little while to breathe their horses.

Before and behind them all was perfectly still.

"That must be a strange sight for any one coming upon it unawares!" said Tom.

"What?"

"The scene where the battle took place!"

"It must, indeed."

"For one thing, there is nothing to identify us with it, or such an outcry would be raised that we should never be able to evade capture, because all the fault would be sure to be laid to us."

"Undoubtedly."

"Whatever person in authority can have sanctioned the perpetration of such an act, I am at a loss to think."

"It seems incredible. Why were they not content with taking the poor man prisoner, and not shooting him down like some wild, noxious animal?"

"We shall learn nothing by thinking of it," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and when we say it is a foul and dastard deed, we say all we can."

"I am pleased," said Tom King, "that I have been able to prevent these papers, containing his future plans, from falling into the hands of his foes. Had they become possessed of them, his cause would have been overwhelmed in ruin."

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN RESOLVE TO JOIN THE ARMY OF THE YOUNG PRETENDER.

"Do you really think, Tom," asked Claude Duval, "that the young prince stands any chance of regaining the crown of his ancestors?

"I do! The best of all chances! Unless I very much mistake, as soon as the intelligence is spread that he has been proclaimed, and at the head of an army, hundreds of thousands will flock to his standard; and every day will serve to bring him fresh adherents."

"You are enthusiastic."

"Perhaps I am; but, rely upon it, I shall do all I individually can to aid him."

"We do not doubt it," said the others, laughing.

"It was the way he behaved upon the occasion of the fight I had with him that won my heart."

"He acted most gallantly, by your accounts."

"We have not exaggerated, have we, Dick?"

"Certainly not."

"Then he is one of the right sort, and I should think it would be a happy day for England when he is proclaimed her king!"

"There is this to be said," remarked Claude Duval, "we cannot well make our position worse, even if we do join the rebel ranks, as they will be called, for we have forfeited our lives already."

"Oh! drop that part of the subject."

"I was going to observe, if the young prince is defeated, we shall not lose anything; but if he gains"——

"Ay, there it is," cried Tom King, exultingly. "If he gains, we shall stand high in his esteem. He will grant us free pardons for what we have done, and place us in a position that will enable us to be gentlemen for the remainder of our lives."

"You must not forget that he will have a great many claimants upon his bounty."

"I do not; but we stand upon rather peculiar ground. He promised"——

"People in his position are always prolific in promises, and his race more particularly; but they have never been good at performing."

"Well—well, we shall see. The road is clear again, forward."

As he spoke, Tom King urged his horse to make better speed, and, the others following his example, they swept along the road at a gallop of about fifteen miles an hour.

This rate of travelling got over the ground quickly.

At last, morning broke.

The first early leaden-coloured beams of light showed them to be at the outskirts of a small town, though what it was they, of course, had no idea, for neither of them had been in that part of the country before.

Lest they should, at that early hour, attract unusual notice, they slackened speed as they passed through the High-street.

None of the places were open.

The town, which was of tolerable size, was quickly left behind, and the open country again reached.

It was now a great many hours since either of our friends had tasted food, and they began to feel the cravings of hunger.

But nowhere could they see a place where they could be satisfied.

The keen morning air served in no small degree to whet their appetites.

Therefore, they kept a sharp look-out for a roadside public-house where they could get the refreshment they needed.

The sun, however, rose, and attained a considerable elevation before they found one.

This they perceived at a great distance, for in accordance with a by no means unusual fashion, a stout post was planted in the footpath near the road, and a swinging sign suspended from it.

When they came near enough, they saw the letters on this sign were, "The Bald-Faced Stag, by James Marsh."

"This will be the place for us," cried Dick Turpin, exultingly, as he walked Black Bess to the large horse-trough attached to the sign-post.

As soon as he reached it, a man came rather leisurely from the inn-door.

"Going to bait here, gentlemen?"

"We shall stay for a little while. Have you good accommodation for man and horse?"

"Look there. Don't you see that truss of straw hanging up?"

"Yes."

"What does that mean, then?"

"Oh! I suppose it is all right. Where are the stables?"

"I'll take care of the horses, gentlemen."

"Yes, I know, but we would rather see them housed, fed, and groomed ourselves. Do you understand?"

Dick slipped a five-shilling piece in the ostler's hand, as he asked the question.

"Oh! yes, gentlemen, I quite understand. Be good enough to come this way. Just under that arch, sir, takes you to the stable yard. Mind you stoop your heads, gentlemen; you see the arch is rather low."

So saying, the ostler, who now was all obsequiousness, led the way to the stables.

According to their usual custom, then, our friends paid particular attention to the disposal of their steeds. They had too often experienced the benefit of doing so ever to neglect this precaution, although on the present occasion they might fairly have been excused if they had omitted it.

They were absolutely famishing.

And they felt pretty well certain that they were near none of their foes.

The delay, however, was but trifling, and they eat their meal in all the greater ease in consequence.

Had they been suddenly surprised, and they in ignorance of the situation of the stables, they would have been in a very awkward fix indeed.

There is nothing connected with their stoppage at this inn at all worthy of record.

Having quite satisfied their hunger, they paid their reckoning, mounted their steeds, and departed.

That they were nearly, if not quite, unknown in that part of the country was pretty clear; but for all that, they took care not to do anything calculated to draw suspicion upon them.

It is questionable whether, in the whole length and breadth of England, four blither hearts could be found than those of the highwaymen.

As they cantered along the road, no one would have thought from their manner that they were in such great peril, or that so heavy a reward was hanging over their heads.

But then a danger that would have appalled most men, would have been looked upon by them with a careless smile.

And now, while they are travelling so quietly along the road, we feel that we cannot do better than give a few words of explanation before we enter upon what is certainly the most interesting and exciting episode in the lives of these celebrated highwaymen.

Many of the readers will not require to be told who and what the Young Pretender was, but yet there may be an equal number who do not, or, at all events, have at best but a confused idea upon the subject.

To these we shall more particularly address ourselves. The others may skip the few following lines.

King James II., then, as all who are in any way conversant with English history are aware, was dethroned, or, perhaps, more correctly, was compelled to abdicate the throne, upon which Prince William of Orange, afterwards King William III., was placed in his stead.

Now, the adherents to the family of Stuart, which, perhaps, included the whole of the Scottish population, would not admit that this forcible abdication barred the right of their family to the crown, and, on the accession of King George I., this question was agitated with much warmth.

Now James Stuart, or King James II., had a son, and it was contended by the Stuart faction that this son was the true heir to the crown, while the opposite party espoused the cause of King George I.

This son of the dethroned monarch, like him, bore the Christian name of James.

By the upholders of the Stuarts he was styled King James III.

By the upholders of the Hanoverian dynasty he was styled the Pretender, and this is the name by which he is most generally known—particularly at the present day.

Now, when George I. ascended the throne, an invitation was sent to the Pretender—who had taken refuge in France—to come to Scotland, where the friends to his cause were enlisting men for his service.

This invitation he accepted. He landed in Scotland, and very soon found himself at the head of a large army, whose numbers were continually augmenting.

The consequence was the outbreak, or civil war, between the two opposing parties, known to the reader of English history as the Rebellion of 1715.

The result of this is known. After a protracted struggle the Pretender was overthrown. Many noblemen who had taken part with him were executed, and their possessions confiscated, while the unfortunate James Stuart, accompanied by the Earl of Mar, managed, under the cover of the darkness, to get on board a vessel lying off Montrose, and afterwards land in France

But, though his defeat was so complete, all hope of seeing him upon the throne was not abandoned by the Jacobites, as those persons where styled who adhered to the side of the Stuarts.

But no very active steps were taken for nearly thirty years after this event, when the son of this James Stuart, the Pretender, by name Charles Edward Stuart, was invited over to Scotland, as his father had been before him.

At this time George II. swayed the English sceptre.

And now the whole affair divided itself into two portions, or pretty nearly so. One the Catholics, the other the Protestants.

Charles Edward Stuart, like his ancestors, was of the Catholic faith.

King George II., of the Protestant persuasion.

This brief, and necessarily imperfect summary, will, we think, be sufficient to enable the reader to have a clear idea of who the Young Pretender was, and also what his pretensions were.

It will be seen they rested chiefly upon hereditary transmission.

Charles Edward Stuart, then, came over to Scotland upon the representations of those noblemen who were affected with him, and what was the ultimate result of this step, we shall, from the circumstance of the highwaymen attaching themselves to his fortunes, quickly know.

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN PERFORMS AN ACT OF CHARITY, AND THEN ONE OF RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE.

RETURNING from this digression, which succeeding events will show to be highly necessary to the proper understanding of the narrative, we will follow the fortunes of the four daring highwaymen upon the road.

They were a long way from Scotland and the Pretender's army, and they were destined to meet with some remarkable adventures before they reached either.

Mid-day saw them still upon their route, and a considerable distance from the inn where they had stopped to breakfast.

Despite the rapid approach of winter, the sun's rays, while he was passing the meridian, were very powerful, and, for the sake of their steeds, our friends were fain to go at a slower pace.

The district through which they passed was very sparsely populated, and conveyances were only now and then met with.

None of these did our friends venture to molest. They were under no pressing necessity, for the money they had in hand would serve to last them for a long time yet, and they by no means desired to be hunted through the country until they were forced into the Pretender's ranks.

For their own sakes it would look better if they came voluntarily.

It was somewhere about an hour past noon when Turpin, who was riding first, descried some object in the roadway.

In the distance he could not discern what it was.

Its appearance was something unusual, and, therefore, he slackened his pace a little, in order to enable his comrades to come up with him.

"What is it, Dick?"

"That is just what I want to know. Look yonder."

"Where?"

"On the right hand side, at some distance further on. Can you see it?"

"A mass of something?"

"Yes, that is it."

"I see it very plainly."

"And I—and I!"

"What do you make it out to be?"

"I should say a human form, only it looks too large."

"That was my first thought," said Turpin. "We cannot be too careful."

"Certainly not!" said Claude Duval.

"It may not bode any danger to us, but I have made up my mind during our journey to be on the safe side, and distrust everything which I cannot exactly make out!"

"That is the plan!" chimed in Claude Duval. "Keep to that, and we shall be right, never fear!"

"I knew such a course would meet with your full approbation, if it did no one else's. But come! Go quietly! We shall soon see what it is."

[DICK TURPIN IS SHOT BY LIEUTENANT BECKWITH.]

At a brisk walk, our friends now went along the road, their eyes all the time fixed upon the confused mass before them.

By degrees, as they grew nearer and nearer, its outlines began to grow distinguishable.

Half-sitting, half-lying upon the roadway, his back supported by the green embankment, upon the top of which the hedge was planted, was a man in the garb of a soldier.

But his uniform was torn in many places; in fact, it was nothing but mere rags and tatters.

Bending over him, and supporting his neck with her arm, was a woman.

So intent was she upon what she was about, that she did not hear the sound of the horses' hoofs, or if she did, she paid no sort of attention to it.

Upon perceiving what it was, the others would have ridden on, but Turpin, touched with the deep distress apparent in both, and curious to learn some particulars of them, came to a halt.

Being then very close, he saw that the soldier was little more than a mere youth.

His cheeks were thin and haggard.

His countenance pale, even to ghastliness.

He was in a state of utter prostration, from what cause, of course, Dick knew not.

The woman, who seemed bowed down with suffering and privation, was long past the prime of life.

Deep furrows crossed and recrossed themselves over her face, and her hair was streaked with silver.

Her apparel, too, was ragged and travel-strained; the boots, too, which, in some mysterious manner, clung to her feet, indicated that they had done much service.

A groan came occasionally from the young man's lips.

It was echoed by a sigh and a gush of tears from her who, by her age and similarity of features, was doubtless his mother.

Her whole attention was centred upon the exhausted youth.

It did not take long for Dick, with his keen eyes, to note all this.

That their suffering was genuine he had no doubts.

Open-hearted and generous, and always ready to assist the necessitous whenever he had the power, it is not to be wondered at that he addressed the poor grief-stricken woman.

He drew yet nearer to her, and then resting his hand upon his mare's croup, he turned half round in the saddle, and spoke—

"Look up, my good woman," he said. "Look up. You are in trouble! I am a friend! Can I do anything to help you, or lighten your load of misery?"

The poor woman turned round with a sob of anguish, as these words of sympathy and kindness fell upon her ears.

They were the first she had heard for a long, long weary time.

Dashing the tear-drops from her eyes, she strove to look upon the face of he who had addressed her, and, at the same time, she endeavoured to control her voice.

But a faint "God bless you, sir!" was all that she could utter.

"Calm yourself," said Dick. "My time is precious. Tell me, if I can do anything to help you; tell me whether I can relieve any part of your unhappiness. Calm yourself, and speak."

Dick Turpin spoke these words in a kind, gentle, reassuring manner.

They had their due effect, for the poor woman removed her arm from around the youth's neck, and rose to her feet. It required a great effort for her to do so.

"God bless you, sir," she said, "and thank you, for I cannot. You see that poor young man there—he is my son."

This was an announcement for which Dick was fully prepared; but, nevertheless, observing that she paused, he endeavoured to put her still more at her ease.

"He is a soldier; is he not?"

"Yes, sir, he is—or rather was."

"Is he not a soldier now?"

"No, sir."

"How is that?"

"Ah, sir, you may well ask that question. It is a black tale, but my poor boy will surely be set right at last—though I fear he will never be alive to see it. I can tell you his history in a few words, and then you will be able to tell whether you can assist me."

"I will listen with pleasure," replied Turpin, "that is, providing that you do not keep me here too long, and I trust that it will be in my power to do you a permanent benefit."

"You are very kind, sir—very kind. There are few I find who can feel for the distresses of another as you do. Would there were more like you."

"Pho, pho! don't mention that; let me hear your story."

"You shall, sir; are those friends of yours?"

She indicated the other three, who were a few yards off.

"Yes," replied Dick, "they are intimate and dear friends of mine."

"That is enough. And now, sir, I will begin, though I fear I have tired your patience already."

"No—no."

"Twelve months ago then, my poor son there took the King's shilling and enlisted. It has proved a sad thing for him."

"It seems so."

"Perhaps I ought to mention, sir, that at one time we occupied a decent position in life. But the same thing dragged me down into the depths of poverty that has dragged down others. My husband took to drinking and to gambling."

"Alas! I see the end."

"I will tell you, sir. My husband gambled till he was ruined, till there was not a fraction we could call our own, and then—then—he drank—drank himself to death!"

It was in a choking and broken voice that the wife confessed the husband's degradation.

"I struggled on as well as I was able, and managed to earn a scanty living. My son, who had never been brought up to any trade, took what he considered the only honourable course open to him—he entered the army. That, as I told you, was twelve months ago."

The poor woman paused, and wiped her eyes with her apron.

Dick found he was listening eagerly and impatiently for the continuation of her melancholy history.

"I ought to mention that from the time he was a mere child, an affection has subsisted between him and one who was the daughter of a neighbour in the time of our prosperity.

"This feeling endured through all the vicissitudes of fortune which we have known—unchanged, unabated.

"But her parents—and, as I may say, only reasonably and justly—forbade her to hold any communication with my son; but she loved him too well to obey this mandate.

"In brief, after his enlistment, and things were going on a little smoothly, she forsook her fathers's roof, and they were secretly married; a step, which, however well-advised it may sometimes seem, is invariably a forerunner of unhappiness and misfortune.

"My son, of course, enlisted as a private.

"One of the lieutenants in the regiment to which my son belonged, whose name is Beckwith, and who has risen in the world, as we have sunk down in it, for some cause or other, I know not what, took a dislike to my son.

"I could never hear the cause of this dislike, but I can more than suspect it."

"I will tell you!" said a hollow voice, and the exhausted youth endeavoured to assume an erect posture.

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN MEETS WITH A SERIOUS MISHAP THROUGH THE TREACHERY OF LIEUTENANT BECKWITH.

"I HAVE heard all that you have said," continued the exhausted youth. "Many thanks, sirs, for your kindness. I would have said as much before had I been strong enough. But now I can tell you how—how——"

Vainly did he try to rally his energies; he sank back again into his old position against the bank.

His mother was in a moment down again upon her knees, her arms encircling his neck.

He had swooned, and her agony for a minute or two was really dreadful to witness, for she thought him dead.

Slowly, however, he unclosed his eyes.

"Do not try to speak," said Dick, perceiving he was about to address him. "The effort is too much for you. I am much interested in your story. Your mother shall tell me the rest."

"Do, mother."

"I think I told you, sir, that Lieutenant Beckwith conceived an animosity against my son?"

"You did."

"Ah! sir, I don't suppose there is much need for me to tell you that when a superior officer has a grudge against one of the men under him, that that man is marked out for disgrace and punishment. It was so with my poor son."

"Curse him!" said the son, feebly, who had sufficient possession of his senses to understand the import of what was said.

"Hush, my boy! hush! Curse him not. Curse no one. Look you, sirs, in a little while, for some trifling offence, my son was sentenced to receive fifty lashes. It was not the pain he cared for, it was the degradation. Again, in a few weeks after he was well, the same thing occurred. The last time he deserted, and here you see him. It is the lacerated state of his back which makes him so powerless and unable to bear fatigue. You would not have patience to listen to all the privations we have suffered. When he came to me, and told me what he had done, I broke up my little home at once and fled with him, carrying away all that was valuable.

"What we have gone through since then no tongue can tell. The little supply of money that we had was very soon exhausted, and since then we have wandered about, subsisting upon the charity of others. Hitherto we have managed to elude those who have been sent out to apprehend him and drag him back to barracks, though how we have managed to do it is a mystery. Lieutenant Beckwith is upon his track, and I fancy will never rest until he has recaptured him."

"I am truly sorry for you," said Dick, "and I wish I was in a position to afford you permanent assistance, but that I cannot, for many reasons. However, here are a few guineas. Take them and use them to the best advantage. They will enable you to buy him new apparel; and have his hurts properly seen to. Here; take them!"

As he spoke, Dick drew from his pocket a handful of guineas, and dropped them into the poor woman's apron.

Then, not wishing to receive the united thanks of the mother and the son, he made a sign to his companions and rode away.

During the brief conference which had taken place, his three comrades had stood around him in a circle a little distance off, yet not far enough to be out of earshot.

"What do you think of that little episode of military life, my friends?" asked Dick; for they were not going fast enough to make conversation difficult.

"Unfortunately," said Claude Duval, "it is only too commonly the case. That poor fellow is the type of thousands. In the army, if a superior officer takes a dislike to one beneath him, and if a revengeful disposition, it is a case. The best thing the fellow can do will be to blow his brains out at once."

"You seem to know a little of military matters, Claude," said Turpin. "I have never heard your history, except in a fragmental fashion; but I should uncommonly like to do so."

"I am yours to command, captain, and when we have an opportunity of sitting down quietly together, I shall have great pleasure in relating it."

"Agreed; I shall call upon you to fulfil your promise; but you did not reply to my question."

"As to being in the army?"

"Yes."

"Well, I have, though it is a good many years ago now. When you hear my history you will know all about it. Ah! look! here! who's coming?"

Upon this the others looked along the road, and there they saw approaching them a man on horseback.

He was magnificently mounted.

As the sun shone upon his attire, it showed by glittering here and there, that he wore some kind of uniform.

He was coming at a gentle trot, and looking carefully around him, as though in quest of something.

On getting closer our friends perceived by his dress that he was a lieutenant in the army.

It is astonishing how ideas, or notions rather, will spring up into the mind, and remain there with the full force of conviction.

No sooner did Dick perceive this traveller than he immediately connected him with the story he had heard.

In fine, he made up his mind he was the evil genius who had haunted the poor soldier's life, and driven him to desertion—Lieutenant Beckwith.

"Hold back, my friends," he said, "and allow me to ride forward and meet this man, myself."

"But why?"

"Oh! never mind. I wish to see whether a suspicion I have formed will be confirmed."

As he spoke, Dick gave Bess the rein, and soon shot ahead of his companions.

The lieutenant, upon hearing the rapid beat of horses' hoofs approaching him, looked up and perceived Turpin.

Somewhat to the surprise of the latter, the lieutenant quickened the speed of his horse, and hastened towards him.

"Good day!" he said. "May I trouble you a moment?"

Dick, of course, came to a halt.

"Have you come far along this road?"

"Yes; a considerable distance."

"Indeed, then perhaps you will tell me whether you have met with an old woman and her son. The latter in the uniform of the regiment, from which he has deserted. I received intelligence, less than an hour ago, that they were somewhere upon the road. Have you seen them? If so, let me know when, for, I need scarcely tell you, I am empowered to arrest him. Have you seen any one answering this description?"

"Yes, I have." replied Turpin, quietly.

"Where? Let me know where, or the villain may again escape."

"You are the villain."

"Sir?"

"I say, you are the villain."

"You shall retract that word."

"Never! That is, if you are the individual I take you to be."

"My name is Beckwith. Lieutenant Beckwith."

"I thought as much, and, being so, I say you are a villain. I have seen the poor fellow of whom you are in pursuit, and from his mother's lips have heard his history."

The lieutenant's face became livid with rage.

"I will let you know, sir, that a soldier is not to be insulted with impunity. But I know you not. Who are you?"

"That can matter little; I know you."

"But you may be a robber, and under such belief I act as I now do."

During the time he was speaking, the lieutenant had held his hand in the pocket of his coat.

Dick had his eye upon him.

As soon as he uttered these last words, he drew, with inconceivable rapidity, a pistol, and, aiming hastily, fired.

Prepared as he, to some extent, was for this treacherous assault, Dick was not able to draw back quick enough to wholly escape the shot.

He felt that he was hit, and no sooner did he have this consciousness than he staggered and fell off his mare.

Well it was for him that he rode so docile an animal, or his life would assuredly have been forfeit.

As it was, however, Black Bess stood perfectly still, and he sustained no further injury than in coming in contact with the ground.

But the report of the pistol rang out loudly and distinctly, and reached the ears of his three friends, who at once galloped forward to his assistance.

Lieutenant Beckwith, who, by this act, showed that he was dead to all feelings of honour and fair play, would have subjected Dick to still further ill-usage, had it not been for his three comrades.

When he saw them rushing towards him with swords drawn, and cries of menace on their lips, a new phase in the lieutenant's mental composition showed itself.

That was cowardice.

But the reader will hardly feel surprised to hear that such a man was a coward; it would have been strange had he not been.

He immediately turned and fled.

"After him, Claude! After him, Jack!" cried Tom King. "Do not lose sight of him. Capture and punish him. I will stay here and look to Dick, whose condition, I hope, is not so bad as it appears."

There was no time to hesitate, so Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack spurred their horses forward, and gave chase, while Tom King, throwing himself off his horse, rather than alighting from it, hastened to ascertain the extent of his friend's injuries.

And, in sooth, they seemed to be great indeed, for Dick lay at full length, without the least signs of life or motion, while blood flowed in great quantities from a ghastly-looking wound in his head.

Black Bess was standing near him, her head bent down towards his face. She could tell something was amiss, and knew not what.

She trembled all over with intense terror.

CHAPTER CLXXXV.

DICK TURPIN RECOVERS SLIGHTLY FROM HIS WOUND, AND TREATS HIS ENEMY MUCH BETTER THAN HE DESERVES.

"WOA, Bess, lass," said Tom King, for he feared she might be startled and run away. "Woa, Bess, lass. Gently, gently! All's well, I daresay. There now, mare—quiet, quiet."

He patted her, at first gently, then firmly, upon the neck as he spoke.

This soothed her.

But, in order to prevent accidents, he kept a firm hold of her bridle while he bent down over his friend.

"Dick—Dick, old boy! Are you too bad to speak? Dick! Dick!"

But the highwayman paid no heed to his words. He might as well have addressed himself to a block of inanimate matter.

Tom now began to grow seriously alarmed. The wound, he feared, was a more serious one than he had at first imagined.

He was in great perplexity what to do.

He wanted water, but there was none at hand, and he did not like the idea of leaving him in his defenceless condition upon the roadway while he sought for some.

Taking a handkerchief from his pocket, he proceeded to wipe away the blood, in order to ascertain, if possible, the extent of the injury he had received.

The result was rather reassuring.

The bullet had struck his head a little behind his left temple, but it had not broken the bone.

It left a very ugly furrow, though, along the side of his skull, leaving, in a place or two, the bone completely bare.

From this the blood came at an alarming rate, so fast, indeed, that Tom began to grow apprehensive that he would bleed to death.

He listened in vain for the sounds that would indicate the return of his companions.

All around was still—still as the bleeding form by the side of which he knelt.

It was not, perhaps, until that moment that Tom King really felt how much attached he had grown to Turpin, but the prospect of for ever parting with him served to show how dear a place he occupied in his heart.

He would have given anything to restore him to life and health and strength, even as he had been only a few minutes before his meeting with the treacherous officer.

The time seemed very long to Tom. Each second was prolonged into a minute, each minute into an hour.

At last, however, the welcome tramp—tramp of horses' hoofs—reached his ears.

Now, he trusted, all would be well.

He rose to his feet, and, standing in the middle of the road, looked down it, anxious to catch the very first glimpse of them he could.

On they came at a rapid rate, for they were very uneasy about the condition of their captain.

Tom saw three horsemen coming, and he knew then that they had been successful in their chase.

They had Lieutenant Beckwith prisoner.

A few minutes brought them to where Tom stood.

The officers hands were bound tightly behind him. Claude Duval had his rein; Sixteen-String Jack held him by the collar.

"How is Dick?" was the question that came simultaneously from their lips. "He is not much hurt, I hope!"

"I fear he is."

"Woe be to the villain, then, who injured him!"

"He is quite insensible! I cannot rally him! And he bleeds profusely!"

"You want some water. Ride back, Jack, and fetch a hatful from the brook that crosses the road a little lower down."

"All right, but mind you keep hold of our prisoner!"

"Trust me for that!"

Sixteen-String Jack released his grasp, and galloped back, until he came to a brook or mimic river that flowed completely across the road.

Here he filled his hat, and, as it was steeple-crowned in shape, it held a tolerable quantity of the pure fluid.

Hastening back as quickly as he could, he found Claude in the meantime had adopted rather ingenious means of securing their captive.

His arms having already been tied behind him, he had made him alight from the horse. Then unbuckling the stirrup leather, he passed it between his arms and his back, and then buckled it again, thus binding him to the saddle.

The reins Claude had tied to the stout projecting arm of a tree

This having been done, he was able to make a closer personal inspection of Turpin's hurt.

He was thus engaged when Jack returned.

The first thing done with the water was to sprinkle a little of it on Dick's countenance, and endeavour to bring him back to life.

This it succeeding in doing. He gave a shuddering sort of sigh, and then opened his eyes.

He looked about him with a bewildered air, being at first quite unable to comprehend what had happened.

But seeing the familiar faces of his three friends bending over him what little amount of uneasiness he may have at first felt was dissipated.

"Lie still a minute or two, Dick," said Claude, seeing that Turpin was about to rise. "Lie still a moment; you have been hit, wounded. Let us dress your wound first, and wash away the blood that has clotted round it."

To this Dick offered no opposition, so with the handkerchief that he had previously used, steeped in the cold water, he proceeded to bathe it.

When the blood was completely washed away, the wound looked nothing like so serious as it had done before.

In those days it was the fashion to wear neck-clothes of white cambric, of a very voluminous description. They were folded several times, passed twice round the throat, and had ends hanging down almost to the waist

Tom took off his own, and thoroughly soaked it in water.

Then he placed it round Dick's head, tying it as tightly as he was able behind.

"Better!" said Turpin, as soon as this was done. "Much better! Until you tied that knot, I felt as though my head was falling to pieces; but it is all right now—quite right!"

"Do you think you could keep your feet, if we assisted you to rise?"

"Oh! yes; with all the ease in the world."

Upon this assurance, they lifted him up as carefully and tenderly as they could.

But when he was in an erect position, Dick felt the full extent of his weakness, and, had they not held him firmly up, he would have fallen to the ground.

By an effort, not to allow himself to be overcome, he recovered himself.

"Where is Bess?" he cried.

"Here!"

"Help me to mount her! Once in the saddle, and bestriding her back, I shall feel that I am safe. Where is the villain who fired so treacherously upon me?"

"Close at hand; but do not trouble yourself about him. Leave us to deal with him."

"No—no!" said Turpin. "Oh! for a draught of water—I parch."

"One moment," said Jack, "and I will fetch you some, though I have nothing better than my hat to bring it in."

"That will make an awkward drinking cup! I think the best way will be for Dick to mount, and ride to the place—it is not far off."

"Yes—yes! Believe me, I get stronger and better each moment, and some water will put me quite right."

"I will go with you, then," said Sixteen-String Jack, "as I know the place, and the others can keep guard over the prisoner."

This was assented to.

The brook was soon reached, and here Jack assisted Turpin to dismount.

Then the latter, lying at full length upon the road, put his lips to the surface of the water and drank heartily.

When he had quite assuaged his thirst, Jack persuaded him to remain where he was for a little time, while he poured water over him.

This he did by filling his hat, and then holding it above Dick's head emptied it.

The fresh, cool water was very refreshing and grateful to Dick's wound. It allayed the irritation.

Ten minutes of this treatment made a wonderful difference to Dick's feelings.

He rose to his feet a new man.

No longer did he require assistance to mount. He seated himself in the saddle without difficulty.

Then turning her head, he directed Black Bess towards where the others stood.

Well pleased, indeed, were they to see him looking so much better.

But there was an expression of stern ferocity upon his face which none of them had ever seen before, and which boded no good to Lieutenant Beckwith.

A clear recollection of all that had taken place came back to them.

And certainly, if anything more than another was calculated to raise a feeling of exasperation in the breast of any one, the treacherous attack which had been made was well qualified to produce that effect.

Dick Turpin was a good-tempered enough sort of fellow, but he could not put up with such a thing as that, nor allow it to go unresented.

"Well, Dick?" they said.

"Yes, I am well," he replied. "But where is the traitorous wretch who attempted my life?"

"Calm yourself, he is here. Take my advice, do not get excited, or the consequences may be more serious than you imagine."

"I shall keep cool, never fear."

As he spoke, Dick guided Black Bess past Tom and Claude, who had purposely interposed themselves between him and the lieutenant.

But they saw how determined Dick was, and they judged it would be more harmful to thwart him than it would be to let him have his own way.

"Dastard! villain!" he said. "You fully deserve instant death at my hands; but I will be more magnanimous than you could ever think of being. You have had your shot at me; it is now my turn to have my shot against you. But I will not take your life, like an executioner. I will give you a chance, and put you on a better footing than I am sure you can deserve."

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

THE END OF LIEUTENANT BECKWITH.—THE ARRIVAL AT THE "OLD WHITE LION INN."

"MERCY! have mercy!" cried Lieutenant Beckwith, as he heard Dick speak, and saw the stern look upon his features. "Spare me, and I will promise not to molest"——

"Silence!" said Dick; "do not make me think more contemptuously of you than I do already."

"What do you intend to do, Dick?" asked Tom, hastening to his side. "You are exciting yourself. Pray be calm, and tell us what you intend to do."

"I will; I intend to give him back shot for shot. Release him, but take care that he does not escape. Give him a loaded pistol, and I will take one too. You can serve as umpires to see fair play between us. Come, make haste, we have no time to lose."

"No," said the lieutenant, in a different tone of voice to that in which he had previously spoken, "no, we have no time to lose. I will consent to what he asks, although I know him not."

This sudden alteration in his manner may seem strange, but it can be easily accounted for.

Licutenant Beckwith was an accomplished duellist.

He had conceived a sudden and rancorous animosity against Dick.

To have slain him or put him to great torture would have given him the utmost pleasure.

So when he found by the words he had spoken to his companions, that he was going to allow a duel to take place, he felt bold and elated, for so great was his skill in the use of a pistol, that he was confident of obtaining a victory over his opponent.

Dick's comrades saw, by the fixed and determined ez-expression of his countenance, that it would be mere folly to attempt to dissuade him from fighting the duel, though they saw how perilous it was.

They could only hope for the best.

The officer was released from his bonds.

Jack was on the look out to see that he did not escape; but their late prisoner did not make the attempt.

He was going to face the matter out, and that with as much valour as he could muster.

But his face was deathly pale, and his eyes looked fixed and stony.

Turpin dismounted.

He took from the holster of his saddle a pistol.

That it was well and carefully loaded he knew, and he threw up the pan in order to see that the priming was all right.

It had caked slightly, so he handed it to Tom, who primed it afresh.

Then a pistol was placed in the hands of the lieutenant, and the two combatants got ready for fight.

They stood facing each other at about eighty feet distance.

The agreed upon signal was the pronounciation by Claude of the words one, two, and three.

He was to hold a handkerchief in his hand, and as he said three, he was to let it fall, the adversaries keeping their eye upon it.

Claude began.

"One!"

"Two!"

But before the three fairly came from his lips there was the report of a pistol.

The officer had fired.

Fired before his time, hoping by so doing to slay his opponent.

But the word was on Claude's lips, and he uttered it, letting fall the handkerchief as arranged.

Apparently, with the utmost calmness, and yet with the utmost rapidity, Dick raised his arm, pulled the trigger, and fired.

The echoes of the sharp report mingled strangely with a horible death-cry, and then all was still.

Lieutenant Beckwith fell to the ground.

Our three friends rushed forward to Turpin.

He was erect, and apparently unhurt.

"All is well, I fancy," he said; "the traitor did not succeed. It was a close touch, though, as you may guess. Look!"

Dick moved the collar of his coat, and showed that it was perforated by a bullet, which had left a track of its progress on the skin upon the side of his neck.

"Close enough!"

"Is the rascal dead?"

"I think so; but, Dick, you look very—very pale. I fear this matter, take it altogether, will be too much for you."

It was Tom King who spoke.

"No—no!" he said; "let us ascertain what sort of a condition he is in, and then we will push forward upon our road."

Dick went towards his foe as he spoke, and the others noticed with alarm how unsteadily he walked.

The lieutenant lay quite still.

He had fallen forward upon his face.

It was Jack who, stooping down, turned him over on his back, and said—

"He is dead!"

"Are you sure?"

"Quite! Your bullet has passed completely through his brain!"

"And so may all treacherous villains, as he was, meet with their reward!" cried Dick. "Draw him to the side of the road, and then let us be off. The sooner we remove ourselves now from this part of the country the better."

It cost Dick a great effort to carry things off with a high hand in the way he did.

The wound in his head was one beneath which most persons would have succumbed.

The other three highwaymen could say nothing against leaving that spot with all speed. It was evidently the best thing they could do.

Accordingly they set off at a gentle gallop.

In aftes times, Dick often wondered how that gallop was performed, and by what mysterious means he retained his seat in the saddle.

But little was said.

Dick was silent, because he felt he had scarcely strength enough to speak.

His comrades were silent, because they did not want to tempt him to join in the conversation.

They saw what a bad state he was in.

Each of them, full of apprehension for his ultimate safety, and cursing in their hearts the unfortunate meeting with the deserter, looked carefully after him, and were in readiness to afford him assistance, the very moment that he needed it.

In this way they proceeded for a long, long time.

It was their intention to put up for the night at the first roadside public-house they came to, and chance the consequences.

The day now began to draw rapidly to a close; but as yet they had not been successful in meeting with what they desired.

Swaying about in the saddle, and keeping up with very great difficulty, Dick Turpin endeavoured to hide, as much as possible, the dreadful pain that he had endured.

The wound in his head was but a flesh one, though of a very disagreeable and dangerous character; but it had bled freely, and to this circumstance he unquestionably, upon that occasion, owed his life.

Then the manner in which his head had been dressed, though simple in the extreme, yet was the one best calculated to drive away all inflammation and irritation.

But it was the after-part that the three friends dreaded: not only would Dick be in danger, but it would delay them upon their route, and allow their descriptions to get before them.

If this should happen, the remainder of their journey would be performed with great peril.

This risk, however, they would have to run, for that Dick could be expected to hold out much longer, was out of all question.

Deeper and deeper grew the shades of evening.

Nothing occurred to vary the dull monotony of their route.

At length, and when it had grown quite dark, they perceived in the distance a faint star-like, stationary light.

This seemed to indicate that at last they were close at hand to what they had for so long been on the look out for.

They were impatient to ascertain this, and one and all urged his horse to quicker motion in order to ascertain.

Yes! they had reached a house of entertainment at last. The light which they had seen was a candle, placed behind a small window in the gable end of the roof.

The clatter of the horses' hoofs as they stopped in front of the inn, reached the ears of those within, and two persons hastened to the door-step.

These beings were the landlord and the ostler, respectively.

Tom King took upon himself to be spokesman; so riding forward a pace or two in advance of the rest, he said—

"Can you give us and our horses accommodation here for the night, landlord? One of us has been slightly wounded in an attack made upon us by some robbers a few miles from here, and he stands very much in need of rest and refreshment."

"Of course—of course, gentlemen. Walk in—walk in! Simeon, take the gentlemen's horses, and assist them to alight. This way, if you please, this way."

The landlord, who was an active, dapper little man, led the way into the interior of the inn.

All followed him, with the exception of Claude, who went to see where the horses were placed.

The "Old White Lion"—for such was the name of the inn—was a quiet public-house in a very lonely, sparsely populated place, and doing but little business; so it is not to be wondered at that four guests coming all at one time, and wanting accommodation for the night for themselves and horses, should create some slight commotion, and induce the utmost willingness to attend to all their wants.

The ghastly pallor of Dick's face, which, by the ruddy firelight, was all the more perceptible, called forth a great deal of remark, for the landlord was rather inclined to be loquacious.

Not to linger too long over trivial details, when we have so much pressing upon us of the utmost and stirring importance to relate, let it suffice to say that, after a tolerable meal, of which, however, Dick partook sparingly, our friends were shown to a large room at the top of the house, where all four could sleep.

Here the bandage that enveloped Dick's head was resoaked with water, which was about all that could be done.

By mutual consent they postponed all conversation as to what should be their next proceedings, until tomorrow, by which time they hoped Dick would be tolerably well.

He either would be in a fair state of recovery, or else in a high fever, so the morning was looked forward to with much anxiety.

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

THE LANDLORD OF THE "OLD WHITE LION" MAKES A DESPERATE ATTACK UPON OUR FRIENDS.

MANY hours had not passed away when the slumber of our friends was broken by the shrill blast of a horn.

It was profoundly dark, and they rose at first without knowing what it was that had awoke them.

Before, however, they could ask themselves, they heard the sound again.

"What's that?"

Such was the question that rose simultaneously to the lips of the highwaymen.

And now, as their eyes got familiar with the darkness, they were able to see the windows in the room, of which there were two, and situated opposite to each other.

After asking the question, their next impulse was to crawl to the window, and look out.

They could not see very distinctly through the little panes of green bottle-glass, so they quietly opened one-half of the latticed casement.

The moment they did this, a rush of cold air filled filled the chamber, chilling them to the bone.

But they heard something which made them pass over this circumstance unheeded.

It was the low, rumbling sound of some vehicle upon the road.

"The coach," said Claude, with a disappointed air.

"What coach?" asked Turpin, whose brains were not in the clearest state.

"The Warwick coach, I fancy."

"Stand and deliver! Tom"——

"Hush, Dick! listen."

The rumbling, grating, and grinding of the wheels now grew much plainer, and again the horn sounded, with a shrillness sufficient to have awakened the soundest sleeper.

Some undefined feeling of curiosity made the four highwaymen linger near the window, and listen to what took place upon the arrival of the coach—for such they took it to be, and, considering the experience they had had in distinguishing the sounds of different vehicles, they were pretty certain to be right.

They were in this instance, for, in a few minutes, the coach stopped before the inn door.

Having the window open, they were able to see down into the front of the inn, where a scene of great animation took place.

The "Old White Lion," it seemed, was a place where the horses were changed.

There was a great deal of bustle and talking, and the busiest in making both was the landlord.

Our friends looked down with considerable interest.

The operation of changing was soon over, but just before it was, the guard drew the landlord aside.

"Here's a parcel of bills for you," he said. "I had a lot given me when I started from London, with instructions to leave a packet at every place I stopped."

"What bills are they?"

"You must read and see. They offer two thousand five hundred pounds reward for the apprehension and conviction of those four notorious highwaymen, Richard Turpin, Thomas King, Claude Duval, and John Rann, otherwise known as Sixteen-String Jack!"

"Lor!"

"They are known to be somewhere on this road. They have been traced to it, so I would advise you to keep your weather eye open. Such a sum as that isn't seen every day, and, when it is, isn't to be sneezed at."

"By no means! I'm much obliged to you."

"Read the bills attentively, old fellow, and pay particular attention to the descriptions. They are cunning foxes, and just beware whenever you see four chaps together on horseback."

"Four chaps"——

"On horseback. I say, look sharp, for, ten to one, they are the individuals."

"Oh! ah! I shouldn't wonder"—who, on the surprise of the moment was about to let out that he had four gentlemen in his house at that moment.

But the dread of having to share the reward, when, he considered, if he only managed properly, he could have it all to himself, and the credit of the capture besides, he became silent, and stopped himself in the middle of his speech.

The guard did not notice it, but, just at that moment, the coach began to move, so he was obliged to run and scramble up into his seat as well as he was able.

The coach, which was on the way from London to Warwick, disappeared in the darkness of the night.

They heard the landlord enter the inn and shut the door.

"What do you think of that, my friends," asked Dick, in his natural tones. The new peril with which they were menaced, seemed to have the effect of dispersing the mists of delirium that hung about his brain.

"I think it is high time we were off," said Tom King. "This is certainly no longer any place for us, but I am rejoiced to find that you have so far recovered from the effects of your wound."

"Thanks. Yes, I feel all right now. When I say all right, I mean excepting the disagreeable pain there is all along one side of my head."

"I am glad it is no worse. I was sadly afraid," said Claude. "It was a close touch."

"Rather too close to be pleasant; but do not let us stop to speak about that now; we have other matters of greater moment to take into immediate consideration.

"We have, indeed; and the first one, I consider, will be to see in what way we can best leave this house, so that our departure may be neither seen nor heard."

"There is no doubt about that."

"It will not do to attempt to get out by descending the stairs. The inmates are astir. Perhaps, by this time, they have read the bills and recognise us."

"I think that's extremely likely."

"How are we to leave, then?"

"The window?"

"Too high. We have no rope, and there are no buildings to break the descent."

"But here is another window opposite, and consequently, as I take it, at the back of the house. We have not looked at that yet. Perhaps we may be able to get out through it."

"This was probable enough; and, feeling that the sooner they got out of the "Old White Lion" the better it would be for them, they hastened to the back window.

Exclamations of gratification rose to their lips when they saw that immediately below it was a slanting roof, down which they could proceed without much difficulty, and thence drop to the ground.

"Capital," said Dick. "Let us be off at once. Claude, you know where to find the horses."

"Yes, but you must not think of going first. As I consider I know the way best, and as you are not so well as you might be, you ought to give way in a moment."

"And so I do," said Dick, as he drew back.

With a little trouble, Claude managed to squeeze his bulky frame through the window.

He reached the tiles in safety.

"Come on," he said.

"No," replied Turpin, in a whisper. "You go first, we will follow. Ten to one if the roof will bear our united weights, whereas it might do singly. Make your way to the stable and get the horses ready."

Claude was well-pleased to find Dick again assuming the command, and he would not have thwarted him upon any account.

So he slipped down the tiles and disappeared in a moment.

Tom King went next, then Turpin followed, and at last Sixteen-String Jack brought up the rear.

They all dropped to the ground in perfect safety, and so far as they could tell at present, without creating the least alarm.

The night was a very dark one, and they were fearful to move at first, lest they should stray to some place, and be discovered.

"Hist! Claude!" they cried, but to no effect. Claude appeared to be out of earshot.

Impatiently, then anxiously, they waited there, for him to make his appearance.

But as no signs of his doing so manifested themselves, Sixteen-String Jack ventured to go alone to seek him, bidding the other two on no account to move from where they then stood, or he might not be able to find them in a hurry, when every second would be of the utmost importance.

And now we will proceed to relate how it was that Claude was so long away.

On going to the stables with the ostler, he had given particular instructions where the saddles was to be placed, and saw it hung up in one part of the stable, where hooks were driven into the wall for the purpose.

But, to his consternation, when he came now to find them the wall was bare, the hooks empty.

A cold perspiration broke out over him at the thought that it was suspected who they were, and that the saddles had been removed on purpose to prevent their departure.

To quite satisfy himself upon that point, he took out a phosphorous match and a small piece of wax-taper, which he ignited.

These means of procuring a light he always took care to have about him.

It is a pity he did not adopt this course earlier. If he had, it would have saved him much time, and still more uneasiness.

By the aid of the tiny flame, he found he had made a mistake, and gone to the wrong side of the wall.

With an exclamation at his own folly, he stuck the end of the wax-taper upon one of the stalls, and going to the saddles, placed them as rapidly as he could upon the horses.

He had nearly finished, when he heard a footstep, and some one call him by his name in a suppressed tone of voice.

It was Sixteen-String Jack, who, entering, assisted him to complete his task.

Then each of them taking a horse by the bridle, they led them as quietly as they could across the yard to where Turpin and King were standing.

But, let them go as quietly as they could, they could not avoid their making a slight noise.

This noise, too, was heard by the landlord and others, who were in the house, for a door was thrown open violently.

A beam of light from the passage came into the yard.

It showed the landlord the forms of his suspicious guests, with their four horses.

"Murder!" he cried. "They're off! Stop them! Fire! Where's my blunderbuss? Quick—quick! that's it! I see them! Just mounting! Take that, you wretches, and I hope it will do you good!"

As he uttered these words, the landlord pulled the trigger of large blunderbuss that had been handed to him.

There was a blinding flash of light, a loud report, and a cloud of missiles hurled above and around the highwaymen and their steeds.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN FIND THE JOURNEY TO THE NORTH A VERY DANGEROUS ONE.

The recoil of the cumbersome weapon was so great that the landlord fell backwards into the passage after firing it, and his head went such a bang against the stone flags, that it was quite awful to hear it.

By great good luck, however, neither of our friends were in the least injured by the discharge.

Mounting their steeds, and led by Claude, who had taken care to familiarize himself with the locality, they dashed into the high-road, and once more were quickly on their way to the north.

In the eastern sky there was just the least flush of light that served to show darkness and night were about to be superseded by day and light.

"Take it all through," said Claude, "during the last twelve hours, I think circumstances have turned out as vexatious as they well could."

"They have, it is true, but we must not always expect to be as fortunate as we have generally been."

"No, no; but it's all through that confounded Lieutenant Beckwith."

"Ah! he's dead now. Let him rest."

"It strikes me we have by no means heard the last of that affair. It has brought us into trouble enough already, but it will bring us into more."

"Well, it is very certain if it had not been for him we should have been on the road in advance of the stage-coach, and then it would not have mattered how much disturbance was made."

"It will make matters awkward now."

"Very awkward."

"We shall be obliged to avoid all large towns, I expect. We must look out, too, very carefully, that we are not known. I hoped the remainder of our journey would be pleasant, but there looks to me to be a strong probability of our being hunted into the Pretender's ranks."

"Hold!" said Tom King. "I must take exception to that word. It savours of Jacobinism. He is no pretender, but a Stuart, and consequently lawful heir to the English throne."

"Well, Tom, well be careful not to offend in future."

"Let us turn to another subject, Dick."

"Yes, my friend."

"Do not misrepresent the case, but tell us truly. What do you imagine to be the state of your wound."

"It is very bad."

"I feared as much."

"And yet, perhaps, not so bad as you might think. It is very painful."

"You must expect that."

"It was a providential circumstance that I escaped so well as I did. Have you ever heard of a more treacherous action?"

"Never."

"While I was speaking, though, I noticed his hand in his coat pocket, and was on my guard, but he whipped out the pistol and fired it in a smaller space of time than I could have believed possible, and I only had time to make just the movement I did."

"And which most unquestionably saved your life."

"I acted fairly by him."

"You did, Dick, a great deal too fair, and I should never have suffered you to stand up against him, only I was fearful that by thwarting you I should cause too great a flow of blood to your head, which might have brought on a brain fever."

"All is well."

"Not altogether. Just think what a commotion the deeds we have done during our journey will cause. We shall never hear the last of them."

"I think every day serves to show us the absolute importance of taking our way to Prince Charles's camp, and as his followers we may yet win distinction and renown."

Claude shook his Lead.

"I have thought the matter very carefully over," he said, "and the result of my deliberations is this: I think he stands a very poor chance indeed of being King of England."

"Do you?"

"I do, indeed; and I think if you will only perpend the matter, you will come to the same conclusion."

"It is a matter hardly worth the discussing now, we have so many things on hand," said Turpin. "There is the Warwick coach."

"Well?"

"It cannot surely, in this short time, have so much got the start of us that we shall be unable to overtake it."

"No, no."

"Let us do so, then."

"But for what purpose?"

"Merely to pass it, because if we can do so we shall be out of all the trouble we shall be sure to get into if it is before us."

"So we shall."

"Black Bess is pretty fresh, considering the number of miles she has travelled. How do you find your cattle?"

"Equal to a good gallop of two or three miles."

"Forward, then. But hark, what is that behind us?"

A confused noise from their rear, as though a number of persons were not far off, reached their ears.

They turned instantly to see what it was.

To their surprise, a multitude of persons, armed with every imaginable weapon at all practicable for defence, some mounted on horses, others on foot, were, with fierce gesticulations, hurrying towards them.

"We may thank the landlord for that," said Turpin; "but we can afford to laugh at such a pursuit. Forward! forward!"

In obedience to these words from their leader, our three friends gave their horses a sudden impulse forward.

A loud shout—it appeared to them one of derision—came from their pursuers.

What it could mean they knew not.

It seemed silly.

And yet Dick felt a vague uneasiness creep over him.

He feared something was wrong.

Oh! could he but have seen what took place in the stable a little before Claude reached it, his heart would indeed have sunk within him, and he would have been ready to give up everything as lost.

But if he was in ignorance, the reader must not remain so, and, therefore, we return to the scene which took place upon the arrival of the Warwick mail.

There was one other person besides the landlord who heard what the guard said about the highwaymen, and the colossal reward offered for their apprehension.

There was one who was struck with the coincidence of four persons arriving there, who tallied in general description with the highwaymen.

Now, it so happened that a slight disagreement had taken place between the landlord and this ostler the day before, about a rise in his wages, which he wanted, and which his master refused to give.

Since then they had not been on such good terms as they had been formerly, or the landlord would have been the first person he would have applied to in the matter.

As it was, he determined to take the case more into his own hands, and he set off to alarm some of the villagers.

But it occurred to him that the highwaymen might take the alarm while he was absent, and be flown by the time he returned, so he thought, to prevent all accidents, he would prevent them from going far.

With this end in view, then, he ran into the stables, and, with a piece of iron used to clear obstructions out of the foot, contrived to loosen one hind shoe on the hoof of each horse, leaving it apparently secure, but yet held only, and that frailly, by two nails.

This done, he darted off, and he had scarcely got clear of the premises, than Claude entered the stable.

Not suspecting for a moment that the horses had been tampered with, we have seen how Claude led them out—how his comrades and himself mounted them, and how they reached the high-road in safety.

While they went a tolerably steady pace, the shoes kept on, but directly they set them to a gallop, off they came, one after another.

That was why those in pursuit set up the cry of derision, which had made Dick uneasy, he did not know wherefore nor at what.

They were not long, however, before they discovered what was the matter.

The discovery came upon them like a clap of thunder.

What to do, or how to act, they knew not.

To turn and fight with their pursuers, although they might in the end prove victorious, yet perhaps it would be at the sacrifice of the lives of one or more of them.

To go on would only be to lame their horses, and render them incapable of doing them service.

Truly, were they on the horns of a dilemma.

Moreover, despite the akwardness of their position, they had but little time for reflection. Whatever course of action they might resolve to adopt, must, to be of any good at all, be adopted speedily.

And now, as if to add to their perplexities, they heard several horsemen on the road, approaching them.

They would be hemmed in between the two, for, of course, the new comers would see that something out of the usual way was taking place, and would lend their assistance to intercept them.

"We are in a dreadful fix!" said Turpin, hurriedly. And for the life of me, I cannot see my way out of it."

CHAPTER CLXXXIX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN FIND THEIR PERILS AND PERPLEXITIES ON THE INCREASE, AND THERE SEEMS TO BE BUT A SMALL DEGREE OF PROBABILITY THAT THEY WILL BE ABLE TO SUCCESSFULLY CARRY OUT THEIR UNDERTAKING.

"THERE is only one thing we can do," said Tom, "and, therefore, we must do it or give in."

"What is it?"

"Take to the meadows."

"Good! On the soft turf our cattle will not so much feel the inconvenience of being without a shoe. It is a good idea; but if it is to be of any good to us at all, we must do it at once."

"Of course."

"How?"

"Look for a gap."

"The hedge is lower here," said Claude. "Lead the way, Dick, for the love of heaven. It is the only thing we have at all resembling a chance."

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES SWEAR FEALTY TO CHARLES STUART.]

"It is," replied Turpin; "so follow me at once! There is no time to lose. The lane is full narrow for a leap, but we must do the best we can."

While he spoke these words, which he did in a very rapid tone of voice, he got as far from the hedge he was about to leap as the opposite bank would let him.

His three companions ranged themselves near him.

Then, settling himself more firmly in the saddle, Dick grasped the reins, at the same time pressing his heels against his mare's flanks to urge her onward.

With a sudden dash and a bound she was over.

The others followed in quick succession.

All alighted in perfect safety in the meadow.

But from their pursuers, who were too close behind them to be pleasant, there arose a furious cry. It seemed as though the highwaymen would triumph over the obstacle they had placed in their way, and get off altogether.

No reward, however, that was offered for their capture was too great and tempting for them to give up the pursuit very easily, and so, with incredible speed and utter disregard of pain, they scrambled up the bank and through the thickly-planted hedge.

But quick as they were in doing this, those of whom they were in chase had had time to cross the very large meadow in which they found themselves, and were in the act of leaping into another, whose extent was more than they could discern.

On—on they went, unheeding the danger and difficulties of their route, filled—animated with the idea that, ere long, the robbers' steeds would be too lame to proceed further.

When this happened, and they hugged the belief that it could not be very long before it did, they were in sufficient force to overcome four men.

At least they thought so.

Had they known the character of our friends as well as the reader knows it, it is probable they would have been of a different opinion.

Leaving them, however, to continue their pursuit, we will turn our attention more particularly to describing the actions of the four highwaymen, whose positions, in consequence of the ostler's trickery, was a most perilous one.

"Take it easy now," said Dick Turpin, after they had leaped into the second meadow, "only go just fast enough to keep these fellows at the distance they are."

"We shall soon tire them out."

"I think so, Claude. We will lead them a pretty dance, and were it not for the loss of the shoes, we would quickly show them a clean pair of heels."

"Curse the ostler!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "It is the most awkward thing for us that possibly could be."

"Yes, we ought to have got ahead of that coach. Now, as we go on, we shall find the whole country alarmed, and on the look-out for us."

"Confound it, yes. But we must make the best of it we can. Take care of your horses, my friends; for if they are knocked up I do not know how we are to get others, and one heavy tread on a stone will do the business."

"They are gaining on us, Dick," said Tom King, a minute or two afterwards. "I have been looking back continually, and I am sure they are a great deal nearer than they were."

At this moment there was a loud report, as though several muskets had been discharged; and this was the case.

But it was quite useless. They had much better have reserved their fire, for they were not within range of their mark by many yards.

It served, however, to show the highwaymen the necessity of maintaining a greater distance between themselves and their pursuers, who they considered must ere long give in.

But for some time they evinced no signs of anything of the kind, and the perseverance with which they kept up the chase was remarkable.

"This sort of thing won't do," said Turpin. "I fancy Bess goes slightly lame already."

"You don't mean that?"

"I am afraid it is so."

"But what are we to do?"

"Ah! that is where I am puzzled."

"So are we."

"Who were they, should you think, whom we heard coming along the road?"

"I was wondering," replied Tom King, "and that is what has made me look back so continually. I have been expecting every moment to see them make their appearance behind us."

"But you have seen nothing of them?"

"No."

"Nor I, so let us hope they went by unnoticed, or perhaps we were mistaken in the sound. But we have no leisure to speculate upon that point now, we must turn round and make a stand."

"Turn round and make a stand?"

"Yes, and ten to one if by doing so we shall not frighten our foes out of pursuing us."

"It is a hazardous plan," said Claude Duval.

"That I do not dispute; but if we continue in this way we shall knock all the hoofs off our horses, and then we shall be done for to a certainty."

"So we shall."

"Turn, then."

"We obey, captain."

"Ten to one if it does not put our enemies out more than anything else we could do would."

As he spoke all wheeled round, and then stood perfectly still.

The result was just as Dick had predicted.

The run at which the men had been coming slackened to a trot, and then a walk.

Finally they stopped altogether.

The sudden and unexpected change in tactics was more than they could exactly understand.

They were too frightened to advance.

"Charge!" cried Turpin. "Now is our chance. Charge, and they will fly before us! What a pity we did not think of it before! Charge!"

His order, extraordinary as it appeared, was obeyed.

The pursued and the pursuers now changed places, for the moment they perceived this movement, those who had kept so perseveringly upon their track, turned and fled in the utmost panic and confusion.

"Hurrah!" shouted Dick. "On to them! on to them! Forward! forward! Death to them all! Do not let one of them escape with life!"

This was said in loud enough tones to reach the disorderly flying throng, and with the intention of intimidating them.

As Dick had said, it was a pity they had not thought of this bold plan of operations sooner, and yet, perhaps, it was all for the best. At an earlier moment it might not have produced the effect it then did.

A short time, considering the distance, served to take them to the high-road again.

Over the hedge they went headlong, each one intent only upon getting clear.

But our friends followed them no further—that is to say, they did not cross the hedge which divided the meadows from the road, since they could only have done so at the risk of seriously injuring their horses.

They, nevertheless, kept up a succession of shouts.

Down the road, in the direction of the "Old White Lion," scampered their discomfited foes, all thoroughly tired and sick of acting as amateur police-officers.

The highwaymen did not change their positions until they had watched the whole of the disorderly throng as far as the "Old White Lion."

Then, having done so, they looked at each other rather anxiously for a second or two in silence.

Their position was getting more and more complicated, and at the same time more full of peril.

Hitherto they had met with many risks and hairbreadth escapes during their journey, and when they passed through the country they were unknown; but now, wherever they went, it would be only reasonable for them to expect to find people anxiously on the look out for them, and prepared in more ways than one to insure their capture.

These words will give a summary of the thoughts that filled their minds during the brief period they looked into each other's countenances.

"What are we to do next, captain?" they asked. "Which will be the best course to take?"

"I scarcely feel competent to say," replied Turpin. "I do not know whether you have all forgotten the wound in my head: but if you have I have not."

"It was forgotten for a moment, Dick, and yet not altogether; but you carried things off so well that we fancied you felt nothing of it, and so thought it best policy not to recall it to your remembrance."

"I see!"

"That is exactly it. Is the pain very great?"

"Not so bad, perhaps, as it has been, nor yet so bad as might have been expected. My head feels very heavy; and every now and then there comes such a cloud over my eyes that I can hardly see; but that I shall soon get the better of, no doubt."

"You alarm me, Dick!" said Tom King, "not only by your words, but by your looks. You are as white as a ghost!"

CHAPTER CXC.

CONTINUES TO DETAIL THE ADVENTURES WHICH BEFEL THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN ON THEIR JOURNEY TO THE NORTH.

And in good truth, any one gazing upon the countenance of the celebrated highwayman, who felt an interest in his welfare, would to the full have shared in Tom King's anxiety.

It was pale even to ghastliness, while his eyes bore a stony appearance, really dreadful to behold.

"I must shake off the feeling as well as I can, Tom," he said. "We have more important things to think about just now,"

"We have," replied Claude; "and I think I can give you some little consolation. In the course of my life I have given and received a great many wounds, and the symptoms you describe are not so unfavourable as one would think at a first glance."

"Indeed."

"No, while you feel as you do you have nothing to fear, since the effect is principally produced by loss of blood, and you will soon make up for that again."

"That's all right, then; and now, my friends, let us leave the discussion of that point, and attend to others of far greater importance."

"With all my heart," said Claude. "But, under all circumstances, it will be most prudent for you to keep yourself as quiet as you can for a short time."

"What are we to do, then?"

"Leave here at once."

"Easily said."

"It will not do to stay where we are. Let us dismount. The horses, then, will get on much better."

"But what are we to do, then?"

"Find some place where we can get them shoed. There is no other course."

"So be it, then. We will dismount. Let us hope we have frightened those fellows too much for them to come after us just yet!"

"Stay," said Tom King; "I will assist you down. You are not strong enough to dismount unaided. Stop, now!"

As he spoke he hastened to the side of Black Bess, and helped his friend Turpin from the saddle.

Nor were his services unwelcome. The short rest they had had at the "Old White Lion" was not enough to properly recuperate his exhausted energies; and though, in the moment of danger, excitement had enabled him to triumph over his weakness, yet, when all was over, he was more terribly prostrated than before.

He staggered slightly on reaching the ground; but, by an effort, he recovered himself.

"I must do the best I can," he said, in reply to his friends' expressed fears for his safety. "To stay where we are will be madness. The panic that has seized upon them will quickly dissipate, and then they will be upon us with fresh force."

"Even so!"

"Come on, then! Take your oridles in your hands, and creep cautiously underneath the hedge. The ground is soft, and will not hurt the horses now, having only their own weight to carry."

"And we shall not wander far out of our way," added Claude Duval, "if we take care to keep along the hedge skirting the high-road."

"I take it," replied Sixteen-String Jack, "that our greatest difficulty has yet to come."

"You mean with respect to shoeing the horses."

"I do."

"There I am of your opinion. Still, the danger and difficulty, great or little, must be faced. There must and cannot be any shrinking."

"True!"

During the whole of this brief conversation, our friends had not stood still, but pushed on as rapidly as circumstances would permit them.

Without dwelling upon their hopes and fears as expressed in their conversation, the reader will not fail to comprehend and form a due estimate of the gigantic nature of the peril with which they were threatened.

In the first place there was the dread that their late pursuers would summon up courage enough to re-attack them, and would, perhaps, bring with them an overwhelming reinforcement.

They were perfectly aware of the helpless state in which the highwaymen were, and that they could not possibly go any distance without rendering their horses quite useless.

Then there was the difficulty of finding a shoeing forge in the vicinity, and the danger they would incur during their stay there.

But, above all, there was the desperate condition of their leader; and this it was that gave the others the greatest amount of uneasiness.

Under this adverse combination of events, we shall see how far fortune favoured them.

Dick bore up bravely.

The pain he suffered was almost beyond endurance, but he made as little of it as he could.

His limbs were like lead.

But the imperative necessity of removing from their present position was foremost in his imagination, and he made all other sensations subservient to it.

No sounds to indicate that their late foes had resumed the chase reached their ears, and as minute after minute passed away, each one increasing the distance between them, they began to indulge in the hope that they had abandoned it altogether.

Ere long, however, they saw in the distance a man crossing the meadows in a diagonal direction, which would enable him to come up with them.

By the way this man fixed his gaze upon their persons, it became perfectly clear that he intended to intercept them.

One man, however, the highwaymen did not dread, though all four looked rather curiously and anxiously towards him.

Upon a nearer approach, they perceived he was a short, stout, apoplectic-looking man, dressed in the costume of a farmer, and having on his face an expression of agricultural obstinacy and stupidity.

He carried in his hand a long double-barrelled gun, and as soon as he was certain our friends saw him, he waved it over his head in a threatening manner.

By his side walked two dogs of a very ugly and ferocious breed.

Disregarding all three of them, our friends still continued striking across the meadows.

Fortunately, however, they watched what he was about.

The farmer began to shout.

At first they could not distinguish the words one from another; but presently, as the distance between them decreased, they found them to be something like the following—

"Hi! there! Stop! stop! Do you hear? Stop! It'll be the worse for you if you don't! Trespass, I say! Hi! Stop, will you? You can't go on!"

"I daresay this is the old bloke's ground," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and we are trespassing on it. Keep on. Don't take any notice. He will catch us just now."

And so he did; for observing that no heed was paid either to his words or his actions, the farmer left off shaking his gun and shouting, but changed his pace from a walk to a run instead.

In a few minutes, panting, breathless, and exhausted, he stood before them.

"Out of the way," said Dick. "Don't interfere with us. Out of the way!"

"But I tell you there's no road this way, and you can't go any further."

"Nonsense! Can't you see that we are in the majority, and that if we chose we could toss you over the hedge! For once in your life be a sensible man, and allow us to pass unmolested, or the consequences will be anything but pleasant."

"Stop, I tell you," cried the farmer, who was quite as pig-headed as he looked. "Stop, or I fire!"

As he spoke, he planted himself before them, and raised his double-barrelled gun to his shoulder.

His two dogs were one on either side of him, and they showed their teeth and growled, and looked as defiant as their master.

Of course the highwaymen were obliged to come to a halt.

"Now then," cried the farmer, having accomplished his first intention, "turn back and be off. I don't allow no trespassers on my ground. Turn back, or I fire!"

"Turn back be hanged!" said Claude Duval; and to the great astonishment of all, he made a sudden bound forward, knocked the barrel of the gun up in the air, and then wrested the weapon out of the farmer's hands.

But he had like to have paid dearly for this feat, for the two dogs we have mentioned, the moment they saw him attack their master, with a natural instinct sprang upon him.

Claude, however, could be nimble when he chose, and jumping backwards with great suddenness, he grasped the gun tightly by the barrel, and swung it round him with tremendous velocity, so that the butt-end described a circle about a foot above the ground.

In its progress it caught both dogs, as the terrific yell they uttered testified.

But although hurt—crippled, in fact—they were not disabled, and the pain they felt made them fly upon Claude with greater fury than before.

But this time he was not left to combat them single-handed. His friends Jack and Tom came to his assistance.

They shot both the ferocious animals.

The farmer turned black in the face with rage, and danced about as though in convulsions, or the agonies of strangulation.

Still, with praiseworthy courage, he would not give in until Tom, having seen Claude in safety, rushed forward, and grasping him by the collar, thrust the muzzle of a pistol into his ear.

"Silence," he said, "or it will be the worse for you! As you have seen, we are not men who will stand trifling with."

CHAPTER CXCI.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN PUT AN END TO THE INTERFERENCE OF THE FARMER.

THE farmer glared around him with some dismay, but all that he saw fully bore out the truth of what Tom King had said.

A remarkable change took place in the colour of his countenance.

From a dusky black it subsided into a nondescript whitey-brown tint.

"Mercy! mercy!" he said. "Spare my life! spare my life! I am a sinner—a miserable sinner! Spare my life!"

"Keep quiet, then," said King, "and your request will be listened to; otherwise, there will shortly be a vacancy in the agricultural districts."

At this moment Claude approached.

"What do you mean?" he asked, threateningly. "What do you mean by treating gentlemen in the manner you have treated us! What do you mean by telling gentlemen to stop, and that they cannot go through your fields? What do you mean by it?"

"Trespass!" cried the farmer, recovering himself a little. "Trespass! that's what it is! This is my ground, I'd have you know."

"Be quiet!" said Tom King, as he pressed the muzzle of the pistol yet harder against the farmer's ear. "Claude," he added, "I want a word with you."

Duval approached, and Tom whispered something in his ear.

A nod and a pleased expression of countenance was the reply, and then Claude spoke to Dick and Sixteen-String Jack.

"Tom has hit upon a capital idea," he said.

"What is it?"

"He proposes, by dint of threats, to compel the farmer to take us to some place where we can have our horses shoed."

"Capital!"

"And make him give out that we are particular friends of his."

"Good!" said Turpin; "and so, inopportune as his presence seemed, we shall be able to turn it over to our own advantage."

"I hope so."

In the meantime, Tom had explained his purpose to the farmer.

"Do you wish to live?" he asked, "or are you quite weary of life? If the latter, I will put you out of the world at once. If the former, I will tell you how to remain a little longer in it."

"Spare me! Spare my life!" cried the farmer, in the utmost alarm. "I will do anything if you will only spare my life."

"Spoken like a reasonable man. Your life shall be spared."

"But what am I to do?"

"Obey me in all things for the next hour, and then you shall be free to do whatever you think proper. Otherwise"——

Tom had no occasion to complete the sentence.

"I will obey—I will obey. But tell me what I have to do."

"In one moment. Here, Dick!"

His three comrades advanced.

"He is quite reasonable, and has promised to obey me in all things."

"Then," said Turpin, sternly, "see that he does so."

"I will—I will, indeed, gentlemen," said the farmer, who, ever since the loss of his gun and the death of his dogs, had been in a perfect fright; "only tell me what I have to do."

"We will. Do you know a place where I can get a shoe put on my horse?"

"A blacksmith's forge?"

"Yes."

"Oh! gentlemen, if that is all you require, I can tell you where to find one."

"Then I should advise you to."

"I will—I will. There is one on my own farm—this very farm."

"Have you really?"

"Yes."

"Lead us to it, then, and understand this, and believe us perfectly in earnest."

"Yes, gentlemen. Oh! yes."

"Lead us to this smithy. I am rather weak, and will take hold of your arm. So. My friends will walk just behind us with pistols ready in their grasp, and the least thing they see that looks like treachery on your part, or hesitation to do as you are bidden, will be the signal for them to fire, and, as you have witnessed, they know how to use a pistol."

While speaking, Dick slipped his hand under the farmer's arm, and held it tightly.

The other three took up their positions a little in the rear, with their right hands in their coat pockets, grasping a pistol.

"Forward!" cried Dick. "We are going to let you off lightly, and you ought to be grateful accordingly. If you will have some shoes put on our horses, we will let you go free and unharmed, and pay you a reasonable sum for your trouble and the damage we have done."

The moment Dick spoke of payment, the farmer's manner entirely changed.

They did not know it then, but he was avaricious in the extreme.

"Come this way, gentlemen," he said; "you need not trouble about your pistols, I am your very obedient servant to command. This way, if you please. I see now you are gentlemen, and I am sorry any disagreement arose between us, but really such a many common people come"——

"That will do—that will do," cried Turpin; "lead on in silence, and bear what we have said in mind. Treachery will only provoke your death. It will not be possible for you to escape."

The farmer was silent, and led the highwaymen across several fields, until, in the distance, some thatched roofs were discernible.

These he soon after reached.

From the one to which they first came issued a bright light, and the clanking of hammers and anvils.

They found, too, that they approached this shed from the back, and that the front of it looked out upon a broad high-road, though not the one our friends had so long been travelling.

"Jackson!" cried the farmer, as they reached the large door of the smithy. "Jackson!"

In obedience to this call, a burly smith came forward.

Our friends kept a keen look out upon both, having fully determined to punish the farmer severely should he prove treacherous.

But all seemed well.

"Good morning, Mr. Bates," said Jackson, with that servile respect so noticeable in farming districts. "What can I do for you?"

Mr. Bates, somewhat to the highwaymen's surprise, spoke quite freely.

"These gentlemen want their horses' shoes seen to at once."

"All right, sir."

"Make haste," said Turpin; "we are pressed for time."

"Do you hear, Jackson," said Mr. Bates; "the gentleman says he is pressed for time."

Dick looked upon the farmer in wonder. He could scarcely believe it possible that so great a change could have taken place in a person in so short a time.

But he did not know how dominant a passion love of money was in the farmer's soul, and that he would hardly have scrupled at any means, however base, to obtain it.

Claude Duval was suspicious, and watched his every movement with the greatest attention.

"Do they all four want attending to?" asked Jackson.

"Yes," replied Dick. "I want the old shoes taken off and new ones placed on them all."

"Very good, sir. I'll take yours first."

"Do so," said Turpin. "Be gently with her, for she has a rare spirit, or temper rather, if you are in the least rough."

The blacksmith led Turpin's mare into the shed, and secured her head.

Then began his work.

"You have lost a shoe," he said.

"Yes, put a new one on carefully. Her hoof will be tender."

"So it will, sir."

"It will take a good while, gentlemen," said Mr. Bates, "to put sixteen shoes on. Don't stand here, I beg, but come up to the house."

"No, thank you," replied our hero, promptly. "I am much obliged to you all the same, but I would rather stand by and see the shoeing done."

"Just as you like, gentlemen; and while we are waiting we may as well settle about the little recompense you spoke of."

"Very good," said Turpin. "What harm have we done?"

"There's my two dogs."

"Yes."

"And my gun."

"Go on."

"And the trespass, and the time"——

"Never mind," said Dick, "going on any further. I'll tell you what, when your man has shoed the horses properly, you shall have five guineas from each of us."

"Five guineas? Yes, gentlemen—your lordships, I mean. Five and five is ten, and five is fifteen, and five is t. Did you mean twenty guineas altogether, my lord?"

"Exactly," replied Dick.

The farmer rubbed his hands together.

Covetousness sparkled in his eyes.

"You're welcome, your lordships," he said, "to come on my grounds whenever you think proper. Of course, I did not know you, or I should not have acted as I did. I'm very sorry. Why, my dogs, Towler and Snap, might have bit one of your lordships!"

"Very probably."

In such like conversation as this was the time passed away while Black Bess was shoed.

It was not that she exactly required a new set, but Dick thought, and wisely too, that he would take the present opportunity and have them all done—for it might be a very long time indeed before another such chance befel him.

CHAPTER CXCII.

A CART IS DRIVEN UP TO THE OLD SMITHY; WHICH EVENT HAS THE EFFECT OF OPENING THE EYES OF MR. BATES.

"WHY, I'm blest!" said Jackson, suddenly, who, having finished Bess, had begun upon Claude's horse, "why this one has cast a shoe too."

"We are aware."

"Their lordships are aware, Jackson," roared the farmer, in a rage with his dependant for making the remark: "go on with your work."

Thus rebuked, Jackson went on.

Presently Claude's horse was done.

Our friends' hearts grew lighter. They were glad to give twenty pounds for such an important service as that was. Just at that moment the value of it was incalculable.

Jackson took Tom King's horse in exchange for Claude's.

The circumstance of the off-hand shoes of two horses being off at the same time filled him with astonishment, and he looked upon the highwaymen and Mr. Bates inquiringly.

But from the looks of neither could he gather anything.

It was really amusing to see the way in which he examined the feet of Tom's horse.

He began with the fore ones.

Then took the near hind leg.

All three shoes were worn, but quite perfect, and fit to do a great deal more service.

Slowly he picked up the other foot.

He let it down with a dab.

The shoe was gone.

This seemed to Jackson mysterious and incomprehensible, and the manner in which he looked at the horses and their riders was ludicrous in the extreme.

However, he did not dare make any remark, but went on with his work.

In time, Tom's horse was finished.

Then there remained only Sixteen-String Jack's to do.

As before, Jackson looked at the feet, and just in the same order.

He lifted up the last one, thinking surely all four shoes would not be short.

But they were.

Letting go the hoof, and braving the anger of his master he stood up.

His astonishment was too great for him to contain his words.

"This caps all!" he cried, "clean caps all! There's four horses brought to the forge at the same time, and, as I'm alive, they have all four cast the same shoe!"

This circumstance seemed to strike Mr. Bates as being a most peculiar one, and he looked up at our friends with undisguised curiosity.

"It's all right," said Dick, for he thought no harm could be done by trying to account for the matter. "You see it's been done for a wager."

"It's been done for a wager, Jackson," cried Mr. Bates, who seized upon this idea with the greatest avidity. "Get on with your work, do. Their lordships know all about it. It's been done for a wager."

Half satisfied, Jackson resumed his work.

The time altogether that it took to put on the shoes was something considerable, and the day was far advanced before they were all finished.

At last, however, the horses were led out into the road in front of the shed, rubbed down, and given a mouthful of hay and water.

Mr. Bates, too, finding our friends would not, on any account, be persuaded to leave their horses, had had some refreshments brought out to them.

It was just at this moment that there came round the corner of the high-road a horse and cart.

Two men were seated in it, and driving at a very rapid rate.

But they drew up exactly in front of the smithy.

It was by no means part of the highwaymen's plan to draw attention to themselves, and therefore they remained just as they were, thinking that the best means of eluding observation.

A man was rubbing down their steeds, and they were standing close by, with Mr. Bates, watching him at his work.

Upon the stoppage of the cart, all looked up to see what kind of people it contained.

One was a man, and the other a youth of about eighteen or nineteen.

"Hullo!" said the former, as he scrambled rather awkwardly out of his vehicle. "Who belongs to this place?"

"I do," said Mr. Bates, stepping forward, and desirous of showing his authority to his visitors. "What do you want?"

"Perhaps you'll be kind enough to look at that, and, with your permission, I'll make use of one or two."

The man thrust a printed paper into the hands of Mr. Bates as he spoke.

Then, without waiting to hear what he said, he ran back to the cart, and produced a paste-pot.

Mr. Bates unfolded the bill.

"The devil!" cried Dick Turpin, as he saw all this. "Mount, my friends! It's another of those infernal bill-stickers!"

It was in a suppressed voice that he spoke, but still it was loud enough for those to whom he addressed himself to hear it.

A glance showed them that what their leader had said was perfectly right; so with that ease and dexterity which long and continual practice had given them, they sprang into their saddles.

Nor were they a moment too soon.

Mr. Bates, who had unfolded the bill, and begun the attempt to decipher it, looked up with amazement upon this sudden movement upon the part of our four friends.

Ere he could speak, however, something else occurred which changed the whole posture of affairs.

The boy in the cart—for he was little more—had of course made himself acquainted with the description given of the four highwaymen.

His eyes had rested upon the horsemen close at hand.

Of course he recognised them instantly; and whatever doubts he had were dispelled when he saw the celebrated mare Black Bess.

Therefore, as soon as the man came to the cart for the purpose of reaching out some bills, he communicated his suspicions to him.

A glance served to show the bill-sticker that his assistant was right; so, standing up on the shaft of his cart, he shouted—

"Stop thief! Two thousand pounds reward! Two thousand five hundred pounds for those four men on horseback! Dick Turpin, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack. Stop them!"

From the insight the reader has already been given of the character of Mr. Bates, the electrical effect which the mention of this enormous sum had upon him can be readily enough imagined.

But he was too dumbfoundered to speak.

As for the highwaymen, they were quite at their ease.

To be sure, they were in such peril as would alarm most men, but all things are comparative; and in comparison with the difficulties they had been in such a short time previously, the present was a mere nothing.

At least they thought so, if one might judge by the easy way in which they took it.

At a sign from Dick they rode forward with great suddenness.

Mr. Bates, who made a wild and maniacal attempt to stop them, was thrown down.

And Sixteen-String Jack, as they passed the cart, gave the bill-sticker, who was still standing rather precariously upon the shafts, a vigorous push, which had the effect of sending him backwards over his horse at once.

This done, they increased the speed of their horses, and swept along the road, leaving Mr. Bates and the discomfited bill-sticker to console themselves as best they might.

In less than ten minutes afterwards, during which time they had torn along at their utmost speed, they drew up.

So rapidly and strangely had the last few events fallen out, that they could hardly bring themselves to believe in their reality.

But the necessity for proceeding with the utmost circumspection pressed itself upon them.

Altogether, they had been delayed something like eighteen hours, which would enable the news to get well spread abroad respecting them, and as for hoping to overtake the Warwick mail, that was quite out of the question.

But in other respects their position was materially improved.

Their horses were well shod and thoroughly rested.

They had no foes to dread upon their track.

By mutual agreement they proceeded at a good sharp pace, keeping a keen look-out for any indications of their enemy.

But none such came in sight.

The rest at the smithy, too, had another good effect, and that was Turpin's wound.

This ugly gash, as it appeared, was in reality nothing—that is, it would have been nothing, had he kept still, and received proper attention; but, as the reader knows, he had neither one nor the other.

They quickly found, however, by his manner, that he was much better, and Claude Duval presaged that, ere long, he would feel nothing of it.

And so, in company, they pressed on together, avoiding the main roads, and all towns and villages, sleeping in the open air, and managing in the best way they could.

Indeed, had they not adopted such means as these, their discovery would have been certain, so well and skilfully were plans laid for their capture.

Then, with respect to the expedition they had taken in hand, it was most unquestionably the best thing they could do, for while the same supervision was continued to be exercised upon the different roads, they would be quite debarred from pursuing their avocation.

Besides this, it had that to recommend it which is needed in all things, and that is variety.

CHAPTER CXCIII.

OUR FRIENDS REACH SCOTLAND IN SAFETY, AND MAKE A HALT AT PERTH, AT THE "MORAY ARMS," WHERE DICK TURPIN HAS A STARTLING ADVENTURE.

FIVE days after the occurrence of the events we have just related, four horsemen, whose apparel was torn and travel-soiled in many places, and whose steeds evinced by their gait a fatigue of no common order, drew rein before a small roadside public-house in the vicinity of Perth.

It is scarcely necessary to tell the reader who those four horsemen were. He knows already they are those in whose varying fortunes and exciting adventures we feel so deep an interest.

During those five days their journey had been undiversified by any incidents worthy of special mention. They had been careful to go by the most unfrequented roads, and had succeeded in escaping observation.

But the time will show that they had not dallied much upon their journey. In fact, with the exception of such brief halts as nature imperatively demanded, they had not stayed once during the whole journey.

But now, having come so far in safety, they felt in tolerable security, and resolved, let the result be what it would, that they would remain for the rest of the day, and during the night, at a public-house, about two miles from Perth, and on the high-road leading from it.

It is at this moment that we again present them to the reader.

The countenances of all are haggard, and show the immense fatigue which they have undergone.

The wound in Turpin's head, thanks to the close attention Claude paid to it, and despite all adverse circumstances, was quite well.

But he was far from looking the man he had done a short time before, though a good rest would soon put all that right.

It was in the latter part of a winter afternoon that they halted before the door of the public-house here alluded to, and which was known by the sign of the "Moray Arms."

They met with rather a cold reception from the occupiers of the house, who, from the fact of their all wearing the highland costume, they conjectured were high Scotch, who, at that time, were much prejudiced against the English, or Southrons, as they called them.

Of course, the dress which our friends wore showed them to belong to this latter nation, and to that they ascribed the cold reception they received.

They called for a private room, and a dinner of the best they could procure, and while they were getting it in readiness the highwaymen, as usual, paid a visit to the stables, conciliated the ostler, and saw their steeds properly groomed and fed.

No account of their exploits seemed to have reached so far north, and upon this they congratulated themselves, for they not only required rest, but desired to enter the Pretender's ranks as though they had come there of their own accord, and not selected it as a place of refuge from their foes.

On their return they were shown to a small and comfortable apartment—at least, it seemed such to our friends, who had been deprived of such a luxury for some time.

Here they dispatched a very hearty meal.

Abundance of wine had been placed upon the table, and, at the conclusion of the repast, Tom King filled a bumper, and, standing up, said—

"Now, my friends, fill up your glasses, and drink to the health of Prince Charlie and his father, King James!"

Some portion of Tom's enthusiasm had infused itself into the breasts of his three comrades; so, standing up, they responded to the toast with great warmth.

The conversation, of course, turned upon their mode of future procedure.

So far, they had come in a straight line, without any idea as to the exact locality of the Pretender and his army, and although they had made numberless direct or indirect inquiries, they were unable to gather a notion of his whereabouts.

But it is not to be wondered at that they were unsuccessful in this respect, for those of whom they made inquiries doubted their sincerity, and feared they were no other than English spies, nor would all their asseverations tend in the least to dispel this erroneous idea.

The only thing they had to guide them was that an engagement had taken place between the rebels and the king's troops under the command of Captain Scott, at a place called Loch Lochy, not far from Invergary, and in which encounter the Young Pretender's army proved triumphantly victorious

Towards this place, then, they had directed their steps.

The papers, which it will be remembered Tom King had taken from the wallet of the messenger, no doubt contained the information they were in search of, but, as all were carefully sealed and tied up, Tom would not listen to any proposition to making themselves acquainted with their contents.

On the present occasion the point was rather warmly contested by Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, who both maintained they should be doing no more than right by opening the papers.

But they had not the respectful feeling for the young prince that Tom had, for he looked up to him as his lawful sovereign, and considered that to do such a thing would be to commit an unpardonable offence.

As for Turpin, he remained neuter, leaving them to settle the affair between them.

But Tom was firm.

At length, however, as night was drawing in, and the necessity for rest made itself more and more apparent, they desired to be shown to their chambers.

The landlord—an old highlander he seemed—replied to their summons, and reluctantly proceeded to obey their bidding.

But, perhaps, thinking from the appearance of the highwaymen that it would be best to keep on friendly terms with them, he subdued this feeling as much as possible, and led the way up stairs.

The inn was a substantial building and of tolerable size.

The first floor was passed, and the second flight of stairs ascended.

Then our friends were shown into two bed-chambers adjoining each other.

Here they divided in their usual fashion—that is to say, Dick Turpin and Tom King—Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval.

Those only who can obtain proper rest at long and uncertain intervals can form a just idea of the pleasure with which the highwaymen laid down.

In five minutes all slumbered soundly, but not knowing what might occur, they had only partially divested themselves of their apparel.

Their chamber doors they had carefully secured.

These precautions taken, they surrendered themselves to sleep.

About four hours afterwards, Dick Turpin, after a few restless movements, awoke.

He lay profoundly still, for he was at a loss rather to think where he was.

Darkness of the blackest character environed him, but, after a little while, he became conscious that some few rays of light must find their way in from somewhere, as he began dimly to see surrounding objects.

As he lay there in perfect stillness, his ears were assailed by a strange murmuring sound.

It arose suddenly and as suddenly ceased.

Then it broke forth again, and continued uninterruptedly.

He could not have been properly awake and in full possession of his senses, or he would have recognised the sound much sooner than he did.

At last, however, he aroused himself thoroughly, and, sitting up in the bed, listened.

"Voices," he muttered. "What can that mean? There are a great many, too. What time is it, I wonder? Late. Long past midnight, I should think. It is danger. And yet, perhaps, it is not. However, I will not awake my comrades until I have ascertained."

With this Turpin slipped quietly off the bed, and standing upon the floor, listened.

He quickly discovered that the sound of the voices came from below.

As soon as he had assured himself such was the case, he, with the greatest care and secrecy, laid himself down at full length, and placed his ear to the floor.

The murmuring of voices became much more distinct, but he could not so much as catch a single word of what was said.

But the more he thought, and the longer he listened, the more uneasy he became.

What could be the nature of the conference taking place at that dead hour of the night?

It was only natural that he should connect it with himself.

He rose to his feet, and, as he did so, formed a hasty resolution.

He would not wake his companions, but alone go forth and learn whether there really was or was not danger.

Accordingly, he, with great speed, put on the remainder of his clothes, and looked carefully to his weapons.

But it was more to his sense of feeling that he trusted than his sight when he tried the priming of his pistol.

Then, with his sword drawn in his hand, in readiness for any attack, he crept on tiptoe across the room, in the direction of the door, which, being of old oak, stood out clearly defined from the white-washed wall around it.

He had himself secured the door, and, therefore, was able to set about unfastening it noiselessly.

This he succeeded in doing, and as, when he ascended, he had taken very particular notice of his route, he was able to find his way to the head of the stairs in the dark, without coming into collision with anything.

On the landing the voices could be heard with much greater plainness than they could in the room.

Not pausing, however, Dick Turpin stealthily commenced the descent of the stairs.

It took him a long time, considering the distance, but at last he reached the first floor.

As he got lower and lower, the more distinctly could he hear the mysterious voices.

And now he noticed that, from underneath one of the room doors on the right-hand side of where he stood, there came a broad beam of light.

That, doubtless, then, was the room in which the conference was taking place.

Cautiously he approached the door.

Then, stooping down, he put his ear close to the key-hole.

But scarcely had he done so, than the door was suddenly thrown open, and a loud ejaculation came from a man's lips.

CHAPTER CXCI

THE HIGHLAND CHIEFS ASSUME A MENACING ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE HIGHWAYMEN.

THE opening of the door was so unexpected by Dick Turpin, that he was a minute before he could recover himself, and he half fell over the threshold of the room.

But, ere he could quite reach the floor, the owner of the voice which had uttered the exclamation stooped down and clutched him by the collar.

There was a hurried movement of many feet, and a hubbub of voices.

When Dick drew himself up to his full height and looked around him, he found he was surrounded by a number of stalwart, well-armed men, who, by their attire, were evidently above the common breed.

The person who held Dick in his grasp was a noble-looking Scotchman, dressed in the costume of the chiefs of one of the highland clans.

Several others he noted wore similar apparel.

"Close the door," said a voice, in loud, commanding tones, "and we will see what curious knave has dared to pry into our counsels."

"I am no knave," cried Dick, who by this time realized his position. "Stand back, gentlemen, or it will be the worse for you. I am well armed."

As he spoke Dick waved his ponderous sword around his head.

Instinctively those who were nearest to him drew back

But it was only for a moment.

Uttering a shrill fierce cry, they drew their claymore from their sheaths and rushed upon him.

Before they quite hemmed him in, however, Dick drew a pistol with his left hand and fired—taking care to point the weapons above the heads of those surrounding him.

He know it would have the effect of arousing his comrades, and quickly bringing them to his rescue.

"A southern spy!" cried the highlanders, fiercely. "A southern spy! Down with him! Slay him! or his assistants will be upon us! Death to the spy! Death—death!"

Dick met the onslaught that was made upon him with the greatest coolness and skill.

With a truly marvellous dexterity, he parried the numberless blows made at him from all sides.

"Hold, gentlemen!" he cried. "Hold—hold! Hear me speak. I am no spy! Hear me, hear me! and then slay me afterwards."

"Yes, hold!" said a voice, full of rich music, gentleness, and strength. "Hold, my friends; we will hear what the southerner has to say, but keep an eye upon him!"

The command was instantaneously obeyed.

Dick turned towards the speaker, for he judged he must be one high in command over the others.

But, ere he could address him, there was the hasty trampling of footsteps; and, a moment afterwards, the door of the apartment was burst open, and Tom King, followed closely by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, rushed in.

"Ha! betrayed!" cried the highlanders, as they perceived this. "Down with the dogs! down with the southerners! They are spies upon us, and our lives are no longer safe."

"Hold!" said the voice which had before spoken; "hold!"

It is impossible to convey an idea of the tone in which this word was uttered; but it had its effect upon all, even upon the three highwaymen.

They, like the rest, obeyed.

"Guard the door!" said the voice again, "and then we will question these intruders."

The men drew back, leaving the four friends in the centre of the apartment.

They stood closely to each other.

The scene was one of rare picturesque beauty.

The room in which they stood was spacious, and the ceiling lofty.

Round the walls, placed in tin sconces, were a number of wax candles, and these diffused a brilliant light, dispersing the darkness in the most distant corners.

In the centre, as we have already said, stood our four friends.

Grouped round them were about twenty distinguished-looking highland soldiers, each one the chief of a clan.

There was sufficient difference between them for any one to have told that.

But apart from the rest, and facing our friends, was the tall noble-looking chieftain, whose commands had been so scrupulously obeyed.

Who he was, neither of our friends had the least idea.

"Speak!" he said, "and be careful how you reply. Who are you, and why are you here?"

"Will you allow me to reply?" asked Tom King, making a step forward as he spoke.

"Yes; if you will be truthful."

"Do not doubt that, my lord. If I mistake not, you are of those who would rather see a Stuart on the throne of Great Britain than a Hanoverian."

"Proceed! That matters not."

"My lord, it does. All depends upon it."

"How so?"

"Whether we are friends or enemies."

"Friends or enemies?"

"Even so."

"Answer our question first," said the chieftain. "We have a right to demand it. Who are you?"

"Friends to Prince Charlie and his father, King James."

"Spies—spies!" interrupted several voices. "Spies—spies! They are southerners. Down with them."

The chieftain raised his hand.

The action, simple as it was, yet seemed so majestic, that the rude and violent men there present immediately obeyed it.

"Hold!" he said. "We will ask them for some proof of what they say."

Then turning towards Tom King, he continued—

"Your answer does not satisfy us. You wear the garb of those hostile to the cause you profess adherence to. But explain first, how it was one of your number was listening at the door during our secret councils?"

A murmur of assent followed this question, which, as the reader must be aware, was one to which Tom King was unable to reply.

But Dick was ready.

"I alone can explain that!" he said; "and I beg you will listen to me in patience. Last afternoon we arrived, and put up here. We have journeyed from England, and have been pursued as far as the borders by those who would gladly have taken our lives. But we eluded them, and were fortunate enough to reach here in safety, and, so far as we could tell, unperceived. The remainder is simple. The chamber in which I slept is immediately over this. I was awoke by the murmuring of voices. Fearful that it might be our enemies who had discovered us, I listened more intently, but still could hear no more than I had at first. The sounds came from below, and I resolved to ascertain whether our enemies were at hand or not. Accordingly I dressed myself hastily, and, taking my sword in my hand, crept down the stairs, and just reached yonder door as some one opened it. The rest you know. The pistol I fired was the signal to bring my friends to my assistance."

Dick spoke so calmly, and the whole bore such an impress of truth upon it, that the Scottish chieftains were all but convinced.

But still, with that pertinacity for which they are celebrated, they clung to the idea they had at first formed—namely, that they were English spies, and they were not willing to be disabused of it.

"Your speech is plausible," said the tall chieftain, who was evidently the head of the assembly. "But beyond doing so very vaguely, you have not told us who you are, nor by whom, nor for what you were pursued."

"Nor can we do so;" replied Turpin, "that is a piece of knowledge we have determined, at all hazards, to keep to ourselves."

There was another threatening movement after this speech, but the chief stayed it.

Turpin continued,—

"But from your dress, and the fact of your having chosen this lonely and unlikely spot for a secret council, I gather that you are partizans of King James, and, under that belief, I do not hesitate to say that we are of the same faction. Moreover, too, that our journey here was for the purpose of joining his army."

"Gentlemen," said the chieftain, "if what you say is true, then no one will be so pleased to take you by the hand. If you prove false, and traitors, mine shall be the first claymore drawn to slay you."

"We have no fear. We have but little proof of the sincerity of our words, but I may state that two of us are personally acquainted with the young prince, and it was upon the occasion of our parting that we promised, so soon as the intelligence should reach us that he had planted his standard upon Scottish soil, we would hasten to place ourselves beneath his standard, and do battle for him as best we might."

"It should be stated also," said Tom King, "that we were fortunate enough to render him a service, and in token of it he gave each of us a ring, and which was to be the means by which he would recognise us at a future date."

So saying, Tom King drew off the ring which Prince Charles had given him, and, with a graceful bow, presented it to the chieftain, who examined it with the closest attention, while the dense throng of Highland warriors looked on with curiosity and eagerness.

"I know this ring," said the chieftain; "and so far what they say is carried out by proof. Whether all is true is more than I could take upon myself to decide."

"We will give you our words," said Turpin; "and, among gentlemen, that ought to be sufficient."

"These are troublous times," said an aged man, solemnly, "and times when all should be distrusted. Our lives, our fortunes are in the balance, and it behoves us to be extremely cautious, when so much is at stake. If what these gentlemen now say is true, they cannot object to what I now propose, which is, that they shall remain with us under guard, and accompany us to the meeting place agreed upon, where, if what they say is true, all will be well; if false, they shall meet with the death that such black liars and base traitors best deserve. Are you agreed?"

A unanimous "We are!" came from the lips of all present.

[THE BODY OF CLAUDE DUVAL IS DISCOVERED ON THE BATTLE FIELD.]

"We are willing to abide by your decision," said Turpin; "for all we desire is to reach with all speed possible the young prince's ranks."

"We go at once, then," said the tall, noble chieftain, who, by his mildness and gentlemanly bearing, presented a strong contrast to the wild spirits by whom he was surrounded.

CHAPTER CXCV.

CAMERON OF LOCHIEL AND HIS TROOPS ESCORT OUR FRIENDS TO THE VALE OF GLENFINNAN, THE RENDEZVOUS OF THE CLANS.

The bare outline we have given of this chieftain's manner and appearance, will enable those who are conversant with Scottish history to immediately recognise him.

It was the gallant Cameron of Lochiel.

His name and fame have descended to us in many a romance, drama, and ballad; and his unfortunate fate is deplored by all.

From his unvarying kind behaviour he had gained the title of the "Gentle Lochiel," and yet he was perhaps the most powerful chieftain in the highlands.

It was unquestionably to the temperateness of his disposition, and the respect in which he was held by those who had assembled at the secret council, that our four friends owed their lives. Had he not interposed, the highlanders would have annihilated them in the blind fury of their rage.

It would seem that the little public-house at which our friends had halted had been selected as the meeting-place for the heads of the various clans, in order to take council as to their proceedings.

It was not, however, until some time afterwards that our friends learned this.

The meeting was just over as Dick descended the stairs, and the one who opened the door was about to depart, in order to ascertain, as a precautionary measure, that there were no spies lurking about.

Our hero was certainly found in a very suspicious situation, and one, under the circumstances, that would have justified those present in taking some very summary proceedings.

As it was, they were desired to deliver up their weapons, while a band escorted them to see that no treachery was attempted.

To all this Tom King cheerfully enough assented, but not so the others. Grumbling, however, would have done not the slightest good, and so they were compelled to submit.

They were, however, permitted to mount their own steeds, and the whole party then set out.

The journey was a long, and, in consequence of the nature of the ground, a most fatiguing one.

On their way, they were joined continually by large bodies of men, each one composing the clan of one of the chiefs who had assembled at the "Moray Arms."

Lochiel led the van, closely followed by the other Camerons.

Ere two days had elapsed, our friends had succeeded in quite gaining the confidence of their guards, so that their arms were restored to them; but, notwithstanding, they continued to keep close to them, and had the highwaymen wished to escape, they would have found it very difficult, if not impossible.

They learned, however, that the place to which they were repairing was the Vale of Glenfinnan, which had been appointed as a general rendezvous for those who favoured King James.

It was here that they were going to meet the young prince.

A bright sun was shining in a perfectly clear blue sky, upon the morning when the party reached their destination.

Their numbers had continually increased, and they now counted upwards of eight hundred men, all highlanders—or nearly so—inured to every imaginable privation, strong, well armed, and ready for any deed, however desperate.

It was a grand and imposing spectacle, for those who were there to see it, when the highland troops, in tartan array, commenced the descent into the valley.

The sun had dispersed the mists which at that time of year hung generally over and around that spot; and, as they slowly wound down that narrow path, our friends gazed with undisguised admiration upon the scene before them.

Glenfinnan is a narrow vale, in which the river Finnan runs between lofty and craggy mountains. At its extremity is Loch Ghiel, a lake upwards of fourteen miles in length; and it is this beautiful sheet of diaphanic water, in which the rugged mountain peaks and the blue sky are duplicated, which gives the valley the grand and magnificent appearance which it wears.

But the centre of the peaceful glen was now occupied by soldiers, who, from where they stood, perceived the approach of their friends, and hailed them with loud cries of joyous welcome.

The total change of scene which this presented to the highwaymen was, of course, not without its charm, and they were prepared to enter with full spirit into the new mode of life open to them.

And if the reader will reflect upon past events he will not feel surprised that they should begin to tire of their latter mode of life, which had but few agreeables and a myriad perils.

Above all, was this the case with Tom King. His history, which we have given in a former chapter, will serve to show that he had been, by a strange series of events, forced to seek a living upon the highway; it was not, as with many, from pure choice.

And now he was tired of the life he had been leading. When he looked back to the fearfully narrow escape of his life he had had at Tyburn, and remembered the horrors of that morning, it was always with a deep and unsubduable shudder.

No wonder.

By birth, education, and breeding, Tom King was a gentleman, and up to his majority always looked forward to being one for the remainder of his days.

The sudden appearance of his father's unrecognized son, and the result of the trial, had dispersed all these hopes.

And yet Tom did not like the idea of continuing to sink lower and lower down in life. Fain would he have abandoned his exciting career, despite the pleasure attaching to it; and in the present insurrection he had been that in the event of the Stuarts proving victorious, he should stand a chance of regaining the estates which had been wrested from him.

There were many who flocked to the Pretender's standard from the same reason.

At any rate, as he had before repeatedly said, they could not worse their position, let things turn out as they would.

But in his own mind he took a far more sanguine glance at the prospect in the future. He was, in fine, enthusiastic in the cause he had espoused, and already saw the Hanoverian swept from English soil, and either the Pretender or his son seated on the British throne.

Then, for himself and his friends, the prospect was, if possible, more cheering still. Already he saw all four high in the estimation of their sovereign—filling honourable situations—their past offences against the laws forgotten and condoned.

Whether things eventuated in the manner he anticipated can only be seen in time, by tracing the course of the different incidents as they arose.

At any rate, they were about to enter upon quite a new phase of existence—quite new to all of them, except Claude Duval, who, it was believed, had fought under the French flag.

At length the bottom of the mountain pass was reached; and here, by the orders of their commander, the gentle Lochiel, they halted, and formed into two lines, each line being three men deep.

Between the two lines, without their arms, walked those prisoners whom they had captured in the various skirmishes they had had with the regular troops upon their route.

And now, looking in advance, our friends perceived Prince Charles, in a semi-highland dress, standing upon a slight eminence in the centre, surrounded by his most trusted adherents, who waved their caps as the soldiers approached.

The scene was one of the greatest possible animation, nor was the additional enlivenment of martial music wanting, for the bagpipes made the air vocal with their spirit-stirring notes.

In a short time the detachments of troops were arranged in a circle round the eminence upon which the young prince stood, with his head uncovered, returning the salutations of the chieftains, and responding to the hearty "Deochs laint an Reogh" of the men, which was very good Erse for "God Save the King."

Seeing himself at last surrounded by what had the outward appearance of an army, the heart of the young prince grew light within his breast. From the time he had left the shores of France he had met with nothing but disappointments, and though this is hardly the place, yet we cannot refrain from enumerating a few of them.

For motives best known to themselves, the French promised to afford the Young Pretender all the assistance, both in the shape of troops and pecuniary supplies, that lay in their power.

Upon the faith of this, and backed by the repeated invitations of the Earl of Mar, Lord Lovat, and other powerful Scottish noblemen, the Young Pretender embarked on board a ship of war of 18 guns, which was joined off Belleisle by the Elizabeth and other ships.

On their way to Scotland, however, they were unlucky enough to fall in with a British man-of-war, the Lion, commanded by Captain Brett, who immediately bore down upon the Elizabeth, the crew of which defended themselves with the greatest valour and resolution; and although, in the end, they obtained a victory over the English ship, it was at the destruction of nearly all their own ships, and the Elizabeth was totally disabled; but she managed, after incredible difficulty, to get back to Brest.

This was a serious blow to the Pretender's enterprise. Not only did it render those he had with him dissatisfied, but the loss was very great, as the Elizabeth carried, besides arms and ammunition for several thousand men, nearly four hundred thousand pounds sterling.

But, undismayed by this disaster, the gallant young prince continued on his way to Scotland, where he landed on the Isle of Skye.

And now he met with a fresh disappointment. The French suddenly backed out of the affair—or virtually so—leaving him resourceless on a hostile shore.

The consequence of this disaffection of the French was, that many of the powerful noblemen, upon whose representations and fidelity he had relied, fell off also.

But, undaunted where many would have been cast down, the young prince persevered against the adverse tide which fortune poured upon him, and in the end gained the partizanship of the Camerons, from which moment things had looked better; and therefore, in consideration of all these circumstances, it is no wonder that he should experience a glow of joy when he positively saw the nucleus of an army gathering around him.

CHAPTER CXCVI.

PRINCE CHARLES RAISES HIS STANDARD, AND RECEIVES A STARTLING COMMUNICATION FROM TOM KING.

AGAIN and again he bowed to the assembled multitude, and, amid the acclamations of all present, the young prince gave the order for his standard to be raised and his colours unfurled.

This was done by brave old Tullibardine.

The flag was made of silk, and double the size of any that had been formerly used—the colours white, blue, and red silk.

A soldier assisted the old highland warrior to support the long, heavy staff, the sharp point of which could not be made to enter the hard, rocky soil.

The spot where the flag was raised is still pointed out. It may be seen to this day by the curious reader who may take the trouble to make a pilgrimage to Glenfinnan; for, in order that the event should never be forgotten, Macdonald of Glennaladel erected a small stone tower upon the spot, with an inscription on the base in Gaelic Latin and English commemorative of the occurrence.

Then, while the beautiful flag streamed out in the pure mountain air, Prince Charles, amid a profound silence, read a manifesto from his father James Stuart, and the commission of regency.

This over, he made a short but energetic speech to the men, which was received with loud shouts of joy, while, in the words of an eye-witness, "such loud huzzas and skimming of bonnets up into the air, appearing like a cloud, was not heard of a long time."

The hearts of all beat high with hope.

And now our four highwaymen, thinking it quite time they declared themselves, pushed forward as well as they were able, and reached at last the base of the little eminence upon which the Pretender was standing.

At the moment they thus appeared, Cameron of Lochiel, who was standing with his hand clasped by that of his prince, perceived them, and said something in a low tone to Charles Stuart, who turned round abruptly.

It was evident that at the first glance he did not recognise the highwaymen, but that was scarcely more than they had expected, for the night when their singular encounter took place was a very dark one, and he must necessarily have obtained only an imperfect view of their countenances.

Moreover, if Dick had forgotten the adventure altogether, how very likely it was that the young prince would do so.

"Excuse us, your royal highness," said Tom King, "but I have fulfilled a promise I made to you some time back. Do you remember giving me this ring?"

As he spoke, Tom held out between his finger-tips the bauble of which he spoke.

Lochiel took it from him, and placed it in the hands of the prince.

"Ha!" he said, as the well-remembered jewel met his gaze. "You are the two men who attacked me while disguised. I was on my way from London."

"You were, my prince, and then, if you recollect, we made a promise, which you were pleased to sanction, to the effect that, as soon as we heard you had raised your standard, we would hasten to enrol ourselves beneath it."

"You did so," said Charles Stuart, "and you are here. Believe me, you are most welcome. The incident, from its very peculiar nature, has frequently been present in my mind; but there seems to be four of you! How is that?"

"We will pardon us, my prince, for bringing with us two of our dearest friends, who will espouse your cause with equal warmth as ourselves."

"That needs no pardon. The more who join us, the easier will it be for me to regain possession of my own, and the more bloodless will be the struggle."

"I thank your royal highness," said Tom King. "There is another matter, of the gravest importance, about which I wish to speak, but would fain find some more fitting opportunity."

"Indeed!"

"The matter is important—yet not urgent."

"I will then dismiss the clans shortly, and, when that is done, do you repair to yonder cottage, where I am at present lodged, and there you shall have your say to me."

As he uttered these words, the prince gracefully held out his hand in true royal fashion.

Respectfully Tom took it in his, and, bending down over it, with his hat in his left hand, just touched it with his lips.

In this he was followed by his companions, and then all four withdrew.

The business with the soldiers lasted for some time longer yet, but at last they were all dispersed.

Ere Tom could gain his promised audience with the prince, the day was almost spent, for the sun had withdrawn his rays from the water of the lake and was sinking fast behind the mountains.

As the reader is aware, Tom's business with Charles Stuart was the restoration of the papers which had been taken from the wallet of the unfortunate messenger.

He went alone, though his comrades were close at hand.

Upon receiving permission to enter, Tom found himself in a small, scantily-furnished room in a cottage.

Besides the young prince himself, there were present several chieftains of note.

All looked with great curiosity at Tom King, but especially was he regarded by Lochiel.

"Your royal highness," he said, "I must request you to keep secret who and what I am, or, rather, in what character you found me."

"Willingly."

"Then, if you will have patience to hear what I have to say, I will put it into as few words as possible."

"Is it so important?" asked one of the chiefs present, and who, by his appearance, he surmised to be the Earl of Mar.

"I think it so. If you will permit me to commence, I will tell you, and then leave you to judge."

There was no reply to this speech, so Tom began—

"The intelligence, my prince, that you had landed in Scotland fell into my hands in a strange manner. A little more than a week ago, while in the midland counties of England, I was travelling the high-road to Warwick, in company with my three friends, whom you have this day seen. We had been in the saddle many hours, and our steeds were tired, so we led them into a meadow on the road-side, in order that they might have a rest.

"We, too, were tired, and glad enough to lie down on the turf beside our steeds.

"Not for long, however, had we been in this position, when, in the distance, we heard the faint sound produced by the coming of a troop of horsemen.

"Having no idea who they were, we did not attempt to move, but resolved to lie still, and allow them to pass us.

"To our surprise, however, the horsemen—there were six of them—drew up in the lane exactly before the hedge behind which we lay concealed."

"A strange coincidence," said the Young Pretender, who felt a deep and immediate interest in the narrative, which is scarcely to be wondered at, for it was well calculated to excite it, and the feeling was shared in by all the grim highland chiefs around him.

"What to make of it we knew not," continued Tom King, "and, as we were fugitives, the idea very naturally took possession of our minds that they had some special reference to us, and that they had halted where they did because they knew it to be our hiding-place.

"But we soon found this, our first surmise, to be an incorrect one, for one of the mounted men spoke—

"'This place will do as well as any,' fancy,' he said, 'if you are quite sure he will pass here.'

"Then another one replied—

"'We are quite sure of that.'

"'Then get behind the hedge and wait,' said the one who had first spoken, and who, for certain, was the commander of the others.

"And now I ought not to forget to mention that, filled with curiosity, we crept silently close to the hedge, and peered through it, in order to see what kind of men they were.

"Although it was night, we were well able to do this, for the moon was shining with unusual brightness, and brought to view the smallest objects.

"We saw, then, in the first place, that the strange and mysterious new-comers were in number six, and that they were each mounted on a steed of more than average quality.

"All six, we found, were dressed precisely alike, in dark-coloured vestments, and there was no distinction, in dress at least, between them. The one who had the command bore about him no distinguishing token by which he could be recognised from the others.

"When the order was given to conceal themselves behind the hedge, we looked upon our discovery as certain, but, strangely enough, they chose the one on the opposite side of the way.

"They leaped over into the meadow, and then lay perfectly still.

"What to make of all this we knew not; and while we were only ruminating upon the subject, the silence was disturbed by the faint clatter of horses' feet.

"We did not require to listen twice to know that it was a single rider who was approaching, nor that his steed was coming at a gallop.

"Clearly, you will think the men behind the hedge were lying in ambush for the one we heard coming, but we had no grounds sufficient for us to act, nor did we see how we were to interfere.

"On the horseman came, and at length he came in sight.

"For some reason or other, he reined in his steed as he reached the ambuscade.

"At last he came opposite to it.

"Just as he did so, a loud voice cried, in startling tones—

"'Halt!'"

"The horseman who had just arrived, we saw wore a kind of military costume, and it was only natural that he should obey the order with the promptitude he did.

"He checked his steed.

"But before he could look around, and ascertain from whence or from whom the order had come, we heard a loud report, as of the discharge of several muskets, and then the horseman, uttering a loud scream of agony, fell headlong, with his steed, into the roadway.

"A cloud of thin blue vapour for a moment hid all things from our sight, but a puff of wind carried it completely away."

CHAPTER CXCVII.

OUR FRIENDS ARE APPOINTED AS BODY-GUARD TO THE YOUNG PRINCE.

When Tom King reached this point in his narrative, he paused for breath, for he had spoken rapidly, and without stopping.

To his surprise, he found himself surrounded, hemmed in by a crowd of eager faces, for, as he had gone on, his auditors had, in the intensity of their interest, lessened little by little the space which intervened between them until they could positively come no closer.

However, when he paused, they drew back again, but they were still intent and listening eagerly for the next word he should utter.

Not only was there the interest the narrative itself excited, but in addition the fact pressed sternly upon them that all that they had hitherto heard was but the prelude of something that closely touched themselves.

"Proceed!" said the young prince; "let us hear the revel of this most mysterious and horrible affair."

"It will, your royal highness. As you may easily surmise, we were at first completely overwhelmed with horror, and were unable to move; but soon another phase in the drama developed itself, which had the effect of immediately restoring to us the use of our lost faculties.

"There was a movement on the opposite side of the hedge where the assassins had concealed themselves.

"Doubtless they were about to consummate their hellish purpose.

"But the sound, slight as it was, was enough to release us from the enchainment of our minds, and as if dominated by the same impulse, we all four sprang to our feet and dashed into the lane.

"Before, however, we could reach the spot where the murdered man lay, the six men had crawled through the hedge on their side.

"We met over the dead body—for both parties directed their steps to that one point, and reached it at the same moment.

"We had our swords drawn, and the hilts tightly in our grasp.

"So had they.

"Moreover, they out-numbered us; for, as I have said, they were six, we were four.

"We did not make an attack upon them, however, without first demanding an explanation of the causes that led to the commission of the foul deed we had witnessed; but, beyond saying that he was a traitor and a rebel, we could learn nothing.

"The man they had shot down was not dead; though, of course, had it not been for our intervention, they would quickly have extinguished the last spark of life remaining in his body.

"In brief, we fought the villains—for they are deserving of no better name—and worsted them.

"All but two were beaten to the ground, and these, in the most abject manner, sued for quarter, which we did not hesitate to grant to them, on condition of their throwing down their arms, and telling us all they knew of the affair.

"It was from the lips of these men that I first learned, my prince, that you had landed on the northern shores of Scotland, and were about to raise an army and invade England.

"In addition to this they told us that information had been given by a spy, that a messenger from you to the chief Jacobites in London would pass that way, and that he would carry with him papers of vast importance.

"To our inquiries whether that was the reason why they had been sent out upon such a brutal errand, they answered in the affirmative. And the sole reason they could give for the sanguinary deed was, that it was expected to find upon his person a list of names which would enable them to arrest the principal adherents to the house of Stuart then residing in London or its vicinity."

A loud, angry, guttural shout came from the throats of the highland chieftains and Prince Charles as they were made the recipients of this news, and their pale, stern faces, showed how deeply they felt the danger in which their cause and lives had been.

But the deep desire they felt to hear the remnant—for they could tell Tom King's narrative was now rapidly approaching a termination—made them curb as much as possible all outward manifestation of their feelings.

Amid a partial silence he continued—

"These two men, whom we found afterwards were soldiers, we suffered to escape; and then, having done so, we turned our attention to the wounded messenger.

"The moon still shone brightly, and showed us his figure very distinctly.

"The horse was quite dead.

"But his rider lived.

"Assuring him that we were friends, he with his latest breath confirmed what the men had told us, and, having given a cheer for Prince Charlie, he expired."

The eyes of the bold highlanders glistened, and the angry expression of their faces was softened somewhat when they thought of the loyalty of their countryman.

"And now," said Tom, "I shall be obliged to speak of myself. Believe me, my prince, that I am sincerely devoted to your cause; and so I resolved that, come what might, papers of so dangerous a character to you as I supposed those were carried by the messenger, should never fall into your enemies' hands; and so, loathsome as the task was, I stooped down to search the pockets of the murdered man.

"The result of that search, my prince, is here. I tender you the papers in the same condition as I found them in the wallet of the messenger. They have been in my possession ever since, and during that time they have been touched and read by no one."

With these words, Tom King took from his pocket the packets of papers, and bending upon one knee, presented them to his prince.

Blood was upon them in many places.

And now the highlanders, but for the respect they felt for young Charles Stuart, would have crowded around our friend with every manifestation of friendship; but as it was, they held back.

The prince rose from the rude chair in the cottage, upon which he had been sitting, at the same time extending his hand to Tom King, and assisting him to rise likewise.

Then he placed his right hand upon the shoulder of the highwayman and spoke.

The tones of his voice were deep and fervent.

"For the great service you have rendered me," he said, I shall never be able to show myself sufficiently grateful. I am poor in thanks, and never had the gift of eloquently expressing myself in words. But, if I cannot speak, I can act, and you will find that I shall do so on the present occasion in a manner that will please and satisfy all; for, had these papers been taken possession of by our foes, we should have been irredeemably ruined."

Tom bowed.

There was a pleased feeling at his heart.

He had done a service, and it had been appreciated.

Still he did not wish the young chivalric prince to bestow the meed of honour upon him only, and, therefore, he took the earliest opportunity to state that his three friends had been animated by precisely the same feelings as he had, and desired that they might meet with a reward equal to his own.

This speech still further increased the admiration which the highlanders felt for our friend, for, let them have been as rude and unpolished as they may, they yet were able to properly appreciate magnanimity and courage — two qualities that must of necessity ever go together.

"Call them hither," said the prince.

This was done.

Our three friends, who had been outside during the whole of this scene, received the summons to enter with some surprise.

"It fills my heart with joy," said Prince Charles, as he gazed upon the forms of the four highwaymen, "and I am sure it must all those friends who are here present, to gaze upon such staunch friends to our cause, and such brave men. But," he added, turning to Tom King, "it is to you that I feel myself most specially indebted, and so I say to you, name your own reward for what you have done."

"I am more than repaid," replied Tom, "by possessing the kind opinion of your royal highness."

This speech pleased and flattered the Pretender.

It seemed as though he already held the sceptre in his grasp.

"But," he added, "there must be something you can wish for. Let me know what it is you wish to please me. If in my power, your request shall be granted."

"We have no other wish than to serve your royal highness," replied Tom King. "Will you permit us to join your ranks?"

"We have already done so," replied Charles, "but I will name something. I admire you. You are all four truly brave men, and I should like you to form a species of body-guard about my person. Will you do this?"

"Willingly, my prince! I am glad you made the proposal, for it is one I should never have presumed to ask myself. You will indeed confer a high honour upon us, and reward our services more richly than they deserve."

"Not so—not so!" replied the prince. "What is your opinion, my friends?" he continued, turning to the chiefs, who were around him. "Can I place too high a value upon the service which these men have collectively and individually rendered us?"

"No—no!" they cried, with one accord. "No—no! Hurrah! for the brave Southrons!"

As soon as the tumult had a little subsided, Lochiel stepped forward.

He looked upon our friends.

"Do you accept," he asked, "the post which your prince offers you? Are you content with that as a reward for all that you have done?"

"We are more than satisfied! We will defend him to the last gasp, and he need fear nothing from his enemies while we are round him."

Little by little the story of the assassinated messenger was diffused among the troops; and so, ere long, the four highwaymen found themselves treated wherever they went with the greatest consideration and respect.

Better days we hope are in store for them than any they have yet seen, but at present we have only the hope to rely upon.

We must, with what patience we can, continue to watch the progress of events as we have hitherto done.

CHAPTER CXCVIII.

THE YOUNG PRETENDER SUFFERS HIMSELF TO BE DELUDED BY HIS TRANSIENT TRIUMPHS.

EVERY hour which now elapsed only served to show fresh men flocking to the standard of the Pretender, whose troops now began to assume the appearance of a regular army.

But all these proceedings had not taken place without attracting a great deal of notice to them, and the result was that Sir John Cope, the commander-in-chief of the forces in the south of Scotland, received instructions to raise what force he could, and march against the rebels.

Intelligence of this soon reached the Pretender's camp, who, under the advice of his chiefs, set his troops in motion, and began his march southward, their avowed object being to take possession of the palace of St. James's, in London.

By the intimate knowledge of the mountain passes which some of the highlanders possessed, they were able, without much trouble, to elude the force under Sir John Cope.

The two armies passed each other in Argyleshire, and the young prince proceeded to Perth.

Of this place they took possession, without the least resistance being offered them; in fact, they were much strengthened, for they were joined by the Duke of Perth, Lord Murray, Lord Nairn, and many others of less note, yet all powerful men.

Flushed with their success, and auguring from it the most favourable conclusions, the rebel army left Perth behind them, and pushed forward rapidly, the point to which they were directing their steps being the city of Edinburgh.

This they reached in three days.

They found the ancient city in a very defenceless state, and, as their numbers were now very formidable, they took possession of it with very little trouble.

Here they supplied themselves with arms and ammunition, and on the following day marched out to attack the royal army under the command of General Cope.

The two opposing forces came in sight of each other at a place which will be ever memorable in English history.

This was Preston Pans.

Early in the morning the Pretender's troops made a furious attack upon their foes, and threw them into unspeakable confusion.

The conflict was a desperate one, but at length the Young Pretender gained a complete victory over his foes, and compelled them to fly before him like chaff before the wind.

Still more elated, they marched back to Edinburgh, and the next morning attacked the castle, which had been put in the best possible posture for defence by the governor.

But it would seem that the rebels were destined to carry all before them.

They were now, at least, twelve thousand strong.

Leaving Edinburgh, and indulging in the wildest hopes of ultimate success, they determined to penetrate into England.

In accordance with this determination, they proceeded to Carlisle, and, much to the surprise of the inhabitants of that city, they were discovered one morning as the fog cleared off surrounding the walls.

This unexpected sight filled them with a panic from which they never recovered. The most exaggerated accounts had reached them of the power of the rebels, and they felt that their last hour was come.

But, when the attack was made upon this city, great difficulty was experienced in carrying it, for a desperate resistance was made at the eleventh hour. It, however, availed nothing. The young prince was again a victor.

It can easily be understood how rapidly people would flock to his standard under such circumstances as these; and, indeed, the manner in which their numbers increased was really astounding.

The French, too, now that they saw some prospect of the Pretender carrying out his original intention, hastened to send arms, ammunition, and money to his assistance, all of which were very thankfully received.

But during this time the English Government was not idle, and the king thought fit to send his son, the Duke of Cumberland, at the head of eight battalions, and nine squadrons just returned from service abroad, to march against them.

But, in the meanwhile, the young prince, by the counsel of his officers, lost no time in following up the advantages he had gained, and he continued his course for some time longer into the very heart of England.

It will be noticed that we have not entered into the details of this episode in the lives of the highwaymen. There is so little always to vary the monotony of a soldier's life, almost constantly on duty, that particulars would but be destructive to interest.

In consequence of the favour with which they were looked on by the prince and the whole body of the soldiery, they fared much better than many of the others did. From this circumstance, however, it must not be inferred that they had no privations to endure, but then they were tolerably inured to hardships of all kinds.

As, however, the rebel army got farther into England, so did their dangers and difficulties increase. They no longer met with the easy victories which they had done hitherto. Every point had to be contended with the sword's point.

And now, to add to the young chief's troubles, disaffection arose among the troops. The highland chiefs, as they got nearer to the object, got more and more frightened at its magnitude, and would willingly have withdrawn.

England was to them a terra incognita, and they advanced with much the same feelings as the ancients when first prosecuting their discoveries.

It was in vain the prince exhorted them not to leave him and abandon his enterprise when so close upon achievement. They grew more obstinate, and at last refused to proceed altogether.

This was a dilemma which the prince was very far from anticipating.

There was, of course, much danger in advancing, but, perhaps, not any more than there would be in retreating. Either way they would have to cut their way through an army, for they were menaced both in front and rear.

To remain undecided, moving neither one way or the other, would be utter ruin, for it would give time for the two armies to coalesce, and then, hemmed in completely, what could they hope to do?

At last they began that disastrous retreat, so well remembered by the student of English history, and which, while it crushed the present rising, effectually put an end to all hopes of the Stuarts regaining possession of the throne.

It was with heavy and reluctant hearts that our friends turned their backs upon their undertaking. Such a course was entirely foreign to their nature. Rather than have retreated, they would have walked boldly and fearlessly to certain death.

But, under existing circumstances, what could they do? The more they saw of the young prince, the more they liked him, and the more deeply they sympathised with his unfortunate situation. With that chivalric feeling, which formed so important an element in their dispositions, they resolved to stand by him to the last.

The post of body-guard, to which they had been appointed, they maintained throughout the whole of the campaign.

Between the young Pretender and Tom King there arose a warm feeling of friendship. At his earnest solicitations, the highwayman had acquainted him with the melancholy details of his history.

Their ages, too, were similar; and so this friendship, strange as it may at first sight seem, was not much to be wondered at.

Nearly did all four feel for the distress of the Pretender when his army, of which he had had such great expectations, fairly turned their backs upon London, and began their retreat.

Sanguine and enthusiastic as he was, he had continued to hope on, and had never allowed himself to be cast down by any adverse circumstance. Now, however, it was impossible for him to hope any longer; the bright vision which he had had before him from the earliest moment of his existence faded away.

From town to town, from city to city, they went, enduring greater hardships than could be conceived, and those of the populace who had been favourable to them, when there was a chance of their gaining their ends, now turned against them with the utmost fury.

The consequence of this was, that all order was lost. The troops no longer marched in companies, but diffused themselves in every direction, committing excesses of all kinds.

It may be imagined with what different feelings the young prince re-entered the towns of which he had taken possession during his advance. Then his heart was elate with joy. He saw in the distance the great project of his life achieved. Now all was at an end.

No matter what may be the prejudices or new sympathies of any one, it is impossible not to feel a deep interest and pity for the fate of this young man.

Like his father before him, he had only been made the tool of others, who desired to gain their own ends, not his.

At length the borders of Scotland were reached, and the soldiers, now that they found their feet upon their native soil, felt ashamed of their fears, and expressed a return of that bravery and courage for which they have always been celebrated.

They resolved even yet not to abandon the Pretender's cause, but make a bold and vigorous stand.

But it was too late.

Awful words!

They seem like a death knell.

Too late!

The resolution was one that should have been made long ago.

The government had had time to take such measures as would effectually crush the insurrection, even though it was thrice as great and thrice as powerful as it then was.

The king's troops, under the command of the Duke of Cumberland, were hard upon their track.

Sanguine to the last, the Pretender hoped that this most desperate chance would enable him to retrieve his shattered fortunes.

CHAPTER CXCIX.

WHICH RELATES HOW THE REBEL ARMY AND THE KING'S TROOPS FOUGHT A PITCHED BATTLE UPON CULLODEN MOOR.

Not to weary the reader too much with historic details, we will pass over all the minor incidents which occurred, and present to him a scene full of grandeur, magnificence, and horror.

It is the night before the battle of Culloden—that struggle upon which depended everything.

The two armies had halted at some distance from each other; but both, having decided on a pitched battle, determined to abide the issue of the day.

In the rebel camp—for such we must perforce denominate it—all is bustle and excitement, despite the fatigue from which all suffered.

The young prince was much agitated, nor could all the assurances of his friends tend in any way to calm him.

He felt with full intensity the importance of the coming struggle.

But there was a little tent pitched not far from the one appropriated to the use of the Pretender, and, from among all the others dotted over the plain, we select that one for our especial consideration.

The weather was bitter cold, but in this tent there blazed, in a kind of iron-basket in the centre, a good fire, round which were seated four familiar faces.

Does the reader require to be told who they are?

The fatigue and harassment of the campaign had left its traces upon them.

They were pale and thin, with their features sharp and sunken.

All but Tom King looked sombre.

He all through had felt, and still continued to feel, as deep an interest in the whole struggle as though he had been the prince himself, and though he felt ill at ease about the morrow yet his enthusiasm would not allow him to show it.

He was elate.

"Do not look so moody, my friends," he said. "From to-morrow all will be changed, for I have still the greatest confidence in the highland broadswords. There is not a man who is not fully conscious that all will depend upon this day's issue."

"That may be," said Claude Duval; "and I sincerely trust that so it may turn out, but I fear it will not."

"And I," said Sixteen-String Jack; "in fact, I look upon the Pretender's cause as perfectly hopeless."

"But you will not desert it on that account?" asked Tom, eagerly.

"Certainly not. Having gone so far, I will see the end."

"And you, Dick?"

"Of course, I shall remain with you. I hope we shall all cling together! To-morrow will be a sharp contest. Hitherto, you must remember, we have been fortunate enough to escape without a wound. Whether we shall do so or not to-morrow is another matter."

"Do not anticipate evil, Dick," said King. "You seem very gloomy to-night; to be sure, there is cause for gloominess."

"It may be, Tom, that this is destined to be the last time we shall all four sit together. I do feel very heavy at my heart, but that is a thing no one can help."

"For one," said Duval, "I always cling to the belief that there sometimes comes such things as presentiments of danger."

"Talk upon some other subject," said Tom King. "The more you dwell upon such imaginary evils, the more terrible they become."

"True—true! But let me ask you to speak candidly, and say what chance you think there is of any good coming of this rash undertaking."

"Things do not look very promising just now, to be sure," replied King; "but yet I do not despair."

"Nor I, exactly; but from one of the spies I learned the British army is much superior to ours in point of numbers and weapons; and not only that, the men are all thoroughly rested."

"Which cannot be said of ours," chimed in Sixteen-String Jack. "Such a miserable lot of half-starved wretches I never remember to have seen."

"But they have true courage and are strong, and so the king's troops will find them to-morrow."

"You will, perhaps, think it foolish," said Dick Turpin, "but I cannot divest myself of the idea that fate has all along been unpropitious to this enterprise. There has been nothing gained as yet, and I do not believe there ever will. Too much valuable time was wasted at the first—time which they should have employed in active operations against the enemy. Time lost can never be regained. It afforded the government the opportunity of concerting the most summary proceedings against us. Tom, my friend, rely upon it, we have lost the day. The young prince, Charles Edward Stuart, will retire into that obscurity from which he has emerged, and never be heard of more."

Tom King shook his head.

"I am of that opinion," said Duval.

"And so am I," coincided Jack.

"You are all against me, then?" said Tom; and as he asked the question, there was just the least tinge of vexation perceptible in the tone of his voice.

"We are."

"I am sorry to hear you say as much," he replied, "very sorry."

"But in a few hours we shall know the worst."

"Or the best."

"Yes, or the best; but I should say the former would be most likely as regards ourselves."

"I cannot help your being of such an opinion; but, my friends, for the sake of all of us, and for the sake of the young prince, who has acted so well to us, do not go out to-morrow to the conflict with such thoughts as those upon your minds."

"How can it be helped?"

"That I leave to yourselves; but you cannot do otherwise than agree with me in saying that were such a feeling general throughout the army, defeat would be inevitable."

"So it would."

"Confidence in a cause or undertaking goes a long way towards insuring its success."

"I know that," said Turpin, "and will try my best to look on the bright side of things. You ought to know that I am not one given to despondence."

"That is true, I admit."

"Look here, Tom, I will promise you this, and I should not be afraid to say that Claude and Jack will promise you the same thing."

"What is it?"

"Why, that to-morrow—or, rather, to-day, for it is now long past midnight—in the struggle we will, as much for your sake as anything, cast our own feelings and prejudices on one side, and use our best individual exertions in the coming fray. Do you promise, Jack?"

"Willingly."

"And you, Claude?"

"Most certainly."

"I am glad to hear as much," said Tom King; "do not forget, I pray, how much depends upon the issue of to-morrow's conflict. It will either make or ruin us."

"No, no," said Turpin, "I will not say that."

"Why not?"

"Because it would not be true."

"But I maintain it would."

"How can that be?"

"Explain yourself."

"With all my heart. I grant, in the first place, that if the Young Pretender"——

"He is no pretender."

"Well, then, the young prince. I say I am willing to grant that if he gains the day our position may be much bettered; but I do not see that it follows we should be any worse off if he loses than we were before we joined ourselves to his fortunes."

"I don't say we should; but what I meant was, there would be no hope of quitting our late mode of life upon the road."

"Nor, to tell the truth," said Dick Turpin, "do I particularly wish to do so. Next to it, the life of a soldier must be most adventurous and exciting, but I am sure I shall never prefer it."

"And shall you never tire of the highway?"

"Who knows? I fear there is not much chance of our doing anything else. Our lives are now doubly forfeit, and to hope for pardon or mercy would be mere folly. As we have been so must we be."

"Let us defer the consideration of that until after the battle. But there is one point in connexion with it which we have not hitherto touched upon, but yet which I should like you to attentively consider."

"What is it, Tom? Speak out."

"I will. Let us suppose the battle over, the king's troops victorious, and the young prince defeated."

"That is a very rational and probable supposition, indeed," broke in Claude Duval.

"It may be."

"But go on."

"Will you listen to me?"

"Certainly we will."

"Well, then," resumed Tom, who was not altogether pleased with his companions' manner, "supposing that things should eventuate in the manner I have spoken of, the young prince's position, assuming that he should escape death or capture, will be a most dangerous one, will it not?"

"It will, indeed."

"But what should you do under the circumstances?"

"In what way?"

"I mean should you depart in the best way you are able, or should you consider it your duty to stick by Prince Charlie to the last?"

"I don't know for the last"——

"I mean until we have seen him disposed in some place of safety. Whether you do or not, I consider that you are in duty bound to do so. He appointed us, as a token of his esteem, to be his body guard, and that, too, at a time when thing looked promising; and no amount of reasoning will make me think it less than an act of baseness to desert him in the hour of difficulty and danger."

"You are chivalric, Tom, to a degree."

"No matter, I feel that I am right."

"And so do we. Until you mentioned it, we never gave the matter the least thought; but rest assured, let the fortune of war be what it will, we, like you, will hold by him until we see him in safety—seated either on the British throne, or landed on some shore where he will be out of the reach of his foes."

"We are, then, it seems, quite agreed upon this point. I am glad of it. But morning cannot be far distant; let us, ere it comes, obtain what sleep and rest we can, for who knows how long it may be before we have another opportunity?"

CHAPTER CC.

DICK TURPIN SAVES THE LIFE OF CHARLES STUART, THE YOUNG PRETENDER, AT THE BATTLE OF CULLODEN.

MISTILY, gloomily, coldly, and cheerlessly dawned the morning which preceded the dread battle of Culloden.

So dark was it that neither army was astir until a much later hour than they had intended.

The heavens were covered with one huge black cloud, which, like a funeral pall, hid the face of the god of day, whose beams should otherwise, for an hour before, have revivified the earth.

Prince Charles, when he perceived the aspect of the weather, and noted the absence of the sun, drew an unfavourable augury from both events, and allowed his spirits to become proportionably depressed.

Unlike the savage and ruthless Duke or Gloster, he was not endued with that philosophic force which Shakspeare has, in common with many of his other characters, assigned to him; and so the young prince could not chase away the ominous effect it had upon him by thinking, as he did, upon a similar occurrence in the well-remembered scene before the battle of Bosworth Field, where he asks who has seen the sun, and is replied to, that he has not yet broken forth:—

> Then he disdains to shine—for by the clock,
> He should have braved the east an hour ago:
> Not shine to-day! Why, what is that to me,
> More than to Richmond? for the self-same heaven
> That frowns on me, looks lowering upon him!

But, as we have said, the young prince could not draw consolation from such a source; and though those around him endeavoured to rally him, the attempt was unsuccessful.

It was nearly eleven o'clock in the forenoon before the opposing forces fairly came in contact with each other; but, from that moment, a struggle commenced of so sanguinary a character as had never before been known.

The highlanders, although some discontent had arisen respecting the position the several clans occupied, behaved with great valour and intrepidity.

To add to their difficulties, a fine, sharp, sleety rain, of that kind so common in Scotland, began to fall. It was carried by a high wind into their faces, which, accustomed as they were to inclement weather, baffled and confused them.

As for the royalists, they felt comparatively little or no inconvenience from it, for they had the wind and rain to their backs instead of to their faces.

It has been general on the part of those antagonistic to the Stuart cause to describe the young scion, Charles Edward, as a young man destitute of personal courage, and especially is the statesman Horace Walpole noticeable for this, but there are two sides to all questions, and it is hardly likely that we should be correctly portrayed by our enemies.

The fact was, since Charles had found it necessary and advisable to adopt the costume of his own men in order that he might not be recognizable from the mass except by those who knew him. As must be well known to all, the government had offered a reward of £30,000 to any one who should take him prisoner either dead or alive, and we shall see presently how this circumstance actually turned out favourable to the prince, instead of adverse, as any one would think.

The four highwaymen, with him in their centre, could be seen in the very thickest of the fray, urging the men to make still greater efforts, and using every possible argument they could to induce them to do so.

Very soon, however, was the disagreeable conviction forced upon those best qualified to form an opinion that the hope of the Stuarts gaining a victory was but slight indeed. The highlanders, bold as they were, could not make any impression on the English bayonet—the most formidable of all weapons in the hands of a determined infantry.

Onwards—imperceptibly at first, but yet there was a movement—came the British troops, and, as a matter of course, as they pressed forward, so did the highlanders retreat.

But the advantage gained by the king's troops was only temporary. The moor in many places was little better than a treacherous bog or morass, and, fearful lest the soft, oozy mud should ingulf them, they held back.

This moment was seized upon by the prince's troops to make a furious charge upon their foes, nor was the opportunity ill-chosen.

Prince Charles himself, mounted upon a powerful war-horse, and surrounded by his body-guard, the four highwaymen, led the way; and this was an act which excited the utmost enthusiasm of his men, and made them second his efforts with unparalleled intrepidity.

The royalist troops wavered.

One of the first to note this was the prince.

Joy, and triumph, and hope beamed in his eye; and, holding his claymore aloft, he cried aloud to his followers in their native tongue.

They dashed impetuously onwards.

But the royalists had received a reinforcement, and came to a stand.

The infantry sank down, and presented a triple row of bristling steel bayonets, which looked as solid as a wall.

And here, it should be stated, that the Duke of Cumberland, brother to King George the Second, and commander of the troops, found a new mode of using the bayonet, which was put into execution with terrible effect.

It may be briefly described in a few words.

The usual plan was for the bayonet-man to attack the swordsman facing him; but, instead of this, the left-hand bayonet-man attacked the swordsman fronting his right-hand man. From this it will be seen that he was covered by his adversary's target, where he was open on his left, and his adversary's right was open to him.

This change produced an inconceivable difference.

Puzzled at this fresh mode of fighting, the highlanders staggered.

Following up their advantage the bayonet-men pressed more closely upon them, until they forced them to retreat.

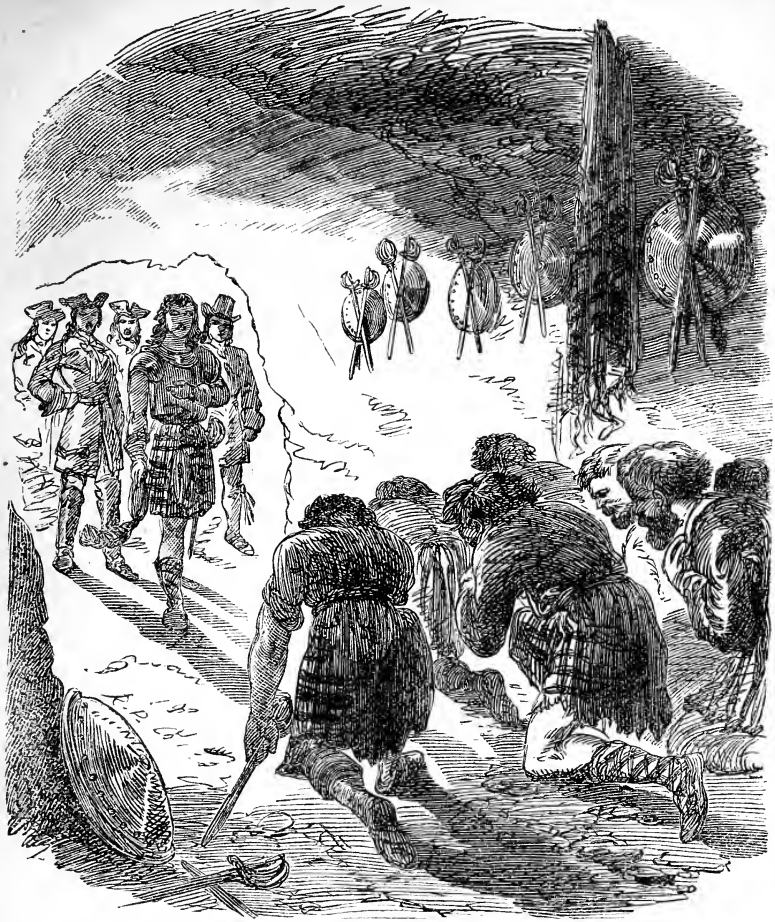
It was in vain that the young prince and the gallant hearts he had around him strove to once more rally their almost defeated troops. They were deaf to all commands, all entreaties, and all threats; and, at last, fairly turned and fled.

Prince Charles made a bold stand to the last, resolved that no effort of his own should be wanting to insure the victory; but, while in the very act of beating back an enemy, his claymore, which had hitherto served him so well, snapped off suddenly, about six inches from the hilt, leaving him, for a moment, utterly defenceless.

His foes pressed closely upon him, and one would assuredly have taken his life had not Dick Turpin, with the greatest promptitude, sprung forward, aimed a pistol, hastily drew the trigger, and fired.

The reader knows already that it was very rarely indeed Dick missed his mark; and this time he assuredly did not, for the soldier, with an awful death-shriek, fell backwards on the battle-field.

"Alight, my prince!" cried Turpin, hurriedly. "Down! down! it is our only chance! They are upon us!"



Seizing the Young Pretender by the arm, he half-dragged, half-assisted him from his horse.

Then followed a volley of musketry, which, if he had been in the saddle, would assuredly have riddled the prince with bullets.

As it was, he was safe, or comparatively so, but the king's troops at that moment made a sudden charge.

Both turned to fly.

The prince had hold of the highwayman by one arm

[THE BANDITTI IN THE CAVERN AFFORD THE FUGITIVE PRINCE PROTECTION.]

But one or both of them, in their blind haste, caught their feet against some obstacle, and were thrown heavily to the ground.

Ere they could regain their feet, something fell with terrific force upon them.

The next moment the right wing of the royal army rushed over them at full speed.

Tom King, Sixteen-String Jack, and Claude Duval had, in the rapid encounter, got in some way separated from them.

They were on foot, and armed to the teeth, and well, indeed, was it for their safety that they were, for the tide of battle that drifted them from the side of the prince carried them into the very thickest of the fight, where they had to use every exertion to defend themselves.

As it was, Claude Duval was struck down by a bullet, and as his companions feared, killed, and though they would fain have ascertained the extent of his injuries, and, if possible, have got him on his feet, yet they were unable to do so without running the risk of being thrown down and trampled to death, so impetuous was this last and decisive charge of the king's troops.

Like the rest, therefore, they scattered before it, and finding that there was no hope of gaining the day, and that their lives depended upon their speedy flight, they managed to escape with only one or two trifling hurts.

But when, after for an hour or so fleeing from their foes, they sunk exhausted on the ground, they began to entertain the most serious misgivings for their companion's fate, and for the young prince's also.

But the only chance they had of safety was to remain where they were for some time, at least.

So soon, however, as it was prudent for them to do so, they determined to rise and seek them.

The hearts of both were heavy, and, not only that, they were filled with disappointment; Tom King especially so, for he had, up to the last, hugged the belief that the Pretender's army would prove the victors.

Now, however, he saw that hope entirely lost. The downfall of the Stuarts was complete, and from such a defeat as that which they met at the fatal battle on Culloden Moor, he felt certain they would never recover.

But we shall see what next took place in this crisis in our friends' affairs.

CHAPTER CCI.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SEARCH THE BATTLE-FIELD BY TORCHLIGHT FOR THEIR MISSING COMRADES.

It is the night after the battle of Culloden.

The strife of battle is over.

Heaps of dead and dying strew the plain.

From the latter there comes incessantly a terrible groaning sound. At times it is louder than others, as some chill blast of air sweeps over the bleak moor, augmenting the sufferings of those who lie there helpless to move.

The aggregation of sound which rose from the hundreds of parched and burning throats was truly horrible. It was the representative of a world of agony.

An almost full moon showed her face now and then as gaps in the clouds occurred, revealing upon such occasions with greater distinctness the melancholy spectacle.

Different portions of the plain are also brought into vivid relief by pine-wood torches, borne by those who have come to search for some friend or relative among the ghastly mass.

Other figures, too, could have been seen creeping stealthily about. They were the plunderers of the slain.

How much additional pain these wretched carrion caused, no tongue can tell.

Very few upon the battle field who wore the Highland dress were left alive. They had not fallen until they had not breath and strength enough left to stand.

The Duke of Cumberland, with the natural ferocity of his disposition, had given his men the order, in a significant tone, "to take no prisoners."

All knew what was meant, and the savage order was ruthlessly carried out.

Among those who bore torches and searched among the dying and the dead, seeking for a familiar face, were two old friends of the readers.

Each carried a blazing torch in his left hand, and a sword in his right.

The features of both, as they were occasionally seen with more than usual plainness, bore upon them the impress of fatigue and disappointment.

"This is weary work, Tom," said one, after they had one by one displaced a large heap of slain. "Very weary work."

"It is, indeed, Jack," replied the other; "but I hope it will not be fruitless."

"And so do I, indeed. We have met with no success as yet, and we have travelled over no inconsiderable portion of the field."

"We have. None but those who have experienced it can tell what it is to search a place like this. I had no idea how vast it was."

"Nor I, Jack. But do not let us despair."

"No—no."

"I knew you would not."

"I will not."

"It is very strange that we should lose both of them—or, as I might say, all three."

"You think, then, the young prince is on the field."

"I do. I feel almost sure of it, indeed, and for that reason I have done my best to spread a report that he had retreated to Inverness."

"And so, by sending his foes upon a wrong track, give him a better chance of escape."

"Just so, but I tremble for him if he is here wounded anywhere. There are many who know him who would not scruple to deprive him of his life, for, as you know, the reward of £30,000 will be paid to any one who will carry his head to London."

"The Hanoverians are bloodthirsty butchers."

"Right. They do not want him a prisoner. They are by far too merciless. They want him dead, for, while he lives, they just exist in terror."

"Let us hope he will escape from the power of his foes. Poor young man, his lot is a sad one."

"I cannot help pitying him myself, Tom."

"Nor can any one with the least spark of ruth within their bosoms. He has his faults and failings, but then he has had enough to try his temper."

"So he has."

"Just help me, Jack, a moment," said Tom King. "There seems to be some one lying under this great horse. I don't know whether we shall manage it, but let us try to move him. It may be one of those we seek lies underneath him."

"I hope not, for if there is I would not give much for his life! It would be stifled out of them."

"I am afraid it would, but Jack, my friend, you must not, because we have escaped without scarcely a scratch, expect that the others have been equally fortunate. If we find them at all, we shall find them badly wounded, perhaps dead."

"I hope not," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I shall be good for nothing if Claude should be no more."

"It is strange where he could have gone. He was by our side when we were overtaken by that rush and cast down, and I thought he was cast down with us."

"But it seems he was not."

"It does; but you must not forget that, though we made a search for him around the spot where we ourselves rose, it was necessarily an imperfect one, and since that time we have not been able to say with certainty this is the place."

"All that is very true, and I don't dispute a word of it. The plain bears always the same appearance by this light, let you go where you will."

"I am of opinion that we have not reached the spot again where we fell, though, of course, I could not speak positively."

"It may be, Tom," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that Claude has been made a prisoner."

"Very likely he has, and yet I don't know, the order given to the soldiery by the butcher, Cumberland, was to make no prisoners."

"And that is equivalent to no quarter."

"The same thing in other words; but come, my friend, help me to move this horse. We shall be doing some one a good service, for I can hear there is some person beneath who is alive."

"All right; but it will take our whole united strength to move the animal."

"I know it will."

"And we have only got one hand at liberty. What are we to do with the torches?"

"I don't know, hardly."

"Nor I."

"The ground is soft."

"A good thought. We shall, I daresay, be able to stick them upright in the damp soil. Try."

"I will."

After several unsuccessful efforts, the two highwaymen succeeded in sticking their torches perpendicularly in the ground, where they burned almost as well as they did while they held them in their hands.

This done, they turned the whole of their attention to moving the horse to which they had alluded, and which seemed to be lying upon two or three people.

He was unusually large and powerful.

To various portions of his body there clung pieces of harness, the character of which seemed to show that this horse had been used to drag a cannon about the field.

He was quite dead, and his whole body was rigid as marble.

How he came there of course they knew not, but from what they could see, it would appear that he had broken from the gun-carriage, and had either been shot down where he then was, or had fallen there exhausted.

But whichever of these it might be, assuredly did not much matter.

With right goodwill they set about the removal of the gigantic beast, and in doing so they were careful not to inflict any additional injury upon those beneath it.

The task was one almost beyond their strength to accomplish, but at length they succeeded.

The moment afterwards a voice, well known to both, said—

"Many thanks, you have saved my life. I know you, or I am mistaken."

"The prince!" cried Tom King.

"Yes, help me to my feet."

"But are you wounded?"

"I think not. I am bruised by that horse falling upon me, but that is all, and I fancy nothing more ails your companion."

"Companion, my prince! Which one?"

"Turpin."

"Ha!"

"He was with me in the strife, and by great promptitude shot a soldier through the heart, who would otherwise most certainly have slain me."

"And he saved you?"

"He did," said the prince, who, having risen, was able to stand by supporting himself with his sword. "He dragged me from my horse, and bade me fly. He clutched me tightly by the arm, and pulled me so I was forced to obey him; but the enemy charged, and in our hasty flight we stumbled, and something fell upon us seemingly a ton weight, and after that I remember nothing until this moment."

"I rejoice, my prince, that you are no worse hurt. I have sent your foes upon a false track, by spreading a report that you had fled to Inverness, which will make it all the easier for you to quit the field."

"I shall never know the extent of my obligation to you," said Charles Stuart; "but before we talk upon such subjects as those, we ought to see to the state of your companion."

"Dick Turpin!"

"Yes; you will find him on the ground, somewhere close to the spot where I myself laid."

"Is he killed, my prince?"

"No, I think not. I do no expect to find him any worse hurt than I am."

"That is good news," said Jack. "We were almost beginning to despair of finding him, for we have searched the field very many hours."

"Another of our companions is also missing, my prince," said Tom King, "and that is Claude Duval. During the last impetuous charge made by the king's troops we got in some manner separated, nor have we been able since to find anything of him."

"Indeed, you have been unfortunate, and yet things might have been much worse; but why do you not attend your comrade, who, I say, fell down with me?"

"Pardon us, prince. With your permission we will do so now."

"And I will sit down upon the carcase of the horse the while, for standing tires me."

As he spoke, the young Prince Charles, who was in a sadly exhausted condition, sat down upon the haunches of the war-horse, while the two highwaymen again taking their torches in their hands, commenced an examination of the dead bodies that had been buried under the noble animal.

CHAPTER CCII.

OUR FRIENDS, AFTER MUCH DIFFICULTY, FIND THE BODY OF CLAUDE DUVAL UPON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

SUDDENLY a cry broke from Tom King's lips, which was immediately echoed by one from those of Sixteen-String Jack.

They had recognised Turpin.

He was lying quite motionless, in a strange huddled-up attitude.

Instantly replacing their torches in the earth, they stooped down and straightened his limbs.

Dick groaned slightly as this was done, but he did not in any other way manifest his consciousness.

Still the sound was a welcome one to his two comrades, for it was enough to show them that life still held possession.

His body was very cold, but that was scarcely to be wondered at, considering the inclemency of the season, and the length of time he had been lying upon the ground.

Before departing upon their melancholy expedition, Tom King had taken care to provide himself with a bottle containing some kind of pungent essence, so taking the little glass stopper out of the neck, he held it to his friend's nostrils.

One inhalation was enough.

Uttering a long-drawn sigh, Turpin opened his eyes.

He looked for a minute or two confusedly about him, and then he remembered what had taken place.

He raised himself to a sitting posture, and then, by the aid of Jack's arm, gained his feet.

But he had almost taxed his strength too far.

Every object which he saw appeared to be spinning round him in mad gyrations.

By closing his eyes, however, he put an end to that.

"How are you, Dick?" asked his companions, anxiously.

"Better!"

"That is well."

"My brain swims, but I am getting the better of that now."

"It will soon cease," said Jack.

"Are you wounded?" asked Tom King. "I have looked, but did not discover any traces of one."

"No, I am not wounded—at least, I think not. It was that confounded horse that did it. He threw us down, and then fell with his whole weight on the top of us. I lay a long while perfectly aware of what was going on, but after a time I lost all consciousness."

"I think it was fortunate we found you when we did. You were doubled up in a very awkward way, and it is quite a mystery to me how you managed to draw your breath."

"It was that that finished me, my friend. You see I got into that position by my own exertions, in trying to get free from the mass above me, but I could not manage it."

"Well, well; let us be thankful you are no worse."

"Where is the prince?" cried Dick. "Have you found him? He fell down, and lay beside me, for he was buried by the horse."

"I am here," said the Young Pretender, as he stepped forward a few paces, for he had been standing on one side in order to allow the friends to speak to each other without restraint.

"And unhurt?" said Turpin.

"Quite, with the exception of some such bruises as you yourself may have received, but they are nothing."

"That is good news. Tom, my friend?"

"Yes, Dick."

"I feel rather faint."

"I suppose you do."

"Have you got such a thing about you as a drop of brandy?"

"To be sure, why didn't I think of it before. Forgive me, my friend."

"Oh! don't mention it."

"At least, it is not brandy, but it is something quite as good. I could not get brandy for love or money."

"What is it, then?" asked Dick, as he took from his comrade's hand a tolerable-sized bottle, and carried it to his lips.

"Rum."

"Better still," replied Turpin. Then, before he tasted the spirit, he turned and handed it to the prince.

"Drink," he said; "I am sure you must require some stimulant. Drink deeply, for we shall have great fatigue, doubtless, to undergo."

Thus adjured, the Young Pretender took the bottle, and drank a portion of its contents.

He then returned it to Turpin, who let it trickle down his throat at an alarming rate.

"Stop! stop!" said Tom and Jack. "Stop! stop! Don't drink it all, Dick. We shall want some left for Claude Duval."

"Claude Duval. Where is he? Not here?"

It was the first time Dick had noticed that one familiar face and form was absent.

"No," replied Tom King, "Claude is not here."

"Is he dead?"

"No. At least I hope not. We were all three thrown down and trampled upon by a sudden charge made by the enemy's troops."

"Like the prince and myself."

"Just so; but when we rose, although we searched in every direction for Claude, we could not find him."

"Has he been taken prisoner?"

"I trust not; but that is more than I can tell. I fancy we shall find him somewhere on the plain, even as we found you."

"Have you searched long?"

"Nearly four hours."

"What time is it, then?"

"I know not, but I should fancy it wants about two hours of daybreak."

"No more?"

"I fancy not."

"We must be speedy, then," said Turpin, who every moment recovered himself more and more, for the hurts he had received were really most insignificant. "We must find some safe hiding-place between now and daylight. It will never do for either the prince or ourselves to remain here."

"Very true, Dick; and so, if you are strong enough, we will resume our search for Claude at once."

"Oh, yes, I am strong enough; and you, my prince, what will you do?"

"With your permission, accompany you."

"You are most welcome so to do, but let me ask you the question that was asked of me, 'Are you strong enough?'"

"I think so. At any rate I will make the attempt, if you will lead the way."

"Agreed, my prince. I think, under all circumstances, you will be safest in our company, and should you feel the exertion beyond your powers, we can each take it in turns to support you."

"You are brave fellows," said Prince Charles. "Would that I had had a few more in my army like you, and the result would have been very different."

To this speech neither of our friends made any reply. It was a delicate point to talk upon.

Instead of speaking, then, they stooped down and took up their torches, and set forward again on their dreary task of turning over and peering into the countenance of every dead and wounded body to which they came.

The time that this consumed was really prodigious, but they toiled manfully at it.

Whatever amount of feebleness Dick Turpin might have felt, he allowed none whatever to be seen, and no one would have credited that he was so near death so short a time before.

As Dick would insist upon carrying a torch, the chief part of the pulling about fell to the share of Sixteen-String Jack, who was the only one who had his two hands at liberty, for the young prince walked by the aid of a sword which he had picked up, and which he used as a walking-stick.

On, on they went, with the same unsuccess. Hundreds of bodies had passed under their notice, but not the one they sought.

For some little time now the moon had been completely hidden by clouds, and the only light they had was such as the torches afforded them.

But now the moon broke forth again.

She was low down on the horizon, and her splendour was dimmed by the vapours that were floating in the atmosphere, and the rays which she cast upon the battle-field were dull and sickly.

But, by contrast with the darkness that had previously prevailed, they seemed comparatively bright.

Our friends were certainly enabled to see to a greater distance around them than they were before.

Sixteen-String Jack happened to stand up just as the moon thus broke forth, having been for the past few moments busily engaged in disentangling a body of men.

As he looked round, he said—

"Tom—Tom!"

"Yes."

"Glance about you. Don't this place look familiar to you."

"It does, rather. We have been here before."

"We have, that's very true, but when?"

"We have not been going over the same ground again in our search, have we?" asked Dick Turpin.

"No, no, I don't mean that; but it was just about this spot that we were when the enemy charged upon us."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, I can tell it by that little mound of earth there, which is just where we fell."

"I know it now," said Tom King, "though I did not at first."

"And Claude was with you, you say?" said Turpin, interrogating.

"He was."

"And thrown down with you?"

"To the best of our belief."

"Then it appears to me this is the most likely spot to find him."

"But we have already searched it."

"And you found him not?"

"No."

"But did you look closely?"

"Pretty well; and yet not so closely as we have done in other places."

"How was that?"

"It was before we had a torch."

"Then I have hopes yet. We shall find him here or nowhere."

"That was what we ourselves thought, but since we have had the torches we have not been able to find the place, and, so far as my knowledge goes, this is the first time we have reached it since."

"Come on, then. My prince, you are fatigued."

"I am, in truth."

"Then seat yourself upon this mound. It will provide you with a tolerably good resting-place. There seems to be no one in this part of the field but ourselves, so you will be in no danger. We are only going to search round about this place."

The young prince was only too glad to do as Dick Turpin suggested.

He seated himself and watched them.

After a few minutes the three friends came to a place where some twelve or fourteen bodies had all been displaced, and turned face upwards by some one whose errand was doubtless the same as theirs—namely, to discover a missing friend among the slain.

One of these arrested their attention immediately.

The moon shone with great clearness upon it.

Extended upon his back at full length—his legs straight and placed close together—his arms outstretched—his head thrown back, and his eyes closed—presenting, in fine, all the appearance of a dead body, was he whom they had for so long vainly sought.

Claude Duval!

CHAPTER CCIII.

THE YOUNG PRINCE AND HIS ADHERENTS HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE FROM THEIR ENEMIES.

DICK TURPIN held his torch still closer over the prostrate form

His apparel was besmeared with blood.

Blood, too, was on his hair, his face, his hands, and all around him.

Sixteen-String Jack stood motionless for a moment.

Although it was in some such plight as this which he had all along anticipated he should find his friend, yet he had at the same time cheated himself with the hope that he should find him in a much better condition than that in which he had found him.

But it was only for a moment that he allowed this feeling to retain possession of him.

Dropping his sword, he sank upon his knees, and placed his hand eagerly over his old comrade's heart.

The two others looked on in anxious suspense to know the result.

"Does he live, Jack?" they asked.

A minute elapsed, and then he replied—

"I cannot tell. I am too excited. Do you, my friend, kneel down and try. I fancy every now and then that I can feel a slight pulsation, but that may, perhaps, be in my own hand."

He drew back as he spoke, and Turpin, kneeling down, placed his hand under Claude's apparel, and immediately above the region of the heart.

"He is not dead yet," he said. "There is a pulsation, but it is so slight as almost to elude detection. We must be prompt, and we may yet restore him to life."

"I see no wound of any magnitude," said Tom King; "at all events, not one that looks as though it was sufficient to cause death. Can you?"

"No, but there is a very ugly gash in his left arm. Give me the bottle with the rum in it, and I will pour some gently down his throat."

"If there is any life in him," said Tom, as he gave Dick the article he asked for, "that will bring it back."

And the result exactly justified the words, for Dick's foot happening to slip as he was in the act of gently pouring a small quantity of spirit into his companion's mouth, about twice as much had run from the bottle than he had intended.

The effect of this upon Claude was for a minute rather alarming.

From being ashy pale, his face turned first red, then purple, and finally almost black.

A convulsive, choking movement shook his body from head to foot.

Dick dropped the bottle, and placed his arm under his head.

Then he raised him to a sitting posture.

No sooner was this done than a violent fit of coughing attacked Claude.

But our friends were by no means displeased to see this symptom of returning life.

"Give him a little more rum, Tom," said Turpin. "That will put him right. I dropped the bottle, but I don't think it is all spilled."

"No, there is a little left," said Tom. "Here, Claude, drink this."

Claude Duval swallowed about a tablespoonful of it, and then made an effort to rise.

But this his friends would not suffer him to do just at present.

They forced him to lie down.

Sixteen-String Jack addressed him.

"Speak, Claude!" he said. "Tell us, are you bodily hurt? Speak!"

"What has happened?" asked Duval, in whose brain the rum had produced a temporary confusion. "What is all this?"

"It means," replied Jack, "that the battle is over, and that we have found you among the wounded."

Claude was silent.

He was trying to recall his recollection.

"I remember now," he said, at length. "We were thrown down, and, ere I could recover myself, several fell upon me. I made several efforts to rise, but had not strength enough to do so. Nevertheless, I struggled to some distance, and then something struck me on the head. I think it was a bullet. I had been previously wounded in the left arm, and I lost a great deal of blood."

"Come—come," said Turpin. "Thank the fates, you will soon be all right; it is not half so bad as I expected; and as for the wound in your head, it can't be much, or you would not be able to speak as you do. Do you think you could rise and walk with Jack's assistance?"

"I think so. I do not feel so strong as I did a little while ago, but yet I think I could manage that."

"So do I; and besides, the sooner we are away the better. Dawn cannot be far distant. The young prince, too, is here, and waiting for us."

"He has escaped, then?"

"Without a scratch."

"Help me up, then; that's it. And you, Dick, and Tom, and Jack, I see you all around me. Have you all got off unhurt?"

"I might almost say so. We are knocked about a little, but that is all."

"Hurrah, then! That news makes me a better man directly. And now, where are we going?"

"I will speak to the prince."

"Do so."

"We will follow, then. Tom and Jack can support me between them."

"Good."

Dick Turpin, who had quite recovered from the effects of the slight hurts he had received, made his way at a run to the mound upon which the young prince was sitting.

It was distant about a hundred yards from where they had found Claude.

Upon a nearer approach he saw Prince Charles was seated in an attitude of deep dejected thought.

His elbows were resting on his knees, and his face was completely buried in his hands.

What his meditations were, who can tell?

So deeply did they absorb him that he had forgotten everything, even the place where he then was, and the danger by which he was surrounded.

He had forgotten that any one had been with him, and though they were so close at hand, he had not noticed the discovery of Claude.

So absorbed was he, that he did not hear the bold highwayman's approach.

Dick was embarrassed.

Time was precious, and yet he scarcely felt inclined to invade the privacy of the young prince's grief—for grief he could tell it was.

He knew how bitterly he must feel his defeat—that defeat which he had met in an hour when he confidently expected victory.

That his cause was now completely, hopelessly lost, he could not but be aware, nor could he blind his eyes to the fact that there would never be a hope again of raising an army in favour of his rights.

The rest of his life would be a weary blank, and when he died it must be with the conviction that he had left a great purpose unachieved.

Turpin coughed in the hope that that would arouse the prince. But no, his abstraction was too deep for that.

At last, feeling that it would never do to longer hesitate, he ventured to draw yet nearer, and touch him on the shoulder.

Charles Stuart started up instantly.

There was alarm visible in his countenance, but the moment his eye fell upon our friend, and he recognised him, the expression changed at once.

"Ha!" he said. "What is it now?"

"Pardon me, my prince," said Turpin, making a low obeisance as he spoke, "pardon me. I should not have ventured to disturb you only it was so urgent."

"Do not apologise, I beg."

"We have found our companion, and he is, I am pleased to say, but very slightly hurt."

"I am glad of that."

"I knew you would be, for he is one of the most devoted of your adherents, my prince."

"But why did you come to me?"

"It is now time to leave the battle-field. Every moment now that we stay is fraught with danger. Dawn is very close at hand. Tell us, my prince, in which direction shall we escort you."

"It does not matter now. Anywhere. To me one place is the same as another, and the grave the most acceptable of all."

"You are full of gloomy thoughts, my prince. Discard them. I am one who has known many a reverse of fortune, but I never allow myself to be cast down. I have that within me which makes me fight to the last."

"But, then, you had something to fight for."

"And so have you."

"What?"

"Your life!"

"The thing with which I would most gladly part."

"It may be now, my prince, that you feel weary of it, but there are others who would not be willing for you to quit this world. Live, if you can, and never yield your life until you are compelled, for it is a possession which once lost can never be regained."

The prince smiled faintly.

"Besides," continued Dick, "if you live you know not what time may yet bring forth. While there is life there is hope. Cling to it to the last."

"I will," said Charles. "You have made me lighter-hearted already."

"I am glad; and now let us depart. Which way shall we take? Yonder are our friends; they have halted there because they saw we were engaged in conversation."

"Call them, then. For myself, I know not which way to turn to escape my enemies, but doubtless they will be able to give us some information."

Dick Turpin beckoned with his hand for the three others to approach, for, as he had said, observing he was in deep and earnest conversation with the young prince, they had halted when they were out of earshot.

But upon perceiving Dick's signal, they instantly came to where he stood.

All three saluted the prince, and stood in silence.

Charles Stuart spoke—

"I cannot tell you which way to take," he said; "I must leave that to you."

"Then," said Tom King, "if you would permit me to advise"——

"Say on."

"A remnant of the army, which still hang together, is not very far from here. Would you like us to join them?"

"What do you advise? I have every confidence in your judgment."

"Union is strength," replied Tom. "I think we cannot do harm by joining them. We shall then see better how things stand, and form a more precise opinion of the general complexion of affairs."

"Your words are wise. It shall be done. Who can lead the way in the required direction?"

"I can."

"Do so then."

"The path lies in a direct line across the battle-field, my prince. Would you please follow in my steps."

CHAPTER CCIV.

OUR FRIENDS ESCAPE BY A HAIR'S-BREADTH A GREAT DANGER ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

Just as the little party set themselves in motion, a faint white light appeared in the eastern horizon, which gradually diffused itself over all things.

The dawn had at last come.

It made the dismal scene by which they were surrounded look very chill, and very, very ghastly.

The upturned faces of the dead bodies that strewed their path seemed of a preternatural whiteness.

The morning came on with alarming rapidity; at least, it seemed so to our friends, the peril of whose situation grew greater as it advanced.

The distance they had to go across the open plain to reach the spot of which Tom spoke was very considerable, and they could not make such speed as they wished for several reasons, not the least of which was the numerous bodies and pools of blood through which they had to pick their way.

Those who followed kept continually glancing around them, in order that no foe should approach them at unawares; but, so far as they could tell at present, they seemed to have the place quite to themselves.

The many little parties of searchers had one by one disappeared, and now not one remained in sight.

When near the outskirts, however, Tom King perceived before him in the distance two mounted soldiers approaching.

They were too far removed for him to be able to say whether they were friends or foes.

In this state of things, he deemed it best to halt at once.

"What are you stopping for, Tom?" asked Dick, in some surprise.

"Two mounted soldiers are coming at a gallop from the very place, apparently, to which we are going. Whether they are or are not our enemies, I cannot from this distance make out. They are as likely to be one as the other."

"I see them," cried his auditors, "and I can see more behind. They are our enemies."

"Down, then," cried Tom King, who did not stop to see whether his comrades were right; "down with you, every one, or we shall be perceived, and then it will be too late!"

"I understand," said Turpin. "You mean us to feign death."

"Exactly. If they are our friends who are now coming we can easily make ourselves known to them, and if they are our enemies they will pass us by."

"I trust they may. I can hear their hoofs now I am upon the ground. They are in good force, be they whom they may."

"Crawl along out of the way," cried Tom, "we seem now to be in their direct line, and it will be no treat to be ridden over by a detachment of cavalry."

This was a fact that did not need impressing upon any of them, and they crawled away as fast as they were able in the direction of the other dead bodies on the plain.

When fairly amongst these, they threw themselves down into various attitudes, and remained profoundly still.

Tramp—tramp—tramp, the hollow beat of the horses' hoofs, coming at one steady pace, reached their ears with greater plainness every moment.

Dick Turpin had managed to dispose himself so that he could obtain a view of the ground before him.

In a few minutes, the two soldiers who rode first, came near enough for him to distinguish their uniforms, and he said, in a low tone—

"Lie still, my friends, and simulate death as well as you can. They are our foes who are now approaching."

The words were, of course, enough to make them obey instantly.

That they would safely escape the scrutiny of the soldiers there seemed every probability, provided they properly carried out the character they had assumed.

Dick Turpin was lying with his body partially concealed behind that of one of the king's soldiers, and being thus screened, he was able to continue his watch without any fear of being noticed.

All he hoped was, the troop would continue in the same direction as they had begun, for if they did, it would then bring them past where our friends lay at a distance of several yards from them.

And now the two soldiers who were, he supposed, sent on as a kind of advance-guard to reconnoitre, he found were gradually slanting towards him.

Still he hoped they would pass, or, at all events, that they would not discover them, for, if they did, their case would be hopeless; for against such a superior force it would be madness to contend.

Apparently, however, they looked neither to the right nor the left, but kept straight on their course.

Dick ceased to look, and held his breath.

The two soldiers swept past.

But they were very near them, and he thought it very questionable whether the troop behind would pass without trampling over them.

"I fear we have not got far enough away," he said to his comrades, who were very anxious about their position, but yet dared not move. "But, if they do, you must bear it, and not betray your being in life if you can possibly help it, or we are lost indeed."

"All right, Dick."

"Silence, now. They are coming."

And, in fact, the jingling of their weapons and accoutrements could now be heard among the medley of other sounds, and this alone was enough to indicate their proximity, and the consequent necessity there was for them to keep silent.

Stiffening themselves in their different positions, they steeled themselves to bear the worst.

But fickle Fortune for once was on the side of the highwaymen and the persecuted young prince.

The body of troops, to the number of two hundred, passed by.

They were not seen.

They were not ridden over.

Nor was their ruse suspected even, let alone detected.

The troop rode in a compact body, and took its way across the battle-field in the direction where the king's army was encamped.

Dick waited for a long time before he would allow his companions to move, and before he ventured to move himself.

He feared there might be some stragglers, and to be seen by any one of them would have been fatal.

But at last they rose, all thankful for the narrow escape they had had, but yet wishing they had been able to pass on their way unhindered.

While they had laid there, however imperative the necessity might be, they had lost much valuable time.

Not only had day dawned, but the sun had risen, and all around them could be seen with the greatest distinctness.

While crossing the open space, they could not fail to be conspicuous objects.

There was no help for it, however; they must run the risk of being seen.

At the best speed of which they were capable, then, they crossed the remainder of the moor, but, fortunately for their chances of not being discovered, the distance they had to go was but short.

In going that distance, too, they were so lucky as not to perceive a single person.

All of them much wished, of course, that they were provided with steeds, but they did not waste any time in vain regrets.

Under the direction of Tom King, they took the way which he believed would bring them up with the remaining portion of the Pretender's army.

But, though they toiled on for many hours, they could neither see nor hear any indications of its presence.

The road wound in between inaccessible and lofty rocks.

It was hare and difficult to travel, but still, without uttering a word of complaint, they kept steadily on.

Several times during their journey they were forced to hide from their foes, either by ascending trees or crouching behind huge masses of rock.

But, so far, they had kept clear of all mischances.

In this way they continued until night began to fall.

Then they were all tired and hungry. They had during their march rested many times, and eaten such food as they carried with them, but, nevertheless, when darkness began to close around them, and they saw nothing in advance to make them think they were nearing the flying army, they felt the absolute necessity for a long rest and sleep.

Besides, without a guide it would be in the dark most dangerous to attempt to continue in the path they were travelling, for they had reached the wildest part of Invernesshire, and their path lay constantly amid the mountains.

At times there would be upon one side of them a precipitous wall of cliff, the top of which would tower high above their heads.

Then on the other there would be a deep abyss—sometimes the bed of a mountain stream, at other times a precipice forming the brink of a ravine.

A short council was held as to what they had better do, when they decided that they would push on as long as they had light to do so, in the hope that they might reach some place where they could pass the night in greater comfort than they could in the open air.

From their enemies, the king's troops, they did not consider they had much to fear. The region into which they had penetrated was one into which they would not care to venture, and as for any of the inhabitants that they might find in that inhospitable region, the young Prince fully counted upon their loyalty and devotion to him not to seek to do him injury.

Whether he was right in holding this good opinion, or whether he was not, we shall very shortly see.

When it grew quite dark, which was not long, for it is one of the peculiarities of mountain districts that night comes on with great rapidity, they found themselves apparently as far off their object as ever.

Their own safety at last compelled them to come to a halt.

What they should do next was a question that increased in difficulty every moment.

The prospect of having to sleep all night upon the hard rocks was anything but an agreeable one.

"Are there no shepherds' huts about this place?" asked Turpin.

"I know not," replied the prince.

"There is a narrow footpath here, which seems to lead off among the mountains. Perhaps that may conduct to one."

"But the passage of it may be dangerous."

"With your permission, I will go alone, and ascertain."

"No!" interrupted the young prince, "let us all keep together. The path seems smooth, though narrow. I think, by exercising common caution, we may ascertain to what place it leads, and I am sure, gentlemen, I think it will be worth the trouble to try to ascertain."

CHAPTER CCV.

THE HIGHLAND BANDITTI IN THE CAVERN FIND THE PRINCE AND HIS FRIENDS FOOD AND SHELTER.

"UNDOUBTEDLY so, my prince," replied Tom King; "but, as you see, the path is very narrow."

"Well?"

"Then, as I proposed it, I hope you will allow me the privilege of going first."

"With all my heart, but pray take care. It would be sad indeed for a brave, gallant heart like you are to quit life in so dismal a fashion as falling over some deep precipice."

Tom laughed, and commenced traversing the narrow mountain path which he had been the first to discover.

The others were compelled to follow him in Indian file, for in no place was it wide enough for two to walk abreast.

Tom King, as we have said, went first.

Dick Turpin followed.

Then came the young prince.

The rear was brought up by Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval.

The latter was much better than, under all the circumstances, he could be hoped to be; but Claude had not only an iron constitution but an iron will, which enabled him to triumph over the infirmities of the body.

But, for all that, his unsteady gait proclaimed the debility under which he was labouring.

The mountain path was long and tortuous.

To add to its difficulties, too, it had an upward tendency, and in places the incline was so steep that they had much ado to ascend it.

But the sides were all the time hemmed in with walls of rock, so the only danger they ran was that of losing their proper path, or of some of the pieces of rock above falling upon them.

But this last was such a remote contingency that it scarcely, if at all, entered into their calculations.

On they went steadily and perseveringly.

They were encouraged to proceed by the conviction that grew in force in the breasts of all of them that this well-kept path must lead somewhere or other.

And the end showed them to be perfectly correct.

The path terminated upon a kind of plateau, about halfway up the side of a tall mountain.

Three sides of this plateau were hemmed in by the mountain.

The fourth was the one by which our friends had gained it.

As soon as they stood upon this place they saw before them a fissure in the rock.

But in the darkness the fissure would never have been visible, save from one circumstance.

It was faintly lighted up.

Our friends almost hailed the sight with a shout of welcome, but prudence restrained the sound.

They did not know yet who or what they had to deal with.

This, however, from what the reader already knows of the highwaymen's characters, was a state of things that was not likely to be of any great duration.

Without speaking a word, but motioning to the rest to remain where they were and be silent, Tom King crept forward carefully to reconnoitre.

The fissure in the rock was soon reached.

He peered cautiously round the side of it.

The sight which met his gaze was at once well qualified to call forth his pleasure and admiration.

At the further extremity of a large cavern, hollowed by the hand of nature out of primeval rock, was a huge fire.

It seemed to be composed entirely of wood, and it burned with great briskness, and the glow it cast irradiated the whole place.

Before this fire, on a very rude spit indeed, hung what in the distance looked like either a pig or a sheep, but Tom could not tell which.

And this was not all he saw.

There were, as might be supposed, some human occupants of this place.

They were six highland soldiers.

Great brawny men they were, real types of their class, but their faces were pinched and hollow, and their uniform hung in tatters about them.

This unlooked for spectacle, full of picturesqueness as it was, made Tom King remain at the entrance of the cave immovable.

His friends, who could not any longer curb their impatience, crept towards him.

He heard them coming, but, ere he could turn or speak, they had reached the spot, and had seen the same as he had, and with equal astonishment.

For a moment they stood as he had.

But, as may be anticipated, they had made some slight noise in their approach, and the highlanders had heard it.

Not dreading anything in the shape of an attack, they had laid aside the heavier portions of their armour.

But, seizing their swords with martial quickness, they ran towards the outlet of the cave.

Had it not been for the presence of the young prince, the position of our friends would have been rather desperate.

He, however, in a moment recognised the features of the men before him.

He had noticed them in the battle, where they had made themselves conspicuous by their daring actions.

Without the least hesitation, he took off his plumed hat, and walked quietly a pace or two inside the cave.

The man who had hastened forward with such fierce gestures stopped abruptly.

They knew him.

Despite his haggard look, despite his ragged dress, for the day's scrambling over rocks, and the stains of battle had not improved it, they knew him.

With one accord, then, and as though each breast was simultaneously animated by the same impulse, they all sank down upon their knees, and bowed their heads in reverent submission.

It would be by no means an easy task to define the feeling which these lawless, uncivilzed men had for their prince. In it there was no slight trait of ancient feudalism, and this is scarcely to be wondered at, when we consider how long that system of government was retained in the highlands by the more powerful chiefs.

These six men, as their plaid indicated, were members of the clan of Macdonald, who, to the last, remained steadfast to the Pretender's cause, and, unlike others, boldly and defiantly proclaimed it.

These Macdonalds, then, in the cave, with their rude and uncultivated intellects, looked upon a Stuart as a being second only to the Deity himself, and they paid respect to this last representative of the ancient and once powerful race.

And here let us remark that this incident is no fiction. These men actually had existence, and were found in the cavern by the prince, and received him in the manner we have described; and no better proof of their loyalty can be given that not even the large reward of £30,000 offered for the prince's head would tempt them to betray him.

Divided between them, it must be borne in mind that this large sum would be sufficient to provide them with an ample income for the remainder of their lives; and many a man has been tempted into committing the most atrocious crimes for less than half such an inducement.

But the prince trusted these men. In fact, he felt quite safe with them, and assured that nothing whatever would tempt them to betray him.

He bowed deeply in return to their salutation, and in a pleasant tone of voice bade them rise.

This they did, and stood with their arms still folded on their breasts, and their eyes bent upon the ground.

Prince Charles advanced, followed by the four highwaymen, who had witnessed this scene with the greatest astonishment.

Of course, they did not feel that amount of reliance upon the fidelity of these highlanders that the prince did. But, upon their parts, this was nothing more than natural. They did not know their loyal nature, and in their lives they had seen enough of human nature to make them more than ordinarily suspicious.

Everything was done by these men that lay in their power to make the young prince and his companions comfortable.

A couple of rude benches were placed at a convenient distance from the fire for them to sit upon, and they warmed themselves until the roast was finished.

It was a small sheep, which had by some means or other fallen into their hands—most likely it had been "lifted," as they called taking things when there was no one looking—but, whether this was so or not, the sheep was there.

As it was the least trouble, the sheep had just been trussed and hung before the fire, whole as it was.

It was suspended from the roof of the cavern by a stout rope.

The prince and his friends arrived just in time, for the sheep was almost cooked.

The mode in which they ate it was at once singular and picturesque.

The only implement they had to serve them for both knife and fork was their daggers.

But hungry men are always willing to put up with some trifling inconvenience when an enticing meal is before them.

The daggers were sharp, and so one by one, with great dexterity, they went up to the fire, and each one cut off a slice as the meat hung before the fire.

Of course the prince was allowed the precedence, and then our friends followed.

The slices they each cut off were really prodigious, but by the time the six gigantic highlanders had taken their portion, there was little more than a frame of bones left behind.

In fact, a glance into their gaunt countenances would have been enough to show that their fare had lately been of the hardest.

For about a quarter of an hour nothing was heard in the cave but the grinding of jaws.

After a time, however, their appetites were appeased, and then they felt a new want.

Like the want of food, it was imperious.

Sleep.

That was what they all required.

The prince set the example to the rest by flinging himself full length upon the rocky floor of the cavern before the fire.

One by one the others followed him, and lay down likewise.

All but one highlander, and he was posted at the entrance of the cave as a sentinel, in order to give the alarm to his slumbering companions in case any danger should present itself.

So passed the night.

The sentinel nodded, but there was no need in reality for keeping watch.

CHAPTER CCVI.

THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND SURROUNDS THE MOUNTAIN CAVERN.—THE YOUNG HIGHLANDER'S STRATAGEM.

This cave, which had been so providentially discovered by the young prince and his four followers, afforded them a shelter for five weeks.

At frequent intervals during that period single spies had been sent forth to reconnoitre, but they all returned with the same intelligence.

The closest search was being made in every direction by the Duke of Cumberland for the young prince, and they were in imminent danger of being discovered in their hiding-place.

But they did not dare to leave it, as by so doing they would only have exposed themselves to fresh dangers.

By the advice, however, of Dick Turpin, the pathway, in its narrowest part between the rocks, had been choked up by a huge fragment of stone, which had been cast down from the crags above.

The only way by which the cave could be gained and left was by a route circuitous and difficult.

During these five weeks they had been several times driven to great straits for the procuration of sufficient food, and, indeed, the chief thing they had to subsist upon was the flesh of such wild goats as they were lucky enough to capture.

And here we pause a moment to supply an omission.

No doubt many of our readers have asked "What became of Black Bess all this time? Where did Turpin lodge her?"

Strictly speaking, we should have related in its proper place that, after joining the prince's army, Dick naturally felt unwilling to run the risk of taking his valuable mare with him during the campaign, and he had said as much to Prince Charles.

His half-implied request met with immediate attention, and one night during their stay at the house of a Scottish gentleman, Sir Kenneth Grant, the prince personally requested him to take care of his friend's mare until such time as he should come or send for her.

This Sir Kenneth readily promised to do, and so Black Bess had been in safety and security, while her owner had been so many times in such great peril.

The mass of incident pressing upon us for speedy recital drove this from our mind, and so it was not set down in the proper place, and with this explanation we will leave it, trusting that the time is not far distant when Dick Turpin, the highwayman, will mount his bonny mare, Black Bess, and resume his old daring and romantic career.

[THE YOUNG PRETENDER AND HIS FRIENDS ARE SHIPWRECKED ON THE COAST OF BARRA.]

For a little while, however, we must continue to follow his fortunes with the Young Pretender.

It is, then, five weeks, or rather more, after the night when they found shelter in the cavern, that we again introduce them to the reader.

The youngest of the six highlanders had just returned from a spying expedition.

The intelligence he brought back was most alarming. Under the direction of the Duke of Cumberland, orders had been transmitted to all the towns and villages along the two arms of the sea, between Inverness and Edinburgh, to stop any person without a passport from the duke himself, or the magistrates of Edinburgh. The same instructions were also sent to all the seaports of Great Britain, prohibiting all masters of merchant vessels from receiving any person on board without a passport, or contributing in any manner to the escape of a rebel (for such, of course, was the term applied to all the young prince's adherents), under pain of high treason, and of being liable to the same punishment as those who had taken arms.

And this was not all, for the duke had also, at the same time, detached his cavalry into the low country at the foot of the mountains, to seize all those who might present themselves without passports to cross the first arm of the sea, with orders to send out continual patrols along the coast, and to search all the towns and villages in the neighbourhood of the sea.

The principal, and indeed the sole object whom the duke had in taking all these proceedings, was to secure the body of the Young Pretender; and it states in history that his instructions to his commanders were, not to take him a prisoner, but to put him to instant death.

It was in consequence of this cruel and savage order, as well as the other atrocities committed by his sanction, that he obtained the nickname by which he was ever afterwards known of "the Butcher."

This news naturally filled the prince and the few devoted adherents with him with alarm and almost despair.

Unable to leave their present shelter, they were like rats who had taken refuge in a trap, for they felt certain if the duke continued his search, as doubtless he would do, their hiding-place would be discovered, and the force of their enemies so overwhelming, that resistance would be quite out of the question.

In this state of affairs much anxious consultation took place.

The young prince himself laboured under a great depression of spirits, so that our friends had the direction of affairs almost in their own hands.

One of the things they deemed advisable was to send a man to the highest portion of the mountain, or the place from which the most extensive view of the surrounding scenery could be obtained, who was to keep a vigilant watch, and give them timely notice should any of the enemy approach.

This duty was taken in turns by the six highlanders, for our friends had not the same ability to scale the precipitous rocks that these hardy Scots had.

By this time, we ought to say, Claude Duval had quite recovered from his wounds.

The one in his arm, although it looked by far the worse of the two, got well first; the one in his head, which had been caused by a bullet, had given them a great deal of trouble.

But now it was quite well, and he was once more the same man as he had formerly been.

Their looks, however, had by no means improved during their stay, but such a triviality as that was not likely to concern them much.

As the five sat around the fire—that is to say, the prince and the four highwaymen—they looked about as lugubrious as they well could. Tom King especially, for he had two causes for vexation: his companions were discontented at their lot, and he felt that it was through his advocacy of the step that they had taken it, and they seemed to be a continual reproach; and in the second place, he was deeply concerned for the position of Prince Charles.

Moodily, therefore, they all sat around the fire.

The gloom which hung around the prince seemed also to envelop them.

What to do, or how they were to hope to make their escape, they knew not.

Could they but gain the sea-shore at Lochnanuagh, near which place the men in the cave informed them the Macdonalds and the Camerons would be found, they doubted not that these powerful chieftains would find some means of evading the embargo which the sanguinary duke had laid; but to reach this much-desired spot they would have to cross the line which the king's troops formed across the country.

To accomplish this feat seemed absolutely impossible, and, in fact, was so while their vigilance continued as active as it then was.

And so, with this uppermost in their minds, each one seeking to find some way out of the difficulty, but without success, all five sat gazing at the embers of the fire.

Apart from them, and quite out of earshot, were the five highlanders.

The sixth was outside on guard.

Like the others, they looked dejected and hopeless, occasionally speaking to each other in a low tone, in their own uncouth, guttural language.

And so the night passed.

How it was the duke had failed to discover their hiding-place they could not think; and yet, when we take the size of the country into consideration, it was not so remarkable as it looked.

Morning came.

Those in the cave did not observe the flush of dawn, but they were made aware of it by the signal of their comrade who was on guard outside, and who had been long anxiously looking for it.

Another of the men was sent on duty, and the one who had passed the night on the lonely peaks above came in.

He was the youngest of these highland banditti, and there was in his youthful countenance an expression of ingenuousness of which the others were altogether deficient.

The resemblance in complexion and general configuration of countenance to the Young Pretender had been frequently remarked by all present; and by any one who was not in the habit of seeing them together, this one might be mistaken for the other.

Of course, as is the case with most such likenesses, they ceased to be striking when the two were seen side by side, for then the little differences which existed showed themselves.

The frank behaviour of this young man made him a general favourite with all; and many a time, when all the rest had been desponding as they were now, he had infused hope into their breasts by his own sanguine enthusiasm.

But on the present occasion it was noticed, when he returned, his face was totally changed.

It was stern and determined, as though he had resolved upon some course of action which it would require all his nerve to carry out.

And his face was a true index of what was really the case. He had resolved upon a particular plan of action, and the result of it was to save his prince and free him from the perils that surrounded him.

What this plan of action was the next few lines will speedily develop.

It was, indeed, one that made it necessary for him to summon up all his self-command—all his stoicism—all his loyalty for the unfortunate prince he served.

The change in his looks and manner was noticed by all present, but no remark was made. No doubt it was thought that he, like them, had at last succumbed to that despair which weighed upon their own minds.

The young highlander, however, ate some food in silence. Then he called one of his comrades apart, and spoke.

What he said none knew; but those who had the curiosity to look on saw that a look of admiration overspread the features of the man addressed, which in a moment afterwards changed to the deepest and utmost dissuasion.

CHAPTER CCVII.

SUSPICION IS GENERATED IN DICK TURPIN'S BREAST BY THE MYSTERIOUS CONDUCT OF THE HIGHLANDERS.

One by one, however, the young highlander called his comrades aside, and addressed them.

From some he received encouragement; from others—and these were the ones who felt the deepest interest in his welfare—the reverse.

But by his way it could be seen that his mind was firmly made up—that what he heard made no difference to him—that he merely submitted his intention to them for the purpose of obtaining their opinion, and yet not for that opinion to bias him.

But the oldest highlander, who seemed to have some degree of command over the rest, addressed him earnestly; and in the end it would seem that they managed in some way to compromise the matter between themselves.

Dick Turpin had not failed to notice these whispered conferences between the men, and apprised his three friends of it.

In common with himself they looked upon it with apprehension.

For their own parts, they had no great faith in the devotion of these men like the young prince had, but then they had all four during their careers seen quite enough to make them distrustful.

They knew how great a temptation a reward of £30,000 would be to any one, but especially to these men, who were not only in want of the necessaries of life, but had also placed themselves in a position of great danger.

Of course, if they remained where they were and were discovered with the prince (and that they would be ere long discovered appeared a certainty), their lives, as well as his, would be taken; but if, on the other hand, they betrayed him, they would receive the reward, and not only that, but a free pardon also, for such was the condition attached to the proclamation of the reward.

These, it must be conceded, were powerful inducements to make these men act treacherously to their prince, and it was while having these considerations in view, that the highwaymen were suspicious of them.

Immediately after sunrise one of the men was sent out as a spy.

Our friends would fain have prevented his departure, but they were unable to do so.

The man left

Full of fresh uneasiness, our friends whispered to each other, and consulted as to what course they should pursue in this alarming crisis of their fortunes. They wished to communicate their suspicions to the prince, but he was so cast down that, for compassion's sake, they forbore to do so.

And so, with their minds in a state of indescribable anxiety and suspense, the time wore on.

And to the credit of the highwaymen be it said that, though they might have found safety in flight, they did not attempt to gain it. A desertion of the man who had so amazingly favoured them at such a time they felt to be an act of baseness such as they would never commit, let things eventuate how they might.

They waited, therefore, to see what would happen next. They had steeled themselves to hear the worst.

Above all, they kept a keen eye upon the young highlander whose conduct had first excited their suspicion, but in his countenance, stern and severe as it was, they saw nothing to indicate a traitor.

They were perplexed, too, by the behaviour of the others, for whenever they looked upon them their faces assumed an expression compounded strangely of compassion and admiration.

What this meant the highwaymen were unable to conclude.

But the day, contrary to their expectations, wore away without any new danger manifesting itself.

The man, however, who had been ostensibly sent out as a spy, did not return.

To be sure, on former occasions they had been absent for much longer periods, and their absence unnoticed or uncommented on, but now our friends counted every hour with feverish eagerness.

At last, to so great a pitch did their impatience and uneasiness rise, that they left the fire, and made their way to the entrance of the cave.

It was quite dark.

No moon lighted up the wild and magnificent scenery by which they were encompassed, and the pale, twinkling stars only partially defined the huge mountains in their immediate vicinity.

A dead silence was around them, unbroken even by the murmuring of the wind among those shrubs which found a scanty sustenance upon the rocky soil.

It was, too, intensely cold, and, as is generally the case under such circumstances, the air was very clear, and capable of carrying the faintest sound to a great distance.

It was while they stood upon the small plateau, which we have already mentioned as being outside the cave, that all four were startled by a slight noise.

It came suddenly, and ceased with equal abruptness, leaving those who heard it no opportunity of learning what it was.

They listened, however, with great eagerness for the repetition of the sound.

Nor was it long in coming.

A little while, and then they felt certain some one was approaching the spot upon which they stood.

But who?

It was too dark, and the comer was too distant for them to distinguish him.

It might be, and probably was, the spy who had been sent out in the morning returning.

It would be no harm, the highwaymen thought, to draw aside and see who it really was, without affording any indication of their presence.

To conceal themselves by standing in the shadow of the rocks was an easy enough matter, and they executed the manœuvre in perfect silence.

Plainer and plainer grew the sound which they had at first heard.

One person only was coming they felt certain, but the intense silence and sonorousness of the air had deceived them with regard to the distance he was from them, and they had to wait for his making his appearance much longer than they anticipated.

But at length he came.

Their vision had become accustomed to the darkness, and they saw a dark figure creeping stealthily up the steep pathway leading to the plateau.

When he drew himself up and stood before them, they found their conjectures correct.

It was the highlander who had been sent out to reconnoitre the position of the enemy, and bring back a report.

He did not hesitate or even glance around him, but walked straight to the entrance of the cave.

Our friends felt almost ashamed of themselves for the suspicions they had harboured, so unsinister was the behaviour of this man.

Nevertheless, they allowed him to enter the cave, and when the sound of his footsteps had quite died away, they listened again.

But this time all was still.

Feeling all but convinced that they had misinterpreted what they had seen, they returned to the cave.

When they entered, they saw in a moment that the spy who had come back had brought with him some intelligence of rather a startling kind.

All were crowding round him, and it could be easily seen that he shared to the full the excitement which every one experienced.

This made the highwaymen hasten forward to listen to what he was saying.

We will not tire the patience of the reader by repeating the speech in his own outlandish dialect, but reduce the substance of it to plain English.

"On all sides," he said, "the king's troops were surrounding them. The Duke of Cumberland was furious at the delay which had already taken place in not capturing the young prince, and had issued his orders in a more peremptory manner than before. To still further exert the men, he had determined upon taking the task of hunting him (the prince) to death in his own person, and that very day had set out, at the head of a large detachment of foot-soldiers. Some suspicion as to his whereabouts appeared to hold a place in the duke's breast, and he was conducting the search with the greatest circumspection and the utmost precision, never going over the same ground twice, and never leaving any place unvisited.

This news was indeed alarming, and seemed to point to their immediate and certain discovery, for in what way were they to prevent it?

The spy further stated that he had had the greatest difficulty in eluding detection, and that once he had to lie concealed among some rocks to avoid being seen by the enemy, or he would have been back much earlier to inform them of the great danger in which they all stood.

The highwaymen could not help regarding this man with admiration. Unquestionably he had had the opportunity of betraying the young prince, and also the opportunity of making his own escape, a thing that now seemed impossible.

The effect of this news upon Prince Charles himself was really heart-breaking to witness.

Up to the present moment, thanks to the representations of our friends, he had still clung to the hope that he should at least escape from Scotland and rejoin his parents, if he did no more.

Now that hope was entirely reft from him.

While his foes continued as energetic as they appeared to be, he knew well enough that he had not the slightest chance.

The stupor of despair settled upon him and upon all.

What could save them?

Nothing.

Nothing but the adoption of some clever scheme by which their enemies could be hoodwinked.

But what stratagem was this?

None at all any one would think who considers how destitute they were of resources.

And yet we shall see how something was proposed that was exactly calculated to achieve the required aim.

The young highlander to whom we have lately so repeatedly made allusion stood forward, and, despite the opposition which some of his companions made, addressed Prince Charles.

CHAPTER CCVIII.

THE YOUNG HIGHLANDER UNFOLDS HIS PLAN OF SELF-SACRIFICING DEVOTION TO PRINCE CHARLES.

THE Young Pretender had assumed what recently had been a favourite attitude.

He had seated himself upon the rude bench near the fire placed his elbows upon his knees, and allowed his face to fall between his hands.

But when he heard the deep rough tones of the young highlander's voice, he raised his head and looked at him—not without surprise.

"My prince," he said, "you have heard, as I have, the report which our scout has to-day brought back to us; and, having done so, you must be well aware that to-morrow it will be no good to send out any one; by that time we shall have fallen into the hands of our enemies!"

"I am afraid it will be as you say. I have resigned myself to that, and so should you. When it comes to the last and the worst, we can only die like brave men, with our claymores in our grasp and our backs to the ground. For myself I will never surrender with life, but fight it out to the last!"

A murmur of admiration came from the lips of the highlanders as the prince gave utterance to this resolute and martial speech.

"I do not doubt your bravery, my prince," responded the young man; "but will you pardon me if I suggest a means by which you can throw your enemies off their guard, and so afford you an opportunity of making your escape?"

"If you can show me how to do that," said Charles Stuart, the fire of renewed hope kindling in his eyes, "I will not only pardon you, but you shall have my best thanks—and not only mine, but those of all here present."

"But, my prince," interposed the chief of the highlanders, "you know not the means of which he speaks, and when you are made acquainted with them, I am quite certain you will never consent to such a sacrifice."

"Heed him not, prince," said the young highlander. "Listen to me, I pray, and do not be offended with what I propose, nor deny my request out of any consideration for myself."

"That will depend," said the Pretender. "Speak, and let me hear. Speak freely, too, for there is nothing of which you need be afraid."

"You encourage me," was the reply, "and yet I don't know how to frame my speech or give utterance to my wishes. My prince, forgive me for my presumption, but have you noticed that in general outline there is some resemblance between you and me, sufficient to deceive any one who was not very intimately acquainted with you indeed?"

"I had not noticed the circumstance until you spoke, but now"—and Charles Stuart looked closely at him as he spoke—"I wonder how it is that anything so obvious and conspicuous can have escaped my notice."

"It has been seen and remarked by others. Look closely at me, prince, and tell me whether you consider the resemblance sufficiently great to deceive any one who had not seen you many times."

"In the face, most certainly," replied Charles. "But," he added, in accents of the greatest astonishment and incredulity, "surely you do not for a moment dream of securing my safety by giving yourself up to my enemies—by personating myself!"

"Pardon my presumption, prince, I beg!"

"But was that your idea? Is it possible that you ever seriously entertained the idea of"——

"Not only is it possible, but true."

"Never!"

"My prince, surely you do not doubt me!"

"No; forgive me; I would never do that; and yet, at first, I found myself almost unable to believe in the existence of loyal devotion of so chivalric a character."

"You flatter me."

"Not I; no one could ever accuse me of that. But, come, I shall not think of granting your request of allowing such a sacrifice to be made; but gratify my curiosity by telling me the plan you had formed."

"Your wishes are law, my prince; but when I tell you, it will be in the hope of gaining more than your curiosity, —your approval likewise."

Charles Stuart shook his head, and made a movement with his hand for the young man to commence.

He obeyed at once.

"You must know that last night, my prince, it fell to my lot to be placed outside upon the summit of the rock, to watch for the appearance of our enemies, and give timely notice of their approach.

"In my long, weary watch, with no one near me—no sound to break the awful stillness—no sight to see but the blue sky and stars, and the dusky outlines of the mountains—many strange and solemn thoughts occupied my mind.

"I thought, my prince, of you. I reviewed the whole of your present position, and saw how full of danger it was; and as I continued to gaze upon them, I became more and more impressed with the extreme difficulty you would have in avoiding them.

"Naturally enough, having reached this point, I pursued my thoughts still further, and having realized the full extent of the peril which impended over you, I began to cast about for some means by which it could be averted.

"For a long time, my prince, I endeavoured in vain to find a means that carried with it any appearance of feasibility of accomplishing so desirable an end. I was unable to see in what manner the vigilance of your enemies could be eluded.

"And then, not to weary you too much with a recital of my reflections, I thought that the only thing that could be done would be in some way to deceive your foes, and lull them into a feeling of false security.

"But, although conscious of the desirability of this, I could not concoct a scheme which would be calculated to effect it.

"At last, my prince, and I trust you will pardon me for the idea, the fact of the remarkable resemblance—in features, I mean—which exists between us pressed itself upon me.

"I had myself noticed it, and been surprised, and those who are with me have frequently spoken of it to me.

"Then I thought to myself, 'Suppose I was to make the proposition to the prince that I should personate him, and give myself up to the enemy.' Knowing you so slightly as they do, I feel sure that the deception would not be detected. When they had me prisoner under the impression that I was you, they would cease their rigorous search, and you would then have the best of all chances of reaching the sea-shore and making your way back again to France."

"I have heard you to the end without interrupting you," replied Charles Stuart; "not because I assented to what you said, but because I wished to hear all. Never did I dream that I should ever have so devoted a follower as your words prove you to be—never did I believe that such chivalrous devotion existed in these degenerate times."

The young highlander bowed deeply at these words of praise from the prince he was willing to serve so faithfully, and a flush of gratified colour mounted to his cheeks.

Charles Stuart, however, did not allow him to speak, but continued—

"You have not heard all, my friend—for such I should feel proud to call you—you have not heard all. Much as I may admire the loyal devotion which prompted the imagining of such a plan, and, however much I may desire the end which it is intended to achieve, I cannot for a moment think of accepting so great a sacrifice."

"Sacrifice, my prince!"

"Yes; do you not know the consequences of acting in the manner you proposed. If you gave yourself up to the Duke of Cumberland, and passed yourself off as being me, what do you think would be the result—whether or not detection should ensue."

"I know it, my prince."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes!"

"It is death!"

"I am aware of that, my prince," said the young highlander, firmly; "but I have devoted myself to your service, and I am quite willing to lay down my life in it."

The Young Pretender, in the present extremity of his fortunes, was much overcome by the behaviour of this follower.

In the hour of his prosperity, much as he might have thought of such an act, had it been related to him, still it would not have made the impression which it now did while he was destitute of friends and hope.

But let us do him the justice to say that he never once thought of accepting the sacrifice so pleadingly proffered, though he was pleased to learn the extent of this young man's devotion.

"You are silent, my prince," he continued. "I trust you are reflecting upon the proposition I have made, and that in the end you will accept it."

"No, it is not that," replied the Pretender. "Never could I dream of accepting such a sacrifice."

"Why a sacrifice?"

"Shall you not sacrifice your life?"

"My life, prince?"

"Yes."

"What is it that I should not win gladly if done in your service? That is no more than the duty of all who rank themselves under your banner, to consider for you if they can—if not, to die."

"Say on," exclaimed the prince, "the more you say the greater becomes my admiration."

"Alas!"

"Why do you say alas?"
